De Benham went up to the captain with extended hand.

"Captain Hay," he said, frankly, "I spoke just now under excitement—I beg your pardon."

The captain grunted, and yielded his hand somewhat unwillingly.

"It is not the supercargo's place, Mr. Debenham, to question the discretion of the captain," he said with some asperity—and turned away.

De Benham accepted the rebuke in silence, knowing that he had deserved it.

The night passed over without further incident, and by five o'clock next morning, the Stormy Petrel was within eight hours of her destination. Both captain and pilot had calculated on making considerably less way in the time, and had allowed a much wider margin for detours and delays: so that now they were not a little perplexed at finding themselves so near the end of their journey. To go on was impossible; for they could only hope to slip through the cordon under cover of the night. And yet to remain where they were was almost as bad. However, they had no alternative; so, after some little consultation, they agreed to lie-to for the present, keeping up their steam meanwhile, and holding themselves in readiness to repeat the manoeuvres of yesterday whenever any vessel hove in sight.

The fog had now cleared off. The day was brilliant; the sky one speckless dome of intensest blue; the sun, an intolerable Splendour fast climbing to the zenith. The blockade-runners, who would have given much for dark and cloudy weather, revenged themselves by saying uncivil things of the glorious luminary; till presently a long, black, horizontal cloud on the horizon warned them of a steamer in the offing, whereupon they edged away in the opposite direction as quickly as possible.

And now their troubles had begun again. Sometimes it was a frigate, sometimes a merchant ship, sometimes a steamer, sometimes a sloop of war—but it was always something; and the Stormy Petrel was perpetually sheering off to one or other point of the compass.

Towards sunset, Mr. Zachary Polter began to look grave.

"Guess we shan't know whar we air if this game goes on much longer," said he. "It aren't in natur not to get out of one's reck'n'ing arter dodgin' and de-vi-atin' all day long in this style."

Still there was no help for it. Dodge and deviate the Stormy Petrel must, if she was to be kept out of harm's way; and even so, with all her dodging and deviating, it seemed well-nigh miraculous that she should escape observation.

At length, as evening drew on and the sun neared the horizon, preparations were made for the final run. Both captain and pilot, by help of charts, soundings, and so forth, had pretty well satisfied themselves as to their position, and Mr. Zachary Polter, knowing at what hour it would be high tide on the bar, had calculated the exact time for going into the harbour.

"Twouldn't be amiss, cap'n," said this latter, "if you was to change that white weskit for suthin dark; nor if you, sir," turning to De Benham, "was to get quit o' that light suit altogether for the nex few hours."

The captain muttered something about "unnecessary nonsense;" but went to his cabin, all the same, to change the obnoxious garment. Whereupon Mr. Zachary Polter gave it as his opinion that if the captain and all on board were to black the whites of their eyes and put their teeth in mourning, it would not be more than the occasion warranted.

After this, an unlucky cock which had travelled with them in the character of a deck-passenger all the way from Liverpool (but was addicted to crowing justly about midnight and the small hours of the morning) was hurried by the steward to an untimely end. And then, the brief twilight being already past, the engineers piled on the coal; the captain gave the word; and the Stormy Petrel steered straight for Charleston.

And now it is night; clear, but not over clear, although the stars are shining. Objects, however, are discernible at some distance, and ships are sighted continually. But as none of these lie directly in his path, and as he knows his own boat to be invisible by night beyond a certain radius, the captain holds on his course unhesitatingly. In the meanwhile, the hours seem to fly. The Stormy Petrel, now clearing the waters at full speed, stretches herself like a racer to her work, flinging the spray over her sharp bows and speeding onward gallantly. About midnight, the stars begin to cloud over and the night thickens; but there is still no mist upon the sea. Towards two in the morning, their patent lead tells that they are nearing shore. Then the pilot gives orders to "slow down the engines"—a breathless silence prevails—every eye is on the watch, every ear on the alert—and, momentarily expecting to catch their first glimpse of the blockading squadron, they steal slowly and cautiously on their way.

And now the sense of time becomes suddenly reversed. Up to this point the hours have gone by like minutes; but now the minutes go by like hours. Beacons there are none to guide them, for the harbour-lights have all been abolished since the arrival of the enemies' ships outside the bar; but those on board begin to ask themselves whether some outline of the coast ought not, ere this, to be visible. And then comes that other question—have they indeed so "dodged and deviated" that the pilot has lost his reckoning?

Still the Stormy Petrel creeps on—still each fresh sounding brings her into shallower water—still those eager watchers stare into the darkness, knowing that the tide will turn and the dawn be drawing on ere long, and that after sunrise neither speed nor skill can save them.

At length, when suspense is sharpened almost to pain, there comes into sight a faint, indefinite something which presently resolves itself into the outline of a large vessel lying at anchor, with her head to the wind and a faint spark of light at her prow.

Mr. Zachary Polter slaps his thigh triumphantly.

"That ar's the senior officer's ship," he whispers. "She lies jest tew mile off the mouth o' Charleston harbour—an' she's bound, yer see, to show a light to her own cruisers. Darned, now, if we ain't fixed it uncommon tidy this time!"

And now, not one by one, but, as it were, simultaneously, the whole line of blockaders comes into sight, some to the right, some to the left of that which shows the light. Of these they count six besides the flag-ship, all under way and gliding slowly, almost imperceptibly, to and fro in the darkness.

Between some two of these the Stormy Petrel must make her final run; and upon this point there ensues a momentary altercation between captain and pilot—the former insisting that the widest passage lies between two cruisers a little way off to the right, and the latter preferring to go in between the flag-ship and the nearest blockader on the left.

"Tell yer, cap'n," says he emphatically, "yer downright wrong this fit. I guess we shall git threw as right as a fiddle; but if we air cotched sight of—wa'al, then, we know that one of the tew's at anker and can't run arter us. Besides, the flag-ship allers lies highest in with the channel."

So the captain gives in sulkily, as is his wont; steam is again got up to the highest pressure; and the Stormy Petrel rushes on at full speed. Then the two ships between which lies her perilous path grow momentarily clearer and nearer, and a dark ridge of coast becomes dimly visible beyond them.

And now the supreme moment is at hand. Straight and fast the good boat flies, her propellers throbbing furiously, like a pulse at high fever, and the water hissing past her bows. Now every man on board holds his breath. Now flag-ship and cruiser (the one about half a mile to the right, the other about half a mile to the left) lie out a few hundred yards ahead—now, for the briefest second, the Stormy Petrel is in a line with both—now she has left them as many hundred yards astern—and now, all at once, she is in the midst of the current, and rushing straight at that long white ridge of boiling surf which marks the position of the bar!

"By Jove!" says the captain, drawing a long breath, "we've done it."

"Don't yew make tew sartin, cap'n, till we're over the bar," replies Mr. Zachary Polter. "We ain't out o' gunshot range yet awhile."

Over the bar they are, however, ere long, safe and successful.

And now the steam-whistle is blown twice, shrill and fearlessly, and two white lights are hung out over the bows of the vessel; for their pilot has been in before, and knows the signals necessary to be observed inside the cordon. Were these signals neglected, the Stormy Petrel would be fired upon by the Confederate forts.

And now, too, lights are lit, and tongues are loosened, and even Captain Frank Hay unbends for once, promising the men a double allowance of grog, and inviting De Benham and Heneage to a bottle of champagne in his own cabin. A long irregular line of coast has meanwhile emerged, as it were, into the grey of dawn; and just as the first flush of crimson streams up the eastern sky, the Stormy Petrel casts anchor under the sand-bag batteries of Morris Island.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—THE FIRST NUGGET.

MORRIS ISLAND, seen by broad daylight, proved to be an unattractive place enough, low and flat, diversified by rolling mounds of sand, patches of starved grass, and bitter salt-water marshes. There were tents pitched here and there among the sand-hills; and just against the beach, long banks of sand-bag batteries, surmounted by a line of black parapet, port-holed like a ship's side, with the muzzles of the guns grinning through.

Sullivan's Island—a long tongue of land running out some way lower down on the opposite shore—partook apparently of the same low, sandy, marshy characteristics, relieved, however, by the noble water-front of Fort Moultrie; while midway between both shores, the stars and bars flaunting gaily overhead, rose, as it seemed, sheer out of the broad waters of the estuary, the battered, eyeless walls of Fort Sumter.

Yellow and turbid as the Tiber at the foot of St. Angelo flowed river and tide, now fast ebbing out to sea. White and dazzling stretched the sandy shores on either side. A hot wind blew, oppressive as the Italian scirocco, and thick with sand as the winds of the Egyptian desert. Half-choked, half-blinded, with smarting eyes, parched lips, and burning throats, the crew of the Stormy Petrel agreed together that the bold defenders of these harbour forts must have a disagreeable time of it.

No sooner was the camp awake and stirring on Morris Island than the beach was crowded with Confederate officers and soldiers, all dressed pretty much alike, in coarse grey cloth, with worsted braid, and yellow facings, and palmetto-tree buttons. Their eagerness, their enthusiasm, their excitement knew no bounds. About a dozen officers put off in a boat and came on board at once, shaking hands with everyone, pressing them to land, and breakfast, and make the tour of the batteries; asking a thousand questions, and volunteering all kinds of hospitalities.

"By Jove! gentlemen, you are the first who have ventured to run the blockade with a steamer of this size," said one.

"An almighty plucky thing to do, captain," exclaimed another.

"I reckon now, you've brought a cargo of Enfields, to help us whip the Yankees!" cried a third.

A fourth went round addressing himself in the same words to the captain, supercargo, and passenger.

"You'll dine with me to-morrow, sir, at the Mills' House. Seven sharp. My card—Colonel Drummond, at your service."

"Every brave Britisher who runs the blockade of this harbour is the guest and brother of every man, woman, and child in Charleston city!"

"Darn my eye-teeth, gentlemen, if I let you go on to Charleston without first coming over to my tent for a bottle of Madeira!"

Resisting all this, however, and much more to the same effect, the captain of the Stormy Petrel succeeded at last in getting rid of his military visitors; and so, running up the Union Jack, prepared to be gone. Then the battery saluted him with a single gun at parting; Fort Moultrie followed up the compliment with another; and, acknowledging each civility with a dip of her flag, the blockade-runner, thus greeted, steamed on for Charleston.

Fort Sumter was now passed—pitted, and seamed, and blackened from the shelling it had gone through. Then came Fort Johnson, on another sandy promontory to the left—then, lying well off the land just at that point where the Ashley and Cooper rivers meet and mingle, Shute's Folly Island with Castle Pinckney (a huge round fort, like a gigantic martello tower) showing a bold front towards the sea—then, on a sandy delta between the mouths of the two rivers, sparkling, many-coloured, many-steepled, presenting a stately show of wharves and quays, white domes, green trees, and public and private buildings of every description—Charleston.

News of her arrival having in the meanwhile been telegraphed from Morris Island, the Stormy Petrel, as she steamed in, was met by an excited, huzzaing, welcoming multitude, which greeted the blockade-runner as enthusiastically as if she were fresh from the scene of some great naval victory. On they came, running along the quays as the boat drew on, and gathering about the landing-place as soon as she was made fast alongside—soldiers, townspeople, women, children, and niggers, waving caps and handkerchiefs, clanking spurs and sabres, shouting, laughing, elbowing, surging to and fro, and wild with that sort of excitement which, in revolutionary times, pervades the air like an inflammable gas, and is ready to flame out upon the smallest provocation.

The gangway once adjusted, it became no easy matter to keep the crowd at arm's length. Having issued orders, however, that no one should be allowed to come on board except the municipal authorities, or persons having business with the supercargo, the captain stationed two men at the top of the gangway and one at the foot, and so kept off all intruders.

Mr. Heneage, or, as he should more properly be called, Senator Shirley, had in the meanwhile seized the first opportunity of landing; and, being instantly recognised, was seen by those on board struggling to shake a hundred hands at once, now carried this way, now that, and finally swept away by a compact body of fellow townsmen, all boisterously cheering.

And now, captain and pilot, mates, engineers, and half the crew, having done so much of their work, were free to go ashore and make merry; but the supercargo's work was only just beginning. An anxious day was it for Temple De Benham. In none of those business transactions upon which he had been employed by Mr. Hardwicke had he as yet been called upon either to buy or sell; and now, for the first time in his life, he found himself responsible for the sale of property to the value of many thousands. He fully appreciated the weight of this responsibility. He knew that for the due fulfilment of his task, he should need all his coolness of head and all the presence of mind he could command. He knew that he must be prompt, but not precipitate; bold, and yet cautious. Above all, he knew that he must betray no sign of the commercial novice. To assume experience though he had it not, was almost the first necessity of his position.

Having thought it out, and resolved with himself beforehand that his best plan would be to remain on board for the transaction of all business relating to the present cargo, he had cleared his little cabin and turned it into a temporary office. A table and a couple of chairs, a ledger and order-book, a despatch-box, a pile of blank invoices, a large inkstand, blotting pad, and so forth, gave the tiny place quite a business-like air. Then the young man tried to transform himself in like manner, that he might look as business-like as his cabin. It was well that he had made all ready beforehand, for his customers were pressing to come on board long enough before the captain was willing to admit them.

The Stormy Petrel left Morris Island while the day was yet young, and so reached her moorings by eleven A.M. Before two P.M. De Benham, had he so pleased, could have sold every item of his cargo; but he hung back, testing his market and holding out for the highest prices. By five P.M. he had sold every item—at a profit of from nine to twelve hundred per cent.!

Several thousand pairs of men's flannel shirts, for instance, bought wholesale at a great Manchester warehouse for something like fifty-four shillings the dozen, were taken by a single purchaser at the rate of ten dollars each shirt. A like number of clump-soled boots for men, costing five shillings the pair, were sold en masse at two pounds eighteen shillings. Ten cases of revolvers by Boissy of Liège, for which Mr. Hardwicke paid about six hundred francs (or twenty-four pounds English) per dozen, were sold by De Benham at the rate of twenty pounds for each weapon. The rest of the cargo, consisting of hats, hosiery, cotton goods and the like, went at prices bearing the same proportion to their original cost; and as for the blankets and Enfield rifles, they realised the heaviest profit of all, being at once bought up on account of the Confederate Government by the Superintendent of the Military Store Department.

When the last "trade" was done and the last buyer had left the ship, De Benham shut himself up in his cabin and set to work to draw out a rough balance-sheet of the day's transactions. Allowing a broad margin for expenses, this balance-sheet, at the end of two hours' hard calculation, proved a clear profit of about eighty-seven thousand pounds English.

The supercargo did not wait to consider what his own per centage on this sum would come to. The result once mastered, he locked up his ledgers and papers, seized his portmanteau, landed, called the first hack that came in his way, drove to the great hotel in Meeting Street known as the Mills' House, and went straight to bed with the worst headache he had ever had in his life.

Being waked, however, somewhere about midnight by a braying of trumpets and trombones, a trampling of many feet in the street below, and a tumultuous chorus shouting the refrain to "Dixie's Land," he sat up in bed rubbing his eyes, wondering where he was, and for the moment forgetting what had happened since he was a poor art-student at Zollenstrasse am-Main. Then it suddenly flashed upon him that he was poor no longer—that he was on the high road to wealth—that he was entitled to fifteen per cent. on the profits already realised. And then, bad as his headache was, he could not help calculating his gains.

They amounted to no less a sum than thirteen thousand and fifty pounds. He could not believe it. He went over it again and again in his head, and still with the same result. At last he was convinced. Fifteen per cent. came to one hundred and fifty pounds in every thousand; and eighty-seven times one hundred and fifty amounted, beyond all question, to thirteen thousand and fifty.

After that, his chances of sleep went suddenly down to zero, and he never closed his eyes again till it was broad daylight.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—NOT A BAD BARGAIN.

THE next day or two in Charleston was given up to unlading the Stormy Petrel, delivering the goods to their several purchasers, and receiving payment for the same. De Benham was careful, by the way, to stipulate for the latter in the shape of bills upon English houses. He could not bring himself, somehow, to put much faith in bran new Confederate bank-notes, which, like the fairy gold in the Irish legend, might, he thought, in a single night turn suddenly to a mere heap of withered leaves. Then came the main business of all—the buying of the cotton.

The supply then actually in the town was, they told him, scanty; for, in consequence of the stagnation of the trade, it was yet lying at the plantations up the country. But there was plenty of it for De Benham's purpose in the long, low lines of open sheds along the quays—plenty and to spare for the freightage of a whole fleet of Stormy Petrels. Some of these sheds were still stacked with cotton bales, each bale in its "bagging" of Indian canvas. On the wharves were piles of cotton bales, ready for removal. But the removals were now few and far between, and the trade was already at a dead lock for want of buyers and a market. There was something singularly melancholy in the sight of all this precious produce upon which so much human labour had already been expended, and for want of which so many millions of workers must be thrown out of employment. De Benham could not help saying so once or twice; but those to whom he spoke—hot-blooded Charleston merchants turned soldiers, with jingling brass spurs, and clanking sabres, and the palmetto tree embroidered on their caps—only smiled, boasting of how soon they meant to “whip” the Yankees, drive off the blockaders, and astonish all creation.

“Besides, sir,” said one, a tall, lanky man in uniform, with a pen behind his ear, “it’s all very well for you Britishers to preach about non-intervention, but you can’t stick to that long, sir. You have between four and five millions depending on us for their daily bread; and you’ll pretty soon find out that it must be cotton or a revolution. Sir, I reckon you won’t risk a revolution. We shall have your ships of war in Charleston harbour before Christmas day comes round, and then I rather think the Yankees will find themselves nowhere!”

Said another:—“No, sir—your Government will have acknowledged us, and every bale of that cotton will be in Liverpool, before the fall. You will have come over to us as allies, sir, by that time—if we haven’t already polished off the Yankees without your help!”

To such replies De Benham could oppose only a grave protest or a civil silence. But all protestation was in vain. That the policy of Great Britain was a fixed policy, not to be reversed by any pressure of discontent or distress at home, was what they could not and would not believe. As for their gay, reckless, hectoring self-confidence, it only struck him, stranger as he was, as the very saddest phase of all this fatal struggle. He saw from the first that it was a doomed cause, and that all these hot hopes and valorous impulses must end in defeat and death, and humiliation more bitter than either.

It was not to the warehouse of the merchant, however, but to the office of the broker that De Benham went for his homeward cargo; for cotton is bought and sold like stock “down south” as it is at Liverpool, and in its mere transfer supports an intermediary class.

Dingy; remote; odorous of the almighty dollar; odorous also of tobacco; lurking in gloomy ground-floors or dingy first-floor flats in Eastbay Street, were then, as now, to be found the counting-houses of the Charleston cotton brokers. How silent they seemed, these haunts seething with business but a little while ago! how deserted those staircases and passages, but lately echoing to the daily tramp of hundreds of eager footsteps!

Mr. Hardwicke had recommended his supercargo to employ an eminent cotton-broking firm with which his house had long had dealings—the firm of Harper, Prideaux, and Barbuckle—and to the offices of Messrs. Harper, Prideaux, and Barbuckle, De Benham repaired accordingly. These he found, after some little difficulty, on the first floor of an immense gloomy building, which harboured dozens of firms on every flat. A strange sort of office, too, when found, and curiously unlike those tiny dens sacred to the stockbroking world of Threadneedle Street and Austin Friars—an office consisting of one large barren room, like a second-class waiting-room at a railway station, with a little space railed off at one end for the clerks, and another little space railed off at the other end for the principals; carpetless, of course, and painfully suggestive of the utility of spittoons; with hard, uncomfortable chairs standing about; and a huge black stove in the middle of the floor; and grimy windows; and framed advertisements of Emigration Agencies, Fast-sailing Lines of Packet-boats, Celebrated A 1 Clipper Ships, patent Steam-ploughs, Steam-thrashing Machines, and other agricultural implements, hanging on the walls.

There was but one clerk in this cheerful apartment—a sallow, sandy, youth of about eighteen—whom De Benham surprised in the act of practising the broad-sword exercise by himself with great energy. He desisted in some confusion at sight of a stranger, and apologized for his occupation by saying that he had lately joined that famous corps known as the “South Carolinian Invincibles.”

De Benham then explained that his own business with the firm of Harper, Prideaux, and Barbuckle was not military, but commercial; whereupon the “Invincible” hung his weapon on a peg behind the door, snatched up his cap, and “reckoning he should find the major on parade,” vanished precipitately.

The major came in due time—a puffy, watery-eyed, stolid-visaged man buckled in much too tight at the waist, and considerably embarrassed by his sword. He proved to be the Prideaux of the firm; and commenced proceedings by unbuttoning and unbuckling as much as possible, and vociferating furiously for "Boker's Bitters"—a marvellous compound much beloved by Charlestonians, which was promptly brought by a white-headed old negro whom De Benham had seen sitting on a stool in the entrance hall.

De Benham tried to excuse himself from partaking of this beverage at so early an hour in the day—the American clock on the chimney-piece was then pointing to twenty minutes past nine A.M.—but the major would not hear of it.

"Sir," said that commercial warrior, "there are two things which can-not be cultivated in this climate without the aid of cool drinks; and those two things are Trade and War. If you and I are to do a trade together, sir, we must sure-ly drink together—and cotton, let me tell you, is a powerful absorbent."

"There seems to be no business doing of any kind," said De Benham.

"No, sir. How should there be business doing, with our ports shut up, and our young men all gone over to the ranks of the army, and these cursed Yankees still upon our hands? But, sir, we don't take much account of business at a time like this. We are a commercial people, it is true; but we are also a military and a pa-triotic people. We are burning just now, sir, with military ardour. Our souls are in arms, and our swords thirst for the blood of the invader. What quality of cotton, now, do you think of buying?"

And plunging thus abruptly from the heroic to the commonplace, the gallant major suddenly scrambled upon a very high, spindle-shanked office-stool, and produced from a drawer in his bureau a number of little wooden bowls containing specimens of raw cotton. Upon these, their quality of fibre, length of staple, and so forth, he then proceeded to discourse with great earnestness, recommending his "Bowed Georgia" for one excellence, his "Middling Uplands" for another, and getting quite enthusiastic on the subject of "Sea Island."

Burning with military ardour as he was, however, and thirsting for the blood of the invader, the major proved to be an uncommonly keen man of business, quoting the highest prices, and something over and above the highest prices, in the market—if, indeed, it could be said that there was now any market at all. But De Benham had not been three days in Charleston without getting himself acquainted with all these particulars. He knew quite as well as Major Prideaux to how low an ebb the price of cotton had come, and of how much importance such an order as he had to give must be, at this time, to any house in that city.

"I may as well tell you once for all, Major Prideaux," he said at length, "that I am here to buy the best article I can find in Charleston at the lowest price for which it can be bought—and I mean to buy on no other conditions."

"And, sir, I offer to transact it for you at seven and a half cents—the lowest price quoted on Charleston 'change this summer."

"That was a month ago, major," said De Benham.

"Sir," replied the major, with dignity, "I am not telling you that prices have risen since then; but I do tell you that not a cent lower has been quoted."

"I imagine that is because no more business has been done," said De Benham. "Prices can hardly be said to have fallen when there is no buying or selling going on: but the staple becomes more and more of a drug for all that."

"Sir," said the major, "the firm of Harper, Prideaux, and Barbuckle"

"I beg your pardon," interposed De Benham, rising as if to go; "but what I mean to give is five cents per pound for the best Middling Uplands, of which I will take two thousand bales. If you think you can do it for me at that rate, I shall be happy to leave the matter in your hands—if not, I have the honour to wish you good-morning."

The major dipped his pen in the ink as promptly as if there had been no chaffering about the matter, and, filling in an oblong memorandum-paper, said:—

"Same as sample number four, I take it, sir?"

"The same as sample number four," replied De Benham.

Then followed some last words as to delivery and packing, and the affair was concluded.

"Well, sir, I don't think you'll get your wisdom-teeth twisted out in a hurry," said the major, with an admiring twinkle in his eye, as they shook hands at parting. "You have done this trade at the lowest figure that has been reached yet—but I reckon you wouldn't get along quite so slick if there was ere another buyer in the market!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—LORD STOCKBRIDGE.

WITH the dinner party given at Strathellan House in honour of Lord Stockbridge, we have here no immediate concern. The Hardwicks were already famous for their sumptuous entertainments; and of this entertainment it need only be said that it was as sumptuous as the most lavish display of gold and silver plate, hair-powder, and gorgeous liveries could make it. There was, beside, a fair sprinkling of minor titles, and the inevitable Bishop—that clerical course, without which no state banquet of the period is complete.

This dinner-party, however, was important in its results, in so far as it converted Lord Stockbridge into an assiduous habitué of the big house in the Regent's Park. Now, Lord Stockbridge was all that Miss Hardwicke had described him to be—and more. He had lived by his wits from his youth upward; and for the last fifteen years had eked out that precarious capital by trading upon his probable succession to the estates and titles of a childless second cousin. He was in debt; and his debts were not all of the most creditable kind. Homburg, Baden Baden, Spa, Wiesbaden, Ems, Monaco, knew him for their own. Upon the turf, wherever there was a turf, far and wide, at home and abroad, he had—a reputation. His contemporaries (especially his continental contemporaries) laid more vices to his charge than could, perhaps, be fairly proved against him; yet there were one or two dark stories current in the hells of Paris and Vienna, one or two disagreeable whispers afloat at Chantilly and Newmarket, which Lord Stockbridge would have done well to silence, if, haply, it had been in his power to do so. That he did not silence them, was taken by his detractors as proof positive of their truth.

Of these things, however, Miss Hardwicke knew nothing. She had heard no more than that he was extravagant, that he had spent most of his time abroad, and that his affairs were supposed to be embarrassed. The truth was that Lord Stockbridge's affairs were a very slough of embarrassment. He was steeped to the lips in mortgages, and from a rent-roll of seven thousand a year touched less than as many hundreds for his personal maintenance.

The spendthrift's common resource, however, was open to him; and he was minded to rehabilitate himself, if practicable, by means of a wealthy marriage.

Thus it happened that Lord Stockbridge was, as he elegantly expressed it when in familiar converse with his club cronies, "for sale, a bargain." Thus, also, it happened that the splendour of his reception at Strathellan House was not without its effect. Being "for sale," he conceived that here, if anywhere, he might fetch his price. Not to be mistaken on this point, however, he took occasion one morning to direct his steps eastward, and dropping in for an hour or two at Doctors' Commons, amused himself by turning over the wills of Hardwicke père, and Hardwicke, Alderman and sometime Lord Mayor of London; and very pretty reading he found them. When, besides the wealth conveyed to Miss Hardwicke under these two interesting documents, he also learned that she inherited a third fortune from her mother, this worthy nobleman invoked the aid of the gods, and resolved that the great prize should be his if skill and perseverance, a persuasive tongue, the remains of a fine person, and a coronet, might avail to win it.

For he had been a particularly handsome man in his time, and was handsome still, though preserving only the wreck of his former beauty. His age at this time was exactly forty-nine; and though he looked worn and dissipated, yet society was disposed, on the whole, to credit him with fewer than his actual years. A slightly bloated look about the lips and jaw; a figure inclining to become heavy, but belted into bounds; an eye apt to be bloodshot, and a hand somewhat given to tremulousness early in the day, were traits and tokens significant enough to such as knew how to read them. But then society never saw him till after two p.m. Now Lord Stockbridge yawning over his breakfast at mid-day in dressing-gown and slippers, alone, jaded, brooding, off his guard, with the remains of last night's headache upon him, was a very different person from Lord Stockbridge dressed to perfection and mounted on a neat park hack at five or six, retailing piquant scandals between the courses at nine, or gliding from room to room with a camellia in his button-hole at eleven.

The Hardwicks, of course, saw him only at his best. Always urbane, always amusing, he came and went; called on the brother at his office in the City; rode beside the sister's carriage in the less crowded drives of the park; fell in with Mr. Hardwicke's pompous manner; accommodated himself to Miss Hardwicke's coldness; and slid, somehow, into the position of a frequent and favoured guest.

Such was the state of affairs at Strathellan House when Temple De Benham started on his first expedition to the Southern States. Lord Stockbridge had just begun to pay open homage to the great City heiress; Miss Hardwicke, haughty and impassible as ever, neither encouraged nor discouraged his attentions; and Mr. Hardwicke, charmed to have a lord constantly at his table, was still more charmed by the evident possibility of having that lord for a brother-in-law.

"Lord Stockbridge is a very pleasant person," said Mr. Hardwicke to his sister, as they came strolling slowly homeward from the "Zoo" one glowing Sunday afternoon—that very day, by the way, that the Stormy Petrel was doubling to and fro in those perilous waters that lie between the Bahamas and the coast of South Carolina. "Lord Stockbridge is a very pleasant person, and improves upon acquaintance."

"Do you think so?" said Miss Hardwicke. "I fancied he would have been at the Gardens this afternoon," continued the merchant.

"Perhaps he was there," said Miss Hardwicke.

"No, I am sure he was not. I looked for him in every direction; and when you were sitting down, I asked the man at the gate."

"I should not have thought the fact was worth so much trouble to ascertain."

"He admires you very much, Claudia," said Mr. Hardwicke.

Miss Hardwicke looked supreme indifference, and answered nothing.

"It is, indeed, something more than mere admiration," he went on. "If I am not greatly mistaken—and I do not think I am often mistaken in my estimate of motive—Lord Stockbridge is actuated by a far deeper feeling."

"Very probably," said Miss Hardwicke, with a scornful smile. "I am rich."

"In personal attractions, my dear Claudia; and in mental acquirements—not only in money. I am prepared to admit that Lord Stockbridge is probably obliged to consider the question of money—would be unable, perhaps, to marry without money; but it does not follow, because your fortune might possibly weigh with him, inter alia, that his sentiments . . ."

"The topic is not worth discussion," interrupted Miss Hardwicke.

"You would not reject a man of birth and position, simply because you were rich and he was poor?"

"I cannot tell."

"But . . ."

"But Lord Stockbridge has given me no opportunity of either accepting or rejecting him, and is likely to give me none. I should be sorry to have the alternative forced upon me."

"You surprise me, Claudia. A man like Lord Stockbridge—elegant, accomplished . . ."

"Am I to understand that he has retained you for his special pleader?" asked Miss Hardwicke.

"He has never opened his lips to me upon the subject."

"Then oblige me by following his example. This sort of conversation is distasteful to me."

They had now come to a wicket leading into their own grounds. This gate Mr. Hardwicke unlocked, and held open for his sister to pass through.

"It is not wonderful that I should wish to see you a peeress, Claudia," he said, presently; "even though I should have to part from you."

Miss Hardwicke smiled at him, almost tenderly.

"You are the best brother in the world, Josiah," she said; "but that pleasure might be bought at too high a price."

Coming round to the front by a path through the shrubbery, they found one of their own grooms leading a well-known bright chestnut up and down the drive.

"He is here," said Mr. Hardwicke.

And as they entered the hall, one of the twin giants stepped forward to say that Lord Stockbridge was in the drawing-room.

They found him looking out of the window, and whistling softly to himself. His quick ear, however, caught the faint rustle of the lady's dress.

"The servants told me you were at the Gardens," he said, as they shook hands; "but I feared to miss you by the way. Was the 'Zoo' very gay this afternoon?"

"Crowded," replied Mr. Hardwicke. "We looked for you."

"I had intended to be there; but dropping in at Lady Chetwynd's en passant, I lost so much time that I thought it best to come here direct. Miss Hardwicke, I bring you a card for Lady Chetwynd's fancy dress ball. I hope you care for the sort-of thing, for I have broken all the ten commandments, and well-nigh committed suicide, to get it for you."

Miss Hardwicke, superbly dressed in some kind of delicate silk covered with costly lace, and lying back in a low long chair, with her back to the light, looked up and smiled languidly.

"Many thanks," she said; "but I do not know Lady Chetwynd."

"That is nothing. There will be at least a hundred others in the same position. Givers of crowded parties in these times don't expect to know half their guests; and in such a case as this, people beg cards for themselves and friends in every direction."

"Such persons must be lost to all sense of self-respect," said Miss Hardwicke. "I mean, of course, those who beg for themselves."

Lord Stockbridge shrugged his shoulders.

"Everybody does it," he replied. "I know a certain lady—a peeress in her own right—who would go on her knees to Lady Chetwynd's groom of the chambers for that card in your hand."

"What a fortunate person I am, then, and how grateful I ought to be!" said Miss Hardwicke, somewhat disdainfully.

"Yes, if you were a mere woman of fashion, with no other object in life than to be seen everywhere, and be paraded daily in the columns of the Morning Post."

"It will be a very brilliant party, I suppose?"

"The event of the season. Lady Chetwynd does these things very well, and means this time to surpass herself. Besides, the Prince is going."

Miss Hardwicke looked down, and put control upon her features; but she could not keep back a faint flush of rising colour. She had sat once or twice at a great civic banquet graced by the presence of a royal duke; but it had never yet befallen her to meet royalty thus, in the ordinary way of society. Too proud to give expression to her pleasure; too proud even to let it be seen that she was pleased, Miss Hardwicke could not keep down that flush of gratified ambition. Lord Stockbridge, on the watch for some such token, saw it, and scored a point, mentally, in his own favour.

"I could not go alone," said Miss Hardwicke.

"A chaperone is easily found. There is my aunt, for instance—Mrs. Cadogan. She would be charmed."

"What dress will you wear, Claudia?" asked Mr. Hardwicke.

"The very question I would have asked, if I dared," said Lord Stockbridge.

"I ought to wear sackcloth and ashes, if such a catalogue of sins has been committed for my sake," replied Miss Hardwicke. "But is a fancy costume indispensable?"

"Not absolutely, of course; but it pleases one's hosts. When people give a character ball, they like all the court cards they can get."

"What do you say to Cleopatra?" asked Mr. Hardwicke.

"Highly effective, if the asp were real; but therefore inconvenient."

"Medea?" suggested Lord Stockbridge.

"Medea and Ristori are one in the eyes of the world; and I could not undertake to look like Ristori."

"Queen Guinevere—Medora—Dido?"

Miss Hardwicke shook her head.

"I should not think of assuming a character," she said. "The utmost I could do, would be to adopt and accurately carry out some old Italian dress, after one of the Venetian pictures."

"The lady in crimson by Bordone, for instance, in the National Gallery," said Mr. Hardwicke.

"No; I am thinking of a portrait at Genoa—a lady dressed in white and gold brocade, with pearls in her hair, and a fan of peacocks' feathers in her hand."

"It sounds charming," said Lord Stockbridge; "but can you trust your memory for the details?"

"No; I must have a sketch made of it, or a coloured photograph. There will be time enough; the ball, I see, is six weeks hence."

"Shall I go to Genoa, and get it done for you?"

Miss Hardwicke smiled incredulously.

"What would you do, if I were to say Yes?"

"Start to-night by the mail-train."

"What a paladin! No, my lord, I will not put your chivalry to so severe a test. I know of a certain copyist at Turin, who will go to Genoa gladly at my bidding; and I shall have the drawing in a fortnight."

Some question then arose as to the authorship of the original picture, Mr. Hardwicke maintaining that it was a Tintoretto, and Miss Hardwicke being of opinion that it was a Paul Veronese. At last she referred the matter to her note-book, and went to fetch it; Lord Stockbridge holding the door as she passed out.

He stood for a moment, and watched her out of sight; then drew a deep breath; came back into the room; and, laying his hand familiarly on Mr. Hardwicke's arm, said:—

"By Jove, Hardwicke, I cannot tell you how much I admire your sister. I never admired a woman so much in my life—never, upon my soul!"

"That is saying much, my lord," said Mr. Hardwicke, bowing.

"Not more than I mean—not half as much as I mean, my dear fellow."

"But, having no doubt seen most of the court beauties of Europe . . ."

"I never saw one fit to hold up Miss Hardwicke's train," interrupted Lord Stockbridge, emphatically. "Besides, it's not only her beauty, egad! it's her style—her style; her personal dignity; what our fathers used to call 'the grand air,' you know."

"Many persons think my sister's manner too haughty," said Mr. Hardwicke.

"Ah, that's just what I like—that noli me tangere manner. She's a woman who might be born to the purple, by George! But I've no business to say all this to you, Hardwicke."

"It is very gratifying to my feelings, my lord," replied the merchant, with another bow.

"It's confounded bad taste, anyhow—but a man can't help speaking, sometimes, when he's in earnest."

At this moment Miss Hardwicke came back.

"Well, is it Tintoretto or Veronese?" asked her brother.

"Neither," she replied. "It is a Palma Vecchio."

And then they talked about painters, and paintings, and foreign galleries, till Lord Stockbridge started up, protesting that he had no idea it was so late.

"Will you dine with us, my lord?" said the merchant.

"Thanks—I wish I could; but I am pledged to some fellows this evening at the club. Miss Hardwicke, pray remember that I'm the most devoted of your slaves,—and that I am quite ready to go to Genoa, or Timbuctoo, if you please, at an hour's notice. My dear Hardwicke, pray don't take the trouble to come down with me!"

But Mr. Hardwicke, of course, disregarded this entreaty, and accompanied his guest to the hall. Then, returning to the drawing-room, he closed the door behind him, and, with some appearance of mystery, said:—

"Claudia, believe me, I was not mistaken in what I said to you just now."

"But I am sure you are mistaken," Miss Hardwicke replied. "I have not only entered it in my note-book as Palma Vecchio, but I have underlined the passage in Murray. See, here it is—"Number two hundred and twelve, portrait of a lady—Palma Vecchio."

"Pshaw! I am not speaking of the picture," said Mr. Hardwicke; "but of Lord Stockbridge."

"Of Lord Stockbridge? Surely we have had enough of Lord Stockbridge for to-day."

"That coronet is at your feet, Claudia, if you will but stoop to pick it up."

Miss Hardwicke, deep in the pages of her note-book, made no reply.

"His admiration for you is boundless," continued the merchant. "He told me that he had never admired any lady so much in his life."

Miss Hardwicke looked at her watch.

"The dressing-bell ought to have been rung before now," she said, rising. "I am so glad we dine alone to-day. Are not you?"

"I should have been very happy if his lordship could have stayed to dine with us," replied the merchant.

Miss Hardwicke frowned.

"Pray oblige me, Josiah," she said, "by not calling the man 'his lordship.' You are not a footman, remember. And do me the favour not to mention Lord Stockbridge's name again to-night."

Saying which, she swept from the room, leaving Mr. Hardwicke snubbed and discomfited.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—SENATOR SHIRLEY SPEEDS THE PARTING GUEST.

DE BENHAM had reason to be satisfied with his bargain. He had bought two thousand bales of the best "Middling Upland" at the rate of five cents American, or two-pence-halfpenny English, per pound. Now, the ordinary American bale contains about four hundred and eighty pounds of cotton; so that his two thousand bales represented some nine hundred and sixty thousand pounds of the raw material, costing in round numbers twenty-four thousand American dollars, or nearly five thousand pounds in English money. This cotton, he knew, was already worth in Liverpool one-and-sixpence per pound,* and would rise in value daily. It would realise, if sold at once, a gross profit of sixty-seven thousand pounds; but then, he told himself, the temptation to sell must be resisted. Mr. Hardwicke would be sure to incline towards an immediate sale, and Timothy Knott would be equally sure to urge him upon that course; but De Benham thought he could rely upon his own influence so far as to induce Mr. Hardwicke to adopt, for once, a bolder policy. His brief experience had already shown him that the war must, and would, go on for a long time; probably for years. He knew the power and resources of the North; he had the reckless enthusiasm of the South before his eyes. He saw that every spark of brotherly love was extinct between the belligerent factions, and that they already hated each other with a sound brotherly hatred. That the war should now come to any sudden ending was impossible. The time for reconciliation, or even for compromise, was too evidently gone by. They must fight it out. They were bent on fighting it out. And when a war is carried on, not by two opposing armies, but by two nations in arms, the campaigns are likely to be many, and the struggle is certain to be long.

And therefore De Benham resolved to exert his utmost influence in persuading Mr. Hardwicke to hold back the cotton. The war would go on; and so long as the war went on, the supply of cotton would be cut off. A time must come, he argued, when there would be absolutely no American cotton in the market; and if prices were so high now, when the stock in hand was not yet nearly exhausted, what would they be then? In the course of that memorable conversation during which he had proposed this present enterprise for Mr. Hardwicke's consideration, he had predicted that cotton would go up eventually to two-and-sixpence per pound; but he believed now that it might go higher still—perhaps to twice two-and-sixpence. Who could tell?

But this was mere wild speculation, not to be acted upon—not even to be spoken in words. Let the cotton once touch two-and-sixpence, or even two-and-threepence per pound, and he would not himself desire to see it held back for a single hour. And then he calculated that, sold at the rate of two-and-threepence per pound, these two thousand bales would fetch £108,000; of which sum, when the five thousand was deducted for cost here in Charleston, £103,000 would remain for expenses and profits.

And besides all this, he meant to run the blockade again, and again, and perhaps again—supposing always that he had luck, and that Mr. Hardwicke was willing to go on. Why should not the two thousand bales become four, or six, or ten thousand? Why should not the profits be multiplied over and over again? Already, upon the single cargo that he had brought in, they amounted to £87,000. Take, say, £80,000 as the probable average profit upon each cargo, import and export alike, why should he not make five round trips and bring that profit up to a total of £800,000?

* The author has been unable to ascertain at what rate "Middling Uplands" was selling in this country during the first summer of the American Civil War. The actual market price of "Middling Orleans" (which is the staple most in demand for manufacturing purposes) was not, however, at this time quite so high as 15. 6d. per lb.; though it soon after reached that standard. In October, 1862, it rose to 25. 3d. per lb. in Liverpool; and in 1864, though not generally quoted above 25. 7½d., did occasionally fetch as much as 25. 8d.

These were bold dreams; but there was a dream still bolder lurking all this time in a dark corner of his busy brain—a dream which he had not as yet permitted himself to define or dwell upon; but which, if he had chosen to put it into words, would probably have resolved itself into some such proposition as this:—

His own claim on Mr. Hardwicke amounted already to something over £13,000, and it was reasonable to conclude that when he next ran into Charleston with a similar cargo, it would be with a similar result. Granted, therefore, that both the cotton cargoes remained for the present unsold, he would still be entitled, at the end of the second journey, to some £26,000. And then why should he not, with that £26,000, buy a little steamer of his own, hire his own captain and crew, lay in his own cargo, and go on running the blockade for his own exclusive benefit? Supposing that he ran it five times on Mr. Hardwicke's account, with Mr. Hardwicke's money, bringing up the profits to £800,000, his own share at fifteen per cent. would come only to £120,000; whereas with his own boat and his own cargoes he might make three or four hundred thousand for himself alone!

But then there was always the chance of capture; and capture meant confiscation for cargo and steamer, and some weeks of a New York prison for all on board. It was an evil chance that might befall the Stormy Petrel this very first trip, on her way back to Nassau, and then. . . . Ah, then, indeed, it would be all over with him, and he would have to begin again at the first rung of the ladder! Whenever his thoughts reverted to this side of the picture, De Benham would smile a bitter smile, and tell himself that he was like the barber's fifth brother in the dear old story of the Arabian Nights—building a palace and marrying a beautiful princess upon the possible profits of a trayful of glass, which is presently kicked down and shivered to atoms!

In the meanwhile, it was important for two reasons that the new cargo should be shipped as speedily as possible—the first reason being that it was now high tide after dark for going over the bar; and the second, that more blockading vessels were rumoured to be upon the eve of leaving New York. So De Benham hastened all his preparations, urged on the immediate delivery of the cotton; hired a gang of expert stevedores to pack it, and so got ready for sea in less time than would have been possible in any country where people were not accustomed to live and work at perpetual high pressure.

It was marvellous to see the skill and speed with which these stevedores disposed of the great cotton bales, each bale already reduced by hydraulic pressure to a compact mass, apparently as solid as marble. First, of course, they stowed the hold; stowing the bales the way of the ship's length; laying each bale as regularly and exactly as if it were a block of granite in the hands of the builders; and so covering the whole floor one tier deep, all except an opening under each hatchway. Into this opening they presently inserted wooden "toms" or blocks, to which they applied the patent worm-screw—an agent of tremendous force, by means of which the cotton-bales were driven back into about two-thirds of the space they at first occupied. The room thus gained was then filled in, and the same process repeated till the whole was packed so close and firm that even a mouse must have been crushed between them, had any sea-going mouse been luckless enough to find its way there. Then, upon the floor thus laid, they built a fresh tier, filling up the hatches last of all, and applying the screw as before, till the hold was quite full and the hatches were battened down. After this, every spare inch between decks was temporarily crowded with cotton; and lastly the spar deck itself was packed, a tier of bales being laid fore and aft, leaving only a narrow lane or two leading to the cabins, the engine-room, and the men's fore-castle; and on the top of this tier, another somewhat narrower; and then, still tapering pyramidally as the structure rose, another. When all this was done, and the bales on deck had been firmly lashed to their places, the Stormy Petrel looked like a ship roofed in for an arctic winter.

De Benham spent all his days on board while the work of stowage was going forward, but slept at the Mills' House, and was so overwhelmed with invitations that he might have dined three or four times over every day, between the hours of five and nine P.M. A hospitable, hot-headed people, these Charleston citizens, welcoming the strangers with open arms, and passionately desirous of being favourably reported of "on the other side."

"Tell your countrymen, sir," said a beautiful girl, Diana Ashby by name, one of three charming sisters, the daughters of a certain Colonel Ashby at whose house De Benham was dining one evening; "tell your countrymen that you saw the Stars and Bars waving over Fort Sumter; and whether they help us, or whether they abandon us, there is not a man in the Southern States, nor a woman either, who for the honour of that flag is not ready to die twice over."

"I have five sons in the army," said another lady, on another occasion. "They are all with the Army of the Shenandoah, under General Johnston; and I have a sixth son, who is only sixteen. But, should the war last another year, and should his brothers have all fallen in the course of it, he will then, please heaven, be old enough to join, and avenge them!"

Such, universally, was the enthusiasm of the women; such, in rougher fashion, was the reckless valour of the men. In the home, in the streets, in the camps, it was everywhere the same—at night, bands of young men traversing the city, shouting to the tune of "Dixie's Land," or the "Marseillaise;" by day, waving of flags, and marching of volunteers, and eager crowds gathered round street orators, of whom there were scores ready to jump upon an empty sugar cask, and declaim by the hour together on the smallest provocation. To sober Englishmen full of their own risks and profits, and bent on utterly practical ends, as were the captain and supercargo of the Stormy Petrel, it seemed as if they were suddenly landed in the midst of a people one half of whom were mad and all intoxicated.

At length, all being ready, the time came for starting. The Stormy Petrel having taken in her coal, had gone down to a point a little below Fort Pinckney, to be searched and smoked—a process to which every vessel leaving a Confederate port was at this time subjected by the military authorities. De Benham, not caring to be smoked with his cargo, had been dining with Mr. Shirley, who lived at a place called Hampstead, a little way out of Charleston, in an exquisite little green-shuttered, verandahed, luxurious, bachelor's cottage—a bijou of a place, buried in trees; stocked with the choicest books, pictures, and bric-à-brac that a refined taste could bring together; and surrounded by well-kept grounds, washed on one side by the waters of the Cooper river, fragrant with magnolia blossoms, and the haunt of humming birds by day and mocking birds by night.

It had been a pleasant party, consisting of some ten gentlemen, most of whom were planters and merchants, one the editor of a Charleston newspaper, and all volunteers. They had been lounging in the verandah after dinner, smoking and taking coffee, and talking, as usual, war, politics, and cotton; and now the far-away chimes of St. Michael's Church were heard, and the city clocks struck eight, and De Benham, who had ordered the gig to be round at the steps at the bottom of Mr. Shirley's grounds at that hour, rose to take his leave. His host went down with him to the water-side, where they found the boat in readiness, and the men resting on their oars.

"I shall not soon forget this scene," said De Benham, looking back at the house, with its background of dark trees and its foreground of undulating sward studded with beds of scarlet, white, orange, and violet flowers, about which the fireflies were already flitting in myriads.

"But for you, Mr. Debenham, I think I should never have set foot in the little place again," said the planter. "I am a sickly man, and I was dying by inches when you met me in London. Another month or six weeks in Europe would have killed me."

And as he said this, he tried to press a small pocket-book into the young man's hand.

"What is this?" said De Benham, drawing back.

"It contains five thousand dollars—my passage-money from London."

De Benham shook his head.

"I have no right," he said, "as far as my owner is concerned, to refuse your passage-money altogether, but I cannot, even on his account, accept such a sum as five thousand dollars. The information you gave me in London was so valuable that, if the ship was my own, I would accept nothing, and yet think myself well paid. As it is, you shall pay whatever is a fair price for a very comfortable passage, and not a cent more."

Mr. Shirley urged and persuaded; but in vain.

"You will accept at least a thousand dollars for your owner, and a thousand for yourself," he said, after offering eight, and six, and five thousand successively.

"I will take two hundred and fifty dollars on account of Mr. Hardwicke," replied De Benham; "and that is far too much. For myself, Mr. Shirley, I can only thank you for your hospitality, and wish you farewell."

The planter coloured painfully.

"If you do not accept some little token of my friendship, sir," he said, taking a ring from his own finger, "I shall fear I have offended you. You won't refuse to wear this for my sake?"

De Benham took the ring without looking at it, and thrust it into his waistcoat pocket.

"Not when it is offered in friendship, Mr. Shirley," he said, smiling; "and now it must be good-bye; for the clocks have just gone another quarter, and we must be over the bar before midnight."

"Good-bye, then, and good luck go with you!"

So they shook hands heartily, and parted. In another moment De Benham had taken his seat; the rowers had bent to their oars; and the gig had shot out upon her way like a sea-bird on the wing.

When he remembered this incident of the ring—which was not till nearly a week after—and took it for the first time out of his waistcoat pocket, he found that it was a magnificent brilliant, large as a large pea, limpid as a dewdrop, and radiant as a little lump of live sunlight.

By half-past nine, the Stormy Petrel was steaming out at a rapid pace in the direction of Morris Island.

The moon, which was but a crescent when they ran into Charleston some ten days before, was now waning, and would go down about eleven. The pilot had, therefore, so timed it that they should slip out a little before midnight with the ebbing tide, and make use of the next four hours of darkness to get as far upon their way as their engines at full speed could carry them. Every moment was, therefore, of importance.

And now, with a clear sky over head, and the moon growing brighter as the night deepens, and myriads of stars, like diamond tesserae, inlaying the vault of heaven, they speed on towards the coast. Castle Pinckney is soon left far astern, and Fort Johnson is passed upon the right. Then comes the long white front of Fort Moultrie, gleaming ghostly in the moonlight—then Fort Sumter, dark and isolated in the midst of the broad stream, like a monster ship at anchor.

The tide is now running out with a smooth, swift current; the moon is going rapidly down; and a tender, silvery sheen lies upon the water, seeming to permeate the very air, so that the night is scarcely night at all, but rather a denser twilight. And now the moon has sunk quite out of sight; and now it is midnight, and they are fast nearing the mouth of the harbour. Now Morris Island and the sand-bag batteries, where they cast anchor coming in, are gained and left behind. And now the mouth of the harbour lies before them, widening out to the open sea; while yonder, cruising solemnly to and fro about half a mile beyond the bar, loom some six or eight dark hulls, each an armed sentinel.

And now the same breathless suspense, the same silence, the same intense watchfulness as before reigns on board the blockade-runner. Slowly and stealthily, the muffled thump of her propeller beating like an anxious heart, the Stormy Petrel crawls on towards the bar, making for the same point between the flag-ship and the blockader next in shore. The pilot's whispered orders come hissing through the still night air. The captain stands by silent, with folded arms, his eyes riveted upon the Federal ships a-head. A faint creak is audible now and then from the engine-room. A single spark flutters now and then from the funnel. And now, the tide beginning to run low, the Stormy Petrel plunges into the surf, scraping and grinding as she strikes the bar—and now she is fairly out; and the whispered order comes, "Full speed a-head;" and away she flies into the very teeth of the danger, trusting even less to the chance of escaping unseen than to her own speed and daring.

Scarcely, however, has she dashed in between the two outer ships and cleared the line of the cordon, than a rocket shoots up into the darkness from some point about half-way to the shore, is answered by another from one of the more distant vessels, and instantly followed by the prolonged roar of a heavy gun.

"Give her way!" shouts the pilot, all caution being at an end; and now there is a tumultuous rush to the engine-room—the utmost pressure is put on—the propeller revolves at the rate of seventy to the minute—and the Stormy Petrel plunges on headlong, making desperate way, tearing up the foam at her bows, and leaving a boiling furrow in her wake.

Nor is her speed put on one moment too soon. Out from the midst of the blockading squadron shoots a small, black, dangerous-looking craft, pouring a torrent of red sparks from her chimney—out from among the sand islands lying off the coast to the right, whence the first rocket rose, rushes another—and now the chase begins in earnest!

"Gun boats, by God!" exclaims the captain; and the words are scarcely out of his lips before two more shots are fired, one of which passes clean over the ship's bows and splashes heavily to leeward.

"Shift some of this cotton aft," says the pilot, with a stamp of his foot.

And instantly, all of the crew who are not at work below fall upon the cotton-bales, De Benham and the captain lending each a hand, and bear about a score of them away to the only vacant space abaft the funnel. The screws being now more deeply immersed, this increase of weight is followed by an immediate increase of speed; and, laden as she is, the Stormy Petrel with her two powerful engines answering gallantly to the strain, and her boilers all but priming over from the tremendous pressure, soon shows that she is more than a match for her pursuers. On they come; but the blockade-runner distances them at every turn of her screws—they fire; but their shots each time fall shorter and shorter of the mark. And now those two black outlines seem to stand still. They diminish, they grow dim—they are swallowed up and lost in the darkness—and the Stormy Petrel, once more out of danger, is alone upon the open sea, and running straight for Nassau.

A BLIND INVENTOR.

BLINDNESS, with all the privations it entails, and the happy necessities to which it gives rise, is a trial little understood but by those who have to endure it, or who have carefully watched its sudden incidence and the fruit it bears in actual life. A man does not become blind by merely shutting his eyes. The thoughts and associations that were his as he looked on the world about are still his when his eyes are closed. He still sees the glowing picture or the loving face, the printed page or the bright and sunny landscape, on which his eyes just now rested. He may, indeed, even close his eyes to enjoy over again, with keener vision, that which has just gratified his outer sight. But to the blind man mental pictures of this kind are in a great measure unknown, if not utterly beyond his reach. The cloud of physical darkness which hems him round in his daily path may be but a tithe of the darkness which besets him. His mental eyesight, his spiritual discernment, may be as dull as his bodily vision, and his calamity be doubled by the mere fact that he is unconscious of its intensity. He writes, speaks, thinks of many things of which he has but an imperfect and scanty knowledge, he is apt to draw pictures the outline of which is inaccurate, and to form conceptions which, however real to himself, are after all vague and unreal when compared with the truth; and of this unreality he is unconscious, and therefore is slow to believe it. A blind man, in this unhappy condition, is often looked upon almost as an inferior being, helpless, and little worthy of cultivation in mind or body. His case is compared with the brightness and fresh intelligence of Huber or the cheerful activity of Gough, the mathematician and naturalist; and wonder is expressed that men similarly afflicted should be so different in appearance, manner, knowledge, and wit. Whereas the men differ simply as the wild crab-apple differs from the ribstone pippin; one has grown neglected in the hedge, and the other has been well cared for in the garden. And in most cases the line which divides the blind man from his fellow-men with eyes is not a whit more substantial. The blind man's faculties and endowments are pretty much on a par with those of others in the class of life to which he belongs. He may be ignorant or vicious, shallow, conceited, self-willed, and ungrateful, just as his neighbour who has eyes; or he may be the very reverse. Blindness alone neither makes nor mars him. It is true that loss of sight may fall on him as a heavy blow, and shatter his whole being into a state of weakness and inferiority, temporary or permanent; but this must mainly depend on the care or neglect with which he has been treated, the light or darkness suffered to grow up within as well as about him. In his case, as in that of other men, the field of the heart gets choked with weeds or crowned with golden harvest, just according to the work and will of those who have most power over the soil.

This in a great measure accounts for the wide gulf between Huber, the famous naturalist, and Blind Johnny, who exhibits a tame rat in the Tottenham Court Road; between the blind fiddler who tortures the ears of Leather Lane, and Stanley the organist, to whom Handel used to listen with delight as he played the people out of St. Andrew's Church; between John Gough, the blind tutor of senior wranglers, and the half-starved youth who offers to solve questions in the rule of three on Waterloo Bridge: though it is far easier to see how the one has sunk, than to see how the other has risen, to be what he is. What we really want is to know how, when the dark cloud begins to settle down on a blind man, he manages to escape; to what shifts and devices he is put; how he meets the difficulties in his path, and how he conquers them; how the sense of touch is gradually educated to such a degree of exquisite and finished keenness as to take the place of sight. It is this keenness which, in average cases, enables the blind boy to read a chapter in St. John as fairly and correctly as if he saw it; which, in cases of higher genius, enables one like Saunderson to detect genuine coin from false, or Gough to distinguish the different species of a rare plant by applying them to the tip of the tongue.

We are led into this train of thought by the recent Life of a blind man,* who possesses some of the most marked characteristics of his class, and a few of the less common ones. He tells us little or nothing of that special information which we need; and, perhaps, less for the one reason that for some years he enjoyed the advantages of sight. He is clearly of an eager and impetuous turn of mind; thirsty in the pursuit of knowledge, which he gathers in a desultory fashion; and apt to talk of many things with that easy fluency which sometimes marks shallow knowledge, and verges on dogmatism; and much that his biographer has to say is interesting. But we should like to have heard in the blind man's own words the exact way in which blindness befel him; the gradual settling down of the cloud on his path; how the light waned; how difficulties, wants, and fears were overcome, remedied, or scattered; how long the impression of seen things remained with him; how far his old knowledge, acquired in the light, served to help him in the darkness; how he set to work at things new and strange; and how matters apparently easy proved to be curiously hard. Of these things only a blind man could have fully told us; and of these the biography says little or nothing.

Yet Dr. Gale is a self-made man. He has won his way to his present position by his own perseverance, and, as the inventor of the "non-explosive gunpowder," holds a place among the foremost blind men of the century. On these grounds it is worth while to glance briefly at his life. He was born in the year 1833, at a little village near Plymouth, his father being the "manager of an extensive coal-shed," but not able to do very much for his son's education. While a child he went to live at Tavistock, on the borders of Dartmoor, famous for the beauty of its hills, woods, and valleys, of which he retained a glowing recollection through many a future year of darkness. He grew up with a natural and boyish love for all sports and games; but he was neither coarse nor cruel. He loved birds'-nesting, but yet walked a mile or two through heavy rain to restore a young bird to its nest; though he knew this would insure his getting a good thrashing from his father for loitering on the road. He had some of that gentleness which is allied to true courage. He twice saved the life of a drowning companion; being once rewarded with the magnificent sum of a penny, and in the other case with a smart blow from a stick, with a stern caution that "if he had not been there, there would have been no bathing."

He was as full of mischief and fun, however, as of courage; and nothing pleased him better than tying old women's knockers together, or playing ghost or bogie to frighten a companion. But he began to pick up a few waifs and strays of knowledge, and when he went to purchase a penny bun was never content until the mistress of the shop "had turned over a new leaf" for him in some of the little books on the counter. At the British School, though in a select class "for the higher branches," he was counted a slow coach. But if slow, he was sure. His memory was keen; and books within reach being few in number, he made the utmost use of all he could get; and in after years—when print was blotted out of his sight—he would amuse his friends by repeating whole pages of the old Tavistock spelling-book. This brought him great credit for wonderful memorial powers as a blind man,—as if the direct fruit of blindness,—whereas he simply cultivated his memory in youth, and thus it bore good fruit in manhood. While yet a youth, too, he began to show a taste for scientific matters; dabbling with chemical experiments in true schoolboy fashion; gases in pickle-bottles, and explosive mixtures that terrified his family out of their wits. A little later, and he is all agog for romance of the fiercest kind, which with food of a more ponderous kind, in "Dick's Material Universe," he devoured wholesale; soon becoming famous as a story-teller on wet days and winter evenings. Such was the state of things when the dark cloud began to overshadow his bright sky, so gradually, however, that none suspected its approach. He had met with a heavy fall while swinging with his head downwards on the churchyard railings; but no ill effect was anticipated until the boy began to tell of a shadowy vagueness that blurred the outline of the summer clouds, or of the glowing coals in which he loved to gaze for imaginary pictures. Objects appeared as if seen through a misty glass; now and then with double outline, one just below the other, thus:—

When playing at leap-frog, he miscalculated distances, often missed his aim, and so got some heavy tumbles, which amused his companions and annoyed the sufferer. But still, unwilling to be beaten when at play, he would place a white handkerchief on the back of the boy over whom he had to leap; and when indoors, would jokingly borrow a pair of spectacles to help his failing sight, and, if possible, to hide from his friends the calamity he began to dread. At school, he was slower than ever, but still too proud and high-spirited to confess the reason. He would even learn by rote the whole of his reading-lesson over-night, so that he might at school pretend to read with ease what seemed to him a mere confused mass of words.

But disguise like this could not last. The family doctor was called in, and, to work a cure, something was dropped into his eyes, which merely served to hasten the calamity. Reading, however, was not given up; and Gale being mad or silly enough (like Huber) to try reading by moonlight, all books were soon strictly forbidden. On the last page which he ever looked at, the final word was Courtenay. That word was treasured up in his memory for many a year, until he vowed that if he ever married and had children, his first-born son should bear that name. And the vow was kept.

Step by step the darkness stole on him, until, in his seventeenth year, he became hopelessly blind. Like Saunderson the mathematician, Gale was at first disposed to rebel against his sad trial: "Why should I be blind?" And it was in vain that his kindly doctor did all he could to cheer his patient.

"Who knows," said the old man, "but that I may be blind also! My sight is failing, as yours is."

"You have seen the world," was the youth's reply; "I have yet the world to see. You can feast your mind on what you have seen; I have no such treasures to fall back on."

Such a spirit of fierce discontent was natural enough: but after a time, better thoughts prevailed. Repining and lamentation were useless; and, the loss once felt to be irreparable, he resolved to bear it with a good courage, in the spirit of Milton's grand words—

"Yet, I argue not Against Heaven's hand or will, nor bate a jot
Of heart or hope."

He would "conquer fate," and prove that he was cast in the true mould. "If God wills it, He knows best; and will lead me by a path I know not." To this brave and wise resolve Gale adhered. Blind he might be; helpless he would not be. His natural vivacity and flow of spirits were here of good service; and, with the help of a ready reader and scribe, he managed to carry on his studies much as before. Gradually learning to rely on himself, he grew more independent as his own powers from exercise came out into sharper life. His hearing grew keener; and he soon learned to tell, as many a blind man does, by a tap of his stick, whether a room was full or empty, and, after a few minutes' talk with a stranger, to make a good shot as to his height, age, and station. Coming home one dark night in the carrier's van, across the moor, he told the driver that the horses had missed their way. Jehu was incredulous, the other passengers were derisive, but the blind man held to his assertion. He offered, "if they would wait for him, to get down in the dark and find the right road." To this they agreed; and in a few minutes the blind man had tested his position by a loud shout, the echo of which from a well-known neighbouring rock told him where he was. A cautious step or two showed where the smooth down joined the stony road, and, tracing this back to the sign-post, he soon proved that he was in the right.

From this time Gale's self-reliance never deserted him. He helped in the management of his father's business; he wooed, won, and married a wife, though he never saw the woman of his choice. He mingled freely in all the concerns of daily life, and seemed to know all that was going on. "And why not?" as he justly asks. "The shutters may be up, but that is no reason why the side-door should be closed also. Through these side-doors of mine I communicate with the outer world. Thus obtained, my information is conveyed to the brain and stored up in the workshop of the mind, as busily as if the windows had never been darkened." Armed with such a spring of hope as this, many a blind man has fought bravely against the cloud overhanging his path. Thus, Metcalfe, the blind guide, engineer, and road-maker, when nine years old found his way about the village ; at thirteen, rode fox-hunting ; and could swim and dive for lost property. At twenty he rode a race on his own horse, and came off the winner. In 1745 he enlisted in Thornton's troop, and took part in the battle of Culloden. Possessed of the same unwearied spirit, Holman, the blind lieutenant, retained all the pluck and trimness of the boldest sailor. He would "spring into the chains" with other middies, and throw the lead as truly as any of them ; and once in every voyage he went aloft, to "keep his hand in." He climbed Adam's Peak, some 7,000 feet above the sea ; and, on the topmost ridge, says, "I felt all its beauties rush into my heart of hearts."

No wonder, therefore, that a man like Gale was able to undertake the practical management of his father's business, though it involved an extensive use of chemicals. He often made journeys with his father's travellers, and thus "saw," as he says, most of the cities in England, extending his travels more than once to the shores of France. But trade was not his only pursuit. He laboured diligently in the cause of teetotalism ; served as an active Guardian of the Poor, fighting against the workhouse girls being hired out by publicans ; and lending a good hand towards founding the Plymouth Blind School. Nor were his favourite scientific studies neglected. He worked hard on the subject of medical electricity, and at last determined to give up his business at Plymouth and embrace that of a medical electrician. A man who professes to have a royal road to healing is sure not to lack patients ; and, for a time, Gale found plenty who wished to be freed from their pains. How many were really cured, we have no means of judging ; but these studies and facts connected with his great invention before long led him to London, where a blind medico-electrician is not likely to attract much notice among "the healers of men." But he was not the man to be idle ; and so work went on in other directions. In 1866 he becomes Fellow of the Chemical Society at Burlington House, as well as of the Royal Geographical, and even aspires to the degree of M.A. from the illustrious University of Rostock, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin. Candidates for the degree have to produce an essay on "abstruse questions in natural philosophy ;" and Gale's first attempt was a failure. But, nothing daunted, he set to work again, passed even a more stringent ordeal, and was successful. But better things than Rostock were in store for him. As a boy he had been a great maker of fireworks ; and it was in the manufacture of these fiery delights that he sowed the seeds of a great discovery. He had made a squib of coarse-grained powder, and, wishing to lessen its rapid combustion, had mixed with the ingredients some fine dust from the workshop. The result was, that the squib absolutely refused to go off. His purse was empty ; the gunpowder spoilt. What was to be done ?

The question was soon answered. As he had mixed sand and gunpowder, he might surely unmix them. Slow and difficult work, no doubt ; but still it might be done. To work he went with an old pair of bellows, a weight, and a fire-shovel. Through a ring attached to the weight, which rested on the shovel full of powder and dust, he passed the nose of the bellows, and then began softly puffing. The dust, being lighter than the powder, rose up in little clouds ; but the progress was wearisome and slow. This soon drove him to fasten a string to the handle of the bellows ; and by working this like a lathe, with a loop round his foot, the winnowing process was complete, and the work was soon done. Years passed away, and the dusty mixture was all but forgotten, when the Russian war broke out and set many men thinking of gunpowder who had never smelt it. Dr. Gale was not proof against the general epidemic ; and presently we find him making experiments to test how far earthworks could resist shot. One of these was a heap of impalpably fine dust, having inside it a heap of gunpowder to represent the magazine. While trying to send a shot through this barrier, the gunpowder and dust got mixed, and refused to explode. Then flashed on his mind the recollection of that old, stubborn Tavistock squib, and the idea, "Can this be made useful in saving life ?"

While sifting the explosive from the non-explosive parts of the compound, he began to speculate as to what material could be best mixed with the gunpowder, so as not to injure it. After some scores of experiments, he decided on powdered-glass as the best, as well as being most easily separated from the inflammable material. This mixture, in certain exact proportions, is proof against all chance of explosion. Barrels full of it have been placed on open fires ; have been stirred up with red-hot pokers ; and the loose mixture has been thrown by shovels full into the fire, —but no explosion has ever followed. The invention has been subjected to the severest tests which science or military incredulity can suggest, and has always succeeded. The impenetrable deafness of the Horse Guards has been partly overcome by the non-explosive gunpowder; while royalty and secretaries of state, savans and generals on both sides of the Channel, have witnessed a trial of its wondrous properties. Pure gunpowder placed in the midst of the mixture has been lighted, when the powder at once exploded, but left the mixture unchanged. The principle of the invention is like that of Davy's safety lamp. The gauze wire, in the midst of explosive air, divides one portion of inflammable gas from the other; and, so far, acts the part of the glass flour among the grains of powder. If the foul air inside the lamp ignites, the flame will not spread to the gas outside it. Just so each grain of powder ignites singly; and a bowl of the mixture either refuses to ignite at all, or burns slowly out—the isolation and difficulty of combustion depending on the fineness and coarseness of the protecting dust. The advantages of the invention are, that gunpowder, in any quantity, can be sent by rail, or stored up in arsenals, without the possibility of explosion. The sifting process is easy, cheap, and expeditious, and the powder remains uninjured.

Dr. Gale next turned his attention still further in the same warlike direction, and the result was the invention of the Ammunition Slide and Rudder-ball Cartridge, by means of which a gun will discharge 140 shots per minute. Armed with weapons of, say, half this power, a regiment 800 strong could discharge 50,000 bullets against the advancing foe within one minute; and few men would relish facing weapons which gave to each man seventy shots per minute as his own chance of death. But, besides all these deadly contrivances, we have perilous saltpetre in a shape more villainous and deadly than ever—as fog-shells, to robe a whole ship in dense and suffocating vapour; balloon- shells, to blow the enemy into infinite space; to say nothing of electric alarm clocks, to wake the sleeper at any hour; with fire and thief detectors, to keep him in safety, whether awake or asleep.

The busy, restless, inquiring mind of the boy has thus ripened into the eager, inventive faculty of the man. The "happy necessities of blindness," as we termed them, have driven him to think and contrive for himself, and he has been no less happy in contriving for others. Whether his great invention—for great it is—will win the battle against red tape in our day remains to be seen; if not in ours, the day cannot be far off. To save men's pockets, as well as human life, is too great a power to die. But, however this may be, the inventor has won for himself a place among the discoverers of the age. Here and there in his biography may be detected a little desire to blow the trumpet of his own fame; but their own trumpet is an instrument on which most men like to sound a few choice notes, and there is no reason why a blind man should not be allowed equal freedom with one who has eyes. After all, the strain is short and harmless. His biographer's chatter about Aristotle and Scribonius Largo, Greek fire, Appollonius, Thy-næus (sic), Eustathius, and a dozen more such themes, is altogether out of place.

To trace the rise of a man like Gale from the little British School on Dartmoor up to his present position would have been more than enough for such a pen. Imperfect as it is, the present record is one more proof that patient toil ever wins its due and happy reward; that the darkest cloud has a silver lining; that every man has power to do the work set for him by the Master; that despair and discontent are foolish and cowardly; and that work is a blessing—tenfold to the man who thinks of others as well as himself.

B. G. JOHNS.

THE YOUNGEST COLONEL IN THE SERVICE:

A MEMORIAL OF ALEXANDER ROBERTS DUNN, V.C.

CANADA is entitled to the first place among our colonies for the warlike, patriotic spirit it has displayed. Of all the dependencies of the Crown, it alone has contributed a regiment for the defence of the mother-country, and the rooth, or Prince of Wales's Royal Canadian Regiment, will always be associated with the name of the gallant young soldier whose brilliant career and untimely end form the subject of the following memoir.

Alexander Roberts Dunn was descended, on his father's side, from an old and well-known Northumbrian family of that name, and, on his mother's, from the Robertses of Glastonbury. He was born at Toronto, in 1833, and was the second son of the Honourable John Henry Dunn, who for more than twenty years held the high and responsible office of Receiver-General of Canada. After the Union he resigned that appointment, and became a member of the Legislative Assembly, where he took an active interest in all that concerned the welfare of his adopted country. As a public man he was highly esteemed for his political consistency, while his private worth and many virtues endeared him to all who knew him.

His second son, Alexander, was intended for the army. It was his desire almost from childhood to enter the service, and he was educated in England, chiefly at Harrow, with a view to his future profession. In 1852, before he had completed his nineteenth year, he was gazetted to a cornetcy in the 11th (Prince Albert's Own) Hussars, a regiment which can boast of a hundred and fifty years' service, and of "Egypt," "the Peninsula," "Waterloo," and "Bhurutpore," inscribed on its colours.

Our young soldier, while at Harrow, without neglecting his studies, delighted in all those manly sports and exercises which are practised there, and on joining his regiment he devoted himself, with equal ardour, to mastering the details of his new profession. He was a splendid swordsman, a skilful rider, and an unrivalled marksman. A friend, who witnessed it, has given us a singular proof of his almost unerring aim. He placed a small cap-case on the head of a favourite servant, and fired at it with his pistol at the distance of sixteen yards. Out of forty shots, he hit the cap-case thirty-six times, and the servant stood as steady as a post. This eccentric feat, recalling the days of William Tell, might appear incredible, but it was actually witnessed by our informant. It must be borne in mind that Mr. Dunn was at this time a very young officer, and, we may venture to add, that this proof of his skill is more to be admired than imitated. The servant must certainly have had great confidence in his master before he would submit to such an ordeal.

The honour of his regiment is dear to the young soldier, and Cornet Dunn was resolved, on joining the 11th Hussars, to prove, if the occasion ever presented itself, that he was worthy of the rank he held. He had not long to wait for that occasion. In less than two years after he was gazetted, he landed with his regiment in the Crimea, and took part in the first skirmish we had with the enemy. Our cavalry division was under the command of the Earl of Lucan; it was divided into two parts—the Light Dragoons under the command of the Earl of Cardigan, and the Heavy Dragoons under the command of Brigadier-General Scarlett. The 11th Hussars belonged to the Light Cavalry Brigade.

On the 19th of September, 1854, Lieutenant Dunn (he had now attained that rank) was under fire for the first time. On the afternoon of that day, while our army was on the march, and before it had reached the Bulganak, curling wreaths of smoke were seen on the south and east, marking the spots where the Cossacks had set fire to the houses of the poor Tartars. Then, on the distant hills, appeared dark bodies of cavalry, drawn up as if to check the advance of the Allies by attacking them on the left flank. Lieutenant Dunn was one of the party of light cavalry that dashed forward, under the command of Lord Cardigan, to drive the Cossacks from their position. The latter remained in possession of the brow of the hill; they were thrice the number of the English, and could only have been attacked at great disadvantage. Lord Cardigan was about to charge up the hill, when Lord Raglan, deeming the odds, both in numbers and position, to be too great, gave orders to recall the skirmishers, and retire slowly. On this the Cossack squadrons separated, and some guns, hitherto concealed, began to play upon our cavalry as they retired; a few hussars and dragoons were wounded, but no lives were lost. There was a feeling of disappointment, not confined to Lieutenant Dunn, that our hussars had not had an opportunity of measuring swords with the enemy, but there can be no doubt that an uphill attack against such superior numbers must have been attended with serious loss.

From the skirmish at Bulganak we hasten on to the battle of Balaklava, where the 11th Hussars gained for themselves an imperishable name, and Lieutenant Dunn proved himself the bravest of the brave. It would be foreign to our purpose to try to describe the battle, but we must trace the course of the 11th Hussars till we reach the point where Lieutenant Dunn, forgetful of his own safety, displayed a chivalrous courage and noble humanity, in saving the lives of his comrades when they were at the mercy of the enemy. The Turks had been driven from the redoubts by the enemy. The 93rd Highlanders, under the command of their gallant old chief, standing in double rank only, had repelled the attack of the Russian cavalry. The Scots Greys and the Inniskillings had made their gallant and successful charge, described by a French general as "truly magnificent—the most glorious thing I ever saw."

Then came the most brilliant episode in the whole campaign, the fatal charge of the Light Brigade. It was a blunder, but that detracts nothing from our admiration of those who took part in it. The first duty of soldiers is obedience; beyond that they have no responsibility. Lord Cardigan was not the man to reason, to cavil, or to doubt. "I received an order, and I obeyed it." Before advancing down the valley, the front of the Light Brigade was narrowed, and the 11th Hussars removed from the first line and stationed so as to act in support. The officers of the regiment present on this occasion were Colonel Douglas, Captain Edwin Cook, Lieutenants Trevelyan, Alexander R. Dunn, Roger Palmer, and George Powell Haughton. At first it formed the left of the first line, but when the order was given, "Forward the Light Brigade! Charge for the guns!" it advanced in support of the 17th Lancers. When Lieutenant Dunn heard that order, he grasped his sword more firmly and rode steadily on. He heard Nolan's death-cry: he saw his horse rush riderless away. The havoc in front was fearful; it could not be called fighting; our soldiers were powerless till they reached the battery. As the saddles in front became empty, there rose the steady cry, "Close in,—close in to the centre—close in!" and every gap was at once filled up. The front became narrower as they neared the battery, but there was no vacant place. Horses with empty saddles, guided by the habit of discipline, retained their places, or fell back and joined other troops. The Russian artillerymen stood to their guns, and fought with obstinate courage; only a few lay hid beneath the tumbrels to escape the sabres of our troopers. The right troop of the 11th Hussars was confronted by the battery; little resistance was offered, as most of the gunners were already cut down. The other troops outflanked the line of the battery, and rejoined the right troop, which had now reached a clear space beyond the limbers and tumbrels. At this point a Russian colonel, imagining that all was lost, gave up his sword to an officer of the 11th Hussars, but there was no time to make prisoners. As the smoke cleared away, several squadrons of Russian lancers were seen drawn up a little in advance; they lowered their lances as if about to charge, but when the 11th Hussars rushed forward to attack them, they retreated and were followed into the gorge between the aqueduct and the eastern base of the Fedoukine hills. On approaching the bank of the aqueduct, the Hussars found themselves confronted by large bodies of Russian cavalry. A mere handful of men, they could do nothing against such overpowering numbers; their only chance of safety was to fall back. At some distance they met the 4th Light Dragoons, who also fell back, aligning with the 11th Hussars. The collision, so to speak, of the two regiments necessarily caused some degree of confusion, and if the enemy had attacked them at that moment, the loss might have been very serious. They failed to do so, and order was soon restored. When the two regiments (numbering only seventy troopers in all) wheeled round and presented a bold front to the enemy, the Russian cavalry, panic-struck by their audacity, halted, and began to fall back. At this moment a large body of cavalry appeared on our left rear, and a joyful cry rose from the little band: "Hurrah! it is the 17th." A closer inspection soon proved that it was not the 17th Lancers, but a large body of Russian cavalry, consisting of five or six squadrons, drawn up to cut off their retreat. They were then placed between two bodies of the enemy, so that to advance or to retreat became equally difficult and dangerous. If the Russian cavalry had known their advantage, and how to profit by it, they might have closed up and crushed our handful of troopers by the mere weight of numbers; but they seem never to have recovered from their first surprise on seeing the audacity of our attack. At this moment our troopers were fronting the enemy in the rear, when the order was given to go about; it thus happened that when this movement was effected the rear rank were in front and the officers behind.

This inversion of the usual order of things gave them one advantage; they could see all that happened to their own men. The danger was greatest for the first few yards, but fortunately the Russian cavalry failed to attack them in the rear. As they advanced two in front and three in depth, the Russian guns opened fire on them. But this was rather an advantage, as it served to distract the attention of the cavalry. If the Russian lancers had only kept their ground, they would have broken our small band as a rock breaks the wave that dashes against it, for they were ten times their number; but at the moment when collision seemed imminent, the Russian commander wheeled his squadron half back so as to flank our line of retreat. This movement was effected in such a way that the enemy's right flank was thrown forward, and our right flank moving at right angles was brought into direct collision with the enemy's front. Then came the tug of war: the Russian cavalry used their lances; our troopers charged them with their swords. What followed may be best described by one of the actors in that glorious scene:—

"It was a genuine blood-hot, all-mad charge from the moment we dashed at the enemy. I know nothing but that I was impelled by some irresistible force onward, and by some invisible and imperceptible influence to crush every obstacle which stumbled before my good sword and brave old charger. I never in my life experienced such a sublime sensation as in the moment of the charge. Some fellows speak of it as being 'demoniac.' I know that it was such that it made me a match for any two ordinary men, and gave me such an amount of glorious indifference to life, as I thought it impossible to be master of. Forward—dash—bang—clank—and there we were in the midst of such smoke, cheer, and clatter as never before stunned a mortal ear. It was glorious. I could not pause. It was all push, wheel, frenzy, strike, and down, down they went."

We have traced the course of the 11th Hussars up to this point, so as to make the part which Lieutenant Dunn acted in the midst of this mêlée intelligible. All discipline was now at an end; every man fought for his own hand; his safety depended on his own individual prowess and skill. In such a struggle the young Canadian soldier possessed physical qualities which gave him an immense advantage over most of his fellows. His great height (he was six feet three inches) and powerful arm, joined to his skill in the use of his weapon, made him one of the most formidable swordsmen in the British army. And then there is no exaggeration in affirming that he was, and to the hour of his death continued to be, an absolute stranger to fear. He was one of those few men so peculiarly constituted as never to have experienced that unpleasant sensation. It might be said of him as of Bayard, he was sans peur et sans reproche. He was as cool and collected in the hour of danger as that model of French chivalry himself. In such a moment the bravest soldier might have been justified in consulting only his own safety, but Lieutenant Dunn was too generous to refuse his aid to a comrade in distress. Wherever he saw a hussar attacked by superior numbers, he flew to his assistance, and soon caused his presence to be felt. No wonder that the men he rescued spoke with enthusiasm of his unselfish and devoted courage, when the hour of danger was past: without the aid his strong arm brought them, some never would have lived to say, "We also took part in that gallant charge." The old troopers of the 11th Hussars still tell with kindling eyes how the young lieutenant, seeing Sergeant Bentley of his own regiment attacked from behind by two or three Russian lancers, rushed upon them single-handed and cut them down; how he saved the life of Sergeant Bond; how Private Levett owed his safety to the same friendly arm, when assailed by a Russian hussar. Kinglake relates in his usual dramatic style, how a young cavalry officer, a mere youth almost fresh from school, was seized with a sort of sæva indignatio—a fierce rage against human life—an almost rabid desire to destroy it; how he inveighed against it in words, and accompanied his words with such deeds that more fell beneath his sword than that of any other who took part in this fierce contest. He adds, also, that when his warlike fury was over, and he saw the havoc he had made, the reaction set in, and he wept like a child. There is nothing improbable or incredible in the story itself. Certain men, certain races even, are known to be subject to such outbursts of fury in the hour of danger, and tears have often been shed after and during a battle; it is all a question of temperament. If the story has any foundation in fact, it could apply only to Lieutenant Dunn, who, it is certain, killed more Russians than any other man in the field, but it could apply to him only in that respect. He was not at all an excitable man, given to sudden outbursts of fury in war or in peace; to shed human blood for the mere pleasure of shedding it was foreign alike to his character and principles; when he struck down the Russians it was the humane desire to save the life of a comrade which lent force to his arm. Nor was he at all addicted to the melting mood; he was as little demonstrative in the expression of emotion as we should expect any other young Englishman to be.

He was naturally shy and reserved, especially with strangers, and averse from saying much about what he did on that day. When it was alluded to in society he changed the subject at once. Even in the bosom of his own family, and among his most intimate friends, he showed a certain uneasiness when it was spoken of. "It was nothing; I only did my duty," was his usual remark; oftener he made no remark at all. If speech be silvery and silence golden, there was infinitely more gold than silver in his composition.

The charge of the six hundred was a mistake, but there was a certain moral grandeur and sublimity about it. The national pulse beat faster when the intelligence reached England: the age of chivalry seemed to be restored. The words of our Queen expressed the general sentiment of admiration, when she said, "The brilliancy of the charge, and the gallantry and discipline evinced by all, have never been surpassed by British soldiers under similar circumstances." The services of the 11th Hussars were not forgotten: "Balaklava" is inscribed on their colours in memory of what they did and suffered on that day. A Victoria Cross—the Queen's own Cross of Valour—was also placed at the disposal of the regiment, to be given to the soldier they deemed most worthy to wear it. There was no doubt or hesitancy: it was unanimously voted to Lieutenant Dunn, who thus obtained the distinction of being the only cavalry officer who obtained this decoration. It was expected that there would be a still more substantial recognition of his merits when the first opportunity presented itself; but he was doomed to bitter disappointment, such as none but a young soldier can understand. The slaughter at Balaklava, and subsequent losses by disease, rendered it necessary to augment each of the Light Cavalry regiments in the Crimea by two troops. The 11th Hussars was so augmented, and one troop in it was given to the first Lieutenant, but Lieutenant Dunn, who was second, was passed over. He was too proud to stoop to ask a favour, or to use influence to obtain what he might justly claim as his right. If any man deserved promotion, assuredly he was that man. He had never been absent from duty a single day in the Crimea, and was left on several occasions in command of the regiment; yet he was superseded. Hence the general outcry in the regiment and elsewhere against the injustice with which he was treated. The troop which belonged to him of right was given to an officer on the Staff, who had no previous connection with the regiment. That officer may have deserved even higher promotion, but he had no claim to the command of that particular troop, which belonged of right to Lieutenant Dunn. The injustice was all the more glaring, because in other regiments—the 13th Light Dragoons for example—the vacant, or augmentation troops, were given to the senior Lieutenants, though, in one case at least, the officer thus promoted had remained at home, and taken no part in the campaign. Our young soldier had carved his way to fame with his sword—he had done enough for glory; and he had too much self-respect to remain in the service after being treated with such neglect. He could leave it without any imputation on his courage, and his ample fortune made him independent of his profession. The career so brilliantly begun seemed already to have reached its close.

Soon after the battle of Balaklava, Lieutenant Dunn sold out, and returned to England. He could not remain in the regiment with another man unjustly, as he thought, placed over his head. It was not without a struggle that he gave up his profession and all the ambitious hopes he had fondly cherished in his youth. He had loved his mother-country, he had fought bravely in her defence, and she had treated him with all the harshness and injustice of a step-mother. He returned home brooding over his disappointment, resolved to renounce for ever a service in which influence was everything and merit counted for nothing. Such was the view he then took of the matter; but we cannot avoid thinking he was wrong to leave the service. We never yet met an officer, young or old, who had not a grievance, real or imaginary. The older hands learn to grin and bear it: the young and inexperienced alone think of giving everything up in disgust. We have met scores of officers who had left the service early in life because it had not answered their expectations. There was not one of them who did not bitterly regret the step he had taken, and who would not willingly have made any sacrifice to be replaced in his former position. And the sequel will show that Lieutenant Dunn's quarrel with his profession was only a lover's quarrel, soon to be repented of, soon to be made up.

A life of enforced idleness soon became intolerable, and Lieutenant Dunn left for the Rocky Mountains on a hunting expedition, in company with an officer of his former regiment. The wild life of the prairie, the society of the half-caste trappers, the occasional encounters with hostile Indians, the buffalo-hunt, the midnight bivouac, the rough fare of the backwoods,—were not without their attractions to a man of his temperament, but still he was restless and dissatisfied. He was born a soldier, and his heart was still in his profession. Wherever he went he carried with him the longing desire to resume the career he had so brilliantly begun and so rashly abandoned. He carried this feeling with him to Canada, when he revisited his native province towards the close of 1857; and it gathered strength from the reception he everywhere received. The courage he evinced in the charge of the six hundred was not forgotten: he had shed lustre on his native province. The Indian mutiny was still going on, and troops were being hurried from England and elsewhere to aid in its suppression. Why should not Canada raise a regiment to assist the mother-country in the struggle? The enterprise was not without its difficulties in a colony where men are scarce and the price of labour high. Lieutenant Dunn was, perhaps, the only man who could have undertaken it with success. His name, the influence of his family, his military fame, the cross of valour which the Queen had placed on his breast with her own hand, and his ample means, entitled him to expect success where others might have failed. General Eyre approved of the proposal, and Lieutenant Dunn entered on his task with enthusiasm. It was mainly owing to his efforts that another regiment—the rooth, or Prince of Wales's Royal Canadian Regiment—was added to the British army. Several of our Highland regiments were raised by private gentlemen; but they were raised at a period and in a land where men were abundant and labour cheap. They cost little; but it was different with the Canadian regiment. Lieutenant Dunn alone expended many thousands; and when his task was completed, he was gazetted as junior major of the regiment. The appointment met with universal favour. Soon after this he was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy, in consequence of the retirement of Baron de Rottenburg, who originally held that appointment. Lieutenant-Colonel Dunn thus, by a happy conjunction of circumstances, found himself in command of a regiment when he had barely completed his twenty-seventh year.

His youth and inexperience had been adduced as an excuse for not giving him his troop. The firmness and judgment with which he discharged the duties of a commanding officer proved that he was qualified for the still higher office which he now held. He was a strict disciplinarian, and yet contrived to gain the affections even of those whom he was compelled to punish. The story is told of an Irishman, whom he had sentenced to a week's extra drill for some military offence, exclaiming, on hearing his sentence, "Shure, Colonel, I had rather have a month's drill from you than a week from any one else." He was kind and familiar in his bearing to his officers; but none of them would ever have ventured to take any liberty with him. The distinction he had gained at Balaklava disarmed the envy which might otherwise have been excited by the promotion of one so young; his regiment was proud of him, and he was equally proud of his regiment. His great ambition was to raise it to the highest state of discipline, and to make it one of the crack regiments of the service.

Soon after his appointment to the majority of the 100th Regiment, he was presented with the sword of General Wolfe. This interesting relic, so closely associated with one of the most glorious episodes of Canadian history, could not have been placed in more deserving hands than those of the young Canadian soldier, whose career was destined to be as brief and almost as brilliant as that of its original possessor. It was exhibited in the Canadian department of the Great Exhibition of 1862, and was examined by thousands with that tender respect which everything connected with the young hero who fell on the plains of Abraham ought ever to excite. It was highly valued by Colonel Dunn, and is now in the possession of his brother-in-law, Mr. Thurlow Dowling.

Colonel Dunn accompanied his regiment to England. Their first station was Aldershot, but after some time they were removed to Gibraltar. There much of his leisure time was spent in yachting, of which he was passionately fond, and on more than one occasion he had a narrow escape from drowning. One or two illustrations may be given of his generous courage, his dauntless disposition, and great powers of endurance. On one occasion several of his brother officers had accompanied him on board his yacht; a favourable breeze sprang up, all sail was set, and they skimmed joyfully along before the wind. The yacht leaned over considerably, so that the sea almost touched the deck. One of the officers, Captain Coulson, happened to bend forward, the vessel gave a sudden lurch, he lost his balance and fell overboard. "Put her about," he cried, "or I am lost!" On seeing his friend in the water, Colonel Dunn rushed forward, and was about to leap overboard to try to rescue him, when the other officers, knowing that he could only lose his own life without aiding the drowning man, seized him and held him down by force. An oar was thrown to and seized by the officer in the water; the yacht was put about, but when they reached the spot he had disappeared. This incident shows how generous were his impulses, how little store he set by his own life, and how ready he ever was to rush to the assistance of others without weighing the consequences to himself.

On another occasion he was caught in one of those sudden gales so common in the Mediterranean. There were none on board the yacht but himself and two or three attendants. The gale increased to a hurricane; every effort was made to save the yacht, but she at length became unmanageable, and all hope of safety was given up. Colonel Dunn told his men that nothing more could be done, and descended to the cabin. The crew remained on deck expecting that every moment would be their last. At length, to their great joy, a Spanish vessel hove in sight, they hoisted a signal of distress, and the ship kept them in sight till the hurricane had sufficiently abated to admit of a boat being lowered. On descending to the cabin they found Colonel Dunn sleeping as soundly as if there had been no danger, and loudly expressed their surprise that he could go to sleep under such circumstances. "Why not?" was his answer; "we had done all that could be done." It seemed to him perfectly natural to go to sleep when nothing else remained to be done.

Tired at times of the monotonous life on the glowing rock at Gibraltar, he visited the opposite coast of Africa, and made his way into the interior in search of sport. Such adventures were not without their danger, as the Moors are extremely jealous of strangers, and ready to attack them if they think they can do so with impunity.

The next station was Malta. Here Colonel Dunn had the misfortune to lose his half-brother, an officer in the regiment, who died of fever. He nursed him most tenderly during his illness. And his letters at this period prove that with all his reserve and seeming coldness, he had a warm and affectionate heart. He caused his brother to be buried in full uniform. It was an idea of his that a soldier, like a monk, should wear in the grave the garb he wore in life. While stationed at Malta, he had another almost miraculous escape. He had been dining at Government House, and was driving home in his carriage with his servant, and his coachman seated on the box. Part of the road lay along the precipitous shore from which it was separated by a species of embankment. The night was dark, and part of the embankment had been broken down. The coachman mistook the way, and the carriage and horses were precipitated over the cliff; Colonel Dunn, with some difficulty, contrived to reach the shore, but the horses were drowned and the carriage destroyed. On this occasion he lost his Victoria Cross and all his Crimean medals, and had much difficulty in having them replaced. From all that has been said it might be inferred that Colonel Dunn bore a charmed life—the sequel, alas! will show that the charm extended only up to a certain point.

On the 20th of December, 1864, Lieutenant-Colonel Dunn was gazetted as full colonel—the youngest colonel in the British service. His active mind and adventurous spirit soon led him to long for a larger field of action than Malta, and he exchanged into the 33rd Regiment, which was then stationed at Poona, in the Bombay Presidency. India has always been the nursery of military reputations, the field where our bravest soldiers have carved their way with their swords to rank and fame. The 33rd is known in the service as the Duke of Wellington's Own Regiment, and the name may have been suggestive of a similar career in India. On joining the regiment he was only second colonel, but Colonel Collings having been made Brigadier-General, Colonel Dunn was left in sole command of the regiment.

After some time, finding that he was about to be superseded by the return of his senior officer, he began to think seriously of returning to England; but after he had made every preparation for going home, and had secured his passage, and all but embarked, his leave of absence was revoked, and he remained in India. An inadvertency on his part, the omission of a simple act of courtesy, is said to have been the cause of the withdrawal of his leave of absence—on such trifles does the future of a man's whole life often hinge. It would be idle to speculate what Colonel Dunn's destiny might have been if he had returned to England; it is sufficient to remark that he remained in India, still retaining the command of the regiment. About this time he made the acquaintance of the present Lord Napier of Magdala, who knew how to appreciate his noble, chivalrous character, and strove to meet his wishes in every way.

The 33rd Regiment was stationed at Kurachee when they received instructions that they were to form part of the Abyssinian expedition. None but a soldier stationed in India can conceive the boundless joy with which these instructions were received. To escape from the dreary monotony of a tropical life our men are ever ready to go anywhere and do anything. While Colonel Dunn shared in the general exultation, certain facts, which we are not at liberty to divulge, prove that he had a presentiment that he would never return alive from that expedition. Some may regard it as a proof of weakness to attach any importance to such a feeling; but it is an undoubted fact that some soldiers are favoured with a presentiment of their impending fate, and act upon it with as much assurance as if their doom were irrevocable. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that this foreknowledge interferes in any way with the faithful discharge of duty; a truly brave man will meet death none the less cheerfully because he knows death to be inevitable. This feeling was not confined to India—Colonel Dunn carried it with him to Abyssinia. A few days before his death, on meeting an intimate friend, a colonel in the Indian service, he told him the presentiment was still present to his mind that he would never leave Abyssinia. This feeling was all the more singular, inasmuch as it was already known that the expedition was not likely to be attended with much loss of life.

On the 2nd of February, 1868, the following passage appeared in the Times' Own Correspondent's letter from Abyssinia:—

"Senafé, Jan. 28.—I found Senafé on my arrival yesterday full of a terrible tragedy, which has cast a gloom over all the camp. One of the most popular and promising officers attached to the Abyssinian force, Colonel Dunn, of the 33rd Regiment, had two days before accidentally shot himself. He had gone out with his rifle after game, and from the account of his native servant, who was the only person with him when the accident happened, it seems that as he was stooping forward over a ditch to get some water both barrels suddenly went off and lodged their contents in his left side. His death must have been instantaneous. He was just able to say, 'Run for a doctor,' and then dropped dead."

More minute details of his melancholy death are given in the following extract from a letter written by the officer who accompanied him:—

"Senafé, Abyssinia, 31st Jan., 1868.—It is with feelings of deepest regret I write to announce to you the death of our beloved commanding officer, Colonel Dunn, V.C., 33rd Regiment, which melancholy event occurred last Saturday, the 25th instant, by the accidental explosion of his rifle when out shooting deer.

"I accompanied him in the morning to shoot, but in the course of the day we got separated from each other, and I never saw him alive again. The bearer, or gun-carrier who accompanied him, states he wandered far after some deer, got tired, and sat down on a stone. He asked the bearer to give him his brandy flask, which he did, but just while in the act of opening it his rifle slipped and exploded. The contents of both barrels (it is believed) passed through the same opening in the chest. He jumped up suddenly, when the bearer caught him in his arms and laid him down. Colonel Dunn told the bearer to take off his coat and lay him on it, which he did; he then told him to take off his shirt and put it over his face to keep off the sun. When he had done this, Colonel Dunn told him to run into the camp and tell the officers, and bring out a doctor. The bearer did so, and on returning the colonel was found, with the cloth over his face, just as he was left, and quite dead—apparently about an hour. The immediate cause of death was internal hemorrhage. He was buried on Tuesday, the 27th of Jan., under a high rock at Senafé, and his funeral was attended by all the camp, sorrowing, for he was universally loved, and had not an enemy.

"In this sad manner has the regiment lost the best commanding officer it ever had, or ever could have; he was beloved by men and officers, and considered the pride of the regiment by all."

We give an extract also from a letter written by another officer to Colonel Dunn's sister:—

"In no regiment was ever a commanding officer so missed as the one we have just so unhappily lost, such a courteous, thorough gentleman in word and deed, so thoughtful for others, so perfect a soldier, so confidence-inspiring a leader. Every soldier in the regiment misses Colonel Dunn; he was a friend, and felt to be such, to every one of them. The regiment will never have so universally-esteemed a commander again. We all feel that. For myself, I feel that I have lost a brother who can never be replaced. I can scarcely yet realise that the dear fellow is really dead; and as I pass his tent every morning I involuntarily turn my head, expecting to hear his usual kind salutation, and to see the dear handsome face that has never looked at me but with kindness. I breakfasted with him on the morning of the 25th, and he looked so well as he started off with our surgeon for a day's shooting. Little did I think that I had looked on his dear old face for the last time in life. . . . I cannot describe to you what a shock the sad news was to every one, both in my regiment, and indeed to every one in the camp. Our dear colonel was so well known, and so universally liked and respected.

"Next day, Sunday, the 26th of January, he was buried about four o'clock P.M. I went to look at the dear old fellow before his coffin was closed, and his poor face, though looking so cold, was yet so handsome, and the expression of it so peaceful and happy. I cut off some of his hair, which lately he wore very short, a lock of which I now send you, keeping one for myself as the most valuable souvenir I could have of one I loved very dearly. And I knelt down to give his cold forehead a long farewell kiss.

"He was buried in uniform, as he had often expressed a wish to me to that effect. Every officer in the camp attended his funeral, and, of course, the whole of his own regiment, in which there was not a single dry eye as all stood round the grave of their lost commander. He has been buried on a piece of ground near where our camp now stands, at the foot of a small hill covered with shrubbery and many wild flowers. We have had railings put round the grave, and a stone is to be placed there with the inscription:—

"IN MEMORY OF
A. R. DUNN, V.C., COL. 33RD REGIMENT, WHO DIED AT SENAFÉ
ON THE 25TH JAN., 1868,
AGED 34 YEARS AND 7 MONTHS."

Wolfe's lines on the burial of Sir John Moore will apply almost word for word to the lonely grave beneath the wild peak of Senafé:—

"No useless coffin enclosed his head,
Nor in sheet nor in shroud we wound him,
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him."

Two soldiers of his own regiment were buried near the same spot.

On the following day his "kit" was sold by auction, as is usually done when an officer or a soldier dies in the field. If he has been popular, his comrades are always anxious to secure something at the sale as a souvenir. Everything belonging to Colonel Dunn was sold at an extravagant price; an old pair of hunting spurs fetched three pounds; a copper wash-hand basin the same amount.

No one lamented the death of Colonel Dunn more sincerely than Sir Robert Napier, who saw in him one of the most promising officers in the British army. He arrived at Senafé two days after the accident, and in reviewing the troops he complimented the 33rd on their efficiency, and expressed his regret that they would not be led by the gallant officer whose loss he and they deplore.

We give a copy of an extract from his next dispatch:—

"Senafé, 30th January, 1868.—By the death of Colonel Dunn, the 33rd Regiment have lost an excellent commanding officer, and the service a very valuable and promising soldier.

(Signed) "R. NAPIER."

His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, on learning the sad intelligence, hastened to express his sympathy with Colonel Dunn's family, in the loss they had sustained. The following letter was written by the Military Secretary, General Forster, to Thurlow Dowling, Esq., by command of H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge:—

"HORSE GUARDS, 22nd Feb., 1868.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I am desired by the Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief to express to you, and to request you will communicate to his relations, His Royal Highness's deep regret at the melancholy death of Colonel Dunn, V.C., 33rd Regiment.

"His Royal Highness would offer, through you to his family, his sincere condolent sympathy in the loss of an officer who had distinguished himself in the service, and whose antecedents in the army led to the anticipation that, had his life been spared, he would have become still more distinguished in his profession.

"Although I could not boast of intimacy with Colonel Dunn, still my knowledge of and friendship for him will, I trust, warrant my requesting you will accept my participation in His Royal Highness's feelings upon this sad occasion.

"I enclose an extract from the report of His Excellency Lieut.-General Sir Robert Napier announcing his death.—Believe me, my dear sir,

Yours very truly,

W. F. FORSTER.

"Thurlow Dowling, Esq."

Colonel Dunn's regiment, the gallant 33rd, highly distinguished themselves at the capture of Magdala. It seemed as if they were still animated by the presence of him they had loved so well. When the head of the column of attack was checked by the obstacles at the gate, a small stream of officers and men of the 33rd Regiment and an officer of Engineers, breaking away from the main approach to Magdala, and climbing up a cliff, reached the defences and forced their way over the wall and through the strong and thorny fence, thus turning the defenders of the gateway. The first two men to enter, and the first in Magdala, were Drummer Maynard and Private Bergin of the 33rd Regiment. For their conspicuous gallantry on this occasion, both were decorated with the Victoria Cross. But amid all the exultation of final success, in the very moment of victory, there was but one feeling pervading the whole regiment—a feeling of regret that their beloved young chief was not there to lead them on, and share in the laurels they gained. "How proud poor Dunn would have been leading his regiment!" was the universal remark among the officers; while still more kindly and affectionate terms were heard from the ranks. It was certainly a remarkable circumstance connected with this highly successful expedition, that while not a single British soldier was killed in battle, a simple accident cost us the life of one of the most distinguished and generally popular officers in the whole expeditionary force.

It was for this reason, doubtless, that the national grief, which might have been diverted into a thousand different channels, as it was during the Crimean war, was concentrated on Colonel Dunn alone. No young officer has ever been so much lamented since the death of General Wolfe, whose sword he possessed. Not only the military journals, but journals of all kinds and shades of politics united in giving expression to the universal grief which the nation felt at the loss of one in whose person seemed to be revived the spirit of the chivalrous ages. This feeling of universal regret even found its way into the House of Commons, usually so cold and dispassionate. When the thanks of the House of Commons were given to General Sir Robert Napier and the army which had taken part in the Abyssinian Expedition, on the 2nd of July, 1868, Mr. Gladstone expressed this feeling with his usual eloquence:—

"Perhaps it may not be going too far from the subject to utter in this august assembly one word of regret for a gallant officer—Colonel Dunn—I believe the only field officer whose life has been lost, although not by the direct result of military operations during the expedition; who had proved in the deadly charge at Balaklava the courage with which he was inspired; who had received at the hand of his Sovereign the honour of the Victoria Cross; who had sought active service as the commander of the gallant regiment that made the assault upon Magdala—the 33rd—and who has now found a grave in that distant country, with a place of honour in the recollection of his fellow-citizens."

The unanimous applause with which these eloquent words were greeted, proved how deeply the House sympathised with the feeling they expressed.

It was one of the wise maxims of antiquity that no man should esteem himself happy till the hour of his death. Of all the gallant officers who landed in Abyssinia and took part in that expedition, Colonel Dunn might justly have been pronounced the most fortunate. At an age when most young men are still at school or college, he gained in the deadly charge at Balaklava a name that was known wherever the English language is spoken or deeds of bravery admired. At the age of thirty, he attained the rank of Colonel, and assumed the command of one of the finest regiments in the service. In that regiment he was universally popular with all, from the senior officer down to the youngest recruit. Nor was his popularity confined to his own regiment. There was a charm, a fascination, in his manner, which disarmed jealousy and converted envy into friendship. A less lovable man might have been disliked because he was so fortunate, but no one complained of his rapid promotion. A colonel at thirty,—the youngest colonel in the British service,—he would have obtained the rank of Brigadier-General before he had completed his thirty-fifth year, for his name was next upon the list. Known as a dashing officer, distinguished for his personal bravery, a Colonel at an age when other men are captains or sub-alterns, possessed of every gift of fortune, there was no rank or position in the army which he might not have been predicted to attain; and yet, by a simple accident, this brilliant soldier, beloved and admired by all, was arrested in the full career of success, and laid in a lonely tomb among the rocks at Senafé. In his case as in many others,

"The path of glory leads but to the grave."

It was a belief among the ancients that an early death is a proof of divine favour; and there is nothing in revelation to contradict that belief. He had lived long enough for his own glory, if not for his country's good. The highest honours of his profession could not have invested his name with a brighter halo than it already possessed at the hour of his death. Such men never die altogether: they live in the hearts of those who have known and loved them.

Such was Colonel Dunn, the very model and beau-ideal of a British soldier—tall, handsome, chivalrous, generous, almost to a fault. Modest and unassuming, he loved more to hear of the brave deeds of others than to recount his own. Shy and reserved with strangers, in the bosom of his own family, or in the society of his own officers, he showed all the fresh light-hearted gaiety of a boy, ready to please and to be pleased with everything. And yet, in those hours of social freedom, no one would have ventured to forget that he was a man born to command; possessed of the mysterious gift of attracting and influencing others without an effort. The tears shed over his grave at Senafé, the aching hearts which still lament his loss, prove how largely he possessed this power. It may be said that he was proud because he was never seen at the levées of princes or in the antechambers of the great; but his was that noble pride which respects itself; which stoops to nothing base or mean; which abhors the language of flattery, and refuses to bow before the idols of the hour.

Now that our task is ended, we bow with tender respect before the memory of this gallant young soldier, to whom the beautiful language of Bacon may be aptly applied:—"The death of such persons is wont to be followed by infinite commiseration; for of all mortal accidents, there is none so lamentable, none so powerful to move pity, as this cropping of the flower of virtue before its time; the rather because their life has been too short to give occasion of satiety or of envy which might otherwise mitigate sorrow at their death, or temper compassion."

P. BEATON.

THE SAILOR BOY.

BY ONE OF THE AUTHORS OF "CHILD-WORLD."

O SAILOR BOY! this is the day;
We count each hour and each minute;
Our hearts are as light and as gay
As the ship that brings you in it.
The house is merry with flow'rs;
The hearth is blazing with light;
We live through the glorified hours,
And laugh to think of to-night.

The minutes and hours slip on;
Alas! they have passed into days;
The beautiful rapture is gone,
And only a weary hope stays.
A hope that weeps in our eyes,
As silently, by-and-by,
Each blossom we gather'd dies,
And with each a hope must die.

O sailor boy ! when will you come
 To turn all our grief to fêting !
 O sailor boy ! sail to your home,
 Our hearts are so tired with waiting ;
 Your mother's step is so sad,
 Her heart is heavy with pain ;
 Oh, darling ! she would be glad To see your sweet face again !

And when we were eager with joy,
 Adorning the room in our bliss,
 And saying fond things of our boy,
 Disputing who'd get the first kiss,
 List'ning for steps on the path,
 Smiling with tremulous lips,
 The wicked storm in its wrath
 Was slaying our ship of ships !

Our darling was dragg'd on the wave,
 (Oh, had we dreamt of it only !)
 The sea is a wonderful grave,
 So wide, and deep, and lonely.
 With a wild and dreadful shock,—
 The wicked storm was so proud,—
 It drove the ship on a rock,
 And changed her sail to a shroud !

And when he could never come back,
 And our hearts were ready to break,
 And even the baby wore black
 For his dear sailor brother's sake ;
 There came a hope and a cry,
 A joy that was almost pain,
 And our darling—who did not die !—
 Was clasped in our arms again !

LAUGHTER.

A Contribution to the Morals of the Subject.

"Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with joy."—PSALM cxxvi. 2.

NOTWITHSTANDING the troublous character of the times (and what times are not troublous in this great battle-field of mighty evil and mightier good—this world?), and the many critical questions of vital importance which are occupying the minds of men, I scarcely think it needful to apologize for selecting for somewhat careful treatment the above subject, to the consideration of which circumstances have led me. It may perhaps be thought that to treat in such times of such a topic is too much to imitate him who was not ashamed to "fiddle while Rome was burning." But I trust that readers who favour me by reading to the end of this article will absolve me from this charge. In such matters everything depends upon the manner of treatment of the subject,—the point of view from which it is contemplated,—the object aimed at by the writer.

That laughter has great effects upon the tone of men's minds, and upon the formation of character, will probably be denied by no one. In the principal nations of the earth there are periodical publications of extensive circulation and great moral influence, devoted very much to the excitement of the peculiar state of mind and feeling that expresses itself in this manner. In England our distinguished fellow citizen, Mr. Punch, has many humbler followers,—Judy, Fun, and others; in France there is the Charivari; in Germany the Kladderadatsch; besides which, there exist jest-books of various kinds and degrees of importance. And I do not hesitate to call it a considerable national blessing that under the present editorship of our English periodicals of this kind, their moral tone and their standard of good taste is, on the whole, so pure; in this respect so very favourably contrasted with the deplorably impure character of many of their foreign "analogues." With this preliminary and well-deserved bow to Mr. Punch, I proceed to my subject.

It has from ancient times been always felt that laughter is a great power in the world. "Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat?" ("What hinders serious truth from being conveyed under ludicrous forms?"), said a moralist of old times. "Ridiculum acri fortius ac melius plerumque secat res" ("The ludicrous generally"—rather say, often—"cuts into the heart of things more forcibly and with better effect than the grave and serious"),* said the same eminent writer. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that times of laughter, like all other parts of human life in which we dare even for a moment to throw the reins upon the neck of our impulses, and to "give them their head" freely, are times of special danger, against which, therefore, it is most important to guard. It is not all men who can be trusted with much freedom of jesting; it is only good men, and all of us only so far as we are good, with whom "joy is its own security,"† and the free "abundance of the heart" is sure not to sin against good taste and good feeling, or even against some of the most sacred laws of God. "Now let us be grave," said Dr. Johnson to Boswell, "I see a fool coming." You must know your company before trusting yourself to unrestrained laughter.

I propose to consider, first, what laughter is,—as a mental and physical phenomenon; secondly, one or two of the principal passages of Scripture with regard to it, and its lawfulness in general; and, lastly, some cautions with regard to it.

1. Laughter, as a mental and physical fact, is a singular phenomenon.

Tears and laughter are part of the universal language of human kind—the language of looks. Since Babel, men, dispersed over the face of the world, do not understand one another's speech. But this one inarticulate language remains intelligible to all mankind; it requires no interpreter, it is legible to those to whom even "the three R's" are still a mystery; infants newly-born seem to bring some understanding of it with them into the world; it may be read by a black man in the face of a white; it would have been apprehended in Robinson Crusoe, by his man Friday on the desert island; it is even in some degree legible by a marvellous instinct by the lower animals in the face of man. For a strong man can flash a spirit-quelling command out of the bodily windows of his soul, his eyes, into the half-waking "spirit of a beast." A Borrow can thereby assert his authority "by right divine" over an enraged dog.‡

* Milton seems to have had these words in his mind when he wrote, in his inimitably forcible English, in the Animadversions on the Remonstrant—"This vein of laughing hath oftentimes a strong and sinewy force in teaching and confuting."

† Wordsworth's "Hymn to Duty."

‡ See The Bible in Spain.

It is a touching proof of that deep underlying unity, which, amidst all their infinite differences, binds together in the deeper regions of their being all the far-separated races and families of Adam's children, that all men do, in this way, understand one another's looks. If I land on an unknown island, whose inhabitants speak a language,—in the ordinary sense of that word,—quite unintelligible to me, and yet see there a human face, whatever be its colour or shape, lighted with a smile, or trembling into tears, my heart, if it is not dead within me, will answer to what I call its expression, though I cannot in the least tell how I gather any such knowledge from that sight. We may plead, therefore, for the deep interest of these two phenomena, tears and laughter, on this ground among others, that they are part of the universal and distinctive characteristics of our brother men, of every race and clime.

Laughter is visible principally in that mystic border-land between matter and spirit, "the human face divine."

How it does so, who shall say? For what is a face? It is a region but a few square inches in extent; and yet this is all the instrument, or much the principal one, with which, in the mystic processes of Nature, all the varieties of thought, feeling, emotion, of which we become aware in looking at another human being, are in some way or other effectively conveyed to us. Its component parts have, it is true, a marvellous power of ceaseless, most subtle movement—a most important attribute. "That," says Lord Bacon (Essay on Beauty), "is the best part of beauty, which a picture cannot express; no, nor the first sight of the life, decent" (i.e., becoming) "and gracious motion." Still, it is through this apparently simple instrument, a face, that, in some way or other, thought, feeling, emotion, are expressed, to a degree really marvellous. And who knows not the actual light (is it physical? or is it spiritual in its essence?—we cannot say) that may flash into our souls from the lines of flowing beauty round the mouth, the dancing gleams in the lengthening eyes, the innumerable twinklings and beamings of the countenance, when it is really laughing?

Still, it is not only in the face, or even in the domain of sight, that the spiritual condition which causes laughter is perceptible in others. The blind, who never looked upon a face, yet know of laughter in others through that other bodily doorway into the presence-chamber of the soul, the ear; and the feelings called up in the soul of the blind by peals of laughter (peals, as of some gladsome and brilliant bells in the spirit-world), must be much the same as those stirred in those deprived of hearing, by the sight of a laughing face, and of the shaking sides,—the arms, it may be, flung into the air, the head thrown back, or the hands enthusiastically rubbed together,—of one who is undergoing that strange seizure rightly called a fit—for a true fit, or physical seizure it is—of laughter. Whatever it may be in its inmost nature and central spring in the soul, its effects are general over the whole body. Probably there is not the remotest corner, or little inlet of the minute blood-vessels (life-vessels) of the body, that does not feel some wavelet from that great convulsion shaking the central man. The blood moves more lively—probably its chemical, electric, or vital condition is distinctly modified—it conveys a different impression to all the organs of the body as it visits them on that particular mystic journey when the man is laughing, from what it does at other times. And so, we doubt not, a good laugh may lengthen a man's life, conveying a distinct stimulus to the vital forces. And the time may come, when physicians, attending more closely than at present unfortunately they are apt to do, to the innumerable subtle influences which the soul exerts upon its tenement of clay, shall prescribe to a torpid patient "so many peals of laughter, to be undergone at such and such a time," just as they now do that far more objectionable prescription, a pill or an electric or galvanic shock; and shall study the best and most effective method of producing the required effect in each patient.*

Having considered laughter as a physical phenomenon, we might naturally next inquire into its causes and its effects—intellectual, moral, spiritual. But before doing so, it may be well to clear out of our way an objection which if valid is fatal. Some passages in the Bible may seem totally to condemn, not, indeed, laughter in itself, but at any rate much laughter.

Now, I am far indeed from denying that there is such a thing as "excessive laughter," or that it may be, and often is, a source of serious mischief. But many of the passages in the Bible that relate to this subject are often much misinterpreted and twisted from their true meaning.

2. With regard, then, to the question, whether or no Scriptural morality allows much freedom to laughter in a perfect human character in mortal man, it must first be said that it is a priori exceedingly improbable that it should not do so.

* On the Physiology of Laughter there is an able and original essay by Mr. Herbert Spencer (2nd series).

For it is a very principal characteristic of Christian religion, that it leaves room for the free and strong play of all primitive impulses of human nature. It never puts its veto upon the use, nor even upon the hearty and free use (let it be remembered that "freedom" is a word of very different signification from "licence") of any faculty or original impulse of our nature, but only claims for it right guidance. According to St. Paul's great anti-Manichean principle, Christian conscience "knows and is persuaded of the Lord that there is nothing unclean of itself," but only in its abuse. Let us hold it fast as a main point in the Magna Charta of our liberty, as redeemed children of God, that with regard to all primitive instincts of human nature, our Divine Lord "came not to destroy, but to fulfil"—not to suppress life, but "that we might have it more abundantly," only guided and inspired aright; that sin is a discord of notes good in themselves—"sweet bells" now, it may be, "jangled out of tune," but which were originally, and may be made again, wholly sweet. Our Lord came to proclaim a "law of liberty" under which the primeval beauty and perfection of human nature as a whole, and of this world altogether, should be manifested, to the glory of the great Maker, by the full use of every one of the faculties and forces of our nature, and of every one of the objects, forces, and primitive arrangements of external nature. Not heaven only, but "heaven and earth" are to be "full of the glory of God."

It is as a principal instance of this large and joyful freedom of Christian morality that I think it well worth while to vindicate the full lawfulness of laughter. It is no true interpretation of the Divine religion which would make it nip off with relentless scissors every free-budding growth of spontaneous nature, and which, because the Divine Law-giver has said that "for every idle word" which is the free "abundance of the heart," men "shall give account," therefore concludes that for every such word they shall be condemned. On the contrary, the result of such "account" may sometimes be, not condemnation, but praise.

Agreeable with this is the honour put by our Lord and his Apostles upon children and the child-like mind. "Bubbling fountains of iniquity!" exclaimed the great Calvinist Toplady, unworthily of himself, as he passed a group of children at play;—"And of such is the kingdom of heaven!" might some one have answered him! The two together would have made up a strange picture of heaven! "The great mistake we have made in education," said a very different person, Lord Palmerston, "is that we have forgotten the truth, that all men are born good." Lord Palmerston, it should be remembered, had no children in his house. Otherwise, he would have seen outbursts of naked selfishness,—perhaps also of ferocity of temper, and revenge, and of various other serious faults, which his genial though, in some respects, deplorably lax conscience would have found it hard indeed to reconcile with his theory.

But if we strike the balance between Toplady and Palmerston, we may get some great truths. Surely, that which belongs to all children, as children, and appears to us so to be a part of the child-nature, that we are obliged to believe that it is independent of the Fall, must be good. There is a great saying of Schiller, somewhere quoted by the author of Friends in Council, "Death cannot be evil, since it is universal" (that may be twisted into a perilous falsehood, but let it be taken in good part). It was beautifully, as well as characteristically, asked by that great preacher of a true and Christianised natural religion, by "him who uttered nothing base," the great William Wordsworth:—

"Who would check the happy feeling
That inspires the linnet's song?
Who would stop the swallow, wheeling
On her pinions swift and strong?"

And he was no rebel against the restraints of divine morality, but only a rightly trustful child of the Most Holy, when he wrote the conclusion of another beautiful poem—"The Kitten and Falling Leaves;" and when in one of the noblest and most inspired poems in the English, or in any other language, he says, speaking of birds and beasts rejoicing in the spring,—

"Ye blessed creatures, I have heard the call Ye to each other make; I see
The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee;
My heart is at your festival,
My head hath its coronal,
The fulness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it all.
Oh, evil day! if I were sullen
While Earth herself is adorning,
This sweet May morning,
And the children are culling
On every side,
In a thousand valleys far and wide,
Fresh flowers; while the sun shines warm,
And the babe leaps up on his mother's arm:—
I hear, I hear, with joy I hear!

I do not therefore fear to affirm that laughter, even the free and boundlessly joyous laughter of children and child-like souls, cannot be forbidden by Holy Scripture rightly understood;—single texts must be misinterpreted which are thought to forbid it.*

Let us, then, examine one of these texts.

It may be asked, "Does not our Lord say, 'Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye shall weep?'" Yes; but, as has been well replied,† He also says, "Blessed are they that weep now: for they shall laugh." The act, the habit, which in one place is condemned, is in the other made characteristic of the state of the victorious happiness of the children of God. All depends on context, proportion, and the place in the order of human life, which it is made to occupy. Placed first or uppermost, it is mischievous; and akin, at least, to many kinds of sin. They whose life may be described as fundamentally one of laughing, are on the road to misery,—the end of that mirth is heaviness. But he whose life is in its great object, tendency, and effect, a faithful service of God and of men, shall be free to laugh; and his laughter, like all other acts of his—so far as he is such as has been described—shall be blest. The solid earth, full of mines of gold, and iron, and ten thousand useful and precious products, may yet afford to bring forth also on its surface innumerable wild flowers, for beauty and for joy. And so I humbly trust I am not wrong in believing that the true meaning and intended resultant of the two sentences above quoted of our Divine Lord is not ill expressed by the following lines of one whom no one will accuse of unchristian wantonness—the poet Cowper:—

"Let no man charge me that I mean
To clothe in sable every social scene,
And give good company a face severe,
As if they met around a father's bier,
(But) tell some men that pleasure all their bent,
And laughter all their work, is life misspent."[‡]

These great sayings of our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount were as a powerful yeast cast into the thoughts of men, teaching great truths, but to be interpreted by the free Spirit of God within us, in harmony with divine laws revealed elsewhere. It is by the balance, the resultant of the whole, that our practical course and our belief must be guided.*

3. On the above principles I will venture even one somewhat hazardous step further, and humbly, yet confidently, affirm that no part of the Divine warning against those that "laugh now" need apply (though doubtless it often does) even to those whose work and business in life is the right guidance of laughter,—as for instance the editors of publications having that for their object. I say it need not do so. For the application, as I humbly venture to think, of that Divine warning is intended to be to such as make laughter, levity, selfish or heartless mirth, the main stuff and substance of the great "now;" to whom life on earth is food for a cynical or a frivolous mirth. But what if some men, being gifted thereto, feel it their impulse and inward calling to deal with this great human manifestation, this broad fact in the existing order of things, laughter, with all its concomitant effects, which exists whether we will or no, and "seeing this move coming" take it in hand to "head it,"—to guide its activity and manifold forceful life into fruitful or beneficial instead of poisonous or barren fields? What if some one, like young Richard II., seeing a motley crew of somewhat wanton creatures running riot, and likely to work mischief, does not frown wrath upon them, but generously and in good temper fronts them with an offer, not unrespectfully made,—"I will be your king?"—or, like David and his Adullamites, fears not to go to live among these wild sons of nature, not to give way for an instant to their wills in so far as they are evil or wanton, but rather with the wish and hope to win them by divine arts of government, and with the light hand of sympathy and firmness combined, to more civilised ways?—then, I say, although a churlish and blind-hearted Nabal may see no merit in such a man, every nobler Abigail will feel and proclaim that he deserves well of mankind in doing a work which greatly needs to be done. And we humbly believe that he will receive, not only absolution, but even a deserved praise at the hands of the unerring justice and love of Him who came to bless our human life as a whole, and who has opened a wide place in His kingdom for every harmless form of human life, activity, and happiness. Of course—and of this it is all important

* "If it be harmful to be angry," says Milton, "and withal to cast a lowering smile, when the properest object calls for both, it will be long enough ere any be able to say why those two most rational faculties of human intellect, anger and laughter, were first seated in the breast of man."—Animadversions on the Remonstrant.

† "They who weep are declared to be blessed, not because they weep, but because they shall laugh; and the woe threatened to the laughers is in like manner, that they shall mourn and weep. Therefore, they who have this spirit in them will endeavour to forward the blessing, and avoid the woe."—Guesses at Truth, first series, p. 340, in an admirable little essay on my subject, to which I am indebted for many quotations.

‡ Cowper's Poems:—Conversation.

* The author of this paper has endeavoured to set this forth at length in No. 12 of the "Tracts for Priests and People" (Macmillan), on the "Testimony of Scripture to the Authority of Conscience and of Reason."

that we should take earnest heed—if this good result is to follow from such men's efforts, and this blessing to attend them, the said editors must guide—and guide aright. King Richard must not become himself a Wat Tyler, nor princely David a scape-grace, like those with whom for the time he associates; his object must be to raise, ennoble, purify,—or, at any rate, to avoid every baser misdirection of the natural joy of human kind.

It is, then, I venture to affirm, a poor, a thin, a meagre, and an unchristian morality which does not acknowledge that some kinds of the heartiest and freest mirth is not only harmless, but directly and even deeply beneficial to the whole life of the spirit of men, tending to the kindling of love in the place of selfishness, of warmth in the place of coldness, of life and play of every joyful faculty of human nature rather than the stiffness and rigidity which is akin with, and is in the way to produce death.

One topic more I must touch before proceeding to speak of the sins and dangers of laughter. It is worth while to affirm here that hearty laughter need not be in the least against good manners. Of course there are kinds of laughter which are so; and there are many occasions when much laughter is so. But the whole notion that hearty laughter is in itself something coarse, that “refined” persons, or those of gentle blood and gentle manners, would not indulge in anything more than “a smile,” and even think it necessary to apologize for that—as when men say they could “scarce refrain from a smile”—is a strange delusion, and a piece of mischievous worldliness. It is part of the tyranny with which the “customs and traditions of the world” cramp and stifle the free and strong life of the heart and spirit; and cover over God's living work in nature with a miserable Rachel-enamel of so-called “polite” manners, under which no breath can any more be freely breathed by the spirit of a human being, than a physical breath can under the pressure of those murderous abominations, with which girls are allowed to kill themselves—tight stays. But this notion of the impropriety of any but the faintest laughter in “good society” prevails fatally, especially in “young ladies’ seminaries,” within the soul-withering dominion of those “prim” manners against which Dickens has in his whole writings waged so effective a war, especially where, with his peculiar and inimitable inspiration of wit, he makes a professor of “deportment” instruct a young lady, before entering a room, in order to bring her mouth into the correct refined shape, to recite the words, “Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prism.” These artificial and forced manners are the fruitful source of those intolerable pests of social life “primness” and “stiffness,” tending to turn free human beings into artificial dolls moved by rigid springs and wires. And by too violent a reaction it is also the parent of the contrary extreme, the coarseness, lawless, and ungente wantonness, and “tomboyishness” of the “Girl of the Period.” Had proper freedom and naturalness been allowed to childhood and youth, such abortions of good manners could not have invaded the land. The “prism” manners wither all originality and freshness of character at its root, rub off all corners, clip down all men and women to one uniform standard of artificial shape, and turn the fresh and noble forest-land of the world, which the Almighty Maker filled with an endless variety of strong-growing trees and shrubs, into the likeness of a cockney tea-garden, in which the beauteous products of nature, the shrubs and even trees, are cut into the form of peacocks and tea-pots.

The manners of most foreign countries are much freer, though at the same time much more truly “refined.” The French say of us English that we only laugh “du bout des lèvres” (with the tips of our lips), the true “prism” caricature of a laugh.*

4. I proceed now to another most essential and necessary branch of the subject, the sins and dangers of laughter.

The principal reason why laughter is a region of danger for fallen beings is that, as Milton has said, Mirth is a twin-sister of “the mountain-nymph, sweet Liberty;" and Liberty in fallen man is continually perverted into Licence—a totally different thing.

* It is related of a great man, taken from us some years back, that, being admitted, late in life, to court, he felt himself at first in difficulties from scruples about laughter. He believed that hearty laughter was hardly proper in those celestial “circles;” and yet, having a strong sense of the ludicrous, he was often tempted, during the free and pleasant conversations he held there, to that unseemly manifestation of amusement, as he believed it was considered. When, therefore, the temptation came upon him, he suppressed the natural expression of his feelings by physical force—applying his knuckle with energy to his upper lip!—of which the result was a sound something akin to that which might be produced by a semi-stifled penny trumpet—much to the loss of the great man's dignity. When he had lived longer in those empyrean regions, he no doubt must have learnt a greater and more genial freedom. Indeed, it may be said generally, that there is less of affectation of any kind in those highest regions of English society than anywhere else amongst us (unless it be among hearty and noble sons of the soil), which great blessing, like so many others relating to the tone of our domestic and family life, has been conferred upon us mainly by the example of the highest lady of the land. No one has a greater dislike to affectation or insincerity of any kind than our most gracious sovereign Queen Victoria, whom may God preserve. Let not anything here said be twisted into any justification of the coarse and ill-mannered laugh, which wantonly forces its rude presence into unsuitable times and places. Nor let it be understood to defend the roughness and reckless defiance of good taste sometimes to be deplored in even otherwise gentle women. Certainly when a woman loses gentleness and becomes boyish and rude, she loses her fairest ornament, and much of the grace which is a woman's true “decoration.”

What exactly the difference between these two, Liberty and Licence, is, it may not be easy in exact words to define. But perhaps it may be said that Liberty is the freedom of a child of God, governed and restrained, not by iron rules from without, but by its godlike instincts, whereas Licence has no such instincts. Liberty, as a true child of the Most High, may be trusted to play in its Father's house; but Licence is as a little fiend, or soulless imp, or brute-creature, let in there by mistake, and sure to be guilty, if not of gross, yet of continual slight, offences against good feeling and good taste; and so the authorities have to expel him with shame, or to keep him under iron rules of discipline till, perchance, he may become a law to himself, and attain to the "glorious liberty of the children of God," guided securely by its divine instincts of purity, of love, and of gentleness.

I must now endeavour to instance definitely some of the kinds of licentious laughter, and denounce them.

"Jesting," says Fuller, in his admirable little essay in The Holy and Profane State, "is not unlawful, if it trespasseth not in quantity, quality, or season."

(a.) In quantity. This I do not understand of intensity of laughter, but only of the extent it covers of time and of subject. For the intensest laugh, even to tears, may be harmless. Nay, it is, doubtless, in its place and time, not only lawful, but excellent; but then it must be limited to its proper place and time. Such laughter entirely unrestrained, say in a royal presence, if pardonable, yet certainly would need pardon; probably for this reason, that it is immodest, and therefore wrong, in an august presence to draw general attention to oneself. But yet the thing in itself is good; and we have seen laughter, even to floods of tears, restrained within narrow bounds as to noise, that would have been harmless, not to say praiseworthy, in the most celestial of earthly "circles" at proper times.

Excess of laughter is to be found, as I have said, not in the intensity, but in the extent of subject or of time that it is allowed to cover. Laughter pulls out a stop in the organ of conversation and social intercourse,—what may be called the Levity stop. Hence, no doubt, its great use at times, as in turning an incipient quarrel into a joke, or in lightening the pressure of subjects taken more seriously than they deserve, leading men to find——opening safety-valves whereby superfluous steam may escape harmlessly. But hence also its danger. What more provoking than men who will persist in pulling out that stop in the midst of serious and profitable discussion, whether at public or private meetings, and so let off, not superfluous, but most useful steam, which otherwise might have done invaluable work? And generally, when it absorbs much time, it is surely mischievous and a snare. It is not good, as says Fuller, "where it is a master-quality, but only where it attendeth on other perfections." Excuse may be made for some who err in this way, because their laugh is involuntary, the result of a morbid state of nerves, and a letting off in an at least comparatively harmless way, and by a kind of defiance, of some inward and oppressive pain, and so to the patient the lesser of two evils; still to others it is an evil, even in some cases a serious one. "Make not jests," said Fuller, "till thou becomest one." Limit laughter strictly in time and place, lest it displace nobler things.

(b.) Of all dangers in laughter, of course, none is greater than that of its trespassing upon sacred ground. Why laughter is wrong in sacred places and sacred times, it may not be easy to say; but that it is so an imperious instinct in the soul of every man of sound heart absolutely declares. "Jest not," says Fuller, "with the two-edged sword of God's Word. Will nothing please thee to wash thy hands in but the font? or to drink healths in but the church chalice? Dangerous is it to wit-wanton it with the majestie of God; wherefore if, without intention, and against thy will, by chance medley thou hittest Scripture in ordinary discourse, yet fly to the city of refuge, and pray to God to forgive thee."

"But," it may be objected, "do you mean to affirm that all jests which turn upon any words of holy Scripture,—even such as merely touch what may be called its external covering, the mere earthen vessels wherein the heavenly treasure is contained, and in no way even graze the blessed and holy Name, or any of the great verities of Divine religion,—do you mean that all such jests as take their material only from the mere outside of Scripture, and make 'Pulpit Table-Talk,' such as truly reverend names have at times, and within strict prescribed limits, sanctioned—are to be branded as profane?"*

* "It is to be observed," says Archbishop Whately, in his Annotations on Bacon's Essays (Essay xvi., Atheism), "that we are not to be offended as if sacred matters were laughed at, when some folly that has been forced into connexion with them is exposed. When things really ridiculous are mixed up with religion, who is to be blamed? Not he who shows that they are ridiculous, but those who disfigure truth by blending

It would be great arrogance for any one in the face of the authorities that may be pleaded for the practice, to do so. That cannot be in its nature profane in which such men's consciences have allowed themselves. Of course whenever any one transgresses such limits as I have assigned for such jests, as when the matter of them is taken from the heavenly treasure itself, not from its earthen vessel, it is then inexcusable; but otherwise, perhaps it is harmless. The golden sceptre may be, and I believe is, often held out to such transgressors. But, at any rate, it is a dangerous practice; and while we cannot condemn those who allow themselves in it, if only the Spirit of holiness and of love is allowed to assign strict limits to such liberty, yet we can scarcely doubt that those of us who have hitherto allowed themselves some—it may be pardonable—licence in this matter, and in so doing have not done ill, would yet do better were they henceforth to “take the pledge” of a voluntary, but yet “total abstinence.”

As to wantonly laughing in sacred places,—as in the midst of a congregation gathered for Divine worship,—it is the sin of poor, of shallow, of unworthy, or of over youthful souls. The sight of a wanton boy, or a silly wench, or of men and women who have not outgrown their childishness, wilfully laughing in church, suggests the thought of a monkey who, in illicit ways, should have climbed the walls of Heaven, and intruded his ignoble chatter and soulless sport among the august Presences THERE. And it should receive the treatment which that would merit,—the expulsion of the offender with sharp decisiveness, and a deserved ignominy. If in jesting you are led into dancing over the lines of the Divine morality, and of Divine reverence, and so fall down some precipices of the Divine vengeance, or lead others to that result, it will be poor comfort to reflect that you were dancing when you did so.

(c.) Impure jests, by which I mean all such as tend to loosen morals (I am not speaking of such as offend against canons of taste, which may without offence vary in different countries and in different individual men), are a gross offence in laughter.

“Wanton jests,” says Fuller, “make fools laugh and wise men frown. Seeing we are civilised Englishmen, let us not be naked savages in our talk.” There are some men whom if you hear laughing loud, you feel an almost certain conviction that the jest is something that had better not have been said; its spice, such as it is, is wanton, and tends to the practice of some heartless or degrading wickedness; nothing but immorality really amuses such persons—the joke was of the nature that “makes fools laugh in the ale-house.” Of forerunners, and preparers of the soil, for sin, none is more effective than loose talking; the “foolish talking and jesting which is not convenient,” denounced by St. Paul. Vile, disgraceful in any gentleman even, but a dark crime in any professing Christian, is such talk, crying to heaven for vengeance upon its perpetrators. Execrable also is the taste which offends us often at “Penny Readings,” and in conversation and popular songs, which takes in hand the relations between the sexes as matter for a merely heartless and foolish levity. The wretched vulgarities anent “the ladies,” to which one is at times exposed to listen, are serious evils, against which it behoves all Christian men and women to set their faces sternly. Do women like, or ought they to like, to be considered mere playthings? What folly and vulgarity is worse, or more odious and contemptible, than this miserable flippancy?*

I must beg permission here to put in a protest also against making drunkenness a subject for laughter, at least in mixed companies. It only tends to make that a subject of amusement which to every Christian—indeed, I might say, considering the immeasurable miseries of which drunkenness is the prolific parent, to every man of the slightest benevolence—should be an object of disgust and loathing.

Such is any, even the slightest real mockery of other men's sufferings, deformities, calamities. How beautiful is Fuller's warning—“Scoff not at the natural defects of any, which are not in their power to amend. O 'tis crueltie to beat a cripple with his own crutches. Neither flout any for his profession if honest, though poore and painfull. Mock not a cobbler for his black thumbs.” “Some,” he says, elsewhere, “think their conceits, like mustard, not good except they bite.”

* The love of men for women, and of women for men, is the most beautiful of human affections; but corruptio optima pessima. Let innumerable wounded, embittered, even broken hearts, and those sometimes the gentlest of hearts, be allowed to utter their terrible warning against heartless flirtations, which are felt to receive a kind of spurious absolution from society, by the levity of a silly and vulgar flippancy of treatment of such subjects. Let it be remembered that the style of jesting in which men allow themselves on the relations of men to women, is a most important element in the education of the general mind on subjects of which it is scarcely possible to exaggerate the importance with reference to human happiness and human morality.

falsehood with it. . . . A tree is not injured by being cleared of moss and lichens; nor truth by having folly and sophistry torn away from around it.”

Against love, that kind of wit consisting of playful personalities called chaff is apt in some hands to sin—it is an edge-tool that can only be trusted in the hands of love and mutual respect. Where “hearts are of each other sure,” such playfulness is one of the pleasantest exercises of the heart’s affections. It is no true friendship that cannot stand or does not delight in it. But there are cats that seem unable to play in this style without letting the claws through the velvet; and on the claws there will be a little—what the French so happily call a souffçon—of poison. The domestic cat has, in such cases, a little of the wild cat—some even of its blood-thirst—still living in it.

So are there some people who cannot use this “play” with safety; and many other grave and serious persons who do not understand it. But in others it is graciousness itself. All depends upon spirit. The Pentecostal spirit of love and purity, rather than any laws written on stone,* must decide where it is safe and where dangerous, or ungentle. With such cautions and limitations, laughter may be made not only harmless, but profitable. The following graceful lines on Nonsense admirably express some of the lighter uses of sportiveness:—

Nonsense! thou delicious thing,
Thought and feeling’s effervescence
Like the bubbles from a spring,
In their sparkling evanescence;
Thou, the child of sport and play,
When the brain keeps holiday.
When old gravity and reason
Are dismissed as out of season,
And imagination seizes
The dominion while she pleases—

Though to praise thee can’t be right,
Yet, Nonsense! thou art exquisite!

When for long and weary hours
We have sate with patient faces,
Tasking our exhausted powers,
To utter wise old commonplaces;
Hearing and repeating too
Things unquestionably true,
Maxims which there’s no denying,
Facts to which there’s no replying;
Then how often have we said,
With tired brain and aching head,
“Sense may be all true and right—
But, Nonsense! thou art exquisite!”

When we close the fireside round,
When young hearts with joy are brimming,
While gay laughing voices sound,
And eyes with dewy mirth are swimming
In the free and fearless sense
Of friendship’s fullest confidence,
Pleasant then, without a check,
To lay the reins on fancy’s neck.
And let her wild caprices vary
Through many a frolicsome vagary,
Exclaiming still, in gay delight,
“Oh, Nonsense! thou art exquisite!”*

And so I beg to conclude, hoping that it will not have been altogether useless to have attempted in this brief essay, principally written during festive days of Christmas-time, to reconcile, on this subject, the instincts of good men and child-like souls, with the Divine precepts of the Book of books; and to vindicate our Christian liberty, at Christmas, as at other joyous times, to rejoice with a free mind; with a well-founded consciousness that mirth and laughter need not jar in the least degree (though, alas! from the lack of true guidance they so often do) against the most sensitive purity, the most wakeful love, or against any of the sacred instincts of “the princely heart of innocence.”

TOILING AND MOILING.

Some Account of our Working People, and How they Live.

By “GOOD WORDS” COMMISSIONER.

IV.—THE BUCKINGHAMSHIRE LABOURER.

THE English hind is best off in some of the northern, worst off in some of the south-coast counties. The Buckinghamshire labourer, however, may be taken with tolerable fairness as a type of the English peasant. Bucks is a good deal nearer to Dorsetshire than it is to Northumberland, and the average of agricultural wages in Bucks is nearer the Dorsetshire than the Northumbrian average;

but, for that very reason, the Buckinghamshire labourer may all the more fairly be selected as a type of the class who receive corduroy breeches as rewards of virtue. The average wages of an agricultural labourer in Buckinghamshire are about 10s. a week, with, in some parts, a shilling extra on Sundays for milking. In exceptional cases, men get as much as 15s. a week, and such men eat meat twice a day. The average physique of the Buckinghamshire labourers, however, is not suggestive of high living. A market-day

* The Day of Pentecost among the Israelites was, according to tradition, the day of the giving of the Law from Mount Sinai. When the Spirit of God descended upon the Church on that day, it was thereby very clearly signified that a free, though a perfectly Holy, Spirit was, under the perfect dispensation, to take that place in the government of the children of God, which had before been occupied by a set of inflexible rules or laws written on stone.

affords a good opportunity of comparing them with their masters. The rinderpest has temporarily injured Aylesbury market, but smock-frocks still muster there on Saturday in force—smocks the colour of a cabbage-leaf, intricately embroidered on the shoulders, back, and breast, and sometimes decorated at the corners of the broad turn-over collars with blue glass buttons; smocks once green, bleached by the weather almost white; now and then a blue smock; and black smocks, for even the coal-carters in Buckinghamshire are smock-frocked. Along the roads and over the meadows the smock-wearers slouch into town—some of the old men looking rather droll in spectacles and tall black hats—to moon amongst the green-marked sheep, the black pigs, and the horses with straw-plaited tails in the Market Square, and to twist calves' tails and to stand at the head of beasts in the Cattle Market. As a class, the patient-eyed clodhoppers seem a grass-hoppery, feeble, shrivelled race, beside the square-shouldered succulent-fleshed farmers. One poor old gaffer whom I saw, dangling his long thin legs from the footboard of a carrier's cart, was a "perfect anatomy."

There is not much piece-work in Buckinghamshire now, mowing machines, &c., being pretty generally employed. The subsidiary industries of straw-plaiting and lace-making are not what they once were either, and the early age at which children have been put to them tells injuriously upon their prospects now that they have grown up mistresses of nothing but those crafts. In a Buckinghamshire parish with a population of 800 the majority of the women can neither read nor write (the men are not much more accomplished), and the schoolmistress has only 35 pupils—the eldest not more than twelve years of age. "Plaiting," said the schoolmistress, "is not so profitable as it used to be, and big girls would be glad to get places, but they cannot take them, because they do not know how to do even plain sewing. The plaiting school is the only school they have been at. Little things not much more than twelve months old go to the plaiting schools. When they can hardly toddle, you see them with bits of straw in their hands, trying to twist them in and out."

As to these plaiting schools, however, accounts differed. I was told, on one hand, that the parents received their children's earnings; on the other, that they constituted half of the income of the mistress. By an informant who held the latter view I was told that he lived close by a plaiting school, "and the little uns love it—they're always at the door before time. They'd far rather go there than to a National or a British school, where half the time is spent in idleness. Bless you, they are taught reading at the plaiting schools, and writing, too, sometimes, I think." According to this authority, no child was admitted to a plaiting school under eight.

When asked whether there was much distress in her neighbourhood—a fairly typical one—the slighted schoolmistress answered with rather eager emphasis, "The people live well. The man pays for rent and bread, and so on, and then his wife and daughters' plaiting pays the rest. Girls who plait pay 2s. 6d. a-week to their parents for their keep. They dress quite fashionably."

I found, however, in more places than one that Buckinghamshire people, who spoke proudly of there "being no distress to speak of about there," when more closely questioned, were ready to admit (as if it did not at all affect their previous statement) that "some had hard times in the winter," and that some were still in receipt of out-door relief; "widows, and poor men out of work, and so on, getting a shilling or two a-week, and a loaf of bread or so, according to families." The only persons whom I saw in Buckinghamshire that plainly, or probably, belonged to the tribe of professional "cadgers," I may add, were a red-faced female tramp openly begging, a peripatetic pamphlet-seller at Buckingham Market, a lemon-coloured gipsy woman professedly hawking tin-ware, and a bronze-faced gipsy woman offering cord for sale in the same style.

A good many of the thatched Buckinghamshire cottages look very picturesque, and, running right into the towns as they do, they link town and country together in a quaintly piquant fashion; but if a man has a family, there is small provision for comfort or decency in those brick-floored, scantily-furnished, often only two-roomed, and generally gardenless hovels, although they do look "bits"—barring the lack of garden—for Birket Foster. A little way off the noble, green-swarded double avenue of trees, with far-stretching roots, showing taut as cables above ground, which sweeps down to ornamented lodges almost inside the town that gives the owner of Stowe his title, there is a cluster of cottages. If an artist had his choice, he would, I think, rather paint the cottages than the prim palatial façade to be seen through the arch at the top of the avenue—in spite of the intervening lawns dotted with fallow-deer. But, so far as the comfort of their tenants is concerned, what a strange contrast there is between the two masses of building so near each other!

Perhaps, however, I shall best enable my readers to "get at" the Buckinghamshire labourer by writing out a few notes of his surroundings and of conversations with him and his.

I started to talk with him in his home, and on both sides of the hedges, in the golden spring weather, which prematurely bloomed out between rain and snow in February. On the main line the long train, bound from black, busy London to the black, busy north, puffed and rattled away on the sun-gilt metals, and silence once more brooded over the station. In the leisurely style which characterizes even railway management in agricultural districts, the branch train got under way, and rumbled most decorously out of the Hundred of Dacorum into equally rural Bucks. On both sides the flat, greenly fat country spread in sunny peace. Half-a-dozen men, employed in building what looked like a village "cage," knocked off work to watch the train go past. Little lambs galloped away from the line fences on long black legs. A sweep's pony, standing at a level-crossing gate, took fright, turned tail, and scampered down a lonely lane with its soot-sack laden cart, and two black familiars after it. In the train the talk was of old-fashioned seasons come again, promising old-fashioned haymaking in May. The town at which the train stops—in spite of the good-looking new buildings and plate-glass shop-fronts in which it has broken out, in spite of more than one railway-station and a canal wharf, in spite of street-lamps (economically not lighted when the almanack says that it ought to be moon-light), and its multitude of signs, hung out like banners, seems almost as sleepy as the country round. It is not market-day, and a bashful stranger might feel inclined to blush at having to walk alone across the bright, broad, bare market-square, watched as he goes with sleepy curiosity by tradesmen basking at their shop-doors. A quiet, sunny, old-fashioned red street leads up to the green, many-graved churchyard, begirt, in cathedral-close fashion, with quaintly-picturesque old houses, ripe-red and yellowish-white. In the middle of the churchyard rises the fine cruciform church, a landmark in the fertile Vale of Aylesbury, part of it as fresh-looking as when just finished, and the other part under the tools of workmen who are chipping off the rough plaster which still disfigures its stone, in the leisurely style which seems to be the characteristic (save in sport, volunteering, and duck-hatching) of the latitude. But, if the town is quiet, the country outside it seems—to one who was in London an hour or two before—almost sound asleep; that is, so far as human life is concerned. Larks are singing by the hundred, in their "privacy of glorious light;" visible, plump, brown thrushes are also singing all around; glossy rooks caw, circle, drop, strut, and then rise in pettish alarm, to drop again, and strut again, with clerical stateliness, on both hands; now and then a cow lows, a bullock sulkily soliloquises, a sheep baas like a hoarse basso, a lamb bleats plaintively, a sheep-bell rattles its muffled tinkle, or a far-off dog barks and bays; but a man's shout across the brown and green fields is so rare, that it sounds startling. The eye wanders over lonely field after lonely field without lighting on a roof. Beyond the fat, low land rise the still lonelier-looking Chiltern Hills, with single trees upon their sky-line, pall-like dark woods sweeping down their sides; and chalky, unwooded, furze-dotted pastures beneath the woods, that make one think of the shorn, tufted lower limbs of poodles. On the highway, the silent road-mender gazes for five minutes after the pedestrian who passes him, or the hip-booted horseman who gallops past, or the taxed cart, to which the fat old lady gives a "list to port," or the half-tilted miller's waggon, slowly drawn by a pair of plump dappled greys, whilst the white-powdered miller's man beguiles the tedium of his journey by pitching fragments of his lunch to the white-and-liver spaniel that is leaping and whining at the cart's-tail. When the waggon has ground out of hearing, there is nothing to remind the road-mender that there is any man besides himself astir in the world, except the sullen thud of the flail, that comes from the long, low, black barn a field off.

Lanes branch from the highway at right-angles, with white finger-posts indicating the distance of the villages to which the lanes lead in miles and furlongs. These lanes are even more lonely than the road. In one of them stands a smock-frocked little boy, holding the halter of a rough-coated horse that lies upon its side, twitching its lips, and now and then giving a convulsive little kick. He watches it stolidly, like a statue of puzzled patience. "What's the matter with your horse?" he is asked. "Pretty near dead." "And what are you going to do?" "Doan't know, sir, unless summun comes along." And then he resumes his silent sentry, staring straight at nothing like a mounted Horse Guards sentinel. Presently, another little boy is fallen in with. He is coming from a farm in whose dank straw-yard, trodden into deep mud near the horse-pond, half-a-dozen white and brown bullocks and a chestnut colt, with a long silver tail and mane, are feeding out of grey and yellow structures like unpainted four-post bedsteads without tops, whilst a white-legged tortoiseshell cat is daintily picking her way through the drier rick-yard. He is a very thin, "weedy" little boy, with pale brown face and languid brown eyes. He wears a peakless cap, an old, red comforter, and a faded, tattered smock. He pants as he propels his two-wheeled barrow, and shovels horse-dung into it with a rusty spade. He looks as if he must be very badly off, but he does not turn out to be so, according to the general notion of the state of things in the South Midlands. This is the account he gives of himself—each item pulled out, like a cork, by a separate question. "I'm gooin' thirteen, sir. Yes, I goo to school. To the chapel school. It begins at nine a-Sundays. No, I don't goo to no school a-weekdays. I have meat about twice a week. Meat such as I eat (said very proudly) costs ninepence a pound—tenpence sometimes. Beef and mutton both. I'm pickin' up dung for Mr. —. I get him a cartload a week. Two barrers-full a day. Each on 'em takes me about a hour. Miles, I s'pose, I walks. He gives me 5s. 6d. a-week. Little boys (said very superciliously) as goos crow-keepin' an' such, gets 3s. a-week, sometimes 3s. 6d.—that's what they gets. Rest o' my time I'm plaitin'. I get three-halfpence a score* for that. Can't say a score o' what. We call it a score. Don't know what you mean, sir. I can do any kind o' work (said with unlimited confidence in the universality of his genius). Yes, sir, I should be glad to get summut else to do."

On again through the lonely lanes. The brown hedges are sprinkled with bursting buds, yellow catkins dangle from them, and "palm" branches are buttoned with silver-grey floss-silk. Little wrens run in and out of the hedges like mice, homely brown sparrows chirp inside, and in the fields beyond, larks, singing as they go, are making painful efforts to rise, like young poets. The furze is in blossom, the hedge-side grass is starred with dandelions, and just above the ditches the cuckoo-pint raises its glossy spear-heads. Some of the fences are of dead thorn-branches—sometimes sliced from the live stems which show their transversely truncated torsos close by—arranged in zigzags. Beside others lie faggots of brushwood, a tumbril-load of which a tiny Hodge, in Jim Crow, smock, and buskins, is driving off as seriously as if he was a grandfather. Little brooks, spanned by little plank bridges, cross the road. The gates have a park-like look, being almost all painted white. Under the clipped hedges, and on the brown furrows, smock-frocks squat, with their legs apart like the legs of compasses, munching their bread and cheese in sociable silence. One man eats his all alone in the middle of a meadow blotched with old mole-hills. Over a ploughed field, littered with lumps of chalk, toils another smock-frock, lifting up his legs as if his goal lay, in Yankee phrase, "somewhere on the other side of eternity." After the rush of city life, there is something very refreshing in the leisureliness of country life. Clodhopper seems a very inappropriately jerky name to give to ploughmen. As the cochineal insect takes its colour from the opuntia, so country-people seem to take their tone from the crops in the midst of which they live. The grass and the corn do not hurry—and why should they? In a wide meadow, ruled with wheeled sheep-troughs, two other men are plodding, in equally leisurely style, from the far-off yellow litter and cut plum-cake-like stack, with pitch-forked loads of straw and hay upon their backs. Here a plough rests, as if asleep, between the furrows; there a plough, drawn by a tandem of four black horses, or three brown horses with black manes and tails, turns the sparsely-green soil into bristly-brown clods. The plough is steered by a man in neutral-hued monkey-jacket and corduroy breeches, and a little fellow in a grey-green smock cracks his big whip as he walks backwards alongside his team. Yonder a dim-blue, single-horsed, two-manned plough goes backwards and forwards. In the next field two or three men are stooping over the dark soil, dibbling holes with one hand whilst they dip the other into their leather seed-pouches. In another field a brown and a white horse are drawing harrows, driven with cord reins by a man in a red shirt, which blazes like a poppy on the brown clods: an old fellow, in a rusty velveteen shooting-jacket and dingy white hat, trudging at the same time, with his gun under his arm, over the barren-looking square.

But now there are signs of a village. Plump, snowy-white ducks are paddling in the ditches; and a man is forking manure into a tumbril from the "farmer's short-cake" that raises its straw-bristled tableland above the roadside turf. The village is a cluster of cottages ; some two-storied, with red brick walls and slated roofs ; some of yellow-washed timber-panelled brick, with high low-hanging roofs of mossy thatch ; and others of white-washed brick and flint, both showing through the wash, with cracked grey shutters that hang down like table-leaves, and tiny quasi-dormer windows in the low thatched roofs. At some of the cottage doors women stand plaiting straw. In the churchyard the sexton is turfing a grave, but jealous for his village's reputation in a sanitary point of view, he anxiously explains that it is an old grave. He invites the wayfarer to enter the vestry to see the church's "lions"—the carved closet in which the surplices are kept, and a painting of Moses and Aaron. Hard by the church is a sleepy, cosy old mansion, with an avenue of trees in a green paddock begoldened with Lent lilies ; and hard by that, the red rectory with an ivy-clad, beehived lodge. In the outskirts of the village stands a square, low, old-fashioned farmhouse, with fruit-trees trained upon its walls. There are old grassy orchards here and there, in one of which hangs a public-house sign. Altogether the village seems an "idyllic" kind of place to live in ; but let us hear how its inhabitants do live in it. At another public-house, labourers are taking their mid-day rest and beer. One of them is picked out by his fellows to give the information required, as being most familiar with all kinds of agricultural labour. He has scanty, iron-grey hair, moistly wisped down on his weather-beaten forehead, and white stubble on his chin. He wears corduroy trousers and a bone-buttoned fustian jacket, and his brick-dust-coloured throat is bare. This is what he says, spontaneously and in reply to questions :—"Yes, sir, I can do any kind o' hagricult'ral labour. Ast anybody that knows me—I don't care who ye ast. I've worked for Mr. — and Mr. — close by ; an' you can goo to them when you've done talkin' to me. I'll goo from the plough even to the buildin' an' thetchin', an' that takes it all through. I've been a prizeman at the buildin' an' thetchin'. Law bless ye, sir, it ain't confined to this parish ! Men comes from thirty and forty miles round—t'other side a long way o' the Chilterns : 15s. is the first prize, and 12s. 6d. the second. I can't say what the third is. I never got so low as that. I get 5s. the square, naked work, a-thetchin', an' 3s. 6d. the other. P'r'aps I'm better off than some—moor so than many be. The work's in my hands, an' I know how to do it, an' so they can't take it out. A ploughman hereabouts may get 14s. a week, an' a shepherd the same, but, take it all round, wages is 10s. or 11s. Some of the farmers let out their work at haytime and harvest, an' then you may get moor. But then you're days and days out o' work in the year. I reckon I don't get moor than eight months out o' the twelve ; an' my boys don't get that. Yes, you may call me an 'odd man,' if you like—I'll turn my hand to anything. An' so'll my boys. One on 'em's sixteen, an' the other's quite growed up. An' I've had to keep them two great boys all winter—an' will if I can. Yes, all the winter I have—'cept when there come a machine, an' they got 2s. or 1s. 6d. a day, for takin' away the straw and chaff. They'll goo crow-keepin'—sixpence they'll push in for ; and what's moor, they'll bring it home. That'll buy a loaf o' bread. Half a loaf, we say, is better than none—much moor a whole 'un. If they could but earn a shillin' a week each certain, that 'ud be summut. Sometimes my youngest son gets a job pig-drivin' to Aylesbury, but the soldiers is al'ays at him, an' that makes him rusty, an' he swears. He don't want to be forced to goo for a soldier. He's a great tall chap, an' so's his brother. You see, sir, he ain't eighteen yet, an' so his time wouldn't count, would it, sir ? I want him to try for the police, but he says, 'No, father, I'll never be a bobby—not if I starve.' I'm six in family, sir—four gals, youngest is eight. All on 'em plaits, but that's like throwin' one 'a'-penny arter another. You buy sixpenn'orth o' straw, an' you gets 9d. for it when it's done, an' it takes you four or five hours to do it. Some, p'r'aps, can do the thirty yards in three and a half—that's accordin' to quickness. 2d. a week is what's paid at the plaiting schools. If I'd to pay that for my gals now, it would pull me all to pieces. There'd be 8d. a week goin' out—see how that would muddle me. A penny a week, I think, is what they pay at the parish school. I've no wish to speak ill o' hanybody, but my opinion o' parsons mostly is, that what they've got they'll keep. There's no lace-makin' just here. There may be about Buckingham—I never was so far. No, you won't see women workin' in the fields here, 'cept, p'r'aps, a wife reapin' with her husband at harvest. No, sir, I've no wish to hemigrate—not as I knows of. Of course, if I could get such wages as them you tells me on in—where was it?—an' house an' food too—I'd take 'em, if I could get to 'em. There's people here that get out-door relief, but I can't tell ye much about that. I don't suppose I could get so much as a parish-doctor to come to me. Yes, we've a club—it's held here—sixteenpence a month. Whit Monday's our club-day. Live, sir? We live as we can, an' not as we would. I've had turnip-tops, an' nothing else, an' them begged. Bless you, we've no garden-ground—not so much as we could put a plant in. Pigs! There ain't many pigs about here. If we could keep 'em, we ain't able to get 'em. There was a deal o' distress here last winter. For four days I'd nothing—next to nothing to eat, though I was in work—I was clearin' off a score. If we'd had sickness, God A'mighty only knows where we should ha' been. Arter all, the Lord al'ays provides somehow. If He hadn't put that there gift o' mine to do anything into my hands, how would my poor children ha' got on? I don't know who ye are, sir, or what ye are; but I've told ye more about myself than I ever told any man afore. If I was to tell ye all, it would fill that there black book ye're writin' in."

And next for a talk with a shepherd. He is a ruddy, robust young fellow, standing in the midst of his ewes and lambs in a hurdled oblong of turnips; and when he sees a stranger suddenly turn aside from the road, climb the hedge bank, stride over the low thorn fence, and straddle across the hurdles, the stalwart young shepherd takes his hands from his pockets, and looks very much inclined to knock the stranger down, under the impression that such eccentrically audacious proceedings can only spring from rabid ovine-kleptomania.

But the shepherd's pipe is empty, and the stranger professes to want a pipe-light. The production of a tobacco-pouch on one side, and the striking of a lucifer held, when alight, between hollowed hands, on the other, are the preliminaries of peace; and when a little lamb, which the shepherd has been obliged to take from its mother, runs up bleating first to him, and then takes its stand between the stranger's legs, rubbing its white ears and black face against his muddy boots, the shepherd relaxes into conversation. Close by us a pied wagtail runs in and out under the sheep's bellies without the least alarm. Its remarkable tameness is remarked upon; but it does not interest the shepherd: he professes even not to know the wagtail under that or any other name. His sheep are half-breds, he says; but he cannot tell between what. "That's a Down," he adds, pointing to a plump, broad-backed, black-headed ewe; but he cannot say what "Down." He gets 14s. a week, thinks others get as much. Carters and ploughmen get 13s. anyhow. He has lived in the neighbourhood six years, and was never three months out of work. He never heard of any distress "to speak on" thereabouts. "What we eat or what we buy, sir, do you mean?" he cross-questions, when asked how often he gets meat. "I get meat twice a day," he goes on, "an' I expect most o' the people hereabouts gets it once or twice a day. Meat here's 8d. and 9d. Couldn't get pork last winter under 8½d. The price o' bread makes a diff'rence. When bread's down, the masters lower the wages. Yes, I've a pretty sight o' lambs, an' I haint lost a yow this 'ear—that's pretty good, we reckon. Yes, them Australian wages ain't bad; but I suppose they don't do much else than shepherd in them parts. But I must be gettin' on—it's pretty nigh milkin' time."

A little brown-faced fellow in a blue-and-white neckerchief, buskins, and a very ragged jacket, is asked what he has got in the basket on his shoulder. "My old coat," he answers, looking his interrogator sturdily in the face, as if determined to defend that treasure at all hazards against felonious appropriation.

"How old are you, my boy?"

"Just gone ten."

"And what are you doing?"

"Stone-pickin' in the fields."

"When did you begin?"

"I've been at it a 'ear."

"What do you get?"

"2s. 6d. a week."

"Do you go to school?"

"No, I doan't goo to school—no," answers the small boy, with scornful emphasis, as if he thought such a mode of spending time would be very puerile for a person of his manly, wage-earning importance.

Another white finger-post points the way to another whity-brown village church, with an embattled tower. Green-powdered beech-boles (the Sylva of Buckinghamshire—the shire of the ham in the midst of boe—still justifies its name) rise in the green graveyard flush with the top of the roadside wall. Green, white-and-yellow speckled tombstones, lean back in the hushed sleeping place—a very different κοιμητήριον from the Tower Hamlets' Cemetery, with its ever rushing and rumbling trains on the straddling viaducts hard by. A little farther on is another quiet, quaintly-named, and quaintly-built jumble of Buckinghamshire cottages—lichened gables, mossy thatch, red brick, yellow brick, dusky plaster, timber parallelograms, white, grey, green, and black weatherboard. The roar of the blacksmith's bellows, the rhythmical cadence of the hammers on the anvil, in the low black forge, are almost the only sounds of human life throughout the place. A cottage-door stands open. Two or three children are squatted before the hearth-fire, on the pitted, lanky-bricked floor of the only lower room. A young woman is ironing on a low, unpainted table, the chief piece of furniture, placed beneath the back window. An attempt to obtain "social statistics" is made by the stranger who has stepped in, but the young woman takes alarm. "If you please, sir, I'd rather not do it," she says; and fidgets about like a hen, when a hawk is hovering over a farmyard, until the intruder beats an apologetic retreat. A neighbour is less cautious, and more communicative. He is a very feeble old man, with a grey-bristled chin, and limbs that seem to be rather hoisted up and down by halcyards, with half-jammed blocks, than moved by spontaneous volition. "I'm seventy-six," he pipes. "Yes, I s'pose I'm past work. I've put my shoulder out; but I was just gooin' to try to walk into Buckin'am. The duke may be a very good landlord, for aught I know, but I don't live under him. My cottage belongs to Mr. —. We've only the lower room, and one above. Yes, there's a good many like that. Some, by chance, may have two rooms over. Yes, men with ever so many children lives the same. Me an' my old woman gets three shillins a week from the parish, an' three loaves; and a shillin' has to goo out o' that for rent. There's been hard times here last winter. Lace? Lace makin' ain't what it was. Little uns may get 2d. a day, and big gals, mayhap, 6d. Yes, a good many on 'em make it hereabouts—yes, both in Buckin'am an' the villages; but it's a poor livin'."

There is nothing "sensational" in the English peasant's life—except when he turns poacher, and shoots the keeper through the head, or gets knocked down and taken up himself. He is not a piquant subject for a character-sketch. He bears his "prosperity" at 14s. a week, and his semi-starvation on 1s. and a loaf and a-half a week, with apparently equal stolidity. It must be admitted, too, that a good many of our town poor—to say nothing of country air—are worse lodged than the peasant, are as badly off, in a pecuniary point of view, as he is at his worst, and would think his receipts at his best a little fortune. But, still, there is something specially pathetic in the way in which the hard-up farmer's man speaks of his lot. He grumbles, of course, but he does not grumble like the hard-up in towns—as if he had an undoubted right to a great deal better fate; he accepts his destiny in a quiet, half-stunned fashion, as if he felt that he could not have been born to anything better, however disagreeable it may be. It is normal for him to live from hand to mouth, with no hopes of better things beyond. He does not turn a Jacobin, like the town-proletary. Slower wits, no doubt, have something to do with the peasant's sullen resignation. If he were not so apathetic, he could find better markets for his labour. Still, there is something respectable in the unenvious way in which the peasant speaks of his "betters." He has to acknowledge "social superiority" far more constantly than the town poor are compelled to—it is, indeed, painful to see a hard-working Hodge touching his hat, under a sense of duty, as if he were still a serf, to any one who passes him "dressed like a gentleman," although clothes may be the sole point of superiority which the touched-to can claim over the toucher; and in all manly virtues, and real gentlemanlike feeling, the one who has obeisance done him may be far inferior to the one who does it. But still Hodge goes on touching his hat; and his way of thinking of those "above him" is sweeter-blooded, so to speak, than that of the town struggler. Hodge would naturally like to be better off, but he does not want to rob others, in order to become so. He still reverences the squire, and all kinds of spiritual and secular pastors and masters; that is, unless he has had his somewhat slavish deference sapped by a sojourn in towns. He sometimes learns ultra-democracy there: ecce signum—I overheard a Buckinghamshire bumpkin describing his experiences in some hospital from which he had recently been discharged—not the County Infirmary: Buckinghamshire people boast of that as a model institution which "Londoners might take copy from."

"The doctor come to me," said the discharged patient, "and 'Young man,' says he, 'you're a deal better.' 'Excuse me, sir,' says I, 'but you're a fool!' Yes, I did, though he was a doctor."

"But that was cheeky," said the patient's companion.

"An' wouldn't you ha' been cheeky?" was the rejoinder. "Don't a man know his own in'ards better than another man?"

THE WAY.

I.

I SAID, "O Guide, go forth :
I will follow Thee any whither."
And behold, as we went out over the earth,

It was all June together ;
The sun steeped half the world in bliss,
And the shadows steeped the rest in quietness.

"The sun steeped half the world in bliss."

And I said, "I have heard of Thy way, O
Lord,
How that it goeth dark through the dark,—
Fire and water, tumult and blood,

Woes to be suffered and foes withstood.
I have heard that the only way to the ark
Is over the flood !

"And now, O Lord, is this the way?
For, behold, I tread smooth paths to-day.
What if I loiter and fail to win?"

But He said, "This is the way ;
Walk ye herein."

II.

I spoke again, and said, "I have heard
That our joy-times here are quickly past,
That the smooth paths are not long to tread,
With smile of the sun and with song of the bird ;

But, Lord, how long shall this last?"

"Not long," He said ;

"And see thou follow me afterward."

Even at that moment I slipped and sank,
Slipped and stumbled down the bank,—
Down the bank to a path beneath,
Chill and dank as the shadow of death.
"Lord," I cried, "I have stumbled astray ;
Lead me back, Lord, into Thy way !
Out of the pitfall, out of the gin,
Far from terror and safe from sin,
Hold Thou up my goings therein !"

But He said, "This is the way ;
Walk ye herein."

III.

I went along in that shadow of death,
Going and weeping, under my breath,

"And the shadows steeped the rest in quietness."

And whispering said, "It was better with me—
Oh, better !—out on the sunny lea."

But He answered, "This is thy best,
That thou follow me here, and into my rest."

I said, "O Master, how shall I know
When my best is gladness or woe ?
How shall I learn what Thy ways be?"

And He said, "Leave that to me.

Follow me only whither I go,
Through chilling shadow and scorching glow,
Through the desert dust and the battle din, Till the goal be reached, and finished the test,

Till the sorrow is past, and the joy is best,—

Till I say, 'This is my rest ;
Enter herein.'

THE TWO BREATHS.

A LECTURE DELIVERED AT WINCHESTER, MAY 31, 1869.

LADIES,—I have been honoured by a second invitation to address you here, from the lady to whose public spirit the establishment of these lectures is due. I dare not refuse it: because it gives me an opportunity of speaking on a matter, knowledge and ignorance about which may seriously affect your health and happiness, and that of the children with whom you may have to do. I must apologize if I say many things which are well known to many persons in this room: they ought to be well known to all; and it is generally best to assume total ignorance in one's hearers, and to begin from the beginning.

I shall try to be as simple as possible; to trouble you as little as possible with scientific terms; to be practical; and at the same time, if possible, interesting.

I should wish to call this lecture "The Two Breaths"—not merely "The Breath," and for this reason: Every time you breathe, you breathe two different breaths; you take in one, you give out another. The composition of those two breaths is different. Their effects are different. The breath which has been breathed out must not be breathed in again. To tell you why it must not would lead me into anatomical details, not quite in place here as yet: though the day will come, I trust, when every woman entrusted with the care of children, will be expected to know something about them. But this I may say—Those who habitually take in fresh breath, will probably grow up large, strong, ruddy, cheerful, active, clear-headed, fit for their work. Those who habitually take in the breath which has been breathed out by themselves, or any other living creature, will certainly grow up, if they grow up at all, small, weak, pale, nervous, depressed, unfit for work, and tempted continually to resort to stimulants, and become drunkards. If you want to see how different the breath breathed out is from the breath taken in, you have only to try a somewhat cruel experiment, but one which people too often try upon themselves, their children, and their work-people.

If you take any small animal with lungs like your own—a mouse, for instance—and force it to breathe no air but what you have breathed already; if you put it in a close box, and while you take in breath from the outer air, send out your breath, through a tube, into that box, the animal will soon faint; if you go on long with this process, it will die.

Take a second instance, which I beg to press most seriously on the notice of mothers, governesses, and nurses: If you allow a child to get into the habit of sleeping with its head under the bed-clothes, and thereby breathing its own breath over and over again, that child will assuredly grow pale, weak, and ill. Medical men have cases on record of scrofula appearing in children previously healthy, which could only be accounted for from this habit, and which ceased when the habit stopped. Let me again entreat your attention to this undoubted fact.

Take another instance, which is only too common: If you are in a crowded room, with plenty of fire and lights and company, doors and windows all shut tight, how often you feel faint—so faint, that you may require smelling-salts or some other stimulant. The cause of your faintness is just the same as that of the mouse's fainting in the box: you and your friends, and, as I shall show you presently, the fire and the candles likewise, having been all breathing each other's breaths, over and over again, till the air has become unfit to support life. You are doing your best to enact over again the Highland tragedy, of which Sir James Simpson tells in his lectures to the working-classes of Edinburgh, when at a Christmas meeting, thirty-six persons danced all night in a small room with a low ceiling, keeping the doors and windows shut. The atmosphere of the room was noxious beyond description; and the effect was, that seven of the party were soon after seized with typhus fever, of which two died. You are inflicting on yourselves the torments of the poor dog, who is kept at the Grotto del Cane, near Naples—to be stupified, for the amusement of visitors, by the carbonic acid gas of the Grotto, and brought to life again by being dragged into the fresh air; nay, you are inflicting upon yourselves the torments of the famous Black Hole of Calcutta; and, if there was no chimney in the room, by which some fresh air could enter, the candles would soon burn blue (as they do, you know, when ghosts appear), your brains become disturbed, and you yourselves run the risk of becoming ghosts, and the candles of actually going out.

Of this last fact there is no doubt; for if, instead of putting a mouse into the box, you will put a lighted candle, and breathe into the tube, as before, however gently, you will in a short time put the candle out.

Now, how is this? First, what is the difference between the breath you take in, and the breath you give out? And, next, Why has it a similar effect on animal life and a lighted candle?

The difference is this. The breath which you take in is, or ought to be, pure air, composed, on the whole, of oxygen and nitrogen, with a minute portion of carbonic acid.

The breath which you give out is an impure air, to which has been added, among other matters which will not support life, an excess of carbonic acid.

That this is the fact you can prove for yourselves by a simple experiment. Get a little lime-water at the chemist's, and breathe into it through a glass tube, your breath will at once make the lime-water milky. The carbonic acid of your breath has laid hold of the lime, and made it visible as white carbonate of lime—in plain English, as common chalk.

Now, I do not wish, as I said, to load your memories with scientific terms: but I beseech you to remember at least these two—oxygen gas and carbonic acid gas; and to remember that, as surely as oxygen feeds the fire of life, so surely does carbonic acid put it out.

I say, "the fire of life." In that expression lies the answer to our second question: Why does our breath produce a similar effect upon the mouse and the lighted candle? Every one of us is, as it were, a living fire. Were we not, how could we be always warmer than the air outside us? There is a process going on perpetually in each of us, similar to that by which coals are burnt in the fire, oil in a lamp, wax in a candle, and the earth itself in a volcano. To keep each of those fires alight, oxygen is needed; and the products of combustion, as they are called, are more or less the same in each case—carbonic acid and steam.

These facts justify the expression I just made use of (and which may have seemed to some of you fantastical), that the fire and the candles in the crowded room were breathing the same breath as you were. It is but too true. An average fire in the grate requires, I believe, to keep it burning as much oxygen as three human beings do; each candle or lamp must have its share of oxygen likewise, and that a very considerable one; and an average gas-burner—pray attend to this, you who live in rooms lighted with gas—consumes as much oxygen as six candles or eleven men. All alike are making carbonic acid. The carbonic acid of the fire happily escapes up the chimney in the smoke: but the carbonic acid from the human beings and the candles remains to poison the room, unless it be ventilated.

Now, I think you may understand one of the simplest, and yet most terrible, cases of want of ventilation—death by the fumes of charcoal. A human being shut up in a room, of which every crack is closed, with a pan of burning charcoal, falls asleep, never to wake again. His inward fire is competing with the fire of the charcoal for the oxygen of the room; both are making carbonic acid out of it; but the charcoal, being the stronger of the two, gets all the oxygen to itself, and leaves the human being nothing to inhale but the carbonic acid which it has made. The human being, being the weaker, dies first; but the charcoal dies also. When it has exhausted all the oxygen of the room, it cools, goes out, and is found in the morning half-consumed beside its victim. If you put a giant or an elephant, I should conceive, into that room, instead of a human being, the case would be reversed for a time; the elephant would put out the burning charcoal by the carbonic acid from its mighty lungs; and then, when it had exhausted all the air in the room, die likewise of its own carbonic acid.

Now, too, I think we may see what ventilation means, and why it is needed.

Ventilation means simply letting out the foul air, and letting in the fresh air: letting out the air which has been breathed by men or by candles, letting in the air which has not. And, to understand how to do that, we must remember a most simple chemical law, that a gas as it is warmed expands, and therefore becomes lighter; as it cools, it contracts, and becomes heavier.

Now the carbonic acid in the breath which comes out of our mouths is warm, lighter than the air, and rises to the ceiling; and therefore in any unventilated room full of people, there is a layer of foul air along the ceiling. You might soon test that for yourselves, if you could mount a ladder and put your heads there aloft. You do test it for yourselves when you sit in the galleries of churches and theatres, where the air is provably more foul, and therefore more injurious, than down below.

Where, again, work-people are employed in a crowded house of many storeys, the health of those who work on the upper floors always suffers most.

In the old monkey-house at the Zoological Gardens, when the cages were on the old plan, tier upon tier, the poor little fellows in the uppermost tier (so I have been told), always died first of the monkey's constitutional complaint, consumption, simply from breathing the warm breath of their friends below. But since the cages have been altered, and made to range side by side from top to bottom, consumption (I understand) has vastly diminished among them.

The first question in ventilation, therefore, is to get this carbonic acid safe out of the room, while it is warm and light, and close to the ceiling; for if you do not, this happens. The carbonic acid gas cools and becomes heavier—for carbonic acid, at the same temperature as common air, is so much heavier than common air, that you may actually (if you are handy enough) turn it from one vessel to another, and pour out for your enemy a glass of invisible poison. So down to the floor this heavy carbonic acid comes, and lies along it, just as it lies often in the bottom of old wells, or old brewers' vats, as a stratum of poison, killing occasionally the men who descend into it. Hence, as foolish a practice as I know is that of sleeping on the floor; for, towards the small hours, when the room gets cold, the sleeper on the floor is breathing carbonic acid.

And here one word to those ladies who interest themselves with the poor. The poor are too apt in times of distress to pawn their bedsteads and keep their beds. Never, if you have influence, let that happen. Keep the bedstead, whatever else may go, to save the sleeper from the carbonic acid on the floor.

How, then, shall we get rid of the foul air on the top of the room? After all that has been written and tried on ventilation, I know no simpler method than putting into the chimney one of Arnott's ventilators, which may be bought and fixed for a few shillings, always remembering that it must be fixed into the chimney as near the ceiling as possible. I can speak of these ventilators from twenty-five years' experience. Living in a house with low ceilings, liable to become overcharged with carbonic acid, which produces sleepiness in the evening, I have found that these ventilators keep the air fresh and pure; and I consider the presence of one of these ventilators in a room more valuable than three or four feet additional height of ceiling. I have found, too, that their working proves how necessary they are, from this simple fact—You would suppose that as the ventilator opens freely into the chimney, the smoke would be blown down through it in high winds, and blacken the ceiling: but this is just what does not happen. If the ventilator be at all properly poised, so as to shut with a violent gust of wind, it will at all other moments keep itself permanently open, proving thereby that there is an up-draught of heated air continually escaping from the ceiling up the chimney. Another very simple method of ventilation is employed in those excellent cottages which her Majesty has built for her labourers round Windsor. Over each door a sheet of perforated zinc, some eighteen inches square, is fixed, allowing the foul air to escape into the passage, and in the ceiling of the passage a similar sheet of zinc, allowing it to escape into the roof. Fresh air, meanwhile, should be obtained from outside, by piercing the windows, or otherwise. And here let me give one hint to all builders of houses—if possible, let bedroom windows open at the top as well as at the bottom.

Let me impress the necessity of using some such contrivances, not only on parents and educators, but on those who employ work-people, and above all on those who employ young women in shops or in work-rooms. What their condition may be in this city, I know not: but most painful it has been to me in other places, when passing through warehouses or work-rooms, to see the pale, sodden, and as the French would say, "etiolated" countenances of the girls who were passing the greater part of the day in them; and painful, also, to breathe an atmosphere of which habit had, alas, made them unconscious, but which to one coming out of the open air was altogether noxious, and shocking also; for it was fostering the seeds of death, not only in the present but in future generations.

Why should this be? Every one will agree that good ventilation is necessary in a hospital, because people cannot get well without fresh air. Do they not see that by the same reasoning good ventilation is necessary everywhere, because people cannot remain well without fresh air? Let me entreat those who employ women in work-rooms, if they have no time to read through such books as Dr. Andrew Combe's "Physiology applied to Health and Education," and Madame de Wahl's "Practical Hints on the Moral, Mental, and Physical Training of Girls," to procure certain tracts, published by Messrs. Jarrold, Paternoster Row, for the Ladies' Sanitary Association; especially one which bears on this subject, "The Black Hole in our own Bed-rooms;" Dr. Lankester's "School Manual of Health;" or a manual on ventilation, published by the Metropolitan Working Classes Association for the Improvement of Public Health.

I look forward—I say it openly—to some period of higher civilisation, when the acts of parliament for the ventilation of factories and workshops shall be largely extended, and made far more stringent; when officers of public health shall be empowered to enforce the ventilation of every room in which persons are employed for hire; and empowered also to demand a proper system of ventilation for every new house, whether in country or in town. To that, I believe, we must come: but I had sooner far see these improvements carried out, as befits the citizens of a free country, in the spirit of the Gospel rather than in that of the law—carried out, not compulsorily and from fear of fines, but voluntarily, from a sense of duty, honour, and humanity. I appeal, therefore, to the good feeling of all whom it may concern, whether the health of those whom they employ, and therefore the supply of fresh air which they absolutely need, are not matters for which they are not more or less responsible to their country and their God.

And if any excellent person of the old school should answer me, “Why make all this fuss about ventilation? Our forefathers got on very well without it”—I must answer that, begging their pardons, our ancestors did nothing of the kind. Our ancestors got on usually very ill in these matters: and when they got on well, it was because they had good ventilation in spite of themselves.

First, They got on very ill. To quote a few remarkable instances of longevity, or to tell me that men were larger and stronger on the average in old times, is to yield to the old fallacy of fancying that savages were peculiarly healthy, because those who were seen were active and strong. The simple answer is, that the strong alone survived, while the majority died from the severity of the training. Savages do not increase in number; and our ancestors increased but very slowly for many centuries. I am not going to disgust my audience with statistics of disease: but knowing something, as I happen to do, of the social state and of the health of the middle and Elizabethan ages, I have no hesitation in saying that the average of disease and death was far greater then than it is now. Epidemics of many kinds, typhus, ague, plague—all diseases which were caused more or less by bad air, devastated this land and Europe in those days with a horrible intensity, to which even the choleras of our times are mild. The back streets, the hospitals, the jails, the barracks, the camps—every place in which any large number of persons congregated, were so many nests of pestilence, engendered by uncleanness, which defiled alike the water which was drank and the air which was breathed; and as a single fact, of which the tables of insurance companies assure us, the average of human life in England has increased twenty-five per cent. since the reign of George I., owing simply to our more rational and cleanly habits of life.

But secondly, I said that when our ancestors got on well, they did so because they got ventilation in spite of themselves. Luckily for them, their houses were ill-built, their doors and windows would not shut. They had lattice-windowed houses too, to live in one of which, as I can testify from long experience, is as thoroughly ventilating as living in a lantern with the glass broken out. It was because their houses were full of draughts, and still more, in the early middle age, because they had no glass, and stopped out the air only by a shutter at night, that they sought for shelter rather than for fresh air, of which they sometimes had too much; and to escape the wind, built their houses in holes, such as that in which the old city of Winchester stands. Shelter, I believe, as much as the desire to be near fish in Lent, and to occupy the rich alluvium of the valleys, made the monks of old England choose the river-banks for the sites of their abbeys. They made a mistake therein, which, like most mistakes, did not go unpunished. These low situations, especially while the forests were yet thick on the hills around, were the perennial haunts of fever and ague, produced by subtle vegetable poisons, carried in the carbonic acid given off by rotting vegetation. So there again they fell in with man's old enemy, bad air. Still, as long as the doors and windows did not shut, some free circulation of air remained. But now, our doors and windows shut only too tight. We have plate-glass instead of lattices; and we have replaced the draughty and smoky but really wholesome open chimney, with its wide corners and settles, by narrow registers, and even by stoves. We have done all we can, in fact, to seal ourselves up hermetically from the outer air, and to breathe our own breaths over and over again; and we pay the penalty of it in a thousand ways unknown to our ancestors, through whose rooms all the winds of heaven whistled, and who were glad enough to shelter themselves from draughts in the sitting-room by the high screen round the fire, and in the sleeping-room by the thick curtains of the four-post bedstead, which is now rapidly disappearing before a higher civilisation. We therefore absolutely require to make for ourselves the very ventilation from which our ancestors tried to escape.

But, Ladies, there is an old and true proverb, that you may bring a horse to the water, but you cannot make him drink. And in likewise, it is too true, that you may bring people to the fresh air, but you cannot make them breathe it. Their own folly, or the folly of their parents and educators, prevents their lungs being duly filled and duly emptied. Therefore, the blood is not duly oxygenated, and the whole system goes wrong. Paleness, weakness, consumption, scrofula, and too many other ailments, are the consequences of ill-filled lungs. For without well-filled lungs, robust health is impossible.

And if any one shall answer, "We do not want robust health so much as intellectual attainment. The mortal body, being the lower organ, must take its chance, and be even sacrificed if need be, to the higher organ, the immortal mind:"—To such I reply, You cannot do it. The laws of nature, which are the express will of God, laugh such attempts to scorn. Every organ of the body is formed out of the blood; and if the blood be vitiated, every organ suffers in proportion to its delicacy; and the brain, being the most delicate and highly specialised of all organs, suffers most of all and soonest of all, as every one knows who has tried to work his brain when his digestion was the least out of order. Nay, the very morals will suffer. From ill-filled lungs, which signify ill-repaired blood, arise year by year an amount not merely of disease, but of folly, temper, laziness, intemperance, madness, and, let me tell you fairly, crime—the sum of which will never be known till that great day when men shall be called to account for all deeds done in the body, whether they be good or evil.

I must refer you on this subject again to Andrew Combe's "Physiology," especially chapters iv. and vii.; and also to chapter x. of Madame de Wahl's excellent book. I will only say this shortly, that the three most common causes of ill-filled lungs, in children and in young ladies, are stillness, silence, and stays.

First, stillness; a sedentary life, and want of exercise. A girl is kept for hours sitting on a form writing or reading, to do which she must lean forward; and if her mistress cruelly attempts to make her sit upright, and thereby keep the spine in an attitude for which Nature did not intend it, she is thereby doing her best to bring on that disease so fearfully common in girls' schools, lateral curvature of the spine. But practically the girl will stoop forward. And what happens? The lower ribs are pressed into the body, thereby displacing more or less something inside. The diaphragm in the meantime, which is the very bellows of the lungs, remains loose; the lungs are never properly filled or emptied; and an excess of carbonic acid accumulates at the bottom of them. What follows? Frequent sighing to get rid of it; heaviness of head; depression of the whole nervous system under the influence of the poison of the lungs; and when the poor child gets up from her weary work, what is the first thing she probably does? She lifts up her chest, stretches, yawns, and breathes deeply—Nature's voice, Nature's instinctive cure, which is probably regarded as ungraceful, as what is called "lolling" is. As if sitting upright was not an attitude in itself essentially ungraceful, and such as no artist would care to draw. As if "lolling," which means putting the body in the attitude of the most perfect ease compatible with a fully expanded chest, was not in itself essentially graceful, and to be seen in every reposing figure in Greek bas-reliefs and vases; graceful, and like all graceful actions, healthful at the same time. The only wholesome attitude of repose, which I see allowed in average school-rooms, is lying on the back on the floor, or on a sloping board, in which case the lungs must be fully expanded. I have seen that plan work much good, not only with girls, but with delicate boys, especially when combined with moderate reading aloud.

This last word brings me to the second mistake, enforced silence. I said moderate reading aloud, because where there is any tendency to irritability of throat or lungs, too much moderation cannot be used. You may as well try to cure a diseased lung by working it, as to cure a lame horse by galloping him. But where the breathing organs are of average health, let it be said once and for all, that children and young people cannot make too much noise. The parents who cannot bear the noise of their children have no right to have brought them into the world. The schoolmistress who enforces silence on her pupils is committing—unintentionally no doubt, but still committing—an offence against reason, worthy only of a convent. Every shout, every burst of laughter, every song; nay, in the case of infants, as physiologists well know, every moderate fit of crying, conduces to health, by rapidly filling and emptying the lung, and changing the blood more rapidly from black to red, that is, from death to life. Andrew Combe tells a story of a large charity school, in which the young girls were, for the sake of their health, shut up in the hall and school-room during play hours, from November till March, and no romping or noise allowed. The natural consequences were, the great majority of them fell ill; and I am afraid that a great deal of illness has been from time to time contracted in certain school-rooms, simply through this one cause of enforced silence. Some cause or other there must be for the amount of ill-health and weakness which prevails especially among girls of the middle classes in towns, who have not, poor things, the opportunities which richer girls have, of keeping themselves in strong health by riding, skating, archery (that last quite an admirable exercise for the chest and lungs, and far preferable to croquet, which involves too much unwholesome stooping). Even playing at ball, which has been popular ever since the time of old Homer, who makes the Princess Nausicaa and her maidens play it on the sea-shore, after they have washed the garments of the royal household—even a game of ball, I say—if milliners and shop-girls had room to indulge in one after their sedentary work—might bring fresh spirits to many a heart, and fresh colour to many a cheek.

I spoke just now of the Greeks. I suppose you will all allow that the Greeks were, as far as we know, the most beautiful race which the world ever saw. Every educated man knows that they were also the cleverest of all races; and, next to his Bible, thanks God for Greek literature.

Now these people had made physical as well as intellectual education a science as well as a study. Their women practised graceful (in some cases even athletic) exercises. They developed, by a free and healthy life, those figures which remain everlasting and unapproachable models of human beauty: but (to come to my third point) they wore no stays. The first mention of stays that I have ever found is in the letters of dear old Synesius, Bishop of Cyrene, on the Greek coast of Africa, about four hundred years after the Christian era. He tells us how, when he was shipwrecked on a remote part of the coast, and he and the rest of the passengers were starving on cockles and limpets, there was among them a slave girl out of the far East, who had a pinched wasp-waist, such as you may see on the old Hindoo sculptures, and such as you may see in any street in a British town. And when the Greek ladies of the neighbourhood found her out, they sent for her from house to house, to behold, with astonishment and laughter, this new and prodigious waist, with which it seemed to them it was impossible for a human being to breathe or live; and they petted the poor girl and fed her, as they might a dwarf or a giantess, till she got quite fat and comfortable, while her owners had not enough to eat. So strange and ridiculous seemed our present fashion to the descendants of those who, centuries before, had imagined, because they had seen living and moving, those glorious statues which we pretend to admire, but refuse to imitate.

It seems to me that a few centuries hence, when mankind has learnt to fear God more, and therefore to obey more strictly those laws of nature and of science which are the will of God—it seems to me, I say, that in those days the present fashion of tight lacing will be looked back upon as a contemptible and barbarous superstition, denoting a very low level of civilisation in the peoples which have practised it. That for generations past women should have been in the habit—not to please men, who do not care about the matter as a point of beauty—but simply to vie with each other in obedience to something called fashion—that they should, I say, have been in the habit of deliberately crushing that part of the body which should be specially left free, contracting and displacing their lungs, their heart, and all the most vital and important organs, and entailing thereby disease, not only on themselves but on their children after them—that for forty years past physicians should have been telling them of the folly of what they have been doing:—and that they should as yet, in the great majority of cases, not only turn a deaf ear to all warnings, but actually deny the offence, of which one glance of the physician or the sculptor, who know what shape the human body ought to be, brings them in guilty—this, I say, is an instance of—what shall I call it? which deserves at once the lash, not merely of the satirist, but of any theologian who really believes that God made the physical universe. Let me, I pray you, appeal to your common sense for a moment. When any one chooses a horse or a dog, whether for strength, for speed, or for any other useful purpose, the first thing almost to be looked at is the girth round the lower ribs, the room for heart and lungs. Exactly in proportion to that will be the animal's general healthiness, power of endurance, and value in many other ways. If you will look at eminent lawyers and famous orators, who have attained a healthy old age, you will see that in every case they are men (like the late Lord Palmerston, and others whom I could mention) of remarkable size, not merely in the upper, but in the lower part of the chest; men who had, therefore, a peculiar power of using the diaphragm to fill and to clear the lungs, and therefore to oxygenate the blood of the whole body. Now it is just these lower ribs, across which the diaphragm is stretched like the head of a drum, which stays contract to a minimum. If you advised owners of horses and hounds to put their horses or their hounds into stays, and lace them up tight, in order to increase their beauty, you would receive, I doubt not, a very courteous, but certainly a very decided refusal to do that which would spoil not merely the animals themselves, but the whole stud or the whole kennel for years to come. And if you advised an orator to put himself into tight stays, he, no doubt, again would give a courteous answer; but he would reply (if he was a really educated man) that to comply with your request would involve his giving up public work, under the probable penalty of being dead within the twelvemonth.

And how much work of every kind, intellectual as well as physical, is spoiled or hindered—how many deaths occur from consumption and other complaints which are the result of this habit of tight lacing, is known partly to the medical men, who lift up their voices in vain, and known fully to Him who will not interfere with the least of his own physical laws to save human beings from the consequences of their own wilful folly.

And now—to end this lecture with more pleasing thoughts—What becomes of this breath which passes from your lips? Is it merely harmful—merely waste? God forbid! God has forbidden that anything should be merely harmful or merely waste in this so wise and well-made world. The carbonic acid which passes from your lips at every breath—ay, even that which oozes from the volcano crater when the eruption is past—is a precious boon to thousands of things of which you have daily need. Indeed there is a sort of hint at physical truth in the old fairy tale of the girl, from whose lips, as she spoke, fell pearls and diamonds; for the carbonic acid of your breath may help hereafter to make the pure carbonate of lime of a pearl, or the still purer carbon of a diamond. Nay, it may go (in such a world of transformations do we live) to make atoms of coal strata, which shall lie buried for ages beneath deep seas, shall be upheaved in continents which are yet unborn, and there be burnt for the use of a future race of men, and resolved into their original elements. Coal, wise men tell us, is on the whole breath and sunlight—the breath of living creatures who have lived in the vast swamps and forests of some primæval world, and the sunlight which transmuted that breath into the leaves and stems of trees, magically locked up for ages in that black stone, to become, when it is burnt at last, light and carbonic acid, as it was at first. For though you must not breathe your breath again, you may at least eat your breath, if you will allow the sun to transmute it for you into vegetables; or you may enjoy its fragrance and its colour in the shape of a lily or a rose. When you walk in a sunlit garden, every word you speak, every breath you breathe, is feeding the plants and flowers around. The delicate surface of the green leaves absorbs the carbonic acid, and parts it into its elements, retaining the carbon to make woody fibre, and courteously returning you the oxygen to mingle with the fresh air, and be inhaled by your lungs once more. Thus do you feed the plants, just as the plants feed you, while the great life-giving sun feeds both; and the geranium standing in the sick child's window does not merely rejoice his eye and mind by its beauty and freshness, but repays honestly the trouble spent on it, absorbing the breath which the child needs not, and giving to him the breath which he needs.

So are the services of all things constituted according to a Divine and wonderful order, and knit together in mutual dependence and mutual helpfulness.—A fact to be remembered with hope and comfort: but also with awe and fear. For as in that which is above nature, so in nature itself; he that breaks one physical law is guilty of all. The whole universe, as it were, takes up arms against him; and all nature, with her numberless and unseen powers, is ready to avenge herself on him, and on his children after him, he knows not when nor where. He, on the other hand, who obeys the laws of nature with his whole heart and mind, will find all things working together to him for good. He is at peace with the physical universe. He is helped and befriended alike by the sun above his head and the dust beneath his feet: because he is obeying the will and mind of Him who made sun, and dust, and all things; and who has given them a law which cannot be broken.

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

HEROES OF HEBREW HISTORY.

BY THE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

VII.—JOSEPH.

THE narrative of Joseph's life is the connecting link in the sacred volume between the story of a single life and the history of a people. In his day the covenant life spread itself into wider circles. In Abraham it was summed up in one man: when Isaac was born it flowed on into him. In Jacob it enlarged itself into the family: in the days of Joseph it swelled out into the dimensions of a tribe. Yet though he was mainly instrumental in this development, he was not the head of the tribe, nor was it through his line that the blessing to convey which to all nations Israel was constituted a separate people, came to the family of man. And so it is the history of the man, and not that of the tribal head, which rivets us in the life of Joseph.

He comes before us overshadowed by the great love of his father Jacob. He was the son of Jacob's old age: he was the child of the beloved Rachel. When his history begins Benjamin was too young (but one year old), to bear the great weight of that passionate affection. Still to the old man's feelings Joseph was the son of "Rachel my wife." This love for Rachel threw a golden light over the old patriarch's last years. Deep, enduring, absorbing, unselfish love, especially for those parted from us by the dark veil which separates us from the unseen world, exalts humanity. And this is always showing itself in Jacob. The bitter lamentation for Deborah, and the planting over her grave the terebinth of tears, because she had been Rachel's nurse, and was the last living link left of those maiden days of youth and beauty, is a lively mark of the old man's enduring love: so is the description of her as "My wife, who bare me two sons" (Gen. xlv. 27), as if she alone and her offspring rose up to the true dignity of the family life. So is the pouring out of his heart on that sick bed to which Joseph brought his two sons for their parting blessing. The old man looks upon their young strength, and the past years, fleet as their wont is before his failing eyes, until the one thought, which was never far distant, rises before him, and as though from that sad day his life of lives was spent, he sums up all in the plaintive utterance, "And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath: and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath; the same is Bethlehem." It was as if again the old deceit looked in on his soul in those thoughts of sadness. For he had been sent to bring his wife from Padan to Canaan, and he came back with her to the border she was not to pass; came back to enter his father's tent alone, having left Rachel at Bethlehem; and to find Rebekah laid before her at Mamre.

Of all this great love Joseph was the natural inheritor, and in the wild Arab family which had grown up round Jacob he was the only one whose personal qualities in any way fitted him for so rich a possession. The discord, the license, the sensuality, and the cruelty which so disfigured the sons of Jacob, were but a reflection of what might have been seen in all the common life of the world around them in still darker colours. No doubt it was a great falling back towards heathendom when it is compared with the family life of Abraham and of Isaac. This was the inevitable consequence of that great curse of Jacob's life, the marriage with Leah palmed on him through Laban's treachery. The sons of that ill-matched union, of the rival sisters and their rival handmaids, had lost from before their eyes that true aspect of the life of the family which had shown so fair in Isaac's tent. To Joseph only was it shown in that strong transferred affection which almost made his dead mother stand as though still alive before him. To him that old man was ever in his tender love as well mother as father. This of itself tended not a little to elevate and purify the young heart of the motherless son. Beyond this, the father's love evidently succeeded in stamping upon the boy the impress of his own spiritual life. The distinguishing feature of Jacob's religious character was his enduring sense of God's perpetual presence with him. The lesson of the heavenly ladder dwelt ever in his heart. This stole early into Joseph's inmost spirit with the accesses of his father's love, and we shall find it reappearing at each crisis of his life as the father's grace repeated in the son.

When at seventeen years old he is suffered to leave that father's side, and begin his own life-work of tending the flocks on the low plains or wild uplands of Canaan, it is with the sons of Zilpah and of Bilhah that he is sent, as being the nearest to himself in age.

But his moral sense is already above theirs ; God's presence makes their youthful sins intolerable to him, and he brings unto his father the report of their evil doings. Such a course was of itself sufficient to stir up against him the angry passions of such brothers as were at this time the sons of Jacob. Their father's conduct increased the evil. His fondness for Joseph broke out into irritating manifestations of partiality. Whilst they were habited in the ordinary dress of Arab shepherds, for the favourite son was provided the long-sleeved tunic, which in that eastern land belonged to superior rank ; and all Jacob's conduct manifested the same peculiar and distinguishing affection.

All these angry feelings were exasperated by Joseph repeating to them two dreams which he had dreamed. In the first of these, as they bound sheaves together in the field their sheaves gathered round and did obeisance unto him ; in the second the sun and the moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to him. The first of these seemed to foretell that he should be the chiefest of all the family, and that all his brethren should bow down to him. This moved their indignation greatly ; and their wrath knew no bounds when this dream was followed by the second, both because, according to the notions of those days, its repetition of the leading idea marked the fulfilment of the first as certain, and also because it added the new prediction that his father and his mother would unite with his brethren in doing homage to him. Even the loving heart of Jacob was stirred by this, and he reprov'd with some sharpness what seemed to him the ambitious imaginations of his favourite son. The father's words seem to imply that he felt it as some indignity to that memory of the dead mother which as a sacred lamp within a sepulchre burned evermore in his widowed heart ; and though he could not but "observe the saying," yet he rebuked the dreamer. The brethren saw in it the fulfilment of all the fears which their father's over-partiality, and especially the gift of the vest of honour, had aroused in them. They knew, doubtless, the story of the birthright stolen through Rebekah's craft from the first-born of the last generation : and that craft was still being punished in the hard thoughts which now rose in their minds against both their father and their brother. He who had consented to violate the rights of his own elder brother might easily, they thought, be led to break through the same rights again in another generation to gratify his partial fondness for the son of his old age. So with a new and an embittered aversion "they hated Joseph yet the more for his dreams and for his words."

But what shall we say of the dreams themselves, and of Joseph's conduct with regard to them? Are we to take them as direct revelations, as one of those visions from God which have, we know, ere now fallen upon his servants, and ordered and guided their way? It is not said so in Holy Writ, and there is no such declaration as that God appeared unto Joseph in a dream. We are left, therefore, to gather from the context what their character was ; and we cannot settle this without having some idea concerning all dreams ; and not concerning dreams only, but concerning those waking visions which visit our own minds and the minds of others ; which seem bred of no suggestion from the immediate present, but arise in them spectre-like and unbidden,—the clear air fashioning itself into strange forms, and the heart's silence breaking into words which to the inner consciousness seem almost articulate.

Whence come these, and what are they? Are they the mere reachings forth of our own spirit ; prophecies of the future because they are the utterances of our own present capacities and deepest longings ; unborn acts, stirring in the womb of the imagination, and waiting their time of birth? Or are they often more than this? Are they purposes and desires of good or of evil which have been wakened up by the sweeping over the waters of our soul of the breath of the unseen enemy, or of the gusts bred of past passions ; or, on the other hand, by the sweet, healing, and enlightening presence of that blessed Spirit which bloweth where it listeth? Who can read the secret of these hidden influences? Who can separate the voice of his own inner being, as original creation framed it, and as past life has moulded it, from the stirring of its sleeping chords, by the sweep over them of these invisible airs?

Here, then, we may come to some clearer idea of the true character of the dreams of Joseph. All those mighty gifts of government which his after life developed, were even now lying seed-like and half fashioned within his soul. Over that soul swept the Spirit of his father's God, ripening for perfection, and half awakening these dormant faculties ; and as they were thus stirred, the busy, creative imagination caught their shapes and consequences, and cast them in their coming colours upon the receptive half-consciousness of the soul in sleep. To this half-natural fore-reaching of his spirit, the higher Spirit, we may well believe, added for him, whose after life would so greatly need such supports, a clearness of perception not its own, and which, if it was not directly prophetic, savoured of prophecy.

Whilst, then, we must not class the dreams of Joseph with those visions of Daniel, in which the strong and direct breath of the Divine Spirit swept before his sleeping eyes the course of dynasties and empires and ages; nor separate them altogether from the inborn prophecies wherewith great minds forecast their own future; neither can we altogether deny to them the character of being inspirations from the Spirit of God. Only, in so accounting of them, let us duly realise the truth that such a view ought not, in our estimate, so much to divorce the supernatural from Joseph's life as to wed it to our own; that it ought to enable us better to comprehend the unity which exists between the patriarchal dispensation and the Christian; to see how that which afterwards for a stiff-necked generation was fixed and almost congealed into the Urim and the Thummim, floated for those earlier saints, and floats for us, an ever-present, impalpable, but most real Power, round about our bed and our path, acting according to its own spiritual laws upon our own inmost and essential spirits. Have we not ourselves known young hearts which seem so to have been visited? The youth of after greatness not rarely has upon it some mark of such a presence. The lad is incomprehensible to his fellows. The frivolous, the sensual, the hollow, the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, feel his very presence to be the sending up of their evil report to the Great Father. They would that he were like themselves. "Mad" they call him in our schools and colleges; for he lives apart from full companionship with others. If every now and then he joins with a spasmodic earnestness in their games and recreations, for the most part he keeps aloof from them; is full of speculation; wanders objectless over the playground, wondering within himself at the life that is stirring in his breast,—wondering whether it so stirs in others; trying to track its laws; dreaming of its development, until the sun, the moon, and the eleven stars, seem to do obeisance to him in some unknown future which spreads out mist-like before him.

Such, then, we may apprehend the dreams of Joseph to have been. His ready divulgence of them agrees exactly with this view. His own soul was full of them; he craved for sympathy. They prefigured he knew not exactly what. He hardly realised in the vista they opened to his eyes, that his elevation was, to a certain extent, the subjection of the rest; and so, with none of the pettiness of vanity, and very little of the chastening of prudence, he told them openly, and thus aggravated his brethren's hatred, and drew upon himself what was harder yet to bear—the blighting frost of his father's displeasure, nipping the tender buds of his yet half-formed anticipations.

Neither he nor his father could fathom the depths of his brothers' hatred. In no portion of his life had Jacob been tempted to it, and the loving spirit of his old age knew nothing of such darkness. And so, when the brethren had been some time away feeding their flocks upon the as yet unappropriated plains and uplands, the father fearlessly sends his darling to inquire after their welfare; and Joseph, unconscious of the deep grudge he had engendered, undertakes with ready dutifulness the distant mission. He goes first from Hebron to Shechem, seeking them. They were not there. He learns from a wayfarer, as he wanders about searching for them, the direction of their track, and follows them on, some twelve miles north of Samaria, nigh to Dothan. He comes upon them with all the freedom and affection of a brother's heart. But it is only to waken up, by his very aspect, from malicious lips, the evil greeting, "Behold, this dreamer cometh." Then when they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, awoke the sinful consultation: "They conspired against him to slay him." There were, indeed, as is the wont of such companies, various degrees of wickedness amongst its members. There were there men in whose tents the "instruments of cruelty" were ready. There were also the sensual softness of Reuben and Judah's uncertainty of purpose, as well as the ruder violence of more hardened offenders, who would at once "slay him and cast him into some pit, and say some evil beast hath devoured him, and we shall see what will become of his dreams" (Gen. xxxvii. 20). Reuben's counsel to "shed no blood" succeeds, and so they seize him, tear from him the hated vest of honour, cast him into a dry pit, and sit down to eat bread. As they make their meal, the huge forms of the "ships of the desert," the camels of the merchant's caravan, rise on their sight. A caravan of Ishmaelites is journeying from Gilead through the plain of Dothan to join the great track which passed from Canaan by Gaza into Egypt. At once the uncertain mind of Judah, trembling with horror at the thought of the great sin of leaving Joseph to perish in the pit, and yet not brave enough to propose his absolute release, seizes on the thought of a safe compromise, and proposes to sell him to the merchants of Midian. In Reuben's absence, who had intended privily to release the lad, the sale is effected. The merchants pay for him the usual price, and carry him away. When Reuben, on his return, finds the pit empty and his scheme frustrated, he rent his clothes and cried, "The child is not, and I, whither shall I go?" Whether from the struggling of a natural pity, or from fear of bringing down with utter grief to the grave the grey-haired man at home, whose life he knew was bound up with the lad's life, he alone enters into all the horror of the tragedy. He does not over-rate the agony which was about to tear that loving heart.

They dip the vest of honour, with which it had been the old man's delight to clothe Joseph, in the blood of a kid, and with a triumph, which they cannot but give vent to in their very words, they send it to him with the lying message, "This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no." Too well the father knew it: too surely did it seem to him that he inherited afresh the sins of his youth, as he cried, "An evil beast hath devoured him! Joseph, no doubt, is rent in pieces." Many days he mourned, refusing to be comforted; and groaning forth, "I will go down mourning into Sheol, that dark land of shadows, where my son has passed before me."

Whilst Hebron echoes these groans of a broken heart, Joseph is carried down into Egypt, and finds a ready purchaser in Potiphar, the captain of the executioners of Pharaoh's house. His master's name, when read in the light which the study of hieroglyphics throws upon it, seems to make it clear that the town of On, devoted to the worship of "Ra," the sun, was the spot of Joseph's servitude. Here he wins at once, because "the Lord is with him," the favour and trust of his master, and is employed in an universal oversight of his concerns. The sculptures of old Egypt depict his life: there we may see the trusted servant overlooking all; entering with minute care, as a patient scribe, every part of his master's property in its daily administration; recording the grain, the fish, the linen, the mass of precious metal, which pass through his hands. Under Joseph's administration all things prospered. It was not only that his great gifts of government were used in his master's service. Beyond this, a higher power was prospering all he touched. "From the time that Poti-phar made him overseer in his house and over all that he had, the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house and in the field" (Gen. xxxix. 5). But this life of busy, honest, successful labour was not to last. His master's wife, too true to the type of old Egyptian womanhood, as every ancient chronicle depicts it, first tempts him to sin, and then, infuriated at his holy resistance to her evil will, slakes her uttermost vengeance by throwing, through a false accusation, not, as it seems, entirely believed, nor wholly disbelieved, the too faithful slave into the dungeon where the king's prisoners were bound.

How grand a display all this is of the power of a living inward sense of God's perpetual presence in ennobling the soul of man! For what condition could be more open to temptation than that of this Hebrew lad? How natural would it have been for him, when smarting under the keen sense of his brethren's perfidious cruelty, and its seeming success, to have cast away all belief in right and truth, and so to have sunk down into the despairing slough of utter godlessness and sensuality! What temptations, too, to such a course must have gathered themselves up against him in the absolute loneliness of his first Egyptian life! Home associations, the voice of love, the watching eye of tender care, the acting up to an already established character—what helps are these! and these seemed to be gone from him altogether. How noble to be the same without them, to have no lowering of the standard from the loss of all outward safeguards, no sapping of the foundations of moral responsibility from his loss, as a stranger, a foreigner, and a slave, of the elevating sense of personality, and the preserving love of character! How grand still to have, like some lustrous diamond gleaming inwardly on his lonely spirit, the talisman of the one thought—"How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God!" This thought was strong enough so to quicken his conscience, that it still connected indissolubly this broken disconnected present with that old past of his younger life, and whilst he moved amidst the new temptations of the house of the Egyptian, he still lived in thought, and love, and faith, in the old tent at Hebron, and saw the fond face of his aged father, and bowed with him anew before the God of Israel.

This was a safeguard which outward change could not touch; and in the king's dungeon, therefore, Joseph still was what he had been in the house of the captain of the executioners. Great, indeed, at first was the trial of his faith. That he escaped with his life from such an accusation implies, probably, that some doubt of his guilt crossed his master's mind. But it was hard, to bear without discontent and murmur, the dungeon and its cruelty, to have "his feet hurt with fetters, and to be laid in iron" (Ps. cv. 18), as the reward of faithfulness, chastity, and truth. In such a time the evil one was sure to whisper, "Where is thy father's God, and His remembrance of thee? Curse thy God and die." But the darker the natural gloom, the brighter shone that ever-present inward memory of the God whom he had served at Hebron. He wore the talisman on his heart, and he was safe. Moreover, besides this talisman within the shrine of his own spirit, there was with him an external guardianship which nothing could break through. How magnificent is the simplicity of its announcement!—"Joseph was there in the prison. But the Lord was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, and gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. . . . And whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. . . . because the Lord was with him, and that which he did the Lord made it to prosper" (Gen. xxxix. 31—33). How long he remained in the prison it is impossible to say with certainty. There and in the house of Potiphar together he spent thirteen years, probably the larger share of them in the prison. Thirteen years of training and perfecting; thirteen years in which the weeds of vanity and self-exaltation were being killed; in which faith and hope and tenderness for other sufferers were matured; in which was the slow ripening of the genius and the gifts of conduct which were soon to be shown forth upon so high a stage of earthly greatness.

And now, when "the word of the Lord" had indeed "tried him" (Ps. cv. 19), his time came. Two chief officers in Pharaoh's household are put in ward in the prison where Joseph was bound; and Joseph is set by the captain of the ward specially to attend on these great men. How long the attendance had lasted we know not, but it was long enough to form those kindly relations which ever grew up between Joseph and those round him. Accordingly, as he waits upon them he notices one morning their saddened countenances, and with kindly youthful sympathy he asks as to their grief. They answer that they have each dreamed a dream, and they are troubled because there in the dungeon they can consult no interpreter to tell them the meaning of the visions. The Hebrew captive's answer soars at once into a higher sphere—"Do not interpretations belong to God?" "May not He" (he suggests), "the mighty Elohim, send you an answer even by my lips? Tell me the dreams."

The chief of the cup-bearers tells his dream of restoration to royal favour, the master of the household his dream of coming doom; and both are fulfilled within three days, on the birthday of the Pharaoh. Joseph's entreaty to the chief officer of the cup-bearers, and the promise it had won of his making mention to Pharaoh of the unrighteous keeping of the Hebrew youth in the dungeon, are both forgotten in the ecstatic joy of the cup-bearer on his restoration to liberty and power, and so two full years pass on with their weary length, and Joseph, now thirty years of age, and still in prison, has spent thirteen since he was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews. But now the days of these sorrows were numbered. Pharaoh's two dreams, and his sore trouble at finding no interpreter, bring back to the remembrance of the chief of the cup-bearers the Hebrew slave of the captain of the executioners, and his true reading of the two dreams which had been told him in the prison. From him Pharaoh hears of Joseph, and snatching eagerly at the hope so strangely offered him of obtaining an interpreter, he sends for Joseph from the ward. With such hasty preparation as was possible, the young Hebrew stands before the dreaded throne of Egypt, whether, as seems not impossible, the great Sesostris, or before a monarch of another of the ancient dynasties of Egypt, it mattered little then to him. His life was in his hand; nor easier or more lightly might a man cast a cup of water on the ground, than might that life be thrown away by one frown of the despotic king. Yet unawed and untrembling the youth stands up before the king, because the hidden strength was his. "I have heard say of thee," begins the eager monarch, "that thou canst understand a dream to interpret it." "It is not in me," answers Joseph; "God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace. God," he boldly declared, "God hath showed Pharaoh what He is about to do," and he reads plainly out to him the riddle of the night's visions. The seven coming years of plenty and the seven following years of famine are declared, and the policy of Pharaoh is marked out for him with an unfaltering tongue.

own dreams suggested, whence was this insight he possessed into these four visions, and to what did it amount? Again it must be said that it is nowhere written of Joseph as it is of Daniel, "God made Daniel to understand all visions and dreams" (Dan. i. 17); and though Joseph with a natural piety attributes all his power to the "Elohim," and though Pharaoh so receives it, and justifies to his courtiers the promotion of Joseph to the highest place by the fact that the Spirit of God is in him; yet neither do Joseph's words, nor does the effect on Pharaoh indicate that direct revelation of Jehovah's power, which in the case of Daniel bowed down the proud heart of Nebuchadnezzar to the wonderful acknowledgment, "Your God is a God of gods and the Lord of lords." Narrow indeed, perhaps almost imperceptible, are the barriers which divide the direct illumination vouchsafed by the Revealer of secrets to Daniel from the more ordinary enlightenment given to the holy, thoughtful son of Jacob; and it is well to note how the one passes into the other; as bringing common life more nearly into that august presence with which the heavens are bright, and so adding to it a sacredness and wonder which some would look upon as withheld from ordinary men, and fenced off within the mystic bounds of immediate inspiration.

Looking thus at the record of Genesis, may we not see that God who gave all to Joseph gave him, by means which we call natural, however unusually quickened, the intuition to read what would have been illegible to a shallower or less observant or less enlightened mind? His natural gifts had enabled him to gather first from his communion with the state prisoners whom he tended the probable restoration of the one, the probable execution of the other; to know that the birthday festival would almost necessarily bring to its final issue the fortune of each of these great court officials, and so, when the dream of each presented to his eye in airy imagery the shadow of the coming crisis, the heavenly light fell upon its folds, and he was enabled to read it out with an unfaltering clearness. Pharaoh's dreams themselves, though they rise higher out of the region of simple naturalness in their conception, possessed the same natural tendency to self-explanation when scanned by one who evermore associated his thought of God with the events and destinies of national life, who had learned to understand the great truth that the God of Abraham was the Lord of all, ruling as much over the court of Egypt as in the tent of Hebron. Every field would set before him the thin ears or the fruitful: every reedy pasture by the river bank, that natural image of the whole power of Egypt, the lean kine or the fat, and the cherished secret of God's holy sovereignty might link for him the coming event with the prefiguring image. As the counsel founded on the interpretation, so the interpretation itself, was full of natural insight, though quickened doubtless by the powers of a higher light. Joseph's life was full of God, and so the light of God poured into it; the sinner's life is the shutting out of God, and so his understanding becomes darkened.

With this special gift of insight the long trial of the faithful man passed away, and now dawned the day for which he had so long been trained. The Hebrew slave, yesterday a prisoner in the dungeon, by a change of fortune familiar to Orientals, is to-day Grand Vizier of Egypt, and next only to Pharaoh, its supreme autocrat. In true Eastern fashion, Pharaoh took off his ring (the mystic signet) from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck, and they cried before him, "Bow the knee." Further, he united him, by a marriage with the daughter of the prince-priest of On, to the aristocracy of Egypt. In the name which Joseph gave to her, and in the names of the two sons she bore to him, Joseph testified his resolution, even in that far land, to bind up his family life with the race of Abraham, whilst they speak of his grateful sense of God's care of him in teaching him to forget his sorrows, and in making him fruitful in the land of his captivity.

And now all his gifts of government are drawn forth into action. He goes during the years of plenty through the land, and stores up with careful industry the fruits of the earth whilst it brought forth by handfuls. Then came the years of dearth. Egypt has always been liable to famine. A time of drought at once produced it; and as she was the storehouse of the neighbouring peoples when the same cause exhausted their supplies, they turned to her for help. So it was now. And Joseph, with a wise liberality, opened his stores for them, as well as for Egypt. He would enrich with foreign trade the land which had adopted him, whilst at home he used the opportunity to change and equalise—retaining only the exemptions of the priestly class—the taxation of Egypt.

But wider consequences were to follow from these years of famine. By Him who in His mysterious sovereignty brings His counsels to pass through the natural acting of secondary causes, they were meant to bring down Jacob and his family to Egypt, and so prevent that mixture of the chosen family with the Canaanitish blood, which would have been inevitable if for these early centuries they had remained within the land of promise. Already Judah had mingled the holy seed with the evil race; and had they not been walled in within the land of Goshen, the separation of the race from whom Messiah was to spring would have been impossible. Fulfilling therefore, without knowing it, the counsels of the Highest, the sons of Jacob came down to purchase corn in Egypt. They present themselves before their brother, but they know him not. More than twenty years had stamped their deep impress of sorrow and of joy on the face once in its youthful beauty so familiar to them. In dress, in language, and in manners he was now an Egyptian. The dreams of his youth in the land of Canaan are fulfilled as they bow before him. He witnesses the late awaking of their long-slumbering consciences, he hears their mutual upbraidings; yet still, even to himself, the old imposture is repeated. They tell him, with ambiguous utterance, that "one is not," and yet more plainly still "his brother is dead." The long pent-up affections of his soul are ever ready to break forth as he probes that he may heal their hearts. At length the victory is won. Benjamin is with them, and is guarded by them with all the jealous tenderness of a father's care. Then at last he makes himself known to them, and sends for the old man from Canaan, that he may himself be the stay of those last years, which, after their long sadness, blossomed out again now that the company of Rachel's son seemed to bring her presence back.

What that summons was to Jacob no words can tell save those which broke forth from that long-suffering heart: "It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive; I will go and see him before I die" (Gen. xlv. 28). Then followed the cheering vision at Beer-sheba, the "Fear not to go down into Egypt. . . . I will go down with thee; and I will also surely bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes." Safe in that companionship, the old man travelled down to Egypt, and when he came to Goshen the chariot of the Grand Vizier met the cavalcade. If there had been in Joseph's early aspirations something too much of a sense of personal greatness, it was gone now; there was no boast on his side, no rebuking on his father's. "He presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while. And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive" (Gen. xlv. 29, 30). Seventeen years longer that life lasted, and Joseph's figure is seen yet again amidst its last shadows upholding and blessed by the departing patriarch. Then he leads the great company, the chariots and horsemen, the servants of Pharaoh, and the elders of the land of Egypt, who go up with him and with his brethren to bury his father, according to his oath, in the cave of the field of Machpelah, "which Abraham bought with the field, for a possession of a burying-place, of Ephron the Hittite before Mamre."

One more most significant outcoming of the spirit of Joseph yet remains. When the family of Israel had returned to Egypt, to live under the shadow of Joseph, his brethren, whose narrow hearts could not measure the greatness of his love, feared for themselves that the day of long-delayed vengeance might at last be come. "Joseph will hate us," groaned their evil misgiving hearts, "and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him." So they feigned a dying message of their departed father, praying Joseph to forgive them. The distrust grieved him to the heart, and he wept when they spake unto him. Had he not of old bid them "not to be angry with themselves that they had sold him hither, for God did send me to preserve life;" and had he ceased to see in all that had happened to him the hand of God? "Fear not," he said, with a sobbing voice, "fear not: for am I in the place of God? Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good. . . . Fear not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them" (Gen. l. 21).

With such deeds of love his history ends. And so he too passes out of sight, living until he was an hundred and ten years old, seeing Ephraim's children of the third generation, and taking an oath of the children of Israel, "God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry my bones from hence." So he died strong in the hope of Israel; bound to it by the ever-during bond of faith; to rise with it at the trumpet's sound from the field of Mamre, though, after the manner of the heathen, "they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt" (Gen. l. 26). His death was like his life—hidden with God; Egyptian in appearance, Hebrew indeed; accomplished in the town of On, amidst pagan dedications to the sun, but tending to the burying-place of Abraham and the resurrection of the heir of all things.

Such was Joseph : the link between the wandering patriarch and the lawgiver of nations ; touching on the one side the Bedouin fathers of his race, and on the other the kings and mighty princes of the house of Ephraim. He was one who was, like all great men, far in advance of his age ; as a ruler of men ; as a financier ; as combining together an unswerving loyalty to Jehovah with a righteous forbearance towards the debased forms of worship which he found and could not alter in the land which had adopted him ; in being capable of being at once an Egyptian patriot and a Hebrew hero. In all these relations he was long before his age. The old patriarchal character broadens out into the politician and the governor of man. Of no other character preserved in all the ancient sacred record is so much told and nothing to his blame. As we dwell upon his life, it is a Christian character which opens on us. Its breadth, its purity, its justice, its forgiveness of injury, its recognising Abraham's God as the Father of all—this from first to last is eminently Christian, whilst all is based upon the ever-present sense of God's nearness to him. The motto of the whole life may be found in his simple description of himself—"For I fear God !"

Once more : his life and his character are encased with the deep lines of typical prophecy. As the true brother condemned and cast out by his own, and saving them through the sacrifice of himself ; and then as lifted up from the dungeon to the throne ; the son of Israel prophesied in act and in character of the great Hope of Israel. As the captive, oppressed, persecuted, and cast into the dungeon, as revealing in it the will of God, as subduing from it the hearts of men, as inheriting the riches, the learning, and the power of the Egyptians, as ruling by the indwelling Spirit of the Lord, where he had served in the prison as a slave, there are marked upon this history the chiefest lineaments of the Church of Christ, rising from her uttermost persecutions, interpreting the will of God, inheriting the riches of the Gentiles, lifted up from the dung-hill to be set amongst the princes, yea, amongst the highest princes of the people. Joseph in the pit and in the prison is the Church in the wilderness ; Joseph reigning over Egypt the Church triumphant. For known unto God are all his ways from the beginning of the world.

An English Story of To-day.

CHAPTER XXIII.—PHOEBE MAKES HER DÉBÛT.

company were at dinner. In order to keep her in countenance at tea, Miss Thorpe left her place of honour at the first hall table, and repaired to Lady Dorothea's room.

Phoebe had time to feel daunted and depressed by the solemn mystery in which Miss Thorpe thought it her duty to veil the most trivial affairs of the family, and by the overpowering dignity and decorum of the lady. So much was this the case that a terror and shyness such as she never felt in this room before came over her, culminating in a lively wish to be at home again, and, at the same time, admitting a rush back of Barty Wooler's most vehement remonstrances and warnings. But it would be out of the question for her to think of running away now. Nay more, it would be selfish, when the temporary association was for a purpose, and when Lady Dorothea had put it as if Phoebe's acquiescence was an act of grace.

All these uncomfortable feelings vanished when Lady Dorothea appeared. Her Ladyship expressed her astonishment at finding Thorpe sitting up there like a crow in the mist, and caused the crow to rear her skinny neck and caw in indignant defence of her conduct. Lady Dorothea came to herself immediately, and was grave and humble in extenuation of her hasty inference, thus declaring her satisfaction with Thorpe for her attentions to Miss Paston.

"Thorpe is so easily affronted, except with mamma," her Ladyship went on to explain, the moment the girls were left to themselves. "And do you know, that is a weakness of valuable servants? Mrs. Bald shares it, but I think the men are more reasonable. And now, Phœbe, it is so good of you to come, and you must pardon me for having kept you waiting so long."

"Oh, don't speak of it," urged Phœbe, the colour mounting to her cheek.

"You are always very kind and indulgent, Phœbe. The fact is, I kept looking at mamma, who was fixed by her trumpet to old Mr. Hammond, and could not move from her own table. However, we have made the great adjournment at last, and the hanging committee of the women are already in the gallery, where if you will come with me I shall settle you comfortably before the men come in, and then none of them need be named to you, except those you like, and Wriothsley and I like. Lord Fairchester, of course, and a picked man or two, you must speak to; but you will not be troubled with noticing the rest. Now, will that do, Phœbe?"

Phœbe thought it would do excellently, and was almost recompensed for her regrets by seeing how balsam-bright Lady Dorothea looked in her light evening-dress, with clusters of autumn berries in her loosened hair, and her opal and diamond clasps, half hidden in the unobtrusive details of her dress, flashing finely when one's eye hit on them.

The women in the Beauty corner of the gallery faithfully followed Lady Dorothea's cue. They received Phœbe each more graciously than the other,—Miss Dugdale, who was in satin and pearls, as if she were representing a bride, most graciously of all. To such an extent indeed did her graciousness go, that it became ungracious in commiserating Phœbe for having had to come all the way from Wellfield by herself. But Lady Dorothea put that down with quick emphasis.

"Of course, Chetwynd, my friend Miss Paston did not walk here, and the drive really does not call for condolence."

Miss Dugdale gave her snowy shoulders

the least little jerk, and then did something like looking Phœbe over with one glance of her slate-coloured eyes, before falling asleep over the contemplation of her bouquet, as Lord Dacre had set her the example of doing over his claret in the dining-room. Phœbe on her side remarked, that Miss Dugdale's speech, carefully and artificially masked and minced as it was, afforded an indication of the sluggish thickness which clung to the tongues of the Dugdales.

The two Miss Hammonds were not resident at Brockcotes, but came from the next country-house. They were highly respectable versions of their solid, gruff father. The Wellfield public were accustomed to look at them as they bowled along in the paternal carriage, year after year. Phœbe had nothing to expect from them but blunt graciousness. They would no more have been guilty of patronising her than of insulting her.

Lady Penelope and Lady Louisa would have taken Phœbe in their arms, and sworn an eternal friendship to her on the spot, although they might cut her dead to-morrow. But Phœbe would not be taken into anybody's arms without her own consent,—a peculiarity which made the Ladies Blount look at her, and remember her a little longer than they might otherwise have done. Yet it was hard work to keep off Lady Louisa, who was as impervious to repulses as the most pushing member of a mob.

The ladies were engaged in criticising the chosen pictures. The Rose of Raby had been found to have one eye lower in the cheek than the other. Lady Rich wore watchet blue, a shade of colour which could not now be had for love or money; and Venetia Lady Digby had an ivory rose miniature on her breast, doubtless one of the Olivier miniatures, but there was not one like it to be found at Brockcotes.

Lady Dorothea had ordered chests to be carried in from the wardrobe room; and faded, falling-to-pieces tunics, wimples, surcoats, and sacques littered the floor. Miss Dugdale suggested softly that old clothes smelt mustily, and elevated the sharp tip of her nose as she spoke. Lady Penelope and her sister tripped here and there among the heap with disparaging rapidity. Lady Dorothea was disposed to dwell fondly on every article, and record the history of its probable owner. As for Phœbe Paston, she wished the accumulation out of sight. She thought the ancient dresses, with their shadowy, serious memories, put the idle play to shame. It was still more so with the pieces of armour which had been lugged from the armoury, bearing dints on the cuirasses and the steel helmets, and splashes of rust on the arm and thigh pieces. Phœbe would rather have made up dresses and Don Quixote armour than mock the old relics of human worth and suffering by using them in a travesty of her father's trade.

No business was done till the gentlemen came. Lord Wriothesley greeted Phœbe with the empressment of a man who has secured a desirable partner, and with the consideration due to a woman who had put herself out of her way to oblige him and his party. Mr. Paston (who had been dining at Brockcotes) and Frank Hall followed, supporting Phœbe, so that she could now summon courage to inspect the rest of the men. Lord Fairchester, who was to be presented to her forthwith, and do his best to recommend himself to his future wife's dear friend, certainly looked quite above caring whether she were of high or low degree. Mr. Edmund Blount, though he was of set purpose not named to her, spoke to her before the evening was over, and called her "a deuced proud little thing" ere the tableaux were brought to an end. He had no part in the representations, and could hardly have had a part, unless he had gone in for a hulking black sheep of high rank. He was there with the futile intention of being kept from getting into mischief.

Lord Dacre answered to the description of one of the great Dukes of Devonshire. He was handsomely credited to be a man of considerable attainments, and a very decent scholar, if he would only exert himself to let it out. It might be true that undreamt-of reserves of wisdom and accomplishments lay in this large-limbed, light-haired, light-eyed man of thirty, whose chin was constantly sunk in his white choker; but he never showed it, except, as Phœbe learnt long afterwards, when Aunt Sally happened to be resuscitated in the course of conversation. Lord Dacre had been one of the gentlemen who had introduced Aunt Sally to fresh fields and aristocratic pastures, stood sponsor for her, and backed her to any amount. Smouldering flames of resentment still woke up in him when the expulsion of the jaunty old woman, and the substitution of her commonplace rival, croquet, were spoken of. Once, during the exigencies of the tableaux, Phœbe and Lord Dacre were mentioned to each other, but she was persuaded that he was half asleep at the time, and that his bow was as much a nod in honour of Somnus as of her. She was therefore amazed to have him bow to her the next time she met him galloping up Wellfield

High Street, with no one to remind him of their introduction, unless his groom received intimation of his master's acquaintances, and put him through his paces in them as in horsemanship. After lengthened meditation on the subject, Phoebe came to the conclusion that Lord Dacre was a gentleman whether asleep or awake.

Mr. Bertie was introduced to her, and Mr. Vernon was not. But Phœbe was certain that this was accidental, for she could not then, or at any future time, discover a pin's point of difference between the two beyond what belonged strictly to the outward man. They were both about the age of Lord Wriothlesley, both in the army, both had yachts and hunters, to which they alluded frequently, and both belonged to the Carlton. They had each gone through all of Europe that was worth seeing, and it struck Phœbe that their tours were precisely masculine editions of those of Lady Dorothea, Ladies Penelope and Louisa, and Miss Dugdale. Phœbe was led to understand that both men were eligible, in being eldest sons of men of property. The two were also alike in haunting Miss Dugdale, in fetching and carrying for her, and in fighting a hard battle to avoid Lady Penelope and Lady Louisa, to either of whom Lord Dacre fell an easy victim. It was a point of some importance, as respects the personal identity of the two men, that Mr. Bertie made faces. With regard to this practice, Phœbe caught an incautious whisper of Lady Louisa's, that Bob Bertie was still unable to resist mowing, and that they had better look out for his falling down among them in one of his epileptic attacks. Phœbe had no doubt that both of the young men were mirrors of that fashion which is so high that it does not look fashion at all, but merely "the thing" on this and on every other occasion. But after all, she suspected she would soon have tired of these perfectly cut heads of hair; of the morning's delicate grey and picturesque brown, or the evening's quiet elegance of black and white, with a single scarlet camellia in the button-hole, and exquisite grotesque vagaries in gold and mosaic by way of studs; and would have been tempted to prefer rough and racy Mr. and Mrs. Edgecumbe as lodgers in Woovers' Alley. The young men were not sluggards like Lord Dacre, nor vicious fools like Mr. Edmund Blount. They might be heroes to their valets, and to more than their valets. They were not without the air of being heroes to Miss Dugdale when she was not otherwise engaged. But, on the face of it, they were too inferior to Lord Wriothlesley to make any but the lightest impression on an intelligent girl.

Lady Dorothea had said no time was to be lost, and Mr. Paston was ready to bestow on the players a little of his hard-earned leisure and valuable advice. The pictures were here patiently waiting. The old dresses were at hand for models of costume. Thorpe stood saturnine, snuffing the air in her silk and lace. Thorpie was officious and saucy, to the despair of her worthy relative. But the first step to business was Lord Dacre's retiring to a corner of the most comfortable and distant couch. Miss Dugdale had in the meantime given herself up to the study of Lady Exmoor's dog Rogero, as shown in all its points by Mr. Bertie and Mr. Vernon for her entertainment. Lady Louisa was insisting on practising Gretchen's wayward heart-broken snatch of "There was a King in Thule," to the accompaniment of a cracked old spinet, contemporary with the late Beauties, and deposited as a fitting adjunct in that corner of the gallery. Lady Penelope was squabbling with Mr. Edmund. Even Lord Exmoor was showing Mr. Paston over the pictures which the painter had seen hundreds of times before, and Lord Wriothlesley and Frank Hall had drawn aside to discuss a paper on logarithms, which had been communicated to the Royal Society, and the substance of which had been propounded by the last six senior wranglers. None but Phœbe and Lord Fairchester remained staunch to their leader, and at her orders.

"Did you ever see a flock of sheep, or of geese, Phœbe?" demanded Lady Dorothea, wrathfully. "We want mamma to be bell-wether; but Lady Lucy Ingram is just going, and Mrs. Hammond, you see, has recalled the Miss Hammonds, so we shall get rid of papa, too, for he must see them off."

Lady Dorothea, although she had nobody but herself to depend upon, did not fail in some of the attributes of a great little generalissimo. She resorted to a coup d'état, and recalled some of her troop by promptly dismissing Mr. Paston, or rather by accepting his presumed resignation of office.

"I shall not keep you longer, sir, a witness to our trifling with our duties. I see you must have about as agreeable feelings as Michael Angelo had, when he made the snow-man for the Florentine Grand Duke; and Michael had the advantage that he was allowed to make the man himself, not compelled to suffer the frittering away of his time and talent by others. If you please, Mr. Paston, you will do us the honour to come back when we are in earnest, and have found our level; and point out such of our faults as can be amended, half-an-hour before the public representation of the tableaux. You will only mortify yourself, and those of us who are capable of feeling shame, by wasting your attention upon a set of butterflies."

Mr. Paston was glad to be relieved from a position which he felt was in danger of becoming a false one; and Phœbe was glad for his sake, although his withdrawal threw her more on the guardianship of Frank Hall. The departure of the professional man who had been called in to preside over their deliberations bore so ominous a resemblance to a relinquishment of the scheme, that every one who had any interest in its fulfilment at once threw aside his or her affectation of indifference and reluctance, and rushed into action.

CHAPTER XXIV.—THE TABLEUX VIVANTS.

LADY DOROTHEA'S tableau was first in order. Far from being caught tripping herself, she had found time to study a copy of the Harleian MS. By the aid of specimens of mediæval costumes, she had managed to get constructed an individual example; and she did not stick even at the horned head-dress of which she had spoken to Phœbe. For the behoof of her partner, she had made an incursion into the armoury, and had got transferred from it in a twinkling an inlaid, stiff corslet and morion, which might have been in the wars of Richard of York's father and the redoubted Black Prince.

This was a good beginning. But when Lady Dorothea stood up, in perfect gravity, her low little head surmounted by the grotesque triple horns, like the horns in a vision of ancient prophecy, adding at least three feet to her stature, but taking away every tittle of its grave propriety, the effect was so irresistibly ludicrous, that even Lord Fairchester and Phœbe could not resist joining in the laughter which greeted the extraordinary spectacle.

Lady Dorothea was neither angry nor abashed, but simply annoyed.

"What do you mean, good people? I assure you the head-dress is historically correct; I measured the inches, and verified the measurement. Our ancestresses wore such head-dresses; I should not think the world laughed openly at them. Pray compose yourselves; for if you forget your manners, what am I to expect from the general public?"

"Oh, Lady Dorothea! you can never appear before all the race-company in that absurd guise," urged a chorus of voices.

"Why not?" asked Lady Dorothea, still more surprised. "I tell you the head-dress will be the most accurate and suggestive in the room; and the greater reasonableness of present fashions, in spite of crinoline, must strike every one. Of course, I shall wear it, and become it, too, I hope."

Here Lady Dorothea composedly resumed the nodding horns, but only to call forth fresh bursts of laughter, at which she at last looked round, disturbed and reproachful, the rather that she found the most ringing peals came from Phœbe and Lord Fairchester.

"I tell you, Dolly," declared Lord Wriothesley, recovering his breath and wiping his eyes, "that we shall die of these horns if you wag them at us in that way. What is worse, Wellfield will be unable, if it is human, to keep from following our example."

With some difficulty, Lady Dorothea was persuaded to resign the horns for a hood of the fourteenth century. Like all really high-bred natures, she was sweet-tempered; but she continued to regret, privately, the substitution of the vague hood for the horned head-dress, and of pasteboard imitation for the true armour, as being subversive of what she was pleased to consider the instructive authenticity of the spectacle.

"Did you ever notice this defect in Lady Dorothea's composition, that the sense of humour is absent? Now don't feel affronted, and flash up at this; for so it is, and you know it is my own sister I am speaking of," observed Lord Wriothesley, sotto voce, to Phœbe, who could not resent the criticism, simply because it was his own sister he was speaking of.

Moreover, it was a "true truth" which he was subtly presenting, though the subject of it was "good, and wise, and fair."

The original armour could not have been worn for half-an-hour by the players, so much had men and times altered. Yet when Lord Wriothesley took up a casque and tried it on, Phœbe was struck by the knightly character of the studious, speculative face, and could not but think of the amount of noble manhood which must lurk in the delicate stripling's features, to be thus brought out by the iron shell and its hard frame.

No hitch occurred in any of the other tableaux that were passed in review that evening. To those who knew the parties, it could not be called a hitch, that Lady Penelope would shine as Stella in a bouncing fashion. She would take no advice, and would consult no authority; but, after consenting to her marvellous, humble-bee's contrast of yellow and black in hair and complexion, would appear with or without a ruff, with or without a lute, as suited her. Her complacent, apathetic Mountjoy personated the blustering soldier by lazily twirling his young bird's-fluff of moustache, and doing in rotation according to everybody's directions. Obedience was so much easier than resistance, when resistance was not worth the trouble.

Miss Dugdale always looked lovely, and brought down plaudits. Yet there was nothing of Venetia Lady Rigby about her except the pearl-drop at her swan's throat, and her dark hair laced, looped, and coroneted with pearls. The incongruity, however, did not raise more than one or two secret dissentient voices against her sovereignty. It seemed taken as a matter of course that she should angle greedily for men's award of her superiority—that she should glance around her with incessant slyness to claim her tribute—that she should clutch each coin, great and small, and not suffer a penny to pass to another queen, whether the ratepayer were her proposed bridegroom, Lord Wriothlesley, or the ugly pressman, Mr. Hall. Failing others, Miss Dugdale would have sought the admiration of grooms and ploughboys. And therein lurked a deadly danger for her. If one of the lowest of men should refuse to acknowledge her claims, it was on the books that she might make a wicked travesty of the parable, and sell all she had to buy that one man. It was not so much passion, as a craving and madness of vanity, half veiled and hidden as yet, but surer than pride of coming before a fall. Every Dugdale of her branch who had possessed it—and this was the case with one-seventh of the men and three-fifths of the women—had fallen from their high estate down to earthly perdition. Lady Dorothea could have told this, only she was particularly tender of the black sheep of her class. She was so infatuated, indeed, that she would have risked her only brother, the jewel of her house, on the tremendous venture of allying himself with one who might otherwise prove a miserable, defiled, and defiling black sheep.

Frank Hall, being plebeian at heart, notwithstanding his improved practice in dining out and cultivating the rising statesmen and men of power, spoke his mind plainly in the ear of his cousin Phœbe as to Miss Dugdale.

"Vanity, thy name is woman," he said; "but here it isn't pure and simple vanity alone, but a Cleopatra mania for conquest in a creature who speaks with the voice of Cordelia. She is morally false, Phœbe; and what do you take to be her value, when

'Worth makes the man, the want of it the fellow;
The rest is all but leather and prunella?'"

"I should say Miss Dugdale of ~~Succerly~~ lies pretty well out of your way, Frank," urged Phœbe, "even although you are to match with her in the tableaux."

"That's all you know, Phœbe," he said. "She doesn't despise me or any grist to her mill. I am only a sort of quill-driver to such as she is, yet she ogles me every time she comes across me."

"Excuse me speaking plainly, Frank, but I'm afraid that comes more from your vanity than hers; though I will confess there is no dearth of that commodity in her case either."

"Come now, Phœbe, that is just rather cruel to be cousinly. I'm not a vain beast, though I am to act the Beast to her Beauty, as paunchy, porous Sir Kenelm to her Venetia, who did credit to his taste with her face, though her character, if all tales are true, was none of the best. What fools we are! I wonder Lady Dorothea does not think better of it. But she is class-blind, that little woman; and this is the speck in the sun. Still I would rather be snubbed by her than coaxed by the other. I confess, Phœbe, I never see your friend without recalling how hard it is for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven, and I regard her as working hard at her task—the young Amazon."

"Now, Frank, I call that rude. Lady Dorothea isn't a bit like a young Amazon."

"Well, perhaps that isn't just the happiest metaphor, and, to confess the truth, I'm not in a very happy vein just now; but neither is she quite like a Christian martyr. She is like a noble young English gentlewoman, I suppose, eh, Phœbe? And I, who am a painter and preserver of portraits in my own way, shall photograph her accordingly."

To this Phœbe was not disposed to take exception; and Frank embraced the opportunity to escape from his cousin's home-thrusts.

Phœbe's rehearsal of her tableau with Lord Wriothlesley had not taken place, the hour being too late. But she had seen her dainty but not incongruous dress, and was taken with it. What girl would not have been taken with a peach brocade of the stuff and tint of poor Oliver Goldsmith's coat, open at the waist, showing the petticoat of fragrantly suggestive cowslip taffetas, and, as if to complete the fruity and flowery associations, butterfly bows of sherry-coloured riband for her breast and topknots?

Phœbe felt that she would fare better than Lord Wriothlesley in the velvet coat without a neck, and the vest reaching down to meet his silk tights, which would make him as spindle-shanked as any Frenchman who had ever affected the shape of a grasshopper. It appeared as if the young lord had thought more of setting off her comely body as Molly Lepel, than of the figure he himself would cut as the wit and beau "Lord Fanny." Lord Hervey's representative was not Lord Hervey's champion, and did not keep back that "Lord Fanny" was at last described "with a painted face, and not a tooth in his head," who was lucky in only not outliving "the last inch of his character."

"What was the good of him?" the unpromising Phoebe demanded; and Lord Wriothly replied, laughing—

"Molly Lepel married him, good Princess Caroline hankered after him, and his queen trusted in him. He was a link in a chain of drawing-room and ante-chamber peers, who twisted the great world of London round their fingers. 'Hervey the handsome,' his glib tongue persuaded folks to call him, in spite of the ghastliness of his complexion and his infirmities. You must not throw dirt at so fine a hero, Miss Paston; only you can do so if you will say, See what we come to at last!"

CHAPTER XXV.—LADY LOUISA'S CONFIDENCES.

WEDNESDAY was the day on which the ladies were to beg themselves off from the races, to make their preparations. Phoebe was all this forenoon at Brockcotes, but Lady Dorothea found that she could not induce the Beauties-presumptive to work without having their partners to consult and lean upon. Every attempt at forming the tableaux languished, and no progress was made by the two Miss Thorpes and the visitors' maids except in mere stitching. Even Thorpie and the younger maids, letting evil communication corrupt good manners, danced here and there, and would not settle down to work. Now, they were seeking Mr. Clarges' nephew to open the refractory lid of this chest for them, and anon Mr. Finlay's first under-gardener to seek old-fashioned flowers such as were set down in Lady Dorothea's list for the bouquets.

In the entire absence of her natural prey, Miss Dugdale's conduct gave signs, that if she had lived in a happy Rasselasian valley, she might have taken to her own sex, instead of largely overlooking them. She would have quickly discovered satellites and slaves, masters and tyrants, among them also, and have proceeded to woo them as assiduously as she wooed their brethren. But Phoebe Paston was excepted from her fascinations. Chetwynd Dugdale, bright-coloured and honey-tongued, glancing out of the corners of her jetty-lashed, slate-coloured eyes, had a decided objection to Phoebe Paston—only an artist's daughter—quite a humble friend of that polished steel steam-engine, Lady Dorothea. On this dull women's day at Brockcotes, Miss Dugdale showed her objection to Phoebe by an engrossing consideration of billiards and operas. In her slow, low way—all the more impressive that it was slow and low—she sung the praises of billiards, rung the changes on billiards, and exalted the importance of billiards, until the game stood even higher than the meet and the hunting-field as the shibboleth of a class, with whom not to know billiards was to be one's self unknown. After Miss Dugdale had exhausted billiards, she took up operas; and depending upon the probability of Phoebe's not having seen more than one in her life, indulged in a flow of hackneyed words on Mario, Santley, Grisi, and Titiens; on Don Giovanni, Fidelio, Il Trovatore, Miss Dugdale's friends' private boxes, and Fops' Alley. In short, Miss Dugdale's conversation conclusively exposed Phoebe as being one of the bourgeoisie—a clever, pretty, good enough girl of her kind, no doubt, but unmistakably an intruder in aristocratic society. As for the other women, each was pursuing her own shadow of hopes and wishes, dreams and determinations, fresh with novelty of conception, or faint with long keeping and retouching. Consequently, they all accepted the suggestion as to Phoebe without caring to examine into its origin, with the exception of Lady Dorothea, who shrank from what was mean and small-souled, come whence it may.

Lady Penelope wrote letters to several friends whom her brother Fairchester did not approve of her associating with, and to other friends who had been inclined to cut the whole Blount family for being on terms with Mr. Edmund. She took care ostentatiously to proclaim the names of her correspondents in both cases.

Lady Louisa persecuted Phoebe with confidences, and declined to be silent. She spoke of the contradictoriness and contumaciousness of her sister Pen, expatiated on Pen's selfishness in going up the Swiss mountain without her, when she was groaning with nervous headache—on Pen's taking advantage of her right of seniority, though she was ready enough to sink the fact at other times. Lady Louisa spoke openly of her cousin Neddy's having had a worse break-out than ever at Newmarket.

"Didn't he look like a dog?" she said, looking Phœbe in the eyes, to see how she took it. "He actually drank gin-and-water, not liqueurs and brandy, but tavern gin-and-water. How he could acquire the taste for that any more than for stable-cleaning, Pen could not think; only, you know, I must confess that Pen herself is rather fond of forbidden fruit."

"You cannot surely mean that?" said Phœbe, doubtfully.

"Yes, but I do mean it," urged Lady Louisa, with a little laugh; "and if you like, Miss Paston, I will tell you something which must not be repeated. Pen actually went with Julia Fitzroy to the review the other day, where there were no ladies to speak of besides themselves, and at the last moment she was caught setting off with Julia on a jolly shooting expedition to her cousin's box at the moors."

"But, perhaps, that was no more than a freak, never intended to be carried out," put in Phœbe, cautiously.

"No, no, it was real earnest; and I assure you they would have gone, and, what is more, I should have gone in for the shooting-party myself. And now, dear Miss Paston, if you will swear secrecy, I shall whisper in your ear something that nobody, not even Pen herself, guesses, touching the loss of my whip-handled parasol, which Lady Camilla supplied shabbily and late in the day, and of the loss of my beautiful sapphire ring."

But Lady Louisa was too eager to wait for Phœbe's pledges, and went rattling on.

"Well, you must know my losses have to do with a Mr. Gibbs, and I confess his is a very plebeian name, and Mr. Gibbs is only the son of a musty, fusty solicitor somewhere about the inns. And speaking of inns, Miss Paston, why is it that solicitors are always spoken of as waiting on at inns without getting shockingly dissipated like Edmund? To do Neddy justice, however, I must say he has been mostly found at hotels. But, of course, lawyer people are of lower rank, and that may explain it all. But you are thinking of Mr. Gibbs, Miss Paston, and that, I will admit, is a more promising subject," she went on, with a toss of the head and a laugh. "Well, Mr. Gibbs holds no more than a lieutenancy in the Lancers, in which Julia Fitzroy's brother is a captain. Mr. Gibbs, you know, is nobody to marry; he could never think of so preposterous a step, more especially as I have only a poor fifteen thousand fortune, and am sure to be dipped at the end of every quarter, because Pen and my cousin Neddy borrow from me, and my maid, Swab, robs me."

"You are surely a little severe, Lady Louisa," said Phœbe.

"Not a bit," urged her Ladyship; "but, Miss Paston, you must not mention the last particular, because Fairchester is so stupidly strict in morals, and nobody can deny that Swab dresses me divinely, so far as her materials will go. I can assure you there would be nothing for me but to enter an English sisterhood, were I to lose Swab, for everybody knows that I require to be well dressed. But what was I speaking of? Oh! about Mr. Gibbs. He is a love of a man, with a darling big curly beard like a buccaneer in a song, and he can sing a magnificent bass to my alto. Now, Miss Paston, don't you prefer altos to sopranos? I am sure you do, Miss Paston. In spite of Chetwynd Dugdale's way of talking, you have a singing face."

Phœbe was only allowed to utter a faint demur to this; for Lady Louisa was so engrossed in the current of her own talk, that she swept on impetuously.

"Well, now, isn't it strange, Miss Paston, that none of the Fairchesters have any music in them except myself, and Fairchester least of all? Fairchester does not care for forbidden fruit, or for wild-oats, or anything of the sort. He is such a very exemplary young fellow of a peer. But on the whole, the Blounts do not much approve of the match with Lady Dorothea. It is certainly on account of politics, estates, and things, and was all arranged for the contracting parties without any trouble. But what I have most at heart to ask you, Miss Paston—for, of course, I am interested in my own elder brother, the head of the house, though he is the grumpiest head of the Fairchester house since crooked Constantine, the second Marquis, built the keep at Ford-in-the-Marsh, and then shut himself up in it; and you must know he fired over the wall with a blunderbuss at every man, woman, or child who looked up at the ramparts—yes, what I wanted to ask you was, whether Lady Do hasn't a temper of her own; for Fairchester is as stubborn as a mule, and our family are of opinion that the couple won't pull well together?"

Phœbe had not heard anything approaching to these confidences which Lady Louisa imparted to her. Mrs. Edgecumbe's old stories came under a different category.

It was a refreshment afterwards for Phœbe to listen to the heavy guns fired off by the Miss Hammonds, when they came over to Brockcotes for their solid practice, of which they did not curtail a note. They favoured the pièces de résistance of Thalberg on the piano, when it seemed as if at least four pairs of hands and half-a-dozen barrel-organs were hard at work, banging and grinding all together.

Even Lady Dorothea was so far beaten on this rehearsal, that she retreated to her room at last.

CHAPTER XXVI.—A DILEMMA.

BUT Lady Dorothea knew her own mood too well to retreat alone. She carried Phœbe with her. The process of heartily abusing all the players, and speaking her mind to an intelligent and friendly listener, she instinctively felt would prove the greatest relief.

"If you believe me, Phœbe," said her Ladyship, speaking from her white dimity throne, and arrayed in her white dressing-gown, "I say my prayers mentally as often as the psalmist for patience to stand Lady Louisa's silliness. She is the silliest creature, and with a universal leakiness about her. It requires personal experience to convince one that a rational adult should be so near fatuousness. How Lady Penelope, who is a smouldering firebrand of a young woman, and Edmund Blount, who is constantly going about their house, mauvais sujet though he be, can refrain from catching Lady Louisa, whipping her, putting her to bed, and feeding her on bread and water, is a constant marvel to me."

"I do think the ball is getting well beaten about to-day, Lady Dorothea, when you, who are so tolerant to others, are beginning to take your neighbours to task so severely."

"Well, Phœbe, how could mortal complacently bear all this mountain of worry? Fairchester is a great deal too good for any of them. I half fear he is too good for me, and that is a consideration which pricks my conscience too sharply to be altogether welcome. Then I own I am not easy about Chetwynd Dugdale. If you only knew, Phœbe, what wretched reverses we have to fear for poor Chetwynd; and Chetty is not entirely to blame for them. Yet I am persuaded if Wriothesley were to marry her all would be well. She belongs to a branch of our Dugdales, and has a claim on our championship. Then the marriage would be in every other respect very beneficial for Wriothesley. The Summerly estates would fill in the net fence round the portions of the Exmoor property in that shire, and would bring under our influence three or four towns of considerable political importance in safe agricultural districts."

"But perhaps all the talk about Miss Dugdale was untrue," said Phœbe quietly.

"Well, poor Chetty could not help those hideous old scandals, and should be backed to fight them down. It does not seem to me that Wriothesley, either as a gentleman, a man of family, or a public man, can get off from the alliance, but that he ought to conclude it as other people conclude theirs."

"Lady Dorothea," said Phœbe, from her opposition dimity throne, and with a bright, impatient humour in her eyes, "you remind me of the ancient Hebrew law, by which Boaz called on the nearer of kin to do his duty to the dead, ere Boaz could take the living Ruth, who awaited their decision."

"Well," argued Lady Dorothea, dogmatically, without a sense of humour or of passionate independence, "did not Boaz comply with the customs of his people? and did not Ruth the stranger submit to them?"

"I suppose she could not help herself," protested Phœbe, rebelliously; "but it sounds a little French of her; and I think I have known elderly men like Boaz who would hardly have paused to inquire into the prior right of the next of kin, unless, indeed, the marriage had not been legal to Jews without that precaution. Perhaps that is the solution?"

"Or perhaps it was that Boaz was a princelysheikh, who had to consider more than himself," Lady Dorothea argued. "Phœbe, did your father ever ascertain whether you might not establish a connection with those respectable old Pastons who conducted that faithful correspondence during the wars of the Roses?"

Phœbe negated this suggestion by shaking her head with the utmost gravity. "My father says it could not be satisfactorily proved were all the heralds' courts in Europe to be employed on it; and that he is quite certain of only two things in his descent—that the grandfather whom he does remember was an honest man, and a parish blacksmith, and that the great-grandfather whom he does not remember was Adam."

"Now that is taking me off," Lady Dorothea declared philosophically.

"The grand old gardener and his wife Smile at the claims of long descent," and so do we at the rest of the poetic democratic tirade. Don't believe them, Phœbe, for they are manifestly wrong so long as blood and breeding make race-horses and cart-horses, greyhounds and terriers. But noblesse oblige is an awful obligation."

This reminded Phœbe of Frank Hall's quotation of the text the night before, "How hard it is for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven!"

DEBENHAM'S VOW.

BY AMELIA B. EDWARDS, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S HISTORY."

CHAPTER XL.—LETTERS FROM HOME.

ABOUT forty-five hours after going over Charles-ton bar—that is to say, about half-past ten o'clock, P.M., on the evening of the next day but one—the Stormy Petrel cast anchor once again in the safe and pleasant waters of Nassau harbour; having sighted and steered clear of several vessels on the way, but having met with nothing further in the shape of adventure. Then did Mr. Zachary Polter forthwith receive the remaining half of his modest fee and, late though it was by that time, hasten ashore to render up an account of himself and his three hundred and seventy-five pounds unto the wife of his bosom. And then, the anchor watch being set, captain and crew and supercargo turned in to sleep as men sleep who for three days and two nights have scarcely closed an eye for five minutes together.

The next was a busy day. The custom-house officers were on board as soon as the sun was fairly up; and when their visitation was over, De Benham had out the quarter boat and hastened ashore. He went straight to the post-office, and there found a packet of newspapers and four letters awaiting him—one from Lady De Benham, one from Mr. Hardwicke, one from Archibald Blyth, and the fourth from an old fellow-student hight Franz Kielmann, written in a tiny crabbed German character on the thinnest foreign paper, and stamped with the familiar Zollenstrasse post-mark. He tore open his mother's letter first—a long, loving, anxious letter, of which he did not then wait to read the whole, but, having seen that she was well, turned with some eagerness to Mr. Hardwicke's. The merchant's letter was brief, but satisfactory. It ran thus:—

"July—, 1861,
"Prior's Walk, St. Hildegard's, London.

"DEAR MR. DEBENHAM,—I am duly in receipt of yours dated the — inst. With regard to the proposal conveyed therein, I can only say that I prefer to leave you full discretionary powers, and that I beg you to act according to your own best judgment, and as the force of circumstances may direct. Should you make the round trip successfully, and on your return to Nassau prefer to venture again before returning to England, you are at liberty to do so. You can, in such case, warehouse the cotton for a few weeks in Nassau; and, if you write immediately on receipt of this, I will at once despatch a sailing vessel to bring off the double lot (i.e., 4,000 bales) to Liverpool. Our brig Sabrina, just in from Odessa, will answer the purpose; and can take out whatever cargo you may direct, in case you choose to risk a third venture. In the meanwhile, you will be pleased to forward all bills, &c., received in payment at Charleston or elsewhere, and continue to draw upon us for your further expenses. Should you decide on running the blockade again immediately, you will of course require another cargo of such goods as you find most in demand; but this, I presume, you can lay in at Havannah.

"Anxiously awaiting your next, and with best wishes for your personal safety and health, I am, dear Mr. Debenham,

"Yours, &c.,

"JOSIAH HARDWICKE."

Now this was a very satisfactory letter—the most satisfactory letter, according to De Benham's views and wishes, that Mr. Hardwicke could possibly have written. Having read it twice through, the young man put it carefully away in his pocket-book, tearing out a leaf at the same time and pencilling these words to the captain:—

"DEAR CAPTAIN HAY,—In consequence of a letter just received from Mr. Hardwicke, I find it necessary to make arrangements for unshipping the cargo as soon as possible—probably to-morrow—so that we may be in readiness to start again by the end of the week.

"Yours truly,

"T. D."

This he twisted into the form of a note, and sent it back to the ship by the coxswain; and then proceeded at once to use the discretionary power with which, to his great joy, he found himself invested. And so actively did he use it, that he not only succeeded before nightfall in making every arrangement for warehousing and unloading his cargo the following morning, but found time also to write a long letter to Mr. Hardwicke, detailing all that had happened since he left Nassau, and enclosing a rough statement of his accounts together with such bills and invoices as he had brought away from Charleston. And then, besides all this (for the English post chanced to be going out that very evening), he scrawled a hasty line to his mother, telling her that he was safe and well, but not coming home for a few weeks longer.

In the meanwhile, all Nassau had again turned out to look at the blockade-runner, which, if she was attractive on the occasion of her first appearance in those waters, was still more attractive now in the éclat of success. Row boats and sailing boats filled with curious gazers young and old, black and white, men, women, and children, swarmed about her where she rode at anchor about halfway between the mouth of the harbour and the town. No one, however, was permitted to come on board, and none of the crew had leave to go on shore; so the public curiosity, except in so far as staring went, remained ungratified.

When the day's work was done, and De Benham had gone back to the Stormy Petrel and talked over his plans with the captain, he at length found time to sit down in his little cabin and read the rest of his letters. First Lady De Benham's:—he had begged her, on leaving home, to remove to a better quarter of London, but he found that she was still in the old Canonbury lodgings. "You wish me," she wrote, "to be in the neighbourhood of the parks; but what pleasure would they give me without you? Can I accept additional comforts while you, my own boy, are exposed to hardship and peril? No, dearest, till I have you home again and all these distant enterprises are ended, I prefer to stay in this quiet nook, 'the world forgetting; by the world forgot.' Yesterday I dusted your books and music, and re-arranged your drawers. Your desk, and some roses in a tumbler, stand on your little writing table. Everything looks as if you had only gone out for an hour or two, and were coming back as usual to tea. I know it is very childish; but I love to have it so—even though it makes me sad." It was a long letter, breathing tenderness in every line, and the young man kissed the loving signature ere he put it away. "Dear—dearest Mutter," he said half aloud, "there is no one in the world like her!"

And then he read Archie's letter, which was written on office paper and sealed with the office seal.

"Prior's Walk, July —, 1861.

"DEAR OLD MAN,—We are all awfully anxious for your next letter. Old Tim Knott shakes his bald pate and croaks doleful prophecies from morning till night. Cousin Josiah looks grave. We all read the American news as eagerly as if the credit of the house was at stake; and the fellows in the counting-house do nothing but bet upon you. I have backed you heavily; so you're bound to get through all right, if only for my sake. My six weeks' holiday is just due again. I don't know where to go, or who to go with. It won't be half jolly without you, anyhow. Charley Bennett is off to Switzerland, and has asked me to join him; but it would cost thirty pounds, and I can't afford it. It's all very well for Bennett, who has a hundred a year more salary than myself, besides what he earns writing theatrical notices for the Shooting Star; but it won't do for A. B.

"Wilson's going to be married, and we are clubbing together to give him a dinner and tea service. Jones and one or two others wanted to make it a silver inksand; but what's the good of a silver inksand to a fellow who is dipping his quill all day long into a leaden one in a merchant's counting-house? Protheroe's aunt has died somewhere up in the north, and left him a pot of money. You remember Protheroe? Sits at the same desk with me—long-legged chap—red face and prominent eyes—like a lobster. He's a good fellow, though, and no one grudges him his luck.

"But I'm afraid all this 'shop' won't interest you, having been so little about the counting-house, and not knowing half the fellows even by sight.

"The Hardwicks are gone down to Hardwicke Hall—the place in Kent, you know; and a grand old place too—belonged once upon a time to some favourite of Queen Elizabeth—red brick house all gables and weathercocks—park, plantations, preserves, and all that sort of thing. Cousin Josiah is a great man down there, and fills the house with visitors every autumn. They gave a great garden party at Strathellan House last week, just before leaving town, and asked me. There were lots of swells—among others a certain Lord Stockbridge, who waited upon Claudia like her shadow. He's at least thirty years older than she is, and has a worn-out, dissipated, disagreeable look about him; but I fancy it will be a match for all that.

"He got her a card of invitation, I heard, to a fancy dress ball at some grand house in Belgrave Square, a little while ago. You may guess what a swell affair it was, when I tell you the Prince was there. Well, Claudia went, dressed so wonderfully and looking so handsome, that his Royal Highness, they say, asked the lady of the house what Queen this was whom she had invited to meet him: I shouldn't wonder if we next heard of her being presented at court.

"I have not ventured to call on Mrs. Debenham since you left. If I thought I could be the least bit useful or pleasant to her, I would go anywhere or do anything—but I'm so afraid of intruding. I know she is well, however, for I inquired at the door the other night without going in.

"I wish I knew just where you are and what you are doing at this moment. When I think of you as you were a year ago, playing the organ at St. Hildegard's, and believing in nothing but music, and then think of you out there in the West Indies, running the blockade and getting in the way of all sorts of dangers, it seems like a dream. Suppose it actually did turn out to be a dream all the time, and I was to wake presently and find myself in our old quarters at the 'Silver Trout'!

"By-the-bye, I went to see the pictures at the Royal Academy last Saturday afternoon, and who should I come upon but Mr. and Miss Alleyne. He asked after you, and I said you were in the West Indies—not a word, of course, about the blockade. That's one of the things it won't do to talk about just now. They asked me to go and see them at Kensington, and I said I would. I thought she looked as if she would like to hear more about you, but she said nothing. She is paler than she was at Cillingsford a year ago, and I fancy looks taller. Mr. Alleyne has a splendid picture in the middle room—'The Athens of Pericles'—sold, of course, and to whom do you suppose? Why to no less a person than Josiah Hardwicke, Esquire!

"Now, good-bye, dear old fellow. Do send me a line to say how you are, and what has happened to you. I don't want to bore you with letter-writing, but I do want half-a-dozen words, and will be contented with half-a-dozen. Take care of yourself, if you can.

"Yours ever,
"ARCHIBALD BLYTH."

De Benham read the last page of this letter twice over, and then laid it down with a heavy sigh. He had not seen Miss Alleyne since the day when he met her by the round pond in Kensington Gardens, and that . . . yes, that was just after Christmas—seven months ago! She did not know that he was in the West Indies. How should she? Well, she knew it now. Archie had told her—and Archie thought she looked "as if she would like to hear more." Poor little thing!—grown paler, too. . . . but then she said nothing. Why did she say nothing? Was it pride? Or indifference? She seemed indifferent enough, and gay enough, that day in the gardens. Pshaw! of what use to go over all that ground again? And so, telling himself that it was of no use whatever, De Benham broke open the envelope of his fourth letter.

This fourth letter carried him back into a world which he had never forgotten; which he never could forget; but of which he now thought so seldom, that the going back to it thus vividly had in it something that almost startled him. This letter told of the sayings and doings of people whose faces, voices, tricks of manner were once utterly familiar to him. It set him down in the midst of a town where every house-front along the streets and every tree in the public squares wore, once upon a time, the face of a friend. It spoke of the Academy; and, as he read, he seemed again to tread the well-known floors—of the parish church, whereof the tongue of every bell in the belfry came back upon his ear as familiarly as the tones of his own voice. It told him that Herr von Kinkel, the Grand Duke's Kapellmeister, was dead. Herr von Kinkel dead! How well De Benham remembered him, his wig, his brown coat, the ribbon in his button-hole, the very painting on the lid of his snuff-box! Herr Zschokke had retired from the professorship of classical languages, and gone to live at Freidorf. Fraülein Thimm was married—not to the old Town Councillor Braun after all, but to a certain Doctor Blitze from Berlin, who had lately settled in Zollenstrasse. The little Lyric theatre in the Fischmarkt had been burnt down. The Krone hotel was being rebuilt. A son of Herr Phillipart, the Post Director, had carried off the gold medal for painting in oils last examination, and Bernhard Clauss had written the prize symphony of the year. And then the writer had something to tell of himself also. He had lately been appointed to the leadership of the Grand Duke's private band, and had some hope of succeeding Von Kinkel in the post of Kapellmeister. If this great good-fortune should indeed befall him, the object of years would be attained. He would be in a position to marry, and then what happiness for Annchen and Franz!

"Thou rememberest my maiden, Lieber Freund," ran the letter; "she whom thou didst use to call 'the fair one with the golden locks?' She is as fair as ever, and as good, and as dear. We have been betrothed (verlobt) for more than four years; and it only needs a little more of assured income on my part to enable us to marry. The little white house with the green blinds at the corner of the Nordlingen Strasse just outside the Nordlingen Thor, is to be let. If I succeed, I shall hire it at once. It is but a bandbox of a house; yet it will be big enough for us. Our ambition soars not high—it is only our love that is boundless. My maiden will have a thousand Thalers from her uncle, and I have saved a little money to buy furniture. Heaven grant that the Kapellmeistership may yet be mine! Give us thy good wishes."

By the time that De Benham had come to the end of this last letter, the daylight was fading rapidly. Still, however, he stayed there, sitting at his desk, his eyes riveted upon the open page, his cheek resting on his hand, his thoughts far distant. Ah, yes—he remembered her so well, "the fair one with the golden locks!" She was the daughter of a small bookseller in the Römer Strasse, and he used to see her almost daily, knitting stockings behind her father's counter. How he used to laugh at Franz Kielmann in those days, recognising only the ludicrous side of all this wordy, outspoken German sentiment! Well, he felt no disposition to laugh now. He almost envied them their patient, faithful, honest love—their four years of mutual trust—their narrow hopes—their contented obscurity. "Our ambition soars not high—it is only our love that is boundless." Happy, thrice happy, for them that it should be so!

"And I, too,—I loved her just like that!" he muttered to himself, with another heavy sigh. But the "her" meant Juliet Alleyn.

Yes; he had loved her "just like that"—for a fortnight or three weeks. He, too, had dreamt that delicious dream and known that sweet intoxication; but then he had waked wonderfully soon from the dream, and the intoxication, in passing off, had left him soberer than ever. Still there were times when he could not help regretting the sweetness—when he told himself that he did not believe he should ever, ever know the taste of it again. He felt as if it were in him to love but once; and he knew that he had loved, and that he loved no longer. Had things fallen out differently—had they known each other longer, had they been engaged for years, or even months, before that day when he took his solemn vow in Benhampton Church, this change might never have come upon them. Or had his heart remained untouched for a few years longer, till the great end of his ambition was achieved, and had he then loved some fair and high-born woman—ah, then nothing would have had power to shake him! He should have gone on loving her, and only her, to the end of the chapter. But now . . . alas! now that sacred fire was all burnt out, and only the dust and ashes of it were left. It could never be lighted again, he thought—never, for him. It was not in his nature to love twice. He had dreamt his dream, and waked from it. He had drunk of the cup, and drained it. And now all was over, and he must try not to think of it again. Regrets, self-reproaches, sighs were all useless now, and worse than useless. They could neither bring back the past, nor renew it in the future. Nothing could do that:—

"For violets pluck'd the sweetest show'rs Ne'er can make to grow again!"

So, for the second time that evening, he put the subject from him, resolving to banish it thenceforward from his thoughts as much as possible. And then, having locked his letters away in his desk, he went up on deck to smoke a cigar with the captain.

It was characteristic of the man—is characteristic, perhaps, of most men under similar circumstances—that he never once reflected upon the fact that all these changes were of his own making. He never reproached himself for what he had done; or, indeed, was conscious that he alone had done it. He felt that life was destined to be somewhat more barren for him in the future, and he pitied himself that it should be so—and that was all. He never thought of pitying Miss Alleyn, having made up his mind that she had long since forgotten, or ceased to care about him. He even felt it as a sort of grievance that she should have forgotten him so easily. If any one had dared to tell him in plain language that he, Temple De Benham, had preferred his ambition to his love, and acted heartlessly in this matter, he would have resented it vehemently, and have denied it with as strong a conviction of his own rectitude as when Archie once upon a time accused him of having changed his mind. In all that had happened he saw only the hand of fate—the force of circumstances—the necessities of his own peculiar position, and so forth. That he was in this instance his own fate—that his position was of his own choosing—that his necessities were of his own making, were possible views of the question that never for one single moment occurred to his mind.

CHAPTER XLI.—HOW THE WORLD WENT ROUND.

THE world went round faster than she has ever been known to do before or since, in these times of which we are writing; and great events succeeded each other across the Atlantic with a bewildering rapidity that held all Europe breathless. But even this vivid interest ended at last in that sort of jaded indifference with which we may suppose a Roman audience to have regarded the last gladiatorial combats of a long day in the Flavian Amphitheatre. States seceded, armies were levied, battles were lost and won by every mail; and each fortnightly budget of American news contained matter enough to furnish our daily papers with leaders, paragraphs, and special correspondence for three months together. The audience, however, had as it were only just taken their seats in these late midsummer days of 1861; the prælusio was only just over; the trumpet had only just given the signal; the real fighting had only just begun. The battle of Big Bethell on the 10th of June, followed within a month by the battles of Carthage, Athens, and Rich Mountain, and by innumerable skirmishes in Virginia and Missouri, inaugurated the terrible spectacle; and even now, while Temple De Benham was for the first time running the blockade of Charleston harbour, the memorable battle of Bull Run had been fought near Centreville, some twenty-eight or thirty miles S.E. of Washington.

News of this "dolorous rout" had but just reached Nassau when the Stormy Petrel put in again to unship her cargo. Here, as in England, public sympathy was divided between the two causes; but the majority—as might have been expected, considering their proximity to the Southern States—sided with the Confederates. Nor was the prevailing excitement confined only to neutral lookers-on. There were plenty of waifs and strays from the adjacent coast, as well as a sprinkling of Northerners, in the place, and party feeling ran hot and high between them. On the quays, in the market-place, at the bar of the solitary hotel, in-doors and out-of-doors throughout the little sea-port town, the talk was all of Bull Run and the war.

"We've whipped them, sir, as if they were a pack of curs, and they ran away like curs," said an excited Southerner, addressing himself to De Benham; who, far too busy to discuss politics with a stranger on the public quays, was superintending the unlading of his cargo.

"The army of the Potomac exists no longer, and that's a fact," said another.

"Twenty thousand of them killed and wounded, and the rest gone straggling home all over the country!" chimed in a third. "It's the end of the war, as sure as snakes."

"It ain't no more the end of the war than it's the end of the world," snarled a gaunt-looking Northerner. "I'm a Boston man, I am. I know what stuff our sodgers air made of. If they're whipped to-day, they'll whip the world to-morrow. Yew call 'em curs, dew you? Call 'em curs, if yew like; but yew'll find 'em bars an' panthers next time yew hev to dew with 'em. See if yew don't!"

"Reckon you Yankees find tall talking easier than fighting," said the first speaker, contemptuously.

"Reckon we shall give yew darned rebels a lesson in fighting afore we've done with yew," retorted the Yankee, savagely.

And then came a storm of curses, and a scuffle, and the gleam of a knife; and if the bystanders had not rushed in, there would have been bloodshed. As it was, the combatants were separated with difficulty, and De Benham, who dragged the Boston man out by the collar, received an ugly gash across the back of his left hand. A red-faced little English officer came bustling up at the first token of a row.

"Come, come," he said, authoritatively,

"we'll have no civil wars here. This is British ground—if you want to fight, you must go elsewhere to do it. Clear off at once, or I'll have every American present arrested for a breach of the peace."

Whereupon the crowd dispersed and the belligerents went sullenly away—to meet again, and quarrel again before night. Scenes of this description were breaking out a dozen times a day in Nassau while the Stormy Petrel remained in port.

The next morning, when De Benham had forgotten all about him, the Yankee came back. Finding the steamer still alongside the quay, the work of unlading still on hand, and the busy supercargo still superintending it, he sat himself down upon a cotton bale, lit a cigar, and began a conversation.

"Stranger," he said, "yew meant it kindly—but I'd rayther hev fit that fight out."

"They were four to one against you," said De Benham, checking off the bales in his note-book.

"Mebbe," replied the Boston man. "I didn't keownt 'em."

"Besides, you were unarmed, and that tall man had a bowie knife."

"I'd rayther hev fit it out, sir, all the same," said the Boston man, reflectively.

"Six hundred and forty-eight—six hundred and forty-nine—six hundred and fifty," sung out the mate on the gangway. And De Benham entered six hundred and fifty in his note-book.

"Tightish work, I guess, sir, running the blockade?" said the Yankee, presently.

De Benham made no reply. It was a subject that he could hardly discuss with a native of those States whose laws he, a neutral, had just been evading.

"I shouldn't mind dewing a trade with yew for that their cotton," pursued the other, after a brief silence. "Yew've bought it cheap, I reckon."

"I mean to sell it dear," said De Benham, smiling.

"Wa'al, now, I'll buy it at an advance of twenty-five per cent. on whatever yew paid for it—and that's as fair an offer as yew'll git any day betwixt Nassau an' Christmas."

De Benham shook his head.

"If you really conclude that we have run the blockade," said he, "how can you offer to buy the cotton? From your point of view, it has been illegally obtained."

"I don't know that the cotton, as cotton, is any the wuss for that, stranger," said the Boston man, drily.

And then he tried again to lead De Benham into telling him what price he had paid, what price he would take, and so forth, till the other fairly lost patience.

"I mean to lock the cotton up till it's worth two-and-sixpence per pound in Liverpool," he said at last. "If you like to buy at that price, I will sell it—if not, let us waste no more words on the subject."

The Yankee screwed up his mouth, and gave utterance to a prolonged whistle.

"Sir," said he, "if those air your terms, I guess you'll not trade this side o' the Millennium."

With which encouraging prophecy, he rose and walked away.

The next evening soon after sunset, the Stormy Petrel steamed out again, this time in the direction of Havannah. And now, being on their way from one neutral port to another, with no cargo on board, the blockade runners put boldly out to sea, knowing that they had nothing to fear between Nassau and the Isle of Cuba.

The weather continued magnificent, the sunsets and sunrises increasing in splendour as they neared the tropics, and the heat becoming hourly more intense. By and by the little steamer had to make head against the Gulf Stream, and then her progress necessarily slackened. Twice, also, in the course of the second day was she hailed and brought to by United States cruisers; both of which, however, the captain could easily have evaded, had he seen cause to do so. As it was, he ran up the Union Jack, and received the Federal officers with a degree of equanimity that must have been extremely irritating to those sharp-sighted Northerners. At length the Stormy Petrel entered the Tropic of Cancer; and a few hours later, steamed into the port of Havannah.

In this West Indian Naples, with its wooded hills, its enchanting bay, its dreamy climate, its Spanish-looking streets and promenades, its cathedral, its opera-house, its Plaza de Toros, its cafés, its billiards, its balls, its cigars, and its ices, De Benham lingered not one hour longer than was necessary for the purchase of his new cargo.

The captain and ship's officers, having nothing to do, went on shore and enjoyed themselves. The crew had their "liberty days" in turn. But the supercargo's work was incessant, beginning with the dawn, and never ending till he laid his weary head each night upon his pillow.

His first morning's experience showed him that everything was done which the Cuban Government could do, to foster an exclusively Spanish trade. Spanish wines, Spanish oil, Spanish wares and manufactures were cheap and abundant; while the protective duty on foreign goods was almost prohibitory. As for English fabrics, they would have cost him so much to buy, that he resolved to take in a cargo altogether different from the last. So in place of Manchester goods, ready made boots and shoes, and Witney blankets, he bought coarse Spanish woollens of Andalusian manufacture, Cordovan leather in skins, small arms of Barcelona make, and some 100,000 lbs. of gunpowder in barrels. And he took care not to forget the Quinine suggested by Major Prideaux. In all this, he had to hold his own against the Cuban dealers as he best could; and that was no easy task. Supernatural was their activity in over-reaching while yet a bargain was pending; and supernatural was the apathy into which they relapsed, when the bargain was struck and it only remained for them to deliver the goods. To haggle, to urge, to threaten, to persuade, to implore—to toil from store to store in the overwhelming heat—to stand by and see his purchases unearthed from the warehouse—to follow them to the quay—to superintend the stowage of them in the hold, was De Benham's incessant occupation in Havannah. Thus fourteen days were consumed; and it seemed to him throughout those fourteen days, that he was the only busy man in the place. A dreamy, voluptuous, lotus-eating city, where the women dawdled through life in rocking chairs and volantes, and every man's career began and ended, apparently, with the smoking of gigantic cigars some seven inches long!

At length, about four o'clock P.M. on the afternoon of the fifteenth day, all being in readiness for the start, their new pilot—a free nigger, black as "blackest midnight,"—came on board; and they steamed out again, to the encounter of whatever perils might await them between the coasts of Cuba and Alabama.

For their destination was, of necessity, determined by their point of departure; and, starting from Havannah, the nearest cotton-port was Mobile.

"United States' Consul berry 'spicious, sar," grinned the pilot, pointing with a jerk of his thumb to a dainty little yacht hovering close under Fort Morro at the mouth of the harbour.

And then De Benham saw that this dainty little yacht mounted the stars and stripes, and that on her deck she carried a gentleman who was watching them intently through his double-barrelled opera-glass. His observations would doubtless have taken a more active form, had it been in this gentleman's power to communicate his suspicions with sufficient promptitude to any Federal cruiser. But there happened to be no Federal cruiser just then in Cuban waters, nor, indeed, nearer than Key West Arsenal; so his double-barrel proved an inoffensive weapon enough.

Happily for the Stormy Petrel and the fortunes of all concerned in her, the blockade of these more southernly ports was at first less stringent than the blockade of Charleston and those places abutting on the northern territory. They found the sea comparatively clear till within some fifty or sixty miles of the coast, and then had to change their course not oftener than three or four times before night came on, bringing them the safety of darkness.

Some three hours later, they succeeded in slipping unobserved through a straggling double cordon of blockading vessels; and sunrise found them at anchor about a mile from the picturesque, foreign-looking city of Mobile, the third morning after their departure from Havannah.

CHAPTER XLII.—THE SABRINA MEETS THE STORMY PETREL.

AGAIN safe, again successful, having run the gauntlet of all those waters lying between Cuba, the Great Bahama Bank and Florida Reef; having had some two or three narrow escapes also, en route; and having come with the Gulf Stream at a tremendous pace nearly the whole way, the Stormy Petrel made her third entry into the port of Nassau one broiling September afternoon, just seven weeks from the date of her departure for Havannah. Seven weeks:—a short time wherein to have purchased, stowed and transported two full cargoes, and sold one; to have twice run the blockade of Mobile; and to have twice traversed, say at a rough guess, 1,200 miles of sea! A short time for the performance of much hard work; some of it within the tropics. A very short time for the gaining of at least one hundred and fifty thousand pounds—and yet long enough to have wrought a sudden and startling change in the little port of Nassau.

"How full the harbour is!" said De Benham, as soon as they had passed the lighthouse.

"Stress of weather, I suppose," replied the captain. "Atlantic storms of which we have seen nothing in the Gulf."

De Benham shook his head.

"I don't think so," he said. "Look there!"

And he pointed to a little knot of steamers, one or two very small; one almost as large as the Stormy Petrel; some painted grey or green; one funereally black, like a gigantic gondola; all with low raking funnels; all bare of masts, like themselves; all obviously bent upon the same business.

The captain did look—uttered an exclamation—looked again—swept the harbour with his glass, and grimly smiling, said:—

"Well, in future, at all events, we shan't want for company."

And that was just it. The Stormy Petrel was henceforth but one among others. Till now she had been, if not the very first to run the blockade, at all events the first well-appointed boat in the field; but while she was making these two first trips, other speculators had waked up to the golden opportunity; other boats had been put into trim for the same purpose; and blockade-running, as a trade, had set in suddenly, in right good earnest. And what a change the new trade had wrought for Nassau! But seven weeks ago, and there were not more than three or four vessels in port; but seven weeks ago, and except when the whole town turned out to stare at the Stormy Petrel, or when the band played in the evenings, there would scarcely be seen a score of people on the quays together. And now—now here were steamers at anchor; steamers unshipping their cotton alongside the wharfs; a whole fleet of dinky colliers; merchant vessels taking in the cotton brought off by the steamers; other merchant vessels fresh from Liverpool, Lisbon, or Bordeaux, discharging their own cargoes of goods and ammunition presently to be re-transported for Confederate uses; small boats in shoals plying to and fro—cotton bales piled upon the quays—crowds of busy strangers, stevedores, sailors more or less drunk with their pockets full of dollars, Yankee spies, sharks, sharpers and traders of every description thronging to and fro, overfilling the one hotel and all the lodging-houses and taverns in the town, and keeping the little port in a perpetual uproar.

Much of this—of the general press and bustle of business both on ship-board and on land—was plainly to be seen even from the somewhat distant point at which the captain cast anchor; and a very unexpected sight it was in the eyes of all on board.

"Nebber see nuffin like this in Nassau afore, sar," said the black pilot, scratching his woolly pate in sheer amazement. "Nassau berry dull place. No business—no 'musement—no money. All 'live now, by golly!"

Then De Benham began to look round, wondering whether Mr. Hardwicke's promised ship, the Sabrina, were among these numerous arrivals; and then, just as before, he had the quarter boat lowered, and went ashore for letters. Alas! for the mutability of things human. The quays were lined with gazers when last the Stormy Petrel, laden with cotton halfway up her funnel, made her appearance in those waters; and a crowd gathered about the landing place to greet and question De Benham as soon as his foot should touch the shore. He had felt himself to be quite a hero then; but now it was over. There was no more prestige for the Stormy Petrel or those belonging to her. The crowd was there, it is true; but it was a crowd blasé of blockade-running—intent upon its own affairs—too busy to give more than a passing glance to any fresh comer, whether man or steamer.

So De Benham landed, feeling that he was a hero in Nassau no longer; but little guessing that there was something better than the popularity of an hour in store for him—little guessing that the first face he should see at the top of the steps, the first voice he should hear in joyous greeting, would be the face and voice of Archibald Blyth.

"Dear old fellow, welcome to Nassau! You didn't expect to see me, did you?"

"Archie!"

"Yes—Archie and no mistake. I've been watching you all across the bay. I was on the point of coming off to you, and then I saw the boat being lowered, and I knew it was best to wait."

De Benham, with unwonted warmth, grasped his friend's hands in both his own.

"You here?" he said. "I can scarcely believe it—it seems too good to be true." And then, a sudden chill of apprehension sweeping over him:—"There's—there's nothing wrong?" he faltered.

"Wrong? bless your heart! no. Everything's right, and everybody's right. I've two letters for you, and lots of newspapers—here are the letters; one from Mr. Hardwicke, and the other from Mrs. Debenham. I went up to see her the night before I left London, and she's quite well—never better, she says. Wants you back, of course. So did I—awfully ; till I got the chance of coming after you."

"You came out with the Sabrina, of course?" said De Benham, as they strolled away, arm in arm, to a less frequented part of the quays.

"Yes—I applied for my six weeks ; and then old Josiah asked me when I had heard from you, and so on, and ended by offering me the trip out here, passage free. Wasn't it good of him?"

"It was kind, certainly ; and I, at least, am heartily grateful to him."

Archie's eyes glistened with pleasure.

"I'm so glad it isn't a bore to you, my coming in this way," he said, simply.

"A bore!" echoed De Benham. "Dear old fellow, it's worth any money to have you! And now tell me all about it—how long have you been here, and what have you been doing?"

"Well, I've been here nearly a week, and I've done nothing but sit in a cold bath all day and eat ices. Good heavens, what a temperature! I never knew what heat meant before."

"You should try Cuba," said De Benham.

"Thank you—Nassau's enough for one while. But the voyage was delightful. Commend me to a sailing vessel, I say. Why the Sabrina came over the sea like a swan! There she is—riding at anchor—that graceful-looking three-master out yonder, with the red and white pennant at her main-top."

De Benham examined the ship through his glass. It was a capital glass, bought at Havannah, and would have served him at thrice the distance to criticize the gilded water-nymph, and read the words "SABRINA—LONDON," which glittered on the good ship's prow.

"Must you go back in her?" asked De Benham.

"Not if you can give me anything to do," replied Archie, eagerly. "Hardwicke said if I found I could be useful to you, I might stay as long as you wanted me."

"That's fine! And I can give you plenty to do. You shall be supercargo's clerk—I've wanted one badly enough, the whole time."

"I'll be anything you please," said Archie, radiant with delight.

And then they talked of Temple's adventures, and of the war, and of all that had happened since they parted. Archie had the latest news to tell, and from him De Benham learned how Fort Hatteras had been taken by General Butler on the 29th of August, with a loss to the Confederates of seven hundred prisoners and one thousand stand of arms.

"It will be a protracted struggle," said De Benham. "All desperate daring on the one side, all dogged resolve on the other ; but the South must go down, and the North must win, in the long run."

"We don't think so in England," said Archie.

"You will think so when you have made the next run with me to Charleston," replied the other. "You will see why it must be so. The Confederates are splendid fellows ; but there will come a point beyond which their resources cannot carry them. Now the resources of the North are practically inexhaustible ; and besides that, your Yankee is made of that indomitable stuff that never knows when it is beaten."

And then he told Archie of the Northerner whom he had seen attacked by four Southerners upon that very quay ; and who, though menaced with a knife and himself unarmed, would fain have "fit the fight out," let the odds be what they might.

"And yet," he added, laughing, "that same fellow would have bought up my first cargo of cotton, without caring one jot for the breach of the law. By Jove! here's the man himself. Did you ever see such a thorough Jonathan?"

"He's coming to speak to you," said Archie.

"Ah—he wants to propose a 'deal' of some sort, depend on it!"

The Boston man came up, grave and business-like.

"Wa'al, sir," he said, "I reckon yew find some difference in this port since your last visit. Nassau has become the centre of a new trade, sir—an illicit trade ; but a trade that will increase, sir, every day. No nation on a'ir, sir, can effectually blockade three thousand miles of coast."

"There must, no doubt, be points at which such a blockade will be inoperative," said De Benham.

"Sir, it is impossible it should be otherwise. In the meanwhile, foreseeing that this port is likely to be pretty crowded for some time to come, I hev laid down a patent slip at Victoria Creek—jest round that pint yonder, about a mile from whar we air standing. If your vessel wants refitting or repairing at any time, sir, I shall be happy to dew my best for you."

And with this he gave De Benham his card, bowed, and walked away.

The young men burst into a roar of laughter as soon as he was out of hearing.

"And that," said Archie, "is Yankee patriotism! What's the fellow's name?"

"Wilbur H. Sakem."

"Then I should think Mr. Wilbur H. Sakem will find himself rather strictly dealt with, if ever his Government chances to hear of this little speculation!"

"Ay, but you must not think, because he cannot resist making dollars when dollars are to be made, that our friend is devoid of patriotism," said De Benham. "Ask him to repair a Confederate boat, and he would refuse, though it were the best bargain ever offered. Tender payment in Confederate bank-notes, and he would not touch them with a pair of tongs. Pit him against any number of armed Confederates, and he would not only fight them, but, like the doughty warrior in the old ballad, if his legs were both shot off, he'd fight upon his stumps."

"You make him out to be a hero!"

"Because the vein of heroism is actually there; imbedded, perhaps, in much base metal, but still there—an inherent part of the man's nature. Ay, and inherent not only in the nature of Wilbur H. Sakem, but inherent in the whole universal Yankee nature, which is more to the purpose."

"But what about the worship of the almighty dollar? There is nothing very heroic in that."

"Well," replied De Benham, "there is even a symbolic element mixed up with the worship of the almighty dollar. Dollar is power, and power is national greatness—so, even here, patriotism is touched at a tangent. The truth is, Archie, that those littlenesses and absurdities which we love to classify under the head of Yankeeisms are for the most part mere surface-traits, after all, and overlay much that is admirable. The more a man sees of the American people, whether Federal or Confederate, Northerners or Southerners, the more clearly he recognises the generous, the fearless, the patriotic—nay, I am not afraid to say the heroic, side of their national character."

Talking thus, now of great public questions, now of events and persons interesting only to themselves, the friends strolled to and fro under the trees in the promenade till nearly sunset, and afterwards dined together at the hotel—now crowded, and noisy, and exorbitantly dear.

"You've no idea what it will cost!" said Archie, dismayed, when De Benham ordered a private room, and called for terrapiu soup, canvas-backed ducks, and other rarities entered (unpriced) upon the bill of fare. "I dined here the first day, knowing no better; but I have never dared to repeat the experiment. I had to pay five dollars for a chicken, a plate of stewed oysters, and half a pint of sherry. A bottle of champagne, I am told, costs twenty-five shillings."

De Benham laughed.

"My dear fellow," he said, "I don't care what anything costs. We will have champagne and Château Margaux, too, every day we are in Nassau, though the price should be double twenty-five shillings a bottle. You are my guest, you know, and I must make much of you. I am a rich man now."

And for the first time, he tasted the pleasure of wealth. It was delightful to see Archie's honest face at the other side of the table—to spend money on him—to fête him—to have him for a guest. Never had he felt that he loved his friend so well. Never had friendship in itself seemed so good and pleasant to him. A man might be forced to renounce love. Many men were forced to renounce it, and did renounce it, missing it, and living solitary all their lives through. But no man was called upon to renounce friendship. That treasure—the treasure of Archie's friendship, so faithful, so devoted, so unselfish—was at all events his own, to have and to keep while he deserved it. And he resolved that he would deserve it. He resolved that he would be good to Archie, as good as he knew how to be, his whole life long.

"It was the pleasantest surprise I ever had, old fellow, seeing your face to-day at the top of the landing-place," he said, presently. "Tringuons donc. What is it that Béranger says?"

"L'amitié qui trinque pour boire, Boit bien plus encore pour trinquer!"

And then they chinked their glasses across the table, once, twice, thrice. Not for many and many a month had Archie seen De Benham so gay.

CHAPTER XLIII.—PERILS ON SHORE.

To go back to Charleston—hospitable, excitable, Madeira-consuming Charleston—seemed to those on board the Stormy Petrel like going back into the society of old friends. It was, however, a pursuit of society under difficulties; and the difficulties, as they speedily discovered, were much greater than on the occasion of their first visit. If bold blockade-runners had increased and multiplied, so also had the blockading squadron become more numerous and more vigilant. These vessels, which cruised off the coast by day, drew in round the mouth of the harbour, forming a close double cordon, at night; while up and down, between and about them, hovered a swarm of gunboats, swift, wasp-like, carrying for the most part only a single gun, and so small as to be invisible beyond gun-shot range after dark. An elaborate system of signals by means of coloured lights was now also established throughout the squadron; so that except on very dark or foggy nights, a blockade-runner was beset by dangers. Still, despite these dangers, the race increased and multiplied, and, on the whole, prospered. Some, of course, were captured; some, to avoid capture, were run ashore and fired by their own crews; some, though detected and pursued, escaped by dint of sheer speed and daring. But the majority, being purposely constructed for the work, succeeded, at all events, in making several runs before their day of disaster came upon them. So enormous were the profits to be made upon all that a boat carried in, as well as upon the cotton she brought out, that it paid well in these days only to make two round trips in safety and suffer for it on the third.

The Stormy Petrel, however, having taken in the cargo brought by the Sabrina, and being once more confided to the skilful pilotage of Mr. Zachary Polter, started bravely upon her third trip, nothing daunted by the additional perils of the way. Nor had her good-luck yet deserted her. Thanks to her build and a moonless night—thanks, also, to the misfortunes of a fellow blockade-runner, which was being hotly chased in an opposite direction just at that critical moment when the Stormy Petrel was making for the bar—she again got through triumphantly.

Then came Charleston quays; Charleston soldiering; Charleston hospitality and universal good-fellowship. Then, also, came the old business of selling and buying, unshipping and stowing, all over again. Had it not been for the excitement of danger at sea and fortune-making on shore, De Benham would soon have wearied of it. As it was, the details of the trade, the chaffering and bargaining, were infinitely distasteful to him. There were even times when he found himself on the verge of being bored. Still no man, however uncommercially disposed, can incur much risk of boredom when he is making money faster than he can count it; and De Benham calculated that he was now earning at the rate of more than twenty thousand pounds a month.

"It is a magnificent life," said Archie, to whom everything was new and delightful.

"It is a life of great excitement, and great uncertainty," replied De Benham.

"Awfully jolly, though—regular game of speculation!"

"Well, it is the roulette table, plus the Parrot gun, the overcharged boiler, and the New York prison. You may call that 'awfully jolly.' I don't. It is not pleasant to be always running away, in the first place; and it is extremely disagreeable, in the second place, to serve as a mere target for long-range practice without firing a single shot in return."

"Why shouldn't you carry an Armstrong, and return their little compliments now and then?" asked Archie, innocently.

"Because, my dear fellow, that would constitute piracy on the high seas, and we have no mind to be hung."

In the meanwhile, Archie amused himself from morning till night. The dinner parties, the iced drinks, the brass bands, the marching to and fro, the very cotton and cotton-stores charmed him with all the charm of novelty. Having nothing to gain and nothing to lose, the risks of the run only added to the pleasure of the excursion; and not even the New York prison—supposing it were indeed his fate to be lodged there—would have troubled him much; at all events as regarded himself. Would he not, in such case, see New York for nothing?

De Benham, as the commercial representative of a great London house, found himself fêted wherever he went in these times—fêted at Havannah; fêted at Mobile; but nowhere fêted so cordially and persistently as at Charleston. The South Carolinians had lost none of their gay self-confidence since he was last among them; but were still boasting loudly of Bull Run, and prophesying victories to come. Touching their losses at Fort Hatteras they said little, and seemed to care less. Their hospitality, at all events, was as profuse as ever. Besides, they never forgot that De Benham first ran the blockade of their harbour in quest of the cotton for which they then had no other buyers; or that it was on board the Stormy Petrel that one of their leading citizens found a safe passage home from England. Archie, who came in for his share of all the pleasant things going, never went into so much society in his life, as during that delightful fortnight in Charleston.

Especially agreeable to them both was the house of Colonel Ashby, who was a near neighbour of Senator Shirley and a great man in the War Department. Now Colonel Ashby was a widower and the father of three daughters, all cultivated, all young, all swift in repartee and fearless in conversation, as American ladies are wont to be. Their names were Janet, Elinor, and Diana. Janet was the youngest; perhaps also the least attractive. Certainly, the least brilliant. Elinor and Diana were both very beautiful, after that delicate, highly-wrought, spiritual type which we in England are only just beginning to recognise as the special inheritance of Transatlantic womanhood. And they were not only very beautiful, but they were very much alike, and both enthusiastically patriotic. But of the beauty and enthusiasm of Diana Ashby, some brief mention, it may be remembered, has already been made in these pages.

She it was who said that whether England came to them as an ally or held aloof as a neutral, there was no man "or woman, either" in all those Southern States, who for the honour of the Stars and Bars was not ready to die twice over. De Benham had often thought of those words since, and of how her eyes darkened and flashed as she spoke them; for Diana Ashby's eyes changed colour strangely at times. They were superb eyes, too—large, luminous, unfaltering; and, for their colour, of a deep, clear grey, inclining more to blue than brown. Yet there were moments when that blueish grey vanished from them altogether, and they became quite black—black as the blackest Spanish eyes that ever glowed under a mantilla. This transformation, however, only came upon them in flashes, and never for any topic save that of her country and her country's cause.

To hear Diana Ashby's low clear voice once more, to watch for the faint colour rising in her cheek, and for the coming of that strange black lightning in her eyes, were not among the least pleasant of De Benham's anticipations when again the flood-tide carried the Stormy Petrel over the bar of Charleston harbour.

It has been said that there were pleasant things going in these days—excursions to the camps and batteries, luncheon-parties, dinner-parties, evening parties, and the like; and, somehow, De Benham contrived to find more leisure for such outings than heretofore. At Havannah, to be sure, his work was difficult, and at Mobile he was among strangers; while here he could rely on the promptitude and good faith of Messrs. Harper, Prideaux, and Barbuckle, and those connected with them. At all events, he now went a good deal into society—especially into the society frequented by Colonel Ashby's daughters.

One evening—it was at the Ashbys' own house, after dinner—Archie revealed the fact that De Benham could play. He revealed it to Janet, the youngest of the sisters, with whom he had fallen into a way of turning over photograph books, loitering in conservatories, and talking confidential chit-chat—that sort of pleasant chit-chat that means nothing, but is, perhaps, therefore all the pleasanter.

"Play?" said Janet Ashby. "What does he play?"

"Anything—everything—Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn—whatever you put before him."

"Then the piano, I suppose, is his instrument."

"Yes—and the violin; and the organ. And then he extemporises—you should hear him extemporise!"

"But your friend must be a genius, Mr. Blyth!"

"He is a genius—that's just it," replied Archie, warmly. "And he's not only a musical genius—he's a great linguist; and he has the most extraordinary talent for commerce. You can't think, Miss Ashby, what a wonderful fellow he is!"

"He is very fortunate, whoever he may be, if all his friends appreciate him so thoroughly," said Elinor Ashby, coming up behind her sister's chair. "May I ask where this genius is to be found?"

"It is Mr. Debenham, Nelly," replied the other. "Mr. Blyth says that he is such a great musician—do ask him to play."

So Elinor Ashby went up and asked him; and De Benham, who had scarcely touched an instrument of any kind since his abandonment of the profession, would fain have excused himself.

"I am out of practice," he pleaded. "I have not played for months."

But then Diana Ashby added her entreaties to those of her sister, and he yielded.

He played first a wild prelude of John Sebastian Bach's—a stormy, impetuous torrent of notes followed by a chain of ponderous chords that crashed out, one by one, upon the ear, like the falling of forest trees smitten by the tempest. Then, leading away into a lighter measure, he ended with a capriccio by Chopin; one of the daintiest, ariest, most fantastic inventions of that ethereal genius—a capriccio that Ariel might have played amid the charmed glades of Prospero's island, or Puck and his fellows have gambolled to by moonlight, for the delectation of Nick Bottom, the weaver. And still, as his fingers fled over the keys, lacking none of their wonted fire or facility, De Benham felt the old, passionate, inborn love of his "so-potent art," the old God-given inspiration, welling up in his heart—welling up imperiously, irresistibly, with a yearning that was almost pain. And with it also came that glowing sense of power that goes with all really fine playing, and is the player's own exceeding great reward.

So, having once begun, he felt that he would gladly have gone on for hours; and he rose from the piano with a sigh. But they would not let him leave off so. They implored him to resume his seat, and begged for more.

"Play something of your own, Mr. Debenham," said Diana Ashby.

"I fear I can remember nothing."

"Let your fingers remember for you."

"Ah, that would never do! If I were once to let my fingers have their own way, they would run off with me altogether; and heaven only knows when they would stop. Perhaps never!"

"We are quite ready, sir, to take the consequences," said Colonel Ashby, laughing. "We'll naturalise you, in that case, as a citizen of the Confederate States."

"I think you would have the worst of the bargain, Colonel Ashby," replied De Benham, with an involuntary glance towards the beautiful Diana.

It was possible, certainly, he thought, to conceive a harder fate.

Then, being again entreated, he played "Dixie's Land," their own much-beloved Southern melody; making it the theme of a marvellous improvisation—such an improvisation as none there present had ever heard before—now giving it out simply and plaintively, like the singing of a sorrowful, solitary voice; now apprelling it in harmonies "rich and strange" and treating it as a solemn chorale; now breaking it up into detached phrases; playing with it; inverting it; chasing it from key to key; dressing it in all kinds of fanciful disguises; overlaying it with dazzling cadenzas; and working it up at the last into a grand triumphal march, in which his breathless listeners seemed to hear the tramp of battalions and the chanting of victorious thousands.

When he had done, there was silence—silence for some seconds; and then his hosts and their friends came crowding round the piano, all thanks and eager admiration. Diana Ashby, however, said nothing. She waited till the rest had said their say; and by and by, when they were all occupied with other matters, and the servants were handing about iced coffee, she turned to De Benham and said:—

"It seems almost sacrilegious, Mr. Debenham, that you, an Englishman, should be able to interpret our national music in this wonderful way. Only one of our own people ought to stir our hearts like that."

"What reply can I make to such a compliment?" said De Benham.

"I think we are bound to impress you, for the sake of the cause, whether you will or no—naturalise you, as my father suggested, and turn you into a citizen of the Confederate States."

"But I am one, in a certain sense, already," replied De Benham. "The artist is a citizen of the world."

"Of the old world, I fear," she said, quickly. "Of that world which was the cradle of the arts—not of our new world, with its material needs and its efforts after material progress."

"Well, the artist, perhaps, takes but a languid interest at all times in mere material progress—I mean in that sort of progress that is represented by steam-ploughs, baby-jumpers, and sewing-machines; but he sympathises with patriotism and self-devotion, wherever they are to be found."

"It is sympathy that we covet," said Miss Ashby; "that, above and beyond all else."

And then she turned to the old subject of the war, and of the feeling with which it was regarded in England, and of the reasons why the English Government should, must, and ought to come to the aid of the Seceded States.

"It is for your interest to do so," she argued.

"Nations, like individuals, sometimes overlook their interests," said De Benham, seeking refuge in generalities, but wishing with all his heart that the lady would not drive him to talk politics.

"Not commercial nations, when their commercial prosperity is at stake!"

"Our commercial prosperity does not hinge upon cotton only," said De Benham, smiling. "Besides, that is not all. Setting questions of interest aside, our people and our pens are alike in favour of peace."

"Yet but a few years ago you took up arms for the Turk, with whom you have nothing in common—neither blood, nor religion, nor commerce; and it was only yesterday that your volunteers were mounting the red shirt in Sicily. Whereas we are your own kith and kin, speaking your own tongue, descended from your own Cavaliers, inseparably connected with you in a thousand ways—to say nothing of growing the cotton which gives employment to millions of your people.”

De Benham groaned in spirit. He was so weary of being reminded of those odd millions of cotton operatives!

“But that is nearly all true of the Northerners, as well,” said he. “They also are of our own blood—they also speak our language—with them, also, we maintain a great international trade.”

De Benham looked at her, almost silenced—not by her indignation, but by the splendour of her beauty.

“Indeed, no,” he said. “I am speaking impersonally—putting my own opinions altogether aside, and trying to show you in what different lights this question may be viewed on the other side of the Atlantic. There are many reasons why we English should hesitate to plunge into a great war. There is the terrible cost in blood and money; there is the still further check to our commerce; there are our Canadian colonies to be defended; and . . .”

He hesitated. He could not utter the thought that was in his mind. He could not say to her:—“Gallant and chivalrous as you are, descended from old English Cavaliers as you are, cotton growers as you are, your cause is stained with the sin of slavery; and on the side of slavery we may not, and will not, fight.” It was impossible that he should say this to Diana Ashby; so he broke off abruptly.

“And your sympathy for us is not strong enough to outweigh all those considerations,” she said, bitterly.

“Not at present,” he replied, “if I may judge from the tone of such English papers as I have seen of late.”

“Well, we can but go on as we have begun—alone. And we shall go on, to the last breath.”

And with this, she rose and swept away into the next room; and De Benham felt that some shade of displeasure against himself was mingled with the bitterness of her speech and the manner of her departure.

A few minutes later, when the guests were all taking leave, he again found himself for a moment alone with her.

“Miss Ashby,” he said, “you must not mistake me. I was speaking just now for England—not for myself.”

“What would you say, then, Mr. Debenham, if you spoke for yourself?” asked the lady.

“I would tell you that I am not a free man; that my hands are tied; that I am vowed to a duty which it will consume all the best years of my life to fulfil, and to which every other consideration must yield, for me. But I would also tell you that if it were not for that sacred obligation—if my life were my own to fling away; which it is not—then I would mount the palmetto tree and draw my sword for the Stars and Bars to-morrow.”

“Would you, indeed, do this, for my dear country’s sake?” she exclaimed eagerly.

And as she spoke, that look came into her eyes, that dark and dazzling fire, taking away his breath and his prudence together.

“I would do it—at all events—for yours,” he said, dropping his voice almost to a whisper.

Miss Ashby coloured crimson, and, Archie coming up at that moment to make his bow, she wished them both, somewhat formally, good night.

“That Janet Ashby is the sweetest girl I ever saw in my life,” said Archie enthusiastically, as they walked back to their hotel in the moonlight.

“Beware, my friend, beware of pitfalls,” replied De Benham. “The sweetest girl that breathes in Charleston city must be the sourest of sour grapes for thee—or me.”

“I don’t see that,” said Archie.

“No? Would you be prepared, then, to turn Confederate for her; or to run the blockade each time you paid her a visit?”

“Well, no—not exactly.”

“Neither would I, my dear fellow. Perhaps, on the whole, it is as well that we must be off again to-morrow night. These beautiful Southerners are dangerous neighbours.”

And then, for the rest of the way, he went singing:—

“If she be not fair for me, What care I how fair she be?”

IONA.

BY THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

FIRST PAPER.

DURING the months of summer and early autumn crowds of tourists take advantage of the excellent arrangements by which they are now enabled to visit Staffa and Iona. No two objects of interest could be more absolutely dissimilar in kind than these neighbouring islands, and nothing but the accident of geography could so unite their names. The number of those who can thoroughly understand and enjoy them both is probably very small. There can be no doubt which is the more popular of the two. The Aspects of Nature will always be more generally attractive than the History of Man. It requires no previous knowledge, and no preparation of the memory or of the imagination to be impressed by "Fingal's Cave." I have heard well-travelled men declare that nothing they had seen in any part of the world had ever produced such an effect upon them. There are many larger caverns—there are many more lofty cliffs. But there is nothing anywhere like that great Hall of Columns standing round their ocean-floor, and sending forth in ceaseless reverberations the solemn music of its waves. This is a scene which appeals to every eye, which all can understand, and which none are likely to forget. With Iona it is very different. Its interest lies altogether in human memories. The stranger must bring with him the knowledge and the reflection which can alone enable him to enjoy what is of real interest in the associations and in the appearance of the place. What he sees upon the Island will not help him much, and a great part of what has to be read about it, will help him less. The buildings which have risen and have decayed upon the ancient sites, and the controversies which have raged around them, belong, one and all, to times far removed from that in which the fame of Icolmkill arose. The most recent description of Iona, and perhaps also one of the most eloquent, is altogether misleading, and gives the traveller a very imperfect idea both of what he ought to remember and of what he may expect to find. And yet no one, perhaps, ever visited the Island who was in some respects better qualified to rejoice in its associations than the distinguished author of the "Monks of the West." But an indiscriminate admiration of mediæval superstitions, and the absence of all endeavour to sift fact from fiction in the narrative we possess of Columba's life, mar the reality of the picture which Montalembert gives us of the Past. Nor does the Present fare better in his hands. His disposition to extol the self-sacrifice of his hero, coupled with the incapacity of every Frenchman to understand any forms of natural beauty except those to which he has been accustomed, combine to make his description of Columba's adopted home in the highest degree fanciful and erroneous. It may well be, however, that different minds should find themselves attached by very different ties to the recollections of Iona, and that there should be a corresponding difference in the form which their impressions take. Its history touches an immense variety of interests—the migration of Races,—the rise of Nations,—the conquests of Christianity,—the developments of Belief. Without venturing into very deep waters on any of these subjects, something perhaps may yet be said which may be of interest to those who visit Iona, and to some also, it may be, who will never see it.

The first great interest of Iona lies in the age to which it takes us back. More than thirteen hundred years have now passed since Columba landed on its shores. It is very easy to speak of such numbers, or to write them; but it is not quite so easy to have before us a definite idea of the place occupied by the last thirteen centuries in the history of the world. Does the year of our Lord 563 appear to us a very ancient or a very modern date? This will depend entirely on the point of view from which we may choose to look at it. For there is no difficulty in placing ourselves in imagination in a much more distant age, and then when we turn and look in this direction, the sixth century of the Christian era will appear a long way on towards the present time. On the banks of the Nile it would seem an hour ago. Even on the banks of the Tiber it would not be old. On the other hand, when we measure thirteen hundred years by the changes they have brought, the days of Columba's ministry will appear remote indeed. And this method of taking our stand at different points of past time, and turning our face alternately in opposite directions, is the only way of estimating correctly the depths into which we look. For the tracts of Time are foreshortened like the tracts of Space. Very often, in a landscape, some difference, hardly perceptible, in the tints of blue, is all that distinguishes between mountains which are really separated by wide valleys, or by whole gulfs of sea. In like manner we forget the long intervals of unmemorable time that have elapsed between events at which we look across the space of more than a thousand years. And then, as the sunlight falls very unequally on different parts of a wide horizon, so does the light of History fall very unequally on different epochs of the past. On the sayings and the doings of some men, who are, nevertheless, among the Fathers of Mankind, it shines so brightly that we hear them speak as if they were speaking at our side; whilst there are many periods, some of them containing many centuries, which are much closer to us, but which lie, as it were, in hollows. We look across them. Columba's age is one of these. The eye ranges over it to those civilisations of the ancient world with which great historians and great poets have made us so familiar. Thus, in some aspects, the age of Caesar, or of Tacitus, may well seem nearer than the age of Adamnan or of Bede. And yet, if we suppose ourselves to be standing at that point of the history of Rome when her legions first landed in Britain, or a few years later, when the long line of her Emperors began, how far on, and how far down that line would the days of Columba seem! If a Roman of the time of Augustus had seen Rome as it was to be five hundred years later, he would have seen it as if the end of the world had come. And so it was—the end of the world which he knew and lived in. His eye would have ranged from Rome pushing her conquests on the Nile, the Danube, and the Clyde, to Rome deserted as the seat of government—taken and retaken by northern hordes, and pouring forth her senate and people to welcome with Imperial honours a barbarian King. And yet, to us, on the other hand, looking back to the days of Columba from the present time, they may well seem to belong to a world which has passed away. We have only to remember that Columba was the contemporary of Justinian and Belisarius; of the great Emperor, whose genius, or whose fortune, restored for a time the splendour of Roman government; and of the great General who re-established the supremacy of the Roman arms. These events seem to belong altogether to the ancient world. Not one of the great nations of modern Europe had yet been born. The very elements of which they are composed were only then being brought together. All Europe, and a large part of Asia, was one great encampment, not of armies merely, but of races on the march. Wave was following wave from the exhaustless breeding grounds of the North, sweeping away the dying civilisations of the world, but depositing a fruitful soil from which later civilisations were to rise. It was the seed-time of all our later harvests. Long before Columba's time these movements had begun. The first capture of Rome by the Gothic barbarians under Alaric, took place a little more than one hundred years before his birth. When he was yet a child, the Ostrogothic kingdom of Italy had come to an end, and the body of Theodoric had been laid in that massive tomb which still stands among the marshy suburbs of sad Ravenna. The conquest of Italy by the ferocious Lombards, which to this day connects their name with one of the fairest portions of that country, took place a few years later than Columba's settlement in Iona.

Such were the times to which that settlement takes us back—times of overwhelming and crushing calamity in all the ancient centres of arts, of letters, and of law. And yet, no sound of these calamities is heard in the calm narrative of Columba's life, as recorded by Adamnan. The petty quarrels of some Irish tribes, and the obscure battles which they fought, seem more important in the eyes of this biographer as fixing the date of the transactions he records, than the most famous contemporary events affecting the most famous countries of the world. It is as if he had never heard of them—as if the sound of them had never reached his ears. But equally unbroken is the silence he maintains on memorable events which were passing much nearer home. It was only a hundred years before Columba's birth that the Roman legions had been finally withdrawn from Britain. During a great part of that time—probably, during the whole of it—that country which was not yet known by the name of England, was still in the main a Roman colony. Some, certainly—probably many—of the towns and villas whose foundations and whose tessellated pavements are now uncovered only by the plough, or which lie buried under existing cities, were still, in Columba's childhood, the luxurious habitations of a Roman people. But the same great movements which had already overwhelmed the heart of the Empire, were now breaking with equal violence on its most distant shores. The old inhabitants of the soil, who had been subdued by the power of Rome, and in some degree also by her civilisation and her laws, were now harassed by the rude barbarians, who had with difficulty been kept at bay even by Trajan, and Severus, and Theodosius. Then the same expedient which everywhere marked the decline of a declining Empire, the employment of barbarians to resist barbarians, is said, in Britain also, to have been the immediate cause of the calamities which followed. Whether the story be true or not, that a British chief invited the Saxon stranger from across the German Sea, certain it is that somewhere about seventy years before Columba's birth, there began the invasion and second conquest of Britain by Angles, and Jutes, and Saxons. During the whole of his long life that conquest was being carried on, and it was only finally completed as nearly as possible about the period of his death. The Saxons had been then firmly established from the German Ocean to the Severn, and from the English Channel to the Frith of Forth.* And this was a conflict more ruthless, and a destruction more complete, than took place in any other Province of the Roman Empire. The Celtic inhabitants and the Roman colonists seem alike to have been destroyed. Their laws, their manners, their Christianity, their language, to a great extent even the very names of places, were swept away before a Pagan race. We know only the general results; we know very little of the details. It is an obscure time—a time of which there is no authentic contemporary record. When we think of it, we think of Caerleon, and of Camelot, and of Usk. Out of its broken memories, its traditions of heroic effort, and its sense of sad discomfiture, there arose, in later times, that noble cycle of romance touching the deeds of King Arthur and his Knights, which delighted our ancestors in the Middle Ages, and which again in our own time, and in a purer form, has been revived by Tennyson in immortal verse:—

"For when the Roman left us, and their law Relaxed its hold upon us, and the ways
Were filled with rapine, here and there a deed
Of prowess done redressed a random wrong.
But I was first of all the kings who drew
The knighthood errant of this realm, and all
The realms together under me their head,
In that fair order of my Table Round,
A glorious company, the flower of men,
To serve as models for the mighty world,
And be the fair beginning of a time."

And the sad work done by internal feuds in bringing in the Heathen and the Stranger is well embodied in the words addressed by the king to Guinevere:—

"Well is it that no child is born of thee:
The children born of thee are sword and fire,
Red ruin, and the breaking up of laws,
The craft of kindred, and the godless hosts
Of heathen swarming o'er the northern sea."*

So much for the place in secular history, to which we are taken back by the memories and associations of Iona. Let us now, standing on the same spot, lay down similar bearings in the history of the Church. And here the impressions of antiquity are less striking. The days of the Saxon conquests and of the Picts and Scots are days which, in all secular matters, belonged to a world altogether different from our own; but the relation in which they stand to the later history of the Church is by no means equally remote. There have been, indeed, many subsequent developments of doctrine and of practice. In the main, however, the theology and government of the Western Church had come, or was then just coming, to be very nearly what, until the Reformation, it subsequently remained. The first great battles of orthodoxy had been fought and won. Athanasius—and Ambrose—and Jerome—and Augustine, had lived and died. They had given form and consistency to that system of discipline and belief which was finally accepted, both by the Latin and Teutonic nations. The Priesthood had firmly established its power on the gratitude and in the superstitions of mankind. In proportion as the civil power declined, the spiritual power had risen on its decay. The organization through which this power was exerted had risen also by slow and insensible development. Like all strong things, it was not invented. It simply grew. An Order and an Office had been established in the Church, and was accepted as of divine origin, for which, in the narratives of the New Testament, there is not even a distinctive name. In and out of the Christian ministry the Episcopate had emerged, and out of the Episcopate the Papacy was emerging too. Both these Powers arose by a natural, if not by a necessary, process of development. All over the East the chief Pastors in the great cities, which were the centres of the old civilisation, had assumed positions always of influence, and sometimes of command. Among those cities, neither lapse of time nor accumulated misfortunes had destroyed the pre-eminence of the greatest Name of all; and in support of the Bishops of Rome, the ascendancy due to personal character had on some memorable occasions come in aid of the ascendancy due to traditional position. Under such circumstances, equality among provincial Bishops was not more likely to endure than equality among local clergy. The same motives of convenience in respect to government, and in respect to the centralisation of authority which operated in each particular community would operate not less powerfully to establish some one Head in the organization of the universal Church. And then the claim of Right and of Hereditary Succession which arose in the one case was sure to arise also in the other. The growth of opinion, out of which these two kinds of Primacy arose, has been, perhaps, as natural in the larger as in the smaller sphere. Theories are never wanting to account for facts; and those facts, which are in themselves only phenomena of Thought and developments of Belief, never fail to gather round them congenial interpretations of the Past. Traces of some special prominence in Peter, among the other Apostles, had been discerned or imagined in certain incidents connected with the early Church. Tradition had designated Rome as the scene of his last ministry, and of his martyrdom. The supposed spiritual Primacy of Peter, and the undoubted secular Primacy of Rome, had conspired to react upon each other in the minds of men. And so, at the beginning of the fifth century,—that is, about 120 years before Columba's birth, the lineal spiritual descent from St. Peter of the Bishops of Rome had become widely accredited in the Christian world.* The tremendous claims, indeed, which this tenet was made to bear were as yet appearing only in the germ; but during that century, immediately preceding Columba's time, the two Pontificates of Innocent I. (A.D. 402—17) and of Leo the Great (440—461) had laid deep the foundations of the Papal power. The last years of Columba's own life were contemporary with the Pontificate of the third great man by whom that power was consolidated, and from whose time forwards we are in the presence of the Mediæval Papacy. Gregory the Great was elected Pope in 590; that is, when Columba was seventy years of age, and after his ministry among the Picts and Scots had been carried on from Iona, for seven-and-twenty years. Before he died in 597, Columba must have heard much of that famous mission of the Roman Monk who came to convert the heathen People which had destroyed Christianity in so large a part of Britain, and from whose country such lovely fair-haired slaves had been brought to the market-place of Rome.

And here we come upon another point of immense interest at which Iona touches the general history of the Church. Columba represents one of the earlier forms of the monastic life, which seems to have materially differed from that which it assumed in the great Orders of mediæval times. And yet the first of those great Orders was founded in his day. As Columba was a contemporary of Justinian, and of Gregory the Great, so also he was a contemporary of the famed St. Benedict. Twenty-six years before Columba's birth, this remarkable man, then a youth of fourteen, flying from the corruption of Rome, had taken refuge in the caves of Subiaco. There he had moulded into a lasting form the Rule out of which arose the first great Orders of the West. Thirty-five years later, when Columba was still a child, Benedict had removed from holes in a precipice, to the summit of a mountain—fit emblem this migration—of the larger prospects which had opened to his gaze, and of the wide dominion which his Rule was destined to subdue. On the sunny ridge of Monte-Casino, which rises above the valley of the Liris, and commands a splendid panorama among the hills of Samnium and over the valleys of Campania, he had founded in 494 that retreat which for more than 1,300 years has been one of the most famous Monasteries of the world. But rapid as was the spread of the great monastic Order which poured forth its legions from this centre, more than a century elapsed before they reached the distant shores of Britain. For aught we know, Columba, though he survived him more than fifty years, never heard of the Rule of Benedict. What then was the monastic system in which Columba himself lived, and which he brought with him to Iona? This is a question respecting which there has been much controversy, but which, mainly the patient research of Irish antiquarians has solved with tolerable clearness. The interest which attaches to this question is considerable, but its importance may be very easily exaggerated or misunderstood. No special value can be set on the customs of religious life in the sixth century as necessarily affording any indication whatever either of the doctrine or of the practices of Primitive Christianity. Five hundred years is a time long enough for almost any amount of drift. We know what abuses had arisen even in the lifetime and under the eyes of those who had seen the Lord. We know more than this—we know those tendencies of our nature which make it impossible that corruptions should not arise. We know that one of the chiefest of the Apostles warned the clergy of Ephesus, and through them the whole Church, that they enjoyed no miraculous protection against the growth of error. In the same breath in which he told them they had all been made Overseers of the church by the Holy Ghost, he told them also that out of their own number men would arise speaking perverse things. Accordingly the very earliest Christian writings which have come down to us after those of the Apostles, bear upon their face the unmistakable marks of deviation and decline. It cannot be too constantly remembered, or too emphatically repeated, that there are no "Apostolic Fathers" except the Apostles. But later writers, in the several centuries to which they belong, are of immense interest in enabling us to trace the developments of belief and of practice which arise out of all those influences, external and internal, by which our conceptions of truth and of duty are so much determined. And so the life of St. Columba is of special value in enabling us to judge of the intervals that elapsed between certain waves of opinion which at successive periods were propelled from the ancient centres of Christendom, and which, each in turn, finally overspread the whole.

The belief in the virtues of a monastic life was one of these. The idea of it was indeed older than Christianity. In the far East, many centuries before the Christian era, Buddhism had devoted its thousands to dreamy contemplation. It had found a home also among the sects of Judaism, and the description given by Pliny of the Essenes who retired to the deserts of the Dead Sea, seems almost as if it had been drawn from the monks of a later age. In the earliest records of the Church, which are the records of the New Testament, we hear nothing of it. The community of property practised among the few first disciples, and the command addressed to the young man of great possessions to sell all and to follow Christ, have indeed been quoted as the beginning of, and the authority for, the life of monks. And certainly if it were true that Christ's life in any way resembled that life, then indeed in the command to follow Him we might see the authority to become an Anchorite or a Cenobite. But there does seem to be an essential difference between the life of Him who went about doing good, and of whom his enemies complained that He "ate and drank with publicans and sinners," and the life of men who stood on the top of pillars or hid themselves in the dens of beasts. Nevertheless it is easy to understand how even so grotesque a parallelism as this has arisen and was sure to rise. Self-sacrifice was the spirit of all Christian service. It was only in the natural course of things that men should forget the essential distinction between self-sacrifice for a good and wise purpose, and self-sacrifice for its own sake, or for purposes neither wise nor good. And the moment this distinction was forgotten, and religious enthusiasm took a wrong direction, there were powerful causes operating to cut deep and wide this new channel for the devotion of the Church. Many were disgusted by the frightful pollution of the Roman world. Many more were terrified by its overwhelming calamities. Perhaps, all things considered, no period in the history of the human race has been so widely miserable as the fourth and fifth centuries of the Christian era—when the Empire was breaking up, and when amidst an universal dissolution of manners, and famines, and the ruthless invasions of barbarous hosts, men looked for the end of the world and the terrors of the Judgment. No wonder if even wise and good men should have concluded in such a world that to leave it was the best thing to do. And so it had come to pass that whole populations had poured themselves into the Desert, and at one time in the course of the fourth century it was said that there were more men and women in the monasteries of the Thebaid than remained in all the cities of Egypt.

A great name in the history of the Church is connected with the spread of this passion in the West. When Athanasius came to Rome he planted its fervour there, and when exiled to the far banks of the Moselle, he imparted it into the rising Christianity of Gaul. We must not confound, however, under one common name the very great varieties of life which prevailed under different forms of the monastic system. It seems always to have been a life more active—less merely contemplative—in the West than in the East. The differences of natural character and genius are almost enough to account for this. It is difficult to conceive of any Roman, or of any Goth, or of any Celt, leading the life of Simeon Stylites. The early Monks of the West abjured, no doubt, domestic life, and they generally chose for their headquarters some retired spot among the mountains or in the forest, or some rock surrounded by the waves. "The bleak and barren isles," says Gibbon, "that rise out of the Tuscan sea from Serino to Lipari, were chosen by the Anchorites for the place of their voluntary exile." In some cases it may be true that they lived as Anchorets. But in many more they issued forth from their huts or cells to engage in the great work of their time—the work of spreading Christianity in the world. We know almost nothing in detail of the conversion of the northern nations. But it is certain that in this conversion the various religious communities of Cenobites were active agents. Like all other systems which involve any violation of natural laws, the monastic life was from the very first full of the element of corruption, and the gross abuses which everywhere arose became very soon intolerable. Montalembert complains in melancholy tones, and with touching candour, of that relaxation of morals "which the Religious Orders, by a mysterious and terrible judgment of God, have never been able to resist."* To those who believe that the laws of nature are God's laws, and cannot with impunity be disobeyed, however high may be the motives with which that disobedience is begun, this result will present no mystery at all. But where the impulses of religious zeal were kept pure by contact with the duties of an active public life, and by the noble work of missionary labour, the tendencies to corruption may long have been kept in check. And so it was, that at a time when monastic life in Italy had already become thoroughly corrupt, and when the rule of Benedict was being established as a great measure of reform, the early religious communities of the far West were still obedient to the rules of a virtuous discipline and of useful labour. This is the stage at which, and the aspect in which, the monastic lie appears in the early history of Iona. Ireland had never been subdued by the Roman arms, and its early Church thus came to occupy a somewhat isolated position in the world. It did not move under the same influences of development which determined the ecclesiastical system in other countries. In the time and in the country of Columba, the Celtic monasteries were not only the great missionary colleges of the Church, but they seem to have embraced and absorbed almost all that existed then of an ecclesiastical organization. Something of a Clan Connection under the rule of hereditary families is discernible in the different foundations, and the innate propensity of the Irish Celts to tribal feuds seems to have made these Bodies, in a very literal sense indeed, active members of the Church militant. And yet their religious zeal after its own type and fashion seems to have been of a genuine kind. The study of the Scriptures was universal, and the transcription of them was a passion. Manuscripts still remain which are believed on probable evidence to belong to this time, and tradition ascribes the exile of Columba to fierce contentions for a favourite copy. Nothing altogether like those old Monasteries existed elsewhere then, or have existed anywhere since that time. There were among the brethren members capable of discharging whatever varieties of function had as yet become distinctively assigned to the different branches of the Christian ministry. How far the more definite rules which now divide those functions, and which elsewhere had been long firmly established, had as yet reached the remote communities of "Scotia," there are, to say the least, serious doubts—doubts which have been very embarrassing to those who depend, in the highest matters, upon the perfect regularity of early times. Such priests as were called Bishops had no local spheres of jurisdiction. There were crowds of them; and although Columba seems to have been treated with great respect such wanderers from among them as came to Iona, they were everywhere entirely subordinate to the Monastic leaders, and they do not themselves appear to have been set apart in the manner which over the rest of Christendom had come to be regarded as necessary to the right constitution of the office. Long after the death of Columba, the Community he founded in Iona seems to have "ordained and sent forth bishops" under circumstances which look very much as if their mission was conferred by the collective authority of the brethren. If any Bishop was present at the consecration, which is a matter of inference only, he appears to have been regarded as the mere organ of the supreme authority of the Abbot and of the Body over which the Abbot presided. All these things have been terrible scandals to later ecclesiastical Historians, and have much exercised the ingenuity of Presbyterian and Episcopal controversialists. It is vain, however, to look, in the peculiarities of the Scoto-Irish Church, for the model either of Primitive practice, or of any modern system. As regards the theology of Columba's time, although it was not what we now understand as Roman, neither assuredly was it what we understand as Protestant. Montalembert boasts, and I think with truth, that in Columba's Life we have proof of the practice of auricular confession, of the invocation of saints, of confidence in their protection, of belief in transubstantiation of the practices of fasting and of penance, of prayers for the dead, of the sign of the cross in familiar—and it must be added—in most superstitious use. On the other hand there is no symptom of the worship or “cultus” of the Virgin, and not even an allusion to such an idea as the universal Bishopric of Rome, or to any special authority as seated there.

There is, however, one other aspect of Columba's religious life which is thoroughly mediæval, and that is the atmosphere of miracle in which the whole is presented to us. This is a subject which is full of real mystery. Adamnan wrote his famous Life within a hundred years after the great Abbot's death. He had spoken in his youth with men who had seen Columba. It is after an interval of time so short as this that a Biography is written, almost the sole object of which is to record the miracles, the prophecies, and the inspired sayings of the Saint. Some of the stories told are not only childish and utterly incredible, but of a character which makes it very difficult to understand how they could ever be seriously believed even in a very ignorant and a very superstitious age. To shut the book and never to open it again might well be our first impulse, when we are told, for example, of a Staff (Pastoral?) accidentally left upon the shore of Iona being transported across the sea by the prayers of Columba to meet its disconsolate owner when he landed somewhere on his way to Ireland. What are we to make of stories such as this? Did Adamnan himself believe them? Or had the pestilent doctrine already been established that frauds can be pious, and that falsehoods can be safely told in the interests of the faith? It is the fashion now to deal with this difficult subject only by evasion. Montalembert himself repeats all his narratives without letting us clearly understand whether he accepts all, or only some,—or whether he narrates them simply as part of the belief of the times,—as such and as nothing more. Perhaps devout Roman Catholics do not choose to put any question to themselves upon the subject. Believers of picturesque narratives care for the picturesqueness and for nothing else. Philosophical historians have recourse to such generalities as this: “History to be true must condescend to speak the language of legend. The belief of the times is part of the record of the times.”* This is all very well, but it is no explanation of the phenomena with which we have to deal; nor can it satisfy any mind which desires to understand them. To believe nothing of the truth of a narrative, and to believe everything of the truthfulness of the narrator, is rather a difficult mental operation. Yet this is very much what is generally offered to us now-a-days by way of compromise. I do not think it possible to explain all the narratives of Adamnan, and other narratives of the same kind, without ascribing much to the effect of deliberate invention. We know indeed what slight additions and alterations made in the telling of a story will transform its whole character after it has passed for a very short time from mouth to mouth, and we know, too, how this tendency to growth may be nourished to an almost unlimited degree in an atmosphere of credulity where nothing is considered as in itself improbable. It is to be observed, too, that Adamnan cannot have been an eye-witness of any of the wonders he records. But the minute and circumstantial details given by him in the story of the Staff, and in many others equally childish, can hardly be referred to mere traditionary legend. There is indeed another class of stories which are of a different character, and must be regarded from a very different point of view. I refer to those in which the wonder lies not so much in the facts alleged, as in the interpretations which are put upon them. These altogether depend on the predispositions of the mind, and the predisposition then was to see in all events nothing but their subserviency to the interests of the Christian Church. The escapes effected by Columba from perils by sea and land through the efficacy of his prayers belong to this class. Adamnan's Life is full of them. Putting aside the exaggerations of detail which transform the Providential into the Miraculous, this is to be remembered—that not only may such interpretations be sincere, but what is more, they may be true. Not even the fullest belief in what men vaguely call “The Supernatural” compels us to accept every manifestation of it which a puerile fancy or a superstitious purpose may invent. We are not shut up to the alternative of denying the possibility of Divine Power becoming unusually visible among men, or else of believing that it is exerted without reason, without measure, and without proportion of Means to Ends. The agencies which work in and through the characters of great men at great epochs of human history, and in the great achievements of their lives, are agencies which may either be called natural or supernatural according to our conception and definition of the term. They are spiritual agencies, and sometimes work in almost a visible manner, through unusual combinations of ordinary laws. Who can measure the power of minds endowed with extraordinary gifts? and who can say how extraordinary these gifts may not sometimes be? Over and over again in the history of the world, they have achieved apparent impossibilities, and have seemed as if yoking to their service the whole natural course and current of events. Many of the stories of Adamnan turn upon the possession by Columba of the gift of prophecy. There is nothing impossible in this. One prediction of Columba recorded by Adamnan, to which, in the next Paper, I shall have occasion to refer, has been in course of fulfilment during 1,300 years, and is being fulfilled now by every pilgrim who lands upon Iona. We must remember as a fact that Columba was an agent, and a principal agent, in one of the greatest events the world has ever seen, namely, the conversion of the Northern Nations. It is not surprising that in such times the providential ordering of events should make a deep impression on the minds of succeeding generations, and that almost every transaction connected with such men should be read in the light which shines from behind the veil. We are almost entirely ignorant of the natural means by which that conversion of the Northern Nations was effected. Such historians as have survived the centuries during which it was going on, are as silent as Adamnan on all the details which we should most desire to know. And yet in order to appreciate how marvellous this event was—how extraordinary the agencies must have been by which it was accomplished—we have only to remember that nothing of the same kind has happened for more than a thousand years. The world is still in large proportion heathen. Christianity is, indeed, still spreading, but mainly by the spread and migration of those races whose conversion was completed then. Converts are made here and there in our own time. But nowhere now—nowhere during a long course of centuries—have we seen whole nations accepting the Christian faith, and casting their idols to the moles and to the bats. What were the predisposing causes which led to this great movement among the Gothic and Celtic tribes? What was the condition of their own beliefs? What were to them the attractive elements in the new religion? What were the arguments addressed to them by Columba?

Could he quote to them as Paul did at Athens to the Greeks some things which “even their own poets had said?” It is really afflicting that Adamnan gives us no ray of light on these questions, so interesting, and so profoundly dark. One, at least, of the explanations so often given of the influences under which Christianity was extended cannot apply to the Picts of Caledonia. Christianity was not presented to them in alliance with the impressive aspects of Roman civilisation. The tramp of Roman legions had never been heard in the Highland glens, nor had their clans ever seen with awe the majesty and the power of Roman government. In the days of Columba, whatever tidings may have reached the Picts of Argyll or of Inverness, must have been tidings of Christian disaster and defeat. All the more must we be ready to believe that the man who at such a time, planted Christianity successfully among them, must have been a man of powerful character and of splendid gifts. There is no arguing against that great monument to Columba, which consists in the place he has secured in the memory of mankind.

The imperishable interest of Adamnan's book lies in the vivid though incidental touches of life and manners which he gives us in the telling of his tales—of life and manners as they were in that obscure but most fruitful time, when the light of ancient history had died away, and before the light of modern history had arisen. As regards Scotland, we get behind the age of History, and not only behind it, but behind it by many centuries. The history of Scotland, properly so called, begins with Malcolm Canmore; and before he was born, Columba had been gathered to his fathers for more than 400 years. Those who are very rigorous in the definition of History, and who demand for it as essential the existence of contemporary records, will find a much wider gap to be filled between the days of Columba and the beginning of Scottish history. Fordun and the other chroniclers, who are considered the fathers of that history, lived no less than 700 years later than the great apostle of the Picts. In the days of Adamnan, Scotland was not Scotland, but “Albyn.” “Scotia” was then the familiar name for that island which we now call Ireland. In like manner, England was not yet England, and the very foundation of its national life had not yet been laid.

It is in close contact with this dreamland of our national annals, this legendary and almost mythic age, that we find in Columba's Life, not only the firm foothold of history, but the vivid portraiture of an individual man. In regard to many contemporary events of the deepest interest, we have to grope our way to nothing better than probable conclusions, through the obscure data of philological research. Not one historical character of the time, in connection with any one of the races contending for the mastery in Britain, is in any similar degree known to us. On one spot, and one spot only, of British soil, there shines in this dark time a light, more vivid even than the light of common history—the light of personal anecdote and of domestic narrative. When we land upon Iona, we can feel that we are treading in the very footsteps of a man whom we have known in voice, in gesture, in habits, and in many peculiarities of character; and yet, of a man who walked on the same ground before the Heptarchy, when Roman cities still stood in Britain,* and when the ancient Christianised Celts of Britain were maintaining a doubtful contest with Teutonic heathenism.

In these memories the interest of Iona lies. In the next paper we shall land upon its shores, and see what is to be seen upon them.

THE WIDOW AND THE PRIEST.

By ROBERT LEIGHTON.

OUTSIDE our village, up within a croft,
Shelter'd from all the winds except the soft
Sweet clover breath that comes out of the west,
There lived a widow in a lonely nest.
A clay-built cottage in against a bank,
Choked up with brambles, docks, and nettles rank;
Before the door a small potato bed,
A bush or two of roses, white and red,
Some herbs we used to know in days of old,
As rue, and thyme, and balm, and marygold;
And one tall willow, in whose wiry top
A pair of pyots came to jibe and hop:
A sleepy place, but for the little stream
That brattled through the croft and broke its dream.

For thirty years of lonely widowhood
She strove to make ends meet as best she could;
Her chief support one small milk cow that housed
Within a little byre at night, and browsed
All day among the whins, or took a turn
About the herby borders of the burn:
And if she straggled from the widow's ken,
A gentle calling brought her back again.
And duly as the milking time came round
The little beast would at the door be found,
Crooming of well-filled udders. Little need
The widow had for watching, and indeed
Long hours within the willow shade would sit,
Or on some hillock in the sun, and knit
The coarse grey woollen stockings, which she sold
About the village when the days grew cold.
This with her scanty butter, milk, and cheese,
Made up her little stock in trade: and these Found ready market; for 'twas thought, and said
The natural herbs whereon her cow was fed Gave to the milk rare virtues, and in turn
The products of her chizzard and her churn.

Thus did she by her merchandise provide
The livelihood that never is denied
To honest careful labour, and could give
A portion to the priest as well as live.
But here it was her brooding trouble lay;
For left alone all through the thoughtful day,
With priestly terrors rankling in her brain,
And penal fears and everlasting pain,
She conjured up a load of outward sin
Far more than one might carry, and within A poor, weak, helpless soul. "Alas!" cried she,
"The holy Jesus never comes to me,
To loose me from this burden of my cares;
Nor will, save through a world of costly prayers:
And what can my small pittance do to bring
A poor old woman to her Lord and King!"

While thus she mourn'd, one day her priest, as oft
It was his wont to do, came up the croft.

"O, reverend father, Heaven's own peace and grace
Thou bearest with thee, shining in thy face!
Grant only that their sunshine fall on me,
And make me strong, yet thou no weaker be."

"Good woman, I have prayed for thee, and sure
Such loud and fervid prayers for one so poor
Never went up before. Peter and Paul,
The powerfulest among the older saints, and all
The weightiest of the new have been implored
That thou to Christian comfort be restored."

"Ah, woe is me! so many holy saints
To strengthen me, and yet my poor heart faints Beneath its load! Good father, what beside Is in thy power? Can nothing else be tried?"

"No, nothing else: I have already given
Thy money's worth in daily prayers to heaven,
And out of charity some aves more,
For which I ask no pay."

"And yet no door
Will open! Like a beggar I must wait
Pleading with all my rags outside the gate!
Will no good saint take pity? Would a prayer
To God's own mother Mary—"

"Woman, forbear!
Think'st thou a person of thy mean estate
Need look for what we grant but to the great?
No, no. 'Tis true the Virgin is alone,
Of all Heaven's holy hierarchy, the one
Through whom an intercession could not fail;
But what can thy small worldly means avail?"

"Ah, reverend father, in good Mary's sight
Perhaps my little, like the widow's mite,
Would find much favour: try, good father, try;
And if great faith be needed, that have I."

"Great faith is needed; but the price is much Above thy means, the intercession such As only wealth indulges in. Yet thou,
I just bethink me, hast a good milk cow—
And what are worldly goods to sins forgiven,
A cleansed heart, a place secured in heaven?
What profits it a man to gain the whole
Of earth, if, gaining that, he lose his soul?
And, earth possessing, it were well he gave
All up, if thereby he his soul could save."

Some while the widow sat without a word—

* The Roman city of Uriconium, the foundations of which have lately been uncovered by curious antiquarians, was destroyed by Ceawlin, King of Wessex, about 577, which is fourteen years after Columba's landing on Iona, and twenty years before his death. (Burton's "Hist. of Scot.," i. 33, 34.)

Although her breast with much unrest was stirred—Brooding with downcast eyes and thoughtful brow
Between her soul's salvation and her cow.
And when she spoke 'twas with a sigh :—

“Alas !

We know not what a day may bring to pass :
What need we set our hearts on worldly gear,
And death, that severs us and it, so near—
So ever near—that any footslip may

From all our clinging hoards snatch us away !
And then to die as unprepared as now !
O, reverend father, thou shalt have my cow.
But pray for me to Mary, mother in heaven,
On bended knees, till I am wholly shriven.”

It was agreed that he should pray and pray,
And keep the courts of heaven, both night and day,
For one whole week, with supplications plied—
Enough to purify a soul, though dyed

As black as sin itself—far more than lift
Her burthen off, and give her peaceful shift.
All that was needed on both sides was this—Unbounded faith on hers, fervour on his.
And for the rest, the cow might nibble there,
About the croft, until the Lammas fair,
A fortnight hence, when he would have her sold.

Meanwhile the widow's grief grew manifold.
If all those holy saints and all those prayers
Have fail'd to rid her of her sinful cares,

How great must these now be ! So greatly more Than ever she had dreamt they were before,
That even the Virgin's interceding word
Unto the bar of heaven may rise unheard !
And to her crowding sorrows she has now
To add the speedy parting with her cow :—

“Alas ! alas ! the world has never seen Such friends, poor Crum, as thou and I have been.
And must we part at last ! and must we part—
To save my soul—ay, ay—but break my heart !”

Then would she hang upon its neck, or gaze
 Into its eyes, until she thought a haze
 Rose from their deeps and gathered in a tear;
 And as the day grew nearer and more near
 When they must part, her fondness for the beast,
 Her fondness and her kindness, still increased.
 She moved beside it both by burn and brake,
 And sadly shared with it her oaten cake.

Now when the week of prayers was at an end,
 Up through the croft the priest was seen to wend,
 And coming on the widow and her cow,
 "Woman," said he, "how is it with thee now?"

"No better, reverend father, none, but worse;
 And all my life seems blacken'd with some curse
 That even holy church has not the power,
 I fear, to charm away, or priest to scour.

O, reverend father, hast thou pray'd thy best?"

"Good woman, I perceive thy great unrest Arises from a want of faith as great.

For one whole week I've prayed, early and late,
 For thee, and thee alone, and am assured
 Thy soul's salvation is right well secured.
 Believe it, just believe it is, and lo!

That very instant thou wilt find it so.

This want of faith, my woman, is thy hell:

Yes, think all well with thee, and all is well."

And, ere she well knew what to think or say,

He turned upon his heel and went away;

While in a trance of curious mute surprise,
 Up through the croft she track'd him with her eyes

Beyond the knolls, till through the upland gap
 His long, black, breezy skirts were seen to flap;

And then she sank into her own sad breast,
 As to the last extremity distress'd,

All outward trust cut off, the last hope gone,
 Her sole reliance in herself alone.

And long she brooded over her despair:—

"If I have but to think this week of prayer
 Has brought me peace from Heaven, why may I not Myself raise comfort by the power of thought?
 My thinking or his praying—which, ay which,
 It matters not. If I could think me rich,
 Believe myself a duchess or a queen,
 I should not feel that I am poor and mean.

If I can think away my sins, what need
 Of priest or holy church to intercede?"

But while she reason'd thus the priest's man came,
 With quick official strides. Said he, "Old dame,

I'm come to fetch the cow." She look'd him nay!

"Go back to him that sent thee, man, and say,
 He's got the cow: if not, be his the blame:

Tell him to think he has—it's all the same!"

And there was such commanding in her look

As plainly told the man that she could brook
 No parley with him; so he turned and left.

Alone again, she felt as one bereft

Of outward help or hope, and doubted whether

'Twere wise to break with priest and church together:

"For though they fail'd to rid me of my grief,
 The thought that yet they would, gave some relief.

But, now I've cast them off, I see their worth,
 And feel the desolation of this earth."

Her eyes fell on the damp earth where she stood,

And there a daisy in sweet solitude

Was meekly folding to the setting sun,
 And all around it not another one.

Its loneliness so touch'd her heart that she

Let go her sorrow, and on bended knee

Gazed deep into the being of the flower,
 And seem'd its sweet existence to devour:

"Dear God, dear God, what need have I to doubt
 Thy far-descending care, which leaves not out

Even this lowly daisy? Dear, dear, look!
 Within its leaves a spray-drop from the brook

Gleams like a star: Thy sun that rules the day
 E'en stoops to glorify a drop of spray!

O nothing is too lowly for Thy light,
 Nor any soul unworthy in Thy sight.

If this poor daisy, looking to the sky,
 Is dowered with such radiance, may not I,

By looking unto Thee, O God, receive
 The Spirit at whose touch all troubles leave?

When Thou Thyself didst walk this earth, God-Christ,

'Twas not the rich man, not the learned priest,
 That got Thy benedictions, but the poor,

Yea, even those that begged from door to door,
 And orphans, widows, all that were distress'd,

If they but kneel'd unto Thee and confess'd
 Their sins, as I do now, they rose up pure—

Lord of the lowly Thou, Friend of the poor!"

While thus she kneel'd she seem'd to look right through

This frame of earth that hides from mortal view
 The real world behind; and when she came Back to her common self, the glori-flame

 In which departed spirits, as 'tis said,

And all angelic beings are array'd,
 Came flickering with her, as if she had been

Within the unseen world behind the seen.

She rose with such meek majesty and grace,
 As though she had seen Jesus face to face.

And softly to her dumb companion talk'd
 Patting its neck, as side by side they walk'd

Along the croft unto their clay-built home,
 Where never more the priest was known to come.

SHORT ESSAYS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRIENDS IN COUNCIL."

SIXTH INSTALMENT.

"He died worth so much." Would that it could be said, He died worth so many. To "much" the proper substantive is money;
 to "many," friends.

Surely the best kind of property is affection:
 and at any rate it is the only kind you can carry with you to the grave.

How charming the young would be to talk to, with their freshness, fearlessness, and truthfulness, if only, to take a metaphor from painting, they would make more use of greys and other neutral tints, instead of dabbling on so ruthlessly the strongest positives in colour!

 It is, however, too much to ask from them to exhibit that moderation in the use of colour which only large experience, perhaps, can inculcate.

There was a man very notable for sagacity, who used to say that proportion is everything, and who marked his approbation or disapprobation of anything, by saying that it was proportionate or disproportionate. No doubt this is a very wise maxim, but like many of the same kind, rather too large for general application, requiring, indeed, something like infinite wisdom to apply it thoroughly.

Suppose you were to say, "That man gives a despicable amount of attention to this or that thing"—despicable, from its being too much, or too little; being, in fact, totally disproportionate. That the censure should be just, you must know the exact nature of the objects which the man censured is capable of attaining, and the relative attention which he is capable of giving to these objects.

"The applause of listening senates to command" may not be within his compass, whereas the making artificial flies may be; and it is unjust to blame him for giving so much attention to the latter object, which is the one within his reach.

In fact, to do rule-of-three sums, except when you are dealing with definite numbers and quantities—to do such sums, in short, for real life, is next to impossible.

What is it that promotes the most and the deepest thought in the human race? It is not learning; it is not the conduct of business; it is not even the impulse of the affections. It is suffering: and that, perhaps, is the reason why there is so much suffering in the world. The angel that went down to trouble the waters, and to make them healing, was not, perhaps, entrusted with so great a boon as the angel who benevolently inflicted upon the sufferers the diseases from which they suffered.

Old age in inanimate things is often likened to old age in man—an ancient ruined building, or an aged oak, to an old man; but the simile is very shallow, and somewhat derogatory to mankind. A far deeper resemblance is to be found in a tropical forest, or even in a single tree in such a forest—where fading leaves, brown from much endurance, young buds, ripe fruit, green bright foliage, and dead branches present themselves at once to your sight, and give you all the seasons at one time. So it is with man. You may notice outward or even inward signs of decadence and decay; but, simultaneously, there are hopes, aspirations, affections, in all stages of growth and development—nascent, virile, and decadent.

It is not only the aged statesman who adheres to life, and who when dying, still takes the keenest interest in the affairs of this world. But poor peasants do the same; and the dying rustic will brighten up at a bit of farm news.

It is a great motive for tolerance to reflect that the men who differ from you most in opinion, may most resemble you in nature—may be most like you in heart and soul. Many a theologian, in former days, has helped to burn a man who was almost to him a second self; whereas he left unmolested the worldly man who, differing from him in all the deeper emotions of the soul, did not care to differ from him in matters of religious opinion.

The most common-place people become highly imaginative when they are in a passion. Whole dramas of insult, injury, and wrong pass before their minds—efforts of creative genius, for there is sometimes not a fact to go upon. Shakespeare's lesser genius required some chronicle, or fable, to work upon for his poor plays; but an angry person's tragedies require no adventitious aids and accessories, resting solely upon the creative power of an imagination inflamed by anger.

No man asks another how much money he possesses. Are there not other matters in which reticence is equally required from the would-be questioner? Questions have given more offence than perhaps any other mode of speech. If silence is golden, and speech is silvery, that peculiar form of speech called questioning is, for the most part, brazen.

When you find yourself unpopular with those amongst whom you live, or with the world in general, do not ask yourself what you have done, but what you have said, to produce this unpopularity.

There is an evil (it is but a small one) which I suspect is produced by long periods of peace and tranquillity in a nation. It is that people cease to speak plainly and distinctly. At least that is the only way in which I can account for the singular indistinctness which pervades English talking. That this indistinctness does exist, is a statement in which I am supported, I believe, by the greatest musical teachers, who say that one of their main difficulties, in teaching English people to sing, is to make them open their mouths properly. Now we do not find that the English in former days were blamed for indistinctness of speech. No doubt they spoke out very plainly at the Norman conquest—during all our numerous civil wars—during the contest between Charles and his parliament—at the Restoration, and at the Revolution of 1688. But it may be doubted whether they have well opened their mouths to speak since that time, unless indeed during their contest with Napoleon the First. The long period of peace since that time has afforded the means of cultivating many arts and sciences; but the art of speaking distinctly has dwindled down into the art of concealing thought by painful indistinctness of speech.

This may be a fanciful mode of explaining the phenomenon; and it may be urged that the notion which has become fashionable, that it is desirable to conceal, if not to repress, all emotions, has conduced to this result of indistinctness of speech.

There is no doubt, however, that this indistinctness is a great drawback upon the pleasure of social intercourse.

One way of bringing home to most people's apprehension the prevalence of the indistinctness of speech would be, to ask them to note down the number of times in each day in which they may observe that the word "what" is used, and that a sentence is obliged to be repeated again. This occasions a sad loss of time; and a busy people should recognise the fact that business is much hindered by this constant repetition.

There are no words in the English language used so confusedly one for the other, as the words rule and principle. You constantly see or hear the word principle used when it is only a rule that is in question.

The attendant verbs show the difference between the substantives rule and principle. You can make a rule; you cannot make a principle: you can lay down a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, lay down a principle. It is laid down for you. You can establish a rule; you cannot, properly speaking, establish a principle. You can only declare it. Rules are within your power: principles are not. Yet the mass of mankind use the words as if they had exactly similar meanings, and choose one or the other, as may best suit the rhythm of the sentence.

The intense individuality which is to be observed in mankind—an individuality so all-pervading, that a profound observer of mankind will admit that no one character is really similar to any other character—is an antidote to the effects that otherwise would be produced by pungent criticism, just satire, good advice, and dramatic similitude.

This is a saying which requires careful explanation and exemplification.

Why is it that the wisest advice, criticism, and satire fail to strike home? It is because the person advised, criticised, or satirised, feels, and, to a certain extent, rightly feels, that what is said does not thoroughly apply to him or her; because, after all, his or her character is not really like the character advised, satirised, or criticised.

To illustrate what is meant by this maxim I will take the case of what I mean by dramatic similitude. You are reading aloud an essay, or a play, or a novel; and, in the course of your reading, you come upon a character, not an agreeable one, which is, as you think, exactly similar to the character of some one in the company. You become very hot; you hardly dare look up: you suffer, sympathetically, from the pain which you fear that you are giving to that person. You need not, however, have disturbed yourself in this way. You look up, with fear and trembling, and you find that your friend, or your relation, does not perceive the resemblance at all; and, from his or her comments, you learn that he or she is in the condition, ironically described by Hamlet, when he says, "Let the gall'd jade wince, our withers are unwrung."

This proceeds, as I intimated before, from the intense individuality of every man, and every woman, amongst us. It may be quite true, that the man or woman in question is vain, proud, exacting, quarrelsome, turbulent, or tiresome, as the character in the novel or the play you are reading. But it is a thousand chances to one that the species of vanity, pride, turbulence, or tiresomeness is exactly of the same nature. Consequently, though you think the cap fits, your auditor or auditress entirely declines to put it on; and the severe comments in the novel, or the essay, or the play, fall off from him, or her, as water from a duck's back. Not a feather is wetted or ruffled.

This, at first sight, appears to be a great misfortune; but, after all, the human race would be too malleable, would be too easily formed after one model by satire, advice, criticism, and dramatic representation, if there were not this intense and saving individuality of character.

"Great Sun, all-powerful Lord of Day, I prithee melt the snow upon the mountain tops, for I am very poor and weak, and need much sustenance."

Thus prayed a tiny rivulet which wound its downward way, amidst great rocks, into the plains below. There had been a long-continued drought; the water-mosses stood high up upon the stepping stones; the resting-places of the rivulet were but small puddles instead of ample pools; and it sang but a thin and wiry song, like that of a great singer who has long passed his prime. In short, the rivulet feared that it was going to die.

The gracious Sun rose higher in its might, and melted the snow upon the mountains; and the rivulet became a rushing, furious, eddying mountain stream.

In the first flow of thankfulness, it asked the Sun what it should do to prove its gratitude.

The Sun replied, "Impetuous mountain stream, I need nothing now, but I would, that when you descend into the plains, you should send up clouds to me, for I am weary of seeing the mean ways of men; and the odours of their great cities are not pleasant to me."

The mountain stream rushed down into the plain; but, there, meeting with a chasm in the earth, the principal part of the current descended into that chasm to seek for coolness. What little water was left took its pleasure in burying itself in a sandy district that was near to the chasm. The forgetful stream did not send up a single cloud to interpose its fleecy self between the Sun and the mean ways of men, and the odours of their noisome cities.

The gracious Sun went on melting the snows, for the benefactor is never tired of benefiting; but it said to itself, "The mountain stream, approaching the great cities of the plains, has imbibed somewhat of the ungenerous nature of mankind, and is only grateful in the first moment of gratitude. I see that if you want a return for good services, you must ask for it at once."

Nothing is more undramatic than that which the drama purposes to represent—viz., real life. Let any man reflect upon the important events, either in domestic, social, or public life, which he has witnessed, and will he not say that, for the most part, they were conducted in a very tame, haphazard, and common-place manner?

Then, again, the drama, with all the skill that may be expended upon it, must fail to represent the lengthiness and dreariness of large portions of human life and human endeavour. The perseverance and the resolution which are shown in awaiting events can never be represented on the stage. How is one to represent a "masterly inactivity?" How is one to represent the carrying on of a long course of policy by a statesman?

Again—and this, though a slight matter of detail, affords a very notable difference between the drama and real life—how is one to represent abject poverty upon the stage, where everything is so large? People can walk up and down their rooms on the stage and make fine speeches with due emphasis. But one of the greatest miseries of poverty in real life is in the limited space and the over-crowding.

Again, nobody has time or inclination to use good metaphors in real life; and, as for dialogue in real life, it consists in a constant series of interruptions; and the most important conclusions are often arrived at by several people talking at once and not listening to one another.

Besides, in real life, the greatest affairs are settled by something that is written down. On the stage the document is accepted or rejected at once; in real life it undergoes an immensity of verbal criticism,—the most prosaic and undramatic thing in the world to witness.

When war is about to be decided upon by the chiefs of a nation, these chiefs, even when they are in levée dress, and when Lord Russell or Lord Palmerston is Prime Ministers, do not draw their swords, as in the Trovatore—now advancing, now receding from the footlights, and exclaiming "How they prefer death to dishonour!" or any other operatic sentiment. There is no "suoni la tromba" to encourage them; but a number of middle-aged and elderly gentlemen, sitting round a table, listen to a long document, much conned over before, the result of many erasures and manifold interlineations. The somnolency which is apt to attend the reading of long documents, and which is, perhaps, the best reward for writing them, prevails; or, at least, some wicked wags, who will make fun of anything, declare that it prevails; and thus, very undramatically, a great war is initiated.

There was much discussion, in a company of thoughtful persons, about the main divisions in which men and women might be classified. One of the company said, "The widest and deepest distinction that I know of, is that which divides men into 'good-natured' and 'ill-natured.' I admit that there are certain intellectual distinctions that appear to be well-defined, viz., that all men are, whether consciously or unconsciously, followers of Plato or Aristotle; and I dare say that anybody who thoroughly understands the distinction between 'objective' and 'subjective,' divides men into two classes, the one considering everything objectively, the other subjectively. But I maintain that mine is the most important, if not the widest distinction. By 'good-natured' and 'ill-natured' I do not mean 'good-tempered' and 'ill-tempered.' The variety in tempers depends much upon matters which are upon the surface, such as the different degrees of nervousness of temperament; but the distinction I allude to goes deep down into the character. The man who is blessed with a 'good nature' wishes for everything to turn out well. Of nations, of individuals, of political changes, of personal disputes, he is always desiring that the outcome may be good. If the Manichæan theory were true, he would always be found on the side of the 'Good Being,' while the other man is on the side of the 'Evil Being.' The conduct of the good-natured man may not be irreproachable; on the contrary, he may have many vices, but somehow he has chosen the right side, and is always wishing for it to prevail, even if, in his own person, he sometimes lends an unwilling assistance to the opposite side. King David was on the right side."

Now this may seem to you a poor and shallow classification; but just try it in real life for some time, and see whether you cannot range all the men whose characters you know well, under one or other of the opposing banners.

I do not know that there is anything, except it be humility, which is so valuable as an incident of education as accuracy. And accuracy can be taught. Direct lies told to the world are as dust in the balance when weighed against the falsehoods of inaccuracy. These are the fatal things. And they are all-pervading. I scarcely care what is taught to the young if it will but implant in them the habit of accuracy.

Now, look at the matter in this light. Take the speech of any man for any given day. For once that he wilfully gives a wrong colour (with an eye to his own interests) to anything which he states or narrates, he mistakes or misdescribes twenty times, on account of his inability to tell anything accurately.

Besides, there is this important result from a habit of accuracy, that it produces truthfulness, even on those occasions where a man would be tempted to be untruthful. He gradually gets to love accuracy more even than his own interests: at last he has a passion for accuracy.

There is frequent discussion in the present day as to what people should learn. Some say, natural sciences, some say languages, some say art, some say those especial arts by which a living is gained.

It appears to me that there are three great points to be aimed at in the choice of subjects for early education. The first is, that something should be chosen to educate upon which is difficult, which, therefore, requires continuity and severity of attention, and which also demands accuracy.

2. This something should be a something which does not demand qualities that are not early developed in the young. That is why I object to Latin verses and to composition, generally. The persons who are able to compose early (except musicians) are persons who have a great talent for plagiarizing and for the humblest forms of assimilation. These powers ought not to be encouraged, for they dwarf originality.

3. Let the thing to be studied, be something which is to a certain extent remote from common life; for a man is but half a man whose knowledge is bounded by the study of the art by which he gains his daily bread.

In addition to the foregoing maxims, I would lay down the rule that whatever you choose as subjects for study, try to make the student care for study in general. I mean, insert into his mind, if you can, a love and a desire for knowledge. He is only to be under you educators for a few years. What a triumph it is for you, if, while he is under your care, you influence him in such a manner that you make study a thing of delight to him! And what a failure it is, if you so disgust him with the acquisition of knowledge, that he throws you and your books overboard as things which are done with, when he comes to what are fondly called years of discretion!

Pursuing this subject of education, I should say that every well-educated man or woman ought to have that knowledge of mathematics which may be gained from the first five books of Euclid. You may be sure that no one ever mastered these first five books without becoming ever afterwards a better reasoner. And, even in domestic life, it is the greatest comfort to have to deal with people who can appreciate and abide by the first principles of reasoning.

It is a strange thing to chronicle, but in England we often confer honour upon a man when he meets with misfortune, and because he meets with misfortune. A county member, after a hard fight, loses an election. We forthwith make him a peer. Or a man loses an appointment, or quits it from old age. Forthwith there is a knighthood or a baronetcy for him. This is very kind; but it may be doubted whether, for the service of the State, it would not be well to confer honour upon a man when he is in full vigour, and when it will add force to him at a time when he is forcible—when, to use an Irish expression, it will give “more power to his elbow.” These “consolation” honours, though very humane, are not the most beneficial to the State.

PEEPS AT THE FAR EAST.

BY THE EDITOR.

VII.—VELLORE AND BANGALORE.

VELLORE and Bangalore being connected by railway with the capital of the Presidency, our visits to these places formed agreeable interludes in our stay at Madras.

Vellore is upwards of eighty miles distant. We passed it en route when coming from the west, so that in visiting it we had to return along the line of our previous journey. The railway, although laid across a dead flat plain, is flanked the whole way by a picturesque range of hills some miles distant. The town is very beautifully situated in a bay within the hills to the south. The outlines of these hills are extremely varied, fantastic, and striking. Here is a bit of the sky-line as seen from the railway at sunset:—

The station is two or three miles from the town, which we approached by a very long bridge. The necessity for these long bridges results from the rise of the rivers in the rainy season. In the dry season the water dwindles into a narrow but respectable stream which makes its way through a vast breadth of bleached shingle and sand. This enables us to form some idea of its size in the rainy season, when it expands and rushes on in majestic volume. Such contrasts as are seen in India between the rivers during the dry and the wet seasons are nowhere else visible. Hence the long roll and roar one hears at night as the train for a mile or so dashes across some bridge which connects the distant banks of what is at one season merely a strip of Arabia Petrea, and at another a full flooded stream.

What most strikes one at Vellore is, as I have already said, the beautiful scenery of its enclosing hills, and the remains of old Mahratta Forts, built nearly four centuries ago by the father of Sivaji, the famous founder of the Mahratta power. Low walls encircle the summits of the hills like large sheepfolds. These must have been powerful defences against bows and arrows, or even matchlocks, but useless when attacked under cover of shot and shell.

When Mysore was finally conquered, Vellore was the place of residence assigned to the numerous family—twelve sons and six daughters—of Tippoo Saib, after his death at Seringapatam. They had many retainers; and this court, like other Mussulman courts, became a centre of intrigue, so cunning as to make it difficult of detection, and yet so stupid and senseless as to be quite unavailing in the end. It is thus that the name of Vellore is associated with the mutiny of 1806. Some martinet innovations had been forced upon the troops—such as making them obliterate their caste marks, trim their whiskers and beards, and wear turbans of a particular fashion. The result was a sudden outbreak, which was prepared for cautiously, as in 1857, by the Sepoys (who veiled their thirst for revenge under pretended kindness and innocence), and allowed to come to a head by the commander, who pooh-poohed the possibility of any rising, although warned a month before of the existence of a conspiracy. Missions, or missionaries, were said to be mixed up with it and blamed for it by some of those who are always ready to disparage missionary work.

The mutiny ended, of course, in bloody reprisals. We could not afford to tolerate any pirates in a ship so great as India, and with so few Englishmen on board. Thirteen European officers and eighty-two privates were killed. Three native officers and fourteen non-commissioned officers were afterwards executed.

It is an old story now! The Duke of Wellington was known then only as General Wellesley, and had not entered on the Peninsular War. Yet on the day on which we visited Vellore, and ordained a native pastor, a soldier communicated at the English Church who fought in the mutiny!

The ditch of the old fort, they say, used to be kept full of alligators, to prevent ingress or egress to the garrison through swimming. There is a story told of a Highland sergeant who dared to swim across and encounter these behemoths. It is said that he actually accomplished the bold feat, but not without having been dragged under water—the monster, I presume, getting hold of the kilt, but missing its wearer.

There is a very beautiful pagoda within the fort, covered in some parts with the richest and boldest carvings I had yet seen. But it is now a barrack, without priests and without ceremonies. The idols' chambers have become the homes of bats.

We received much kindness at Vellore, as at all other places in India. The English chaplain gave us the use of his church for our ordination service, affording another instance of the catholic spirit manifested by the different Christian Churches in India.

One striking feature of the scenery on the way to Bangalore—about two hundred miles from Madras—is the remarkable disintegration in the hills, which rise from the plain towards the higher plateau, where Bangalore itself is situated, about three thousand feet above the level of the sea. It requires some such illustration as I have given (p. 552) to convey any idea of the strange appearance of these huge granite blocks piled up in the strangest manner. Yet few of them have moved, except when their props have given way. The whole is the result of "weathering," together with the crumbling of the softer parts of the granite, as though portions of the mass had been united by seams of ice, which, melting, left but isolated blocks. Had we passed such tumuli of rocks at home, we should at first sight have put them down to glacier moraines, or judged they were the discharged cargoes of icebergs which had foundered and disappeared ages ago in ancient seas.

These hills commence just after leaving the Jolapert junction, where we begin to ascend the ghaut which connects the lower plain with the upper plateau. They give great interest and character to the scenery along this portion of the line. The same kind of island-like hills which I noticed dotting the plain as we journeyed from Beypore, are also marked features in the landscape.

Judging from what meets the eye in travelling, there is no small amount of prosperity among the people. I was much struck by the numerous flocks of sheep and goats—the villages to which they belonged being sometimes concealed. There were also signs of extensive cultivation. The success of the cultivation here, as in India generally, depends on irrigation, which is accomplished by immense canals sending their waters through innumerable veins. From a difference in the physical condition of Southern India, its irrigation depends on tanks, in some cases like small lakes, formed either from the damming up of streams, or the collecting of the surface drainage of the country. This makes the South depend much more than the North, with its great river system, on the rains of the monsoons. If the rain falls not, of what use are tanks?

We have not so much to build tanks in many districts, as to repair and restore them. The native rulers, built them, but, alas! the Mahrattas often destroyed them.

Much has been said and written upon the Ryotwari, or land revenue settlement of Madras. It was established by that eminent and good man Sir Thomas Munro about sixty years ago. A very admirable pamphlet, now before me, on the subject of "the Land Tenure of Southern India," was published in 1866 in Madras by "a Madras Civilian"—I believe Mr. Dalyell, the well-known and able secretary to the Board of Revenue. Another distinguished civilian has hastily jotted down for my information some notes which he must pardon me for publishing in his own words rather than in mine, for the better information of those who feel interested in this subject.

" The oldest Hindu law defines the state right in the cultivated land to be a certain proportion of the crop, claimable from the cultivator.

"By implication, then, it recognises a right of occupation subject to the condition of making this payment to the state. And this is the keystone of the whole structure.

"The government now recognises in the Ryot practically a proprietary right in the land he occupies, subject to the payment of the money value of the state share in the crop which it is qualified to produce under ordinary tillage; the Ryot being at liberty to relinquish at pleasure, in the proper season, any portion of his holding, and thereby to release himself from the government demand on account of that portion.

"In bad seasons he can claim a remission of the demand, in part or whole, according to circumstances.

"In the division of the assessment of the government demand which is now being made in combination with a scientific field survey, the share of government is limited to one-half of the net produce, after deducting all costs of cultivation and making certain percentage allowances to cover ordinary risks of season and unculturable areas, as fences, paths, threshing-floor, &c., &c.

"The fields are classed with reference to quality in a few grades of moderately wide range, and their productive powers determined by experiment and a kind of jury of experts among the villagers.

"The fact of the land being irrigable, or otherwise, goes far to determine what kind of crop it is capable of producing.

"The government share of the crop is then computed for a cash payment on the average of the market prices over an extended period of years, and this money-rate remains fixed for a long period of years (nowhere less than thirty), so far, at least, as any enhancement of the government demand is concerned.

"It is readily modified by reduction, either permanent, if the original assessment proves to have been excessive, or temporary, if merely necessitated by some disastrous season, epidemic disease among cattle, damage to the irrigation works, or similar exceptional causes.

"The Ryot receives from the government officers a document (puttah) which declares the extent of his holding in fields, giving their numbers in the village register, their individual class, area, rate per acre, and total tax; and an annual settlement of the government demand (jumma bundy), is held to allow of any additions or reductions being made to this document, and to adjust all claims to remission. This is held in different parts of the district by the divisional officers, and no Ryot need attend unless he chooses, nor is his attendance in any way necessary unless some change has to be made in his puttah. This document has been declared by the highest court in the land, the judicial committee of the Privy Council, to be 'not a muniment of title, but an evidence of holding.' The title is, in fact, derived from the immemorial custom to which I before alluded, and is absolute against all comers, so long as the government dues are paid. It can be sold, mortgaged, bequeathed, or alienated, as the possessor pleases. It is subject to the laws of succession and inheritance precisely as any other property.

"In fact, the Ryotwari system views and strives to maintain the Ryot in the position of a proprietor of a landed estate, subject to a land tax, but at liberty to relinquish any portion of his estate that he may deem valueless to the state, and thereby to free himself from any tax on account of such portion. The system admits of the utmost accumulation or distribution of land. A Ryot may hold one or one thousand acres, or more.

"The well-working of the system depends on the fairness of the assessment of the government demand, and no effort is spared to adjust this as equitably as care and science can secure.

"When this end is attained, there is ample margin for a landlord's rent, and the Ryot sub-lets to under tenants all land which he does not wish to keep in his own hands, and pays the government tax on his entire holding out of his rent.

"We have every reason to hope that this class of wealthy Ryot is rapidly increasing partly from the removal of whatever was oppressive in the assessment of the government tax, partly from the great rise in prices, the whole benefit of which goes into the Ryot's pocket, except when at long intervals of years, a re-valuation of the government share in the crop is made with reference to the prices ruling during an extended series of years, including the most recent."*

To return now to our journey. Such of the villages as were visible from the railway were very pleasing, with their thatch of palm-leaves covered over by masses of creepers in full bloom. Every village has its little temple for worship. In the woods which clothe the hill-sides there are abundance of bears and other wild beasts. There are everywhere visible, small booths protected from the sun, and set on four supports, which are seven or eight feet high. In these the shepherds watch at night to frighten off the wild beasts from injuring the crops. They are somewhat like this.

The climate was sensibly cooler when we reached Bangalore, the fresh elastic air of which was quite invigorating.

Bangalore is one of the pleasantest military stations in India. It consists of two distinct portions. The old fort, with the native town or Pettah under its once protecting shadow, forms quite a town in itself; while the military cantonments and European residences at a little distance, might be in a different world, so far as community of manners, habits, and ideas are concerned. The fort is now used for public offices; and the old palace of Tippoo, in its Tartar-looking orientalism, if I may so describe it, looks more peculiar than imposing. The rooms and audience chamber which were once crowded with the wild and dashing followers of that able despot, are now business-like apartments. Red tape bundles of papers and maps, and all the signs of European organization, are seen here, and are presided over by old officers and competition Wallahs, attended by white-robed and most obedient humble servants in cool and elegant costumes.

The fort (see p. 560) was a powerful one, and its storming, with that of the gate of the Pettah, was a desperate conflict, which cost many brave lives. A monument on the spot where most of the men fell commemorates the event. The well where Sir David Baird was Revenue Report for Madras for the year ending 1867. The facts there recorded seem to strengthen all that has been already said condemnatory of the Madras Revenue settlement as contrasted, for instance, with the permanent thirty years' settlement of Northern India. It tells a sad tale regarding the poverty of the Ryots, that out of 2,865,485 there are only 384 who pay, say, £100 a year of land tax;—that of the whole number more than one half pay less than £1 per annum; that the average land tax—which is practically their only rent—paid by each large holder is about 26s. per annum. Though the ryots increase in number, they do not increase in wealth. These facts will soon compel a revision of the Ryotwari system of Madras.

* Since the above was written we have seen, in the admirable paper, The Friend of India, a notice of Mr. Dalryell's compelled to draw water for the daily amusement of the ladies of the Harem, is still to be seen in a small court full of weeds and rubbish, a solitary tree marking what was once the ladies' flower garden. The Harem itself has gone to decay, although the windows, which were once filled with fair faces, remain to hint of the former history of the place. The sleeping rooms are mere closets, muggy and close, with little air and little light. The cell where Sir David was confined near the gate, may yet be seen, although, from some obstruction or other, we did not get access to it. We could not but remember the commiseration expressed by his old Scotch mother—not, however, for her son, but for the unfortunate man who was "chained to oor Davie!" But the draw-well, chain, and all, had probably subdued his impetuous temper. Tippoo was cruel to his prisoners. I was told that many memorials of such treatment have been inscribed by Englishmen on the rocky walls of his old prison-house high up on the neighbouring hills.

The native city has nothing peculiar about it. We saw what we had so often seen before—the same narrow and crowded streets or lanes, the same tumble-down houses, the same kinds of bazaars, with the same products from East and West, presided over by the same lanky, white-robed, turbaned skeletons. Most of the houses in the less public streets have little courts attached to them, connected with the busy thoroughfare by a gate. Sheep, or goats, or cattle are, I believe, confined in these courts during the night. We entered one of them, and saw the weaving of silk in the old Indian loom sunk in the earth. The weavers were waited on by women, who arranged the golden skeins and balls.

The European quarter is as different from the Pettah as Belgravia is from the East-end of London. Here the houses are in their own "compounds," with shrubs and flower gardens quite fresh and blooming. Open, park-like spaces meet the eye everywhere, with broad roads as smooth and beautiful as the most finished in England. Equipages whirl along; and ladies and gentlemen ride by on horseback. One catches a glimpse of a church tower or steeple; and these things, together with the genial air, make one feel once more at home—at all events, in a bit of territory which seems cut out of home and settled in India. There are delightful drives, among others one to the Lal-Bagh, laid out in the last century by Hyder Ali.

Our home feeling was greatly intensified by attending a flower show, although it was the last week of December. There was the usual military band; and crowds of carriages conveyed fashionable parties to the entrance. Military officers, and civil servants of every grade were there, up to Mr. Bowring, the Chief Commissioner of Mysore, distinguishable by the extreme simplicity of his attire, and the absence of all that could attract the eye. He is, I believe, an able administrator.

The most remarkable and interesting spectacles to me were the splendid vegetables of every kind, including potatoes which would have delighted an Irishman; leeks and onions to be remembered like those of Egypt; cabbages, turnips, cauliflowers, pease, beans, such as England could hardly equal; splendid fruit—apples, peaches, oranges, figs, and pomegranates, the display culminating in a magnificent array of flowers, none of which pleased me more than the beautiful roses, so redolent of home! Such were the sights of a winter's day in Bangalore.

Among other beauties the show was not wanting in fair ladies, although I do not remember them so well as I do the native boys, grandsons of Parneah, the able and famous Brahmin minister of the deposed Rajah of Mysore. These lads appeared perfect ideals of high breeding and Oriental beauty. The delicate and refined outline of their features, and the glory of their quiet eyes, with their pure white robes and turbans, made me accept for the first time the idea of angels with bronzed skin, passing into mellow gold.

Another incident at Bangalore which lives vividly in my memory, was a visit paid by my friend and myself to its most famous Pagoda. A great guru was holding his visitation of the district, and we wished to see him. Hindooism, as I shall immediately show, is divided into an infinitely greater number of sects than Christianity or any other religion. These are separated from each other, too, by social barriers, such as never divided even the Quaker from the Papist. Now each sect has gurus, which means "masters." The guru is not a priest who ministers in the temple, nor is he necessarily a Brahmin, but rather, like a Romanist "guide," an ecclesiastic who is invested with the power of settling such questions as affect caste—its duties and ceremonies, as well as expulsion from it or admission into it. The number and various ranks of the gurus are determined by the importance and extent of the caste which they govern. A large and influential caste has several principal gurus together with hundreds of inferior ones, occupying chief cities, and visiting their respective districts, perhaps annually and with great pomp and dignity, if the districts are rich in dues and presents. A great guru or "Pontiff" wields despotic power. His curse is dreaded more than death, and his blessing most eagerly purchased. He imposes his ecclesiastical dues and fines, and demands their payment with inflexible rigour, often amassing great wealth, which is assumed to be spent in charity among his poorer followers. The guru is esteemed an ascetic, or Sanyassie, of peculiar sanctity. His followers believe that his time is wholly given up to the reading of holy books, to prayer, meditation, and fasting. He is worshipped as the incarnation of all the gods, and as being able to prevail with them in prayer. The water in which he washes his hands or feet is drunk with thankfulness by the people, as sanctifying both soul and body. The guru may marry, and if he has children, his office descends to one of them. If he has no children, he may elect a successor during his life. Should he fail in doing this, the other gurus meet and appoint one. When not engaged in visiting his diocese, the guru remains in a monastery, or in one of the cities, as a recluse. He then receives visits from those who wish to get his blessing or his advice, or to obtain his decision on ecclesiastical questions. These gurus are often great fanatics, and just as often men of intense greed—at once tyrannical and sensual. But such faults are overlooked in "a holy man."

The guru who had come to visit Bangalore was a great pontiff. He travelled in a gold palanquin, surrounded by troops of enthusiastic followers, excited by "bang,"—that is, a decoction of hemp. They waved their flags, and marched along with bands playing their wild music. Unfortunately we did not see the procession either when going from the Pettah, where the guru had taken up his residence, or when returning to it; but the village, close to Bangalore, in which the temple is situated, had its streets adorned with arches, wreathed with flowers and green leaves. Every house wore a gay holiday look—and there was all that crowding and excitement among the people which one sees at home on similar occasions.

In slowly driving along the narrow street in our open carriage, we saw the huge Idol Car, or Rutt, which, like a ship laid up in ordinary, seemed but a mass of useless lumber. It appeared to be unheeded except by a small donkey which leant his wise head against one of the large wheels, sunk in meditation. His eyes were fixed on the ground. His ears moved not, but drooped like long fading leaves. He almost mesmerised me like another Peter Bell. I could not help conjecturing as to what he was pondering over. Was he comparing other donkeys—those who usually dragged that idol car—with himself? or, mounting higher in his mood, was he measuring himself with those who were giving him a holiday for the sake of the guru? or with the guru himself? or with those strangers in the carriage who were going to the heathen temple? We had no interpreter, yet I wish we had had one, for I doubt not, there were thoughts worth knowing in that brown shaggy head. I could not help thinking of Balaam; and so I passed on.

The outer court of the temple was crowded with multitudes moving to and fro, passing out and in.

Could we not also enter by that gate in the great sombre tower, and get access to the inner sanctum where sits the great guru with thousands filling the inner court before him?

The carriage was soon surrounded by a packed mass of turbans, covering features with the caste-marks renewed by fresh paint and ashes.

"What do you want, gentlemen?" asked one of these men, in good English.

We said our errand was to see the guru.

A most interesting conversation then ensued, in which about a dozen natives joined, all of whom spoke English!

They told us what they knew about the guru; how holy he was; how he did not eat nor sleep for days; and how he was "their Pope," and so on.

They then interpreted our wishes to some ignorant and fanatical-looking men who seemed to be the masters of ceremony, among others to a filthy-looking Sanyassie, almost naked and covered with ashes, a leopard-skin over his shoulders.

The replies of these high chamberlains varied from time to time. They asked who we were. Were we missionaries desirous to argue? Had we letters of introduction from the Commissioner, Mr. Bowring? If we were travellers, then what did we think of their civilisation? Idolatry?—Yes—but that was custom—each country should have the religion best fitted for it—and all religions were equally good, with much more talk of a similar kind.

But could we not see the guru?

A great, very great man! They would inquire.

And then another scene of talk and jangling.

No, we could not see the guru! He was at his devotions, and must not be disturbed. He might continue praying for hours. But if we came to-morrow, &c., &c.

So we never saw the guru! After various attempts we could not get any information as to his movements on which we could rely. Our chief interest, however, was in the men who conversed with us. They were forward, conceited, and what is termed bumptious, yet on the whole civil and communicative. They at first argued as sincere and believing Hindoos; but on being gently pressed and slightly quizzed, as well as more earnestly addressed, one of them said,

"To tell the truth, gentlemen, we who have been educated and speak English do not believe anything!"

On our suggesting that possibly, as he had been at a mission school, he held more religious truth than he was willing to confess, he acknowledged his faith in one God, and in right and wrong, although he was not a Christian. How, then, we asked, can you be so false to your convictions as to go through all this pooja, and profess what you deride and despise?

"We wish to honour our fathers," replied another of the group.

On this the first speaker said to his countrymen, "Our fathers forsooth! what did our fathers do for us? Did they give us the steam-engine, the railway, or the electric telegraph?"

Then, turning to us with a smile, he added, "Though we cannot forsake these national customs so long as they exist in the country, and our people believe in them, yet, if you educate the people, they will give them up of themselves."

He spoke further of what they would suffer—and verily it is not small!—if they should lose caste.

When I spoke of men losing life for the sake of truth, he shrugged his shoulders, as if that were a wholly foreign idea.

I certainly felt then, as I have often felt since, that the distance between earnest Christianity and the easy-going religion held by my educated Vishnuite, was as great as that between the East and the West. The spirit of the two is vastly different. That strong, earnest regard for truth, which is common in the West, is seldom or never to be seen in the East. A man like Paul or Luther seems at present to be an impossible product there. Yet when this great garden is once weeded, carefully tilled by the influences of the West, and sown with the seeds of a living Christianity, we shall undoubtedly have such products from it.

I may take this opportunity of giving another instance of the indirect influence of English education. A Rajah of a small Principality in the West had had transmitted to him some severe articles, written in English, which had appeared in a Bombay native paper, exposing grievous errors in his government. Irritated at the exposure, he employed spies to detect the writer. A Sanyassie was brought before him as the offender. To a native ruler, such a charge against such a man seemed absurd. It was very much as if an Irish tinker had been accused of writing articles in the Times against Lord Derby.

Yet the ascetic, with little clothing, and no ornament except ashes, claimed the articles as his, and proved his right to do so.

On being questioned, he said,—“I was educated in a mission school. I did not see it to be my duty to become a Christian, but to remain a devotee to my own religion. As such I journey through the country examining into and exposing all that is false, cruel, and unjust, and giving my support to whatever is good wherever I find it; and this I shall continue to do.”

“I make you my prime-minister!” exclaimed the wondering Rajah.

"I refuse the post," replied the Sanyassie, "for I have this other work given me to do. But I can get you as good an adviser as myself, and one who has been educated like me."

He accordingly sent to his friend the editor of the paper for a prime-minister to the Rajah ; while he himself went on his lonely way to fulfil his calling in the name of that truth and justice which he had been taught at the mission school.

I have hitherto avoided the attempt to convey to my readers any idea—such even as I myself possess, dim and inadequate as it may be—of Caste. The very term repels inquiry ! It seems to lead into a cloudy region, in which one's way is wholly lost among heathen gods, Brahmins, Vedas, Puranas, and metaphysics as incomprehensible as a madman's dream. And yet in connection with India, one constantly hears of Caste as accounting for everything, obstructing everything, entering into everything, whether meat, drink, politics, or religion, and causing every kind of mischief from mutinies to missions. Caste and curry are two things inseparably associated with Hindoos.

Now, if the reader wishes to master this question in what the Germans call its innermost, he has the means of doing so in volumes many, beginning, of course, with Max Müller's delightful "Chips," and passing on to his huger blocks of learning. But let me make some attempt to convey the general impression made on me as to what caste practically is. I asked numberless questions about it and received many answers, no two agreeing except in the haze which enveloped them all.

To form a rough notion of the system of caste, let us glance at the complex structure of European society.

Sum up, if you can, the various fragments of which it is composed, the network of lines which divide it, and the groups of living beings composing it, each group having its own unity, and yet forming a part of a compact whole.

Take the distinction of races, and bring them together in thought from the poorer class—for Europeans of education and culture are much the same everywhere—Irishmen, Scotch Highlanders, Yorkshiremen, Jews, Poles, Italians, Russians, &c.—and, for the sake of colour, introduce among them some negroes. Mark their differences—how great they are ! how wide the gulf between even white and black.

Again, classify according to rank. Take the various ranks which divide society from that of the polished aristocrat down to the sweepers of the streets or of the chimneys. See this embodied in the different homes in which they respectively dwell, their differences in dress, manners, ideas, and in social and domestic habits.

Consider, also, the various trades and guilds into which men are grouped, including at once the most plebeian and the "most respectable"—the "guild" of gipsies and the guild of goldsmiths ; the carter or coal-heaver's union, and that of the benchers of the Temple ; the colleges of physicians, lawyers, or civil engineers ; the various professions and trades of soldier and seaman, engine-driver, waiter, carpenter, gardener, blacksmith, and so on, until each trade and profession stands out separate and distinct by itself.

Remember, too, the divisions which mark the Christian Church,—Protestant and Romanist, in all their varieties ; Quakers and Capuchins, Scotch Covenanters and Italian friars ; Methodist preachers in circuit, and metropolitans in their cathedrals ; the Presbyterian minister in his kirk, and the Pope on his throne in St. Peter's.

Do we, I ask, realise the number of such castes among ourselves, how much social difference they imply, and to what extent they separate man from man ? Are there no marks, too, on brow or lip, in dress or manner, by which caste is distinguished from caste ? Let us, in fancy, bring them before us,—the lord and labourer, the rich and poor, the dignitary of this church and the no-dignitary of that, and ask, Can these eat together ? can their children intermarry ? or can they hold familiar intercourse with each other ? or look and talk to each other like brothers ? What answers to these questions would be returned from every kingdom, from every city, from every village in Europe !—from the Vatican to the conventicle, from the peer to the carter, from Lady This to Mrs. That ! Look at the faces of the worthies in a country town when the district nobleman enters the room in which they are assembled ! Was not Burns assailed as a dangerous revolutionist when he, a mere poet and a no-caste man, dared to describe a high-caste man as a "birky ca'd a lord."

But you tell me that there is a constant change in society—a constant passing of those in one circle up into another circle ; that the pauper may grow up into a Peer, and the outcast into a priest ; that the dweller in any town or the member of any guild, may become the member of another and a higher one, and that society is thus in a continual flux. Very true, and so caste in Europe differs from caste in Hindostan.

Yes, to get an idea of Caste, just conceive of Europe or Christendom, with all its ranks and "guilds" as fixed for ever by a divine decree, or suddenly frozen like a great northern ocean, with every high wave and every ripplet on its surface—each man remaining in the trade, sect, clan, family, or race into which he was born, and never passing out into another, but holding fast to his caste, as a thing imposed by the authority of God—a thing not to be lost except with the loss of family, friends, labour, and every blessing here below, as well as of salvation hereafter.* Is he of the dustman caste or priest caste, the soldier caste or physician caste, the barber caste or shoemaker caste? then there he has been placed by God Himself, and there must he at his peril remain! His place has been ordained of God. It has grown out of some part of the body of Brahman. As he is, so were his fathers through endless ages, and so must his children be. Only within his own caste can he marry; and that caste has its own laws and customs, with power to enforce them on its members. It is an independent fortress, within which all the members reign supreme. Beyond its walls no one dare go, and within its walls no stranger can enter. As its members believe, and think, and act, so must he. It is an everlasting unity, one among thousands. Let him be proud of his position, for it is of God as much as the position of the highest is!

It is not possible to describe the immense subdivisions of caste. They are various as the different departments in a particular trade; and just as absurd as if the caste of pin-makers were divided into the castes of pin-head-makers, pinpoint-makers, pin-polishers, and pin-packers. Nor are these fanciful distinctions; for, while the pin-makers form a corporation high or low in relation to other castes, or as belonging to "right-hand" or "left-hand castes," and would fight for their lawful place in a procession, yet the caste of pinhead-makers may have customs quite peculiar to themselves, which distinguish them everywhere from the caste of pin-pointers. From generation to generation they will never intermarry with each other, although both may break up into other castes, such as the caste which uses three files in pointing the pin, or the caste which uses but one. Nor is this an exaggeration—one sect, for example, of the oil-mill caste yokes one bullock to the mill, and another sect of the same caste yokes two, and are named accordingly! In Mysore alone, Major Puckle, in his accurate and carefully prepared report (1867) of the tribes in that province, enumerates 110 races and tribes, speaking four different languages, each having its own caste, with peculiar laws and customs.

In Judaism we have what is more like caste than is to be found in any other religion. In the separation of the Jew from the Gentile; in the minute ceremonies of the temple; in the sacred priesthood confined to one family or tribe; in the minute commands regarding eating and drinking, we have something like the distinctions of Hindooism. St. Paul speaks as a high-caste man would do when he says, "Circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews," &c.; all these divisions or "castes" being moreover, by God's express command, a part of religion.

There is, however, this immense difference between the rules of the Jews and those imposed by the Brahmins, that all the arrangements of the Jewish church and state were confessedly temporary. The Jewish rites had all a meaning with reference to a grand future. They were not ends, but means. Thus it was that the very separation of the Jews from idolaters, and their education by rite and ceremony, was to the end that in the fulness of time there should be realised in the best way, a holy brotherhood of men. The water was carefully drawn off from the swamp with its miasma, and gathered together into a reservoir, but only that in the end it might irrigate the world.

Caste is not to be found in the Vedas, or sacred books of the Hindoos, which are alone authoritative in matters of religion. But these being rare and written in Sanscrit, which the priests alone were permitted to read, they did not prevent the priests from developing a system based upon their own supremacy and love of power, any more than the Gospels prevented the priestly corrup-

tions of pure Christianity during the middle ages. Now, however, that the Vedas have been dragged out of their hiding-places, and are being translated for the first time—a great and distinguished honour reserved for Wilson, Max Müller, and England!—a change is being inaugurated which must tell immensely on the reformation of India.*

Buddhism—which now numbers among its adherents about a third of the human race—was a reaction against Brahminism, chiefly as proclaiming the equality of mankind, and therefore putting down caste as a part of religion. It was “the established church” of India three centuries before the Christian era. A pillar erected by Asoka, the Constantine of Buddhism, still remains on the ridge which was occupied by our troops at the siege of Delhi. For a thousand years Buddhism struggled on. But now there is no Buddhist worship in all India! Burmah and Ceylon are its nearest places of strength.

I have dwelt on this caste system, as it is the most important fact we have to deal with in India. Whatever good may in the past have sprung from it as a system of police and as a protection to trade, through promoting union, and securing some of the blessings of fellowship, it is now a source of great if not unmixed evil. It destroys all patriotism, all national unity, and all true progress; and worst of all, it destroys personality. Under it a man becomes merely a thing—at best a polype in the vast gelatinous mass of his caste. His conscience and will are lost. From birth to death he has to accept (for there is no alternative) his place, his rank, his work, his wife, his beliefs—in short, his everything. He moves not except with his caste, which moveth all together if it move at all. The most united and most tyrannical trades-union is a poor imitation of a Hindoo caste.

No doubt the system is now giving way before the force of Western education and of circumstance. A great revolution is effected when a low-caste man can be educated and raised to occupy a high position in the government employment; much more when, in a third-class carriage, he can stand beside and touch a Brahmin, who may be his servant, although ecclesiastically his superior! But Christianity alone can extirpate caste; and this it will do, not by making high-bred gentlemen in India, any more than in England, social equals to Sudras or Pariahs, nor even by preaching the truth alone, but by carrying out Christianity in its social aspect, that is, by organizing the Church as a social system, by means of which the weak and tottering man, who is cast out from the only society or brotherhood he has ever known, may find a welcome and a home in the love of Christian brethren. Caste is the heathen method, the living Church is the Christian method, of satisfying the hunger of the heart for brotherhood!

But I must proceed with my narrative.

The change from the scene I have described at the Pagoda to that of a mission school in the Pettah is great. And here, in a narrow street, in the centre of a densely peopled native town, we came upon a cheering sight. It was not on British territory, but in the native state of Mysore, of which we long ago heard stories from our grandfathers, with the names of Hyder Ali and Tippoo Saib associated in tales of conquest and of cruelty towards English captives in the neighbouring fort. Two Englishwomen—ladies in the truest sense of the word, whose culture and manners were such as to fit them for any society—were here devoting themselves to the education of female children. It was beautiful to see. There were from three to four hundred children present. In their obedience, frankness, and freedom, they had the look and manners of children who had been well and carefully trained. We examined the classes through friends who were present; and I have no hesitation in saying that I never heard scholars at home give more accurate and thoughtful replies to questions in the history both of the Old and New Testaments. I more than once apologized for the kind of questions I put, and was, of course, the more gratified by the replies. There was no cramming, but genuine education of the faculties. I was struck also by the truthfulness of some of the answers. For instance, I asked the senior class, “Do you ever pray to God?” “Never;” “Yes, sometimes, but not often;” “I know I ought, but I don’t;” “Yes, I do”—so ran their replies, which were given in a simple, natural way which pleased me much. Some of the classes were taught by two male Mahomedans who teach religious facts

* How thankful ought the Church to be to such scholars as Professor Max Müller and Mr. Muir in this country, together with others like learned and like minded on the continent of Europe! By years of toil, these workers have furnished such indomitable and effective instruments of attack upon Brahminism, as enables us to dig down beneath the very foundations of the system and overthrow it! The one is giving us the traditions of the Vedas, the other “the sacred texts,” both of which should be in the hands of every man who wishes to know the religion of India, as very few of the Hindoos themselves can know it. They are being published by Messrs. Trübner, London.

from books put into their hands, as Christian teachers have yet to be trained for such work. It was curious to watch the eagerness with which they waited for the answers of their pupils, and their delighted looks when these were correctly given. Here, we had another striking instance of the acquirement of Christian knowledge without any real belief in Christianity being produced by it. Yet who can think of all these facts and truths being stereotyped on the minds of those who are most probably to become the wives and mothers of native inquirers, or of Christian converts, without feeling how in manifold ways good must result, and the way be prepared for that fulness of time in which all history will culminate? I believe there are female schools in other parts of India as good as this one of the Misses Anstey; but I do not believe that a better exists. Mrs. Anderson has a noble one at Madras, in connection with the Free Church mission. I had the pleasure of meeting her at Bangalore, but not of seeing her school. It was vacation time and the school was closed.

I preached on Sunday in a beautiful church

erected through the exertions of my old friend, the Rev. Stewart Wright, one of our Presbyterian chaplains. Chaplains are not missionaries in the technical sense of the term, but are connected with the army, and as such occupy fixed stations under government. Yet those who, like Mr. Wright, take a proper view of their calling as Christian ministers, have immense influence, which they ought to exercise within the utmost limit of their official duties, to aid their missionary brethren in every possible way.

The hospitality of Bangalore was on a par with what we experienced in India generally.

If I do not record the names of our many friends here, it is certainly not from the lack of grateful remembrances of their kindness. One fact, however, is not without its interest to the barbarians of the North, that we had a famous Scotch dinner at Bangalore, in which the smiling "sonsy face" of a noble haggis was kept in countenance by other national dishes, all equally unapproachable in their savoury excellence.

It is not possible to leave Mysore without saying something of the political condition of the country, as being in so many respects characteristic of the past history of India and its native dynasties. The population of the present province is 4,000,000, or, in round numbers, about equal to that of Scotland. Under Hindoo chieftainships, it gradually rose from being first a handsome property—the estate of a Zemindar—into a province of great importance; and finally it became a state under a Hindoo Rajah, about two hundred years ago. This Rajah was a great tyrant. Take one instance. Four hundred priests, who had dared to oppose his oppressions and had ministered to Ryots or peasants, were cunningly entrapped, and executed one by one, so that those who lived were kept in ignorance of the fate of their companions. Under the Mogul empire, the Rajah became a sovereign prince. He was called Chick-Deo-Raj. But the Mogul empire was breaking up, and with it began the breaking up of this Hindoo dynasty also. The son of Chick was deaf and dumb, and his son again—the third sovereign since Mysore had become a kingdom—was an imbecile, with the tastes of an imbecile, such as spending tens of thousands annually in supporting asylums for all sorts of wild creatures and base vermin, from tigers to bugs. He had, too, some of the sensuality and cruelty of these favourites of his. Then began the reign of unscrupulous and unprincipled ministers, who kept puppet Rajahs on the throne, but incarcerated or murdered them as it suited their purpose, while they themselves practically reigned and divided the spoil with the blackguard soldierdom and robberdom which surrounded and supported them. What did the mass of the people from generation to generation care for all this unchecked ruffianism? In this, as in every native state since the days of the truly great Akbar, the people were nothing but machines for feeding the unprincipled and selfish sensualists who, as rulers, sucked their blood like leeches. Loyalty, on the part of the mass of the people towards their native sovereigns, has, as a rule, been unknown in India. To be let alone, was a luxury unknown to them! But to be taxed and plundered, as no British ruler ever conceived of doing, was what the people had learned to look upon as the normal condition of government. It was in the midst of these contests of native ministers that Hyder Ali, a free-lance and common soldier, by dint of talent and cunning rose into power, and became the prime-minister of one of the puppet Rajahs, whom he afterwards strangled. The successor of this murdered Rajah was his grandson by the female line, but Hyder took a whim to preserve this "ancient Hindoo dynasty" in another way. This way is worth noticing in relation to the present ruler of Mysore and the policy of the British Government. Hyder collected all the young descendants of every collateral branch of the old house. He filled the room with all sorts of play-things—sweetmeats, flowers, books, and toys. He declared his intention—good, dear man!—of electing a Rajah by some sign suggested by the occasion; and seated on his throne, he watched for this sign as the young ones amused themselves. One of them chanced to be attracted by a beautiful dagger. The sapient Hyder at once declared, "That is the Rajah!" So the boy was officially placed upon the throne, but till Hyder died in 1795 he remained a prisoner in the palace. Hyder's son, the famous Tippoo Saib, then banished him and his son, some two years of age, along with the mother, to a wretched hovel near Seringapatam! After Tippoo Saib was killed, and Seringapatam taken under Lord Wellesley in 1799, this boy, six years old—the son, observe, of him who as a boy had chosen the dagger and was therefore made Rajah—was, chiefly for state reasons, taken out of the hovel where he had been reared in ignorance and poverty, and to his own great surprise, but we presume to the delight of all who wish justice done to "old" dynasties, was made Rajah! What was the result? The poor lad, on attaining his majority, found his treasury—owing chiefly to the honesty and good management of his able Brahmin minister Pameah, acting under the English Government—with nearly three millions sterling in it, and the country prosperous. He soon squandered it all, impoverishing himself and his country; rejected every advice and remonstrance from the British resident, until there came that cry from the oppressed, ending in a rebellion that compelled the British to interfere, and forced them—cunning fellows!—to annex the country? No! Amidst the rejoicings of the people, they consigned the Rajah to obscurity with a handsome pension, and took charge of the province for his son and heir whom he nominated to the throne of his worthless ancestors, who are, after all, but as of yesterday! The present Maha-Rajah is a boy of five years of age. He enjoys the fifth of the revenue of Mysore, and is being educated under the care of the British government. I am not aware that Christianity is being taught to him.

Whether or not we are acting wisely and for the good of the people in putting the young representative of a native dynasty on the throne, time will prove. We are at all events unselfishly endeavouring to govern through native princes, and giving the greatest amount of freedom possible to their rule short of sovereign independence. If we succeed, it will be a blessing to all parties; if we fail, then we must at all hazards take the power into our own hands for the benefit of the many in spite of the few. Such is the lesson of the story of Mysore.

It is difficult to ascertain with accuracy what is the general moral condition of Mysore. Considerable drunkenness prevails among the non-Aryan races, from chewing bang, and drinking a vile spirit distilled by the Pariahs. The government system—which is too bad to last long—of farming out the excise revenue taxes, and giving them to the highest bidder, has no doubt a most demoralising influence. As to the advancement of Christianity: the chief workers in Mysore are the Wesleyan Methodists and the London Missionary Society.* The number of native converts to Christianity is about 800 only throughout the whole province. But the tone of feeling manifested towards Christianity has greatly changed for the better; and the influence of the Brahmins has so immensely decreased, that their old oft-repeated arguments against Christianity are no longer heard. Education above all is doing its work, although Hindooism has still secured to it large endowments in connection with its temples. The lower government gets rid of the responsibility of acting as a trustee, and gives those endowments to be managed by the priests themselves.

We closed the year 1867 and entered upon 1868 at Bangalore. What my thoughts were at such a time and in such a place as I, "revolving many memories," thought of the past, need not be here recorded. However interesting these thoughts may have been to myself they can have no interest to the most sympathising of my readers.

* The former have 86 agents, 273 members, 2874 scholars, and 400 hearers in Mysore. But how many of these belong to the heathen? The London Missionary Society have four male European and two European female agents in Bangalore, with one native pastor and nine native evangelists.

LOVE MAKETH FAIR.

"Fœdam amavit, ut Pulchram faceret."—ST. AUGUSTINE.

SHE was the fairest of all things on earth

When first she came from her Creator's hand,
But lost the beauty of her primal birth,

And could no longer in His presence stand;
Yet He who loveth said He would repair
Her beauty, and by loving make her fair.

He left the glory of His Father's home,
And sought her in her sinfulness and shame,
Into His heart of hearts He bid her come,
And clothed her with the honour of His Name;
Contented all her sufferings to share,
And love her foul, that He might make her fair.

But lest the splendour of His high degree
Should startle her, and scare her from His side,
He took her own poor frail humanity
And wore it as a veil the God to hide:
That she might let Him all her sorrows bear,
And love her foul, that He might make her fair.

And thus He won her heart's devotion, when She saw how low He stooped for her relief,
Despised and rejected among men,
A man of sorrows, intimate with grief;
And all to draw her back from her despair,
Loving her foul, that He might make her fair.

And having poured His life out for her sake,
He left her to prepare for her a home,
But with all precious things that might her make Fairer against the day when He shall come;
Fragrant and beautiful, beyond compare,
Through Him whose love had made her foulness fair.

And daily in His absence she doth live
In the Great Presence of His life below, Fed by the heavenly food which He doth give,
That she may into oneness with Him grow;
And all her losses may through Him repair,
Who loved her foul, that He might make her fair.

And thus she grows beneath that wondrous love,
As Beth's lily, or as Sharon's rose,
Fed by the beams that woo them from above,
Each into bloom, and fragrant beauty blows:
Repaying all His tenderness and care
Who loved her foul, that He might make her fair.

And when He comes to claim her as His bride
She shall not then, as now, ashamed be,
But clothed in His beauty, by His side
She shall sit down through all eternity;
And tell out to the angels round her there
His love, which made what once was foul so fair.

JOHN MONSELL.

PAMPHLETS FOR THE PEOPLE.

BY THE DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

V.—ROMANISM AND PROTESTANTISM.

Good Friday in Paris. Anticipate much, from former experience, in hearing the close of Father Felix's Lent "Conferences" in Notre Dame. Went last evening on my arrival, to learn all particulars. Am informed, as on that other occasion, that he begins at 7:30 P.M., but that if I want a good place near the pulpit, I must be there by five. Again guided by experience, I repair to the bookstall at the western doors, that I may beguile the two and a half hours of waiting by "reading up" the previous sermons of the course. Am attracted this time by a little yellow volume, having conspicuous as its title, "Protêtantisme, Anglicanisme, Moscovitisme: appel à tous les Chrétiens. Par le R. P. Felix, de la Compagnie de Jésus." On looking nearer, I see a smaller heading title, "Les Eglises non-catholiques devant le progrès." Of this I possess myself, and go my way.

My anticipation is this time doomed to disappointment. For I learn at the packet office, that my intended crossing on the Saturday will be attended with no small difficulty: that the boat is expected to be crowded with volunteers, and it is doubtful whether it is advisable to trust to that day. The agent strongly advises making the passage by the night's boat.

So I reluctantly give up Notre Dame, and leave Paris just when Father Felix would be beginning. My yellow volume, instead of beguiling my waiting hours in the glorious nave, beguiles my journey to Calais.

Now very far be it from me to contemplate at any distance the contingency of measuring lances with the Père Felix. He is, though in modest guise, one of those giants of rhetoric and persuasion, at whose feet one fain would sit and be convinced against one's will, the proverbial result following in one's solitude. But truth is truth, and logic is logic, in spite of the Père Felix's rhetoric and persuasion. And therefore only, I have a few words to say: which words may as well be said in this popular form, because the matter is one for plain speaking to plain men.

He professes to arraign the three leading forms of "non-Catholicism," and to convict each in turn of being incapable of leading the "progress" of mankind. And of course he assumes to have proved that "Catholicism," i.e. in his sense, Romanism, is alone capable of leading this progress, and has alone in all ages led it.

With the last-mentioned of the three "non-catholic" churches, "Moscovitism," I have in this paper small concern. It was at all events a bold stroke of policy on the part of the Père Felix, to represent the Christianity of the East, which is older and more "catholic" than Rome, as an offshoot from it: and, I may add, an artifice worthy of the society to which he belongs, to stigmatize this ancient faith by the name of "Moscovitisme," in order to subject it to all the odium of the charge of state-bondage. It is rather singular that he should have done this, in the face of the fact, that the words in the Nicene Creed, which date the "schism" of East and West, were actually imposed upon Rome by state dictation. Those who are familiar with triumphant apologies for Romanism well know by this time, that they cannot be made out without a pretty plentiful ignoring of the thing that is, and an equally plentiful suggestion of the thing that is not. As for the Eastern Church, in any conflict with Rome in which the voice of history can be heard, we hardly need say that it has nothing to fear. The highly amusing, and to us Protestants most edifying attitude of the Patriarch of Constantinople towards the Pope's summons to his so-called Œcumenical Council, hardly exaggerated the claims (on the external unity theory) of the Eastern Church to be the centre of unity, as compared with those of the Western.*

It is with the two other "isms" spoken of that our attention will be occupied in this and our next "Pamphlet." Previously, however, something must be said of the Father's general preface.

His reasons for publishing separately two sermons of the Conferences, are three: First, as a response to the aspirations which, from the depth of schism and heresy, call so many souls towards the centre of Catholic unity: secondly, to meet the wants of the religious situation of this time, which more than ever demand the union of all Christians, and the concentration of all the living forces of Christianity: and thirdly, as an echo of the appeal of the present Pope, who "has opened to all our severed brethren, with the two arms of crucified love, the bosom of living unity:" that is, by his "Apostolic Letter" addressed to all Protestants and non-Catholics, inviting them to his "œcumenical" council: which letter M. Felix reprints.

The rest of his preface is occupied in expanding these reasons. At the bottom of all the Protestantisms, he says, but especially at that of Anglicanism, there is a great movement towards Rome, the bond of universal unity and the living centre of true Christianity. What will come of this movement, is the secret of God: but it opens before the afflicted Church the sweetest possible anticipations: it is like a smile of Providence on the future; and, amidst the distresses of the present, furnishes a pledge of hope.

But this movement of return is only the consequence of another movement, on which, in the Preface and throughout the volume, the Father lays great stress. An army of aggressors is arrayed not only against the Catholic Church, but against Christianity itself.

As this is a distinction somewhat new from the pen of a rigorous "Catholic," it may be as well to pause a moment and to see exactly how M. Felix expresses it. We had imagined that in his mind Christianity was confined to the (Roman) Catholic Church. But in the present case, with whatever intent, he varies his nomenclature, and includes within the limits of Christianity, "non-Catholics" as well as Catholics. Speaking of this latter movement, he says, "It is impossible to deceive one's self on this matter: the question is, Christianity or anti-Christianity. Questions which divide Christians are relegated into the second place. Before all, at the present hour, is the great Christian question itself,—To be, or not to be: this looks universal Christianity in the face." And this being so, there is from all the regions of religious error a cry of universal alarm. The tide of antichristian error, driven by the gale of revolutionary passions, is seen rising higher day by day. The cry is, Who shall save us? Who shall meet the shock of this new barbarism, which threatens to stifle Christian civilisation in ruins and in blood? By the light of events they see this mysterious and palpable power; revolution, at once hidden and revealed, growing, growing evermore, like a giant preparing to lift the world, and already shaking its foundations. Seeing this, Christians everywhere are calling to union, to united resistance to defend this kingdom of Christ, thus menaced all round. And, continues the Father, our separated brethren see but one power which can dress the ranks of Christendom: which can organize in invulnerable unity an universal resistance: which can concentrate and direct their grand Christian effort. One religious power only appears to them capable and worthy to march at the head of this new crusade. And this is the reason why, from all the frontiers of the Christian world, so many hearts are now turning to Rome, and invoking, as the only ark of safety in the threat of the modern deluge, the Church, Catholic, Apostolic, and—Roman.

We have been thus particular in citing Father Felix's words, because the last quoted sentence, as we shall see ere long, contains in itself the "motive" and the fallacy of the whole book.

In opening the main argument, the Father recapitulates the results of a former "conference," in which he has shewn that no positive religion outside Christianity is capable of leading the world's progress. We are then to seek such a leader within Christianity itself, if anywhere.

Within Christianity, besides the "Catholic Church," there are two great religious sections, each claiming to be the true religion of Christ and the lawful guide of the world which Christ has regenerated. These sections are, First, heresy, by which name he designates every Christian sect rejecting any part of doctrine once universally admitted,—and secondly, schism, that is, every religious body separated from the central government once universally accepted, and constituting itself a special centre and government apart.

And first he deals with the former of these. The only modern heresy, he says, is the great and manifold heresy of Protestantism. Resting on vast political forces, and on immense material resources, this heresy does not disguise its ambition to occupy the whole realm of Christianity, and to create the religious power destined to possess humanity now, and guide her hereafter.

"I shall attempt to shew," he proceeds, "with absolute impartiality, that this ambition on the part of Protestantism is perfectly chimerical and illusory. I will not say one bitter word of our separated brethren: I wish to put into what I shall say all my conviction, and at the same time, all my love. My end will be gained, if I can unite in my speech the power of truth and the sweetness of charity,—the respect due to others, and the liberty which I claim for myself."

All this is admirable, and is expressed in that charming vein of lucid antithesis of which French rhetoric alone seems capable, and of which, in modern French rhetoric, the present writer is perhaps the most eminent example. But there is another thing of which French rhetoric is also capable; the hidden art of carefully veiling under this surface of simplicity the joining of false issues, and the ignoring of inconvenient truths. Shall we find in our illustrious orator an example of this also? Let us see.

He now puts Protestantism on its trial. To attempt to treat of "all the protestantisms" one by one, would be an ungrateful and well-nigh useless labour: an attempt to grasp a Proteus ever changing, and ever slipping its guise.

Excuse us one moment. Is this exactly so? Is there nothing of a false issue here? Nothing of a first coat of obscurity cast over a central truth which shines too brightly for the speaker's purpose? Again, let us see.

Disclaiming the attempt to grasp this Proteus, he immediately lays fast hold of it, and, malgré lui, proves it no Proteus after all:—

"Under the generic name of Protestantism, I include all which, holding on by some point or other to the Christian revelation, protests in any degree against the authority of the Catholic Church, and appeals to the Scripture as to the one source of revelation and of Christian truth."

What is become of Proteus? To the celebrated case of your infallibly-authorised inconsistent versions of Scripture, reverend father, the term "concordia discors" is owing. We may borrow from that a description of your own report of "all the protestantisms," and say that it is "discordia concors." You have lightly and skilfully touched, and would have us pass over as merely by the way, that which is the great central invariable life-power of all Protestantism. You appear partially sensible of this: for you confess that this description gives to Protestantism a semblance of enormous extension and force, and of being a worthy candidate for the leadership of the progress of the world. This candidature you proceed to discuss. You convict "the protestantisms," first, of absence of vitality. Let us see how you do this.

There are two kinds of life, you say. Life real, spontaneous, ever young, ever fruitful,—true life: and life apparent, impelled from without, decrepit, sterile,—false life,—or at least life purely human and subject to merely human laws.

Having said this, you turn to us, and say that you spare yourself the trouble of convicting us of being without the true life and possessing the false. Of this you believe that we convict ourselves. And now follows something very curious.

"The protestantisms" you acknowledge, are in movement, nay more, in agitation—they have a propaganda whose fame fills the world. "But," you say, "whence comes this movement? Where is the force which projects it? Be sincere, and confess. Behind your movements I see governments; at the back of your propaganda I discover the form of civil power, and at the base of your work I feel the hand of political influence. Is this what you call religious life?"

Now this is something so surprising, that we may well pause to ask an account of it. We had thought that "the protestantisms" were least of all religions beholden to the civil power; that with some entirely insignificant exceptions, they one and all repudiated even state aid towards their religious efforts. Either our eloquent Father is grossly ignorant, or,—we are reluctant to write it,—not quite ingenuous. We had thought that the one religion most dependant on state succour, behind whose efforts the greatest amount of secular power may be discerned, was one not comprehended among "all the protestantisms;" one of which moreover we have long been reading that Catholic Europe was providing it with material weapons, and imperial battalions propping its very foundations.

Well, now the Father goes on to another point—deserting, it is true, his former triumphant demonstration somewhat precipitately—perhaps as being rather dangerous further to pursue. Real religious life is always young. Well: how old are you Protestants? In your fourth century: a long life for a heresy: few have had so tough or so long a one. But, the odd thing is, that three centuries ago you were old and decrepit. And you are the same now: this agitation which you are keeping up to give an appearance of youth is only giving more decisive evidence of your being worn out with age.

All we can say to this is, that we do not see it. It seems to us perfectly gratuitous. What examples are there of its truth? The Père Felix gives none. Are we to seek them in a quarter to which we shall have again to repair, the missions of "the protestantisms?" Shall we go to Madagascar in order to witness this galvanized life? to Tinnevely? to Melanesia? or are we to look at the progress of Christian public opinion in Protestant countries,—at the decadence of slavery, of duelling, of licentious-ness? A power which is achieving such victories seems to us to be in full vigour, when we consider what influences are opposed to it. May we venture to believe also, that the "Church Catholic" does not always find the energies of "all the protestantisms" so effete as her advocate would here represent them. For now we come to another point. The life of true religion is ever fertile and fruitful.

"Where," says the Father, "is your religious fecundity? Where are the generations of Christians which you have begotten? You have missions and missionaries; you make the world every year re-echo with the number of your stations, your schools, your Bibles distributed. But where are results corresponding to the cost? A poor missionary, with a humble provision and a heroic devotion, creates whole generations of Christians. You, with the national flag over your heads, and millions in your hands, what are you doing to extend the kingdom of Christ? You put your sickle into the harvest of a Catholic priest. What he wrests from paganism by dint of devotion and sacrifice, you make it your endeavour to wrest from the Church. And, thanks to means which you dare not always avow, you attain often this illustrious result—out of bad children of the Church, to make excellent disciples of reform. Is this what you call your apostolic fecundity? Is this the distinctive sign of your force and of your vitality? to cast into the air the leaves of the sacred Book, even in scenes the most profane? Does it need such a prodigious vitality to distribute, in our universal Expositions, to the willing and even to the unwilling, millions of St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, St. John? or to send them, on the wings of steam, to cover with their scattered fragments the most distant shores?"

I have quoted this singular passage, as shewing both the weakness and the strength of Protestant missions: and also as shewing how much of either of these is understood by our orator. Were our Missionary Societies wiser, we should have far less of empty vaunting, and far more of solid work. There would be less said about the millions of distributed Bibles, and less published of the utterly nauseous made-to-order journals, which constitute the staple of our missionary periodicals. The ostentatious stalls at our Exhibitions would be as much loathed and avoided, as they are now glorified and frequented. No doubt all this puffery tends, as it is called, to keep alive the missionary spirit at home: the people love to be tickled, and let them be: but it also tends to raise the contrast which the Père Felix dwells on with such exultation, between the enormous self-laudation of the platform, and the sad and dispiriting result at the foreign station itself. Those who know much of Roman Catholic missions in our own day would, we expect, if they spoke the truth, confess that the disappointment of Christian missions is not confined to Protestants. We presume not to assign a reason: but it is too evident to the Christian world, that the whole subject of missions in our day is one, if rightly considered, to make us sadder and wiser men: to curb our spiritual vanity, and humble us all before the great Source of success.

There is something of bitterness in the sentence about the Catholic pastor's harvest, which perhaps has a reality at its bottom: but we wonder at so able a man reiterating the very ordinary insinuations, of the employment of unworthy means to make protestant converts, and of the worthlessness of those who are converted. If the Père Felix does not know, many at least of his hearers at Notre Dame well know, that all such charges on both sides are simply redundant matter, which no fair pleader will deign to use.

He goes on to challenge Protestants to prove their religious vitality by fighting side by side with "Catholics" against pantheism, materialism, scepticism, positivism, monsters of error which threaten to bury us all in the ruins of our common Christianity and civilisation.

Well, as to this combat, there might much be said. In the first place we could not be quite sure whom our fellow-soldiers might point out to us as enemies. Some of these formidable names might be bestowed on opinions which we believe to be God's truth, which would be awkward. And on the other hand, fighting side by side might be held to imply obeying the same commander, and using the same weapons. And as to facts. Where are these "monsters of error" making the greatest inroads at the present time? In Protestant England, or in Catholic France and Italy? If in the latter, then why?

The end of this chapter adduces again the old complaint, of which the good Father's thoughts are full.

"Shew your vitality by imitating," he says, "our missions. Go, armed with your love and your self-sacrifice, go, without a family to follow you, without a flag to protect you [This flag seems especially distasteful to the Père Felix—we wonder what it means. Surely he has not forgotten, that the 'flag' of Roman citizenship covered the first and greatest Christian missionary], without a sword to defend you, and even without a provision to sustain you. Go to the ends of the earth: carry on your lips the living word, and if it must be so, with the word which saves souls, give the blood which makes the word fruitful. Behold the true manifestation of the religious life,—the true attestation of Christian vitality—devotion even unto blood: the accepting of heroic sacrifice and of martyrdom without solace and without glory, that Jesus Christ may reign in one soul the more! Yes, behold the sign of life—to die in proof of one's vitality. I seek in you this grand and crowning testimony of Christian vitality: I seek the martyrology of protestant lives devoted for Christ in millions of holocausts. I find it not, and I say to myself, No: true Christian vitality is not here: I must seek elsewhere the religion of the future."

Eloquent and effective as this is, he must have been a bold man who uttered it. No Protestant martyrologies. We thought France herself could furnish a few. We had visions of a time when the professors of the faith of Père Felix, armed with a power which, by their own confession, they would wield again if they could, raised by their persecutions untold thousands into the ranks of Christian heroism. We knew that our own island had her glorious roll also, less numerous, but not less illustrious. With singular inconsistency, the orator complains that he cannot find among us records of martyrdom without solace and without glory. He cannot find them, because of such martyrdoms there lives no human record. Just a few emerge, samples of unmentioned hundreds. He has never heard doubtless of Martyn at Shiraz, of Williams at Erromanga. We vaunt not the names of our martyrs in the vain pomps of canonisation: we keep no chests of their relics, nor dedicate days to their memory: but their names are in heaven, and their record is on high: and when all shall stand before the Judge of all, we have no fear of their being forgotten, however Rome and her orators may depreciate them.

Such is the first great count of the Father's indictment against "the protestantisms." There are five more, which we cannot follow with so much detail.

Next in order comes, want of organization. And here he evidently thinks he has hit us very hard. Logical Protestantism, he believes, absolutely requires that nothing at all shall be interposed between the individual conscience and the Scripture.

"Start from this," he triumphantly says; "insert one man, one man only, between the written word and your individual thought: unite together two believers mutually inspiring and assisting one another by any kind of religious dependence and communion, there is an end of Protestantism. All religious societies with men who speak and men who hear, with pastors charged with interpreting the divine word, and faithful who receive the interpretation spoken by human lips, with superiors who determine and ordain religious practice, and inferiors who accept the ordinances and execute the rules, all such association, all such communion, every such church, small or great, is no longer protestant: it is hierarchy and authority, but hierarchy copied, and authority counterfeited. You have preachers, pastors, and, it may be, in your little church, some little pope after your manner. Go to—you have betrayed your principle: you are but Catholics disguised, with more of inconsequence, and less of logic!" And therefore, he maintains, "Protestantism, faithful to its principle, pushes all its disciples who are able to see consequences, by an irresistible logic, either into the arms of Catholicism or into the bosom of individualism. There is no half—no intermediate step. They must return to Catholicism,—that is, to social, organic, authoritative Christianity, or they must pass to total, absolute, solitary individualism.”

Now doubtless it is most effective, to push, in any given case, this hard logic of consequences to its extreme. It is a characteristic of the practised reasoners which Rome turns out, to take this course evermore on the offensive side : and its principal fields of employment are by this time well known in controversy.

But like most other ruthless applications of logic, it is a two-edged weapon. Change the name, and it recoils upon its employer. Suppose we reverse the argument : which indeed, for his own purposes and after his own manner, the Père Felix has virtually done in another part of his book. Suppose we say to our brethren of Rome, “It is a fundamental requisite for all religion that a man live personally and individually as in the sight of his Creator and Judge : that he be fully persuaded in his own mind and act as a responsible being on that persuasion. Where is this principle found among you ? Doubtless you have a show of it : you preach about it, you take it for granted, you trade upon it, you live by it. The term ‘conscience’ and ‘moral feelings’ are as often found among you as among us.

“But let us examine this matter a little. You have a principle which makes you what you are : not two principles, but one : and this principle is, religious organism in all its rigour. Roman Catholicism is nothing if it is not the submission of the individual conscience to organized authority. There is with you no such thing as the individual conscience face to face with the Word of God. Here is the veritable, the only attitude conceivable for logical Roman Catholicism.

“Now start from this. Insert but one thought, one moral feeling, in any man’s being, which is not set down in the written law of the Church : nay, make a man to follow out for himself as in God’s sight and with God’s help, the guiding of his own reason, and there is an end of Catholicism. All individuals using the common rules of logic to argue by, all application of moral intuitions to practical circumstances, all such self-guidance and self-reliance, is no longer Catholic : it is individual responsibility, but in your case individual responsibility heavily weighted and obstructed. You have appeals to men’s consciences—it may be, in your confessionals, you speak of justice, mercy, temperance, judgment to come. Go to—you have betrayed your principle : you are but Protestants disguised, with more of inconsequence and less of logic.”

If this reasoning is absurd in the latter case, can it be pronounced otherwise in the former ? Who does not see, who can believe that the Père Felix does not see, that all religious organism must imply a compromise between the principle of obedience and the principle of individual responsibility ? We are happy in the persuasion, that if the reigning Pope himself were to prove a Borgia, the individual conscience of every Catholic as well as of every Protestant would rise in “protest” against him.

We see in Catholicism individualism oppressed by organization : we see in Protestantism organization enfeebled, it may be, by individualism. Which of the two, in the world’s experience, has proved the surer guarantee for right, for justice, for mercy, for purity—the corporate, or the individual conscience ?

The next count urged against us is, want of unity. He introduces his pleading with a shout of triumph :—

“Ah, Messieurs, unity, unity in the religious family, unity which prostrates all believers, united in one creed and one government, before the face of the same God, Father of each and all : unity, that is to say, the greatness, the force, the beauty of the religious society ; unity between all Christians associated in one life, and fused together in the heart of one Christ the Brother of us all, and on the bosom of one Church the mother of us all : unity, finally, which was the ideal of Christ when He founded the Christian society, so often set forth by Him under the most expressive symbols and the most vivid images. Ah yes, mark well the point where Protestantism as a religion, by confession of all, and by its own confession, feels itself the most deeply vulnerable.”

The Father pursues with all his charming force of rhetoric, this triumphant strain through the whole chapter. Of much that he lays to our charge we acknowledge the justice. Of the pattern city of God which he so strikingly describes, we fall lamentably short. But again, might we not translate the terms of the process ? Mind, the question is not about the perfection of Protestantism, but about its characteristics as compared with Romanism. Might we not ask, where is this unity in Romanism itself ? What one fact is becoming clearer as the years flow on than this ? that the Roman Catholic world, profoundly dissident in its national and social divisions, altogether heterogeneous in its individual views of church faith and practice, is as to one point only in universal agreement, viz.—that it is absolutely indifferent what the Church ordains to be believed :

whatever it be, let it be professed, and let it be despised. And this is unity—the unity for which the Holy One prayed! If this is to be the unity of the religion of the future, and to concentrate the progress of the world, then indeed will that progress be to the disgraces, not to the glories of the latter days; then indeed will such progress be traced not in the waking up of the conscience of the evil to the whispers of the divine Spirit, but in searing it with the scars of a thickening and numbing hypocrisy.

The next count against us is conceived in terms which fly as we try to grasp them. We want catholicity. What is catholicity? “Orthodoxy, ma’am,” said Dr. Johnson, “means, my doxy: and heterodoxy means, another man’s doxy.” This, which was hardly true as it was originally growled, finds its real illustration in the absurd uses and claims of the term “catholic.” One would think that the very word precluded, cried out against, the qualifying it as the Père Felix’s brethren qualify it, and as he himself does. We quoted some time since a triumphant termination of an eloquent passage in his preface, which he winds up by saying that “the only ark of salvation in the prospect of the new deluge of unbelief is the Church, Catholic, Apostolic”—so far we understand and follow him—“and Roman.” These last words utterly bewilder us. They seem to us like an epithet destructive of the last used. How, if the Church be universal, can it also be particular? What becomes of logic in this case? Or if we can conceive that the universal Church should be centred in and ruled from any given spot, what possible claim has Rome to be that spot? Is it in virtue of the primacy of St. Peter? Ask Christian antiquity. Make out even a plausible case for such an hypothesis. Shew us that the Apostles recognised any such primacy at all, and when you have done that, shew us that it was ever localised at Rome. You prefer to assume both these things. Well and good: but don’t expect the assumption to have any force with those who know the facts to have been otherwise. The elephant which is to carry the world, rests on the tortoise: but what does the tortoise rest upon?

And look at your claim of Catholicity, as measured by the present state of your Church of Rome. That Church, according to you, is universal, and has a divinely appointed head. The conclaves which choose your Popes are specially guided by the divine Spirit of Christ Himself. What has that Spirit told us? that in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, barbarian, nor Scythian, but that all are one in Him. What are we to think, in the light of this revelation, of the fact that your visible personal head is always to be an Italian? Can anything be imagined more absolutely destructive of Catholicity than this?

The Father professes to demolish the “branch of the Catholic Church” theory; calls it an ingenious stratagem, devised to hide from the world the misery of our isolation and our separation.

“Deign,” he says, “to explain yourselves. What sort of branch are you? a dead or a living branch? If you hold by the trunk, a living branch; I understand you; Catholicity is the great oak, and you are the bough. But if you do not hold by it, what can you be but a broken branch, and therefore a branch already dead or soon to die? In the name of heaven, abuse not the sanctity of words by lying against the verity of things. If you are a branch, tell us what is the trunk to which you are attached, and whence you derive the sap which mounts from its roots to fertilise you? Is it the Anglican Church? Is it the Greek Church? Is it the Church which calls itself orthodox? Is it the Roman Church? Yes, to this last you once held; but, being free branches, and rebels against the trunk, which at once carried you and nourished you, you have of your own will torn yourselves from it, and the sap has retired from you.”

Thus far had the Father written, when certain sacred words of one who said, “I am the vine, ye are the branches,” came up before him too strongly to be put aside. Peter was not the trunk, though he was present, and might have been addressed as such: Christ was the trunk, and all His Apostles, and all the churches founded by them, were branches. This view of things must be dealt with, however unwelcome; for the Notre Dame audience are not boors, and even the boor knows as much as this. And therefore, in a fashion, Père Felix deals with it:

“It is of no avail to you to seek, in your pretended vital union with one Christ, a last refuge. Christ is the soul of Catholicity: He is not Catholicity itself: Christ remains invisible, and Catholicity is essentially visible: it is the splendid radiance of unity. You have lost both the one and the other, and you take refuge in the partial and the invisible. Go to—you are judged; you have not on your front the sign which God has engraven on the front of the religion of progress.”

Was ever conclusion more lame and impotent? Poor Father Felix! The truth was too strong for him, and he is compelled to take refuge in a mist of words and metaphors, all subterfuge and confusion. Christ, the true vine, is [the soul of] Catholicity; it would not do to say, Christ is Catholicity; Father Felix would not have ventured on this; but it is a dubious way of evading the error and yet gaining its result, to say that the true vine is the soul of the true vine. And then, Christ is invisible—of course, as the true vine which includes all earthly branches, must be. Catholicity is essentially visible: how? and why? Catholicity is a quality, an abstraction from a certain definite procession of visible facts. But it is "the splendid radiance of unity;" quid ad rem? And we have lost both the one and the other. Why? how shewn? This page is the weakest part of the Father's argument. By the divine words any Church which pretends to be the vine, stands condemned of arrogating to herself the prerogative of Christ. He sees this, but is not honest enough to confess it. And hence this sudden collapse of his argument, and this inconsequent peroration.

But more is yet behind. You are not he says to us his Protestant brethren (?), the living, the organized, the one, the catholic religion: are you the religion of holiness?

Now observe; our subtle orator finds himself here again in somewhat of a perplexity. Holiness of common life, reflection of the example and image of Christ, "figures Christianly austere and bearing the sign of moral grandeur," these he does not deny us. But these are not the question. It would be as "mal habile" as it would be unjust to rest the discussion on such an equivocation. Doubtless it would be "mal habile:" and simply because the result would be total defeat for the accuser. What then does he mean by holiness? He means, holiness in what he calls "the superior degree—holiness which reaches to heroism: holiness which can give by the loftiness of its principles and its examples, to the multitude the essential attributes of virtue, and to the élite of the virtuous the crown of brilliant sanctity."

Now it is very observable, how he meets this question. He says Protestants have shut up the very sources of virtue by the doctrine of predestination and of the bondage of the human will. And this doctrine he charges us with having "at one time taught"—rather a limping article of accusation. But let us ask the Père Felix, did he calculate on such a congregation as we saw filling Notre Dame, and not one reader of Augustine? Let him settle his account not with one "father in heresy" to whom he attributes these doctrines, but with the father of the dogma of irresistible grace, his as well as ours.

Then we have rejected confession and communion, we have suppressed the religious orders, that "militia of abnegation and sacrifice:" and by this last measure we have annihilated under their most heroic form, poverty, chastity, voluntary obedience. We have overthrown the altar, or we have extinguished on it the fire of the perpetual sacrifice, the hearth where generous hearts came to draw the holy ambition of sacrifice, of heroism, of martyrdom. "Do we call our reformers, saints? Who says a word of the virtues of Luther, of Calvin? All you have of sanctity comes not from yourselves, but from us: all you have of your own, all the work of the rebellion of your human genius against God's work is but the germ of moral decadence, and with it the germ, more or less fruitful, of all other decadence also."

Again, this is bold talk: bold in at least two ways. It were impossible to deny that the religious orders have afforded opportunity for the exercise of a certain kind of sanctity which but for them never would have existed, or at least would not have been commonly practicable. Whether such sanctity has been really advantageous to God's church, might admit of grave doubt. But even this is not the point. It is a question not so difficult of solution, whether the religious orders have advanced or obstructed the faith: have as a whole, adorned or disguised the Gospel. The voice of history on this point is clear and unmistakeable: and catholic powers themselves have not been slow to listen to it.

And as to the other point, it is surely but darkening counsel by words without meaning to decline the real test, and set up the idle one of what the Father calls heroism in sanctity. If it were fairly asked which faith has been most productive of domestic and personal holiness, though both must shrink in abasement before the pure ideal, I cannot for a moment believe that the Père Felix's judgment would be confirmed.

The "act of accusation" is nearly closed. All that remains to be questioned, is, the fact of protestant progress.

"In the mind of many," says the Father, "the religious revolution of the sixteenth century was the great signal of enfranchisement for the human race: it was the great impulse given to reform of manners, to social liberty, to philosophy and the sciences, to industry and the arts, in a word to whatever contributes to the progress of our race.

"But is this the testimony of history? What progress has the reformed religion, quâ the reformed religion, made, itself and by itself? This is the question."

The answer to this question is hardly more than a recapitulation of the results already tabulated in the course of the argument.

The progress has not been moral: that has been already proved. All the moral progress commonly attributed to the Reformation mation was really due, the Father tells us, to the Council of Trent, and to "Catholic" preaching which responded to the signal given by that council. The reform was not in the new Church, but in the old. While Protestantism reformed words, she reformed things, and prepared by this renovation the aurora of a new and glorious age.

This may, in ordinary language, do for the marines; but we are surprised to find it in a book written by such a man as the Père Felix. Either he believes it, or he does not. We do not know which alternative would be of least advantage to him.

It has not been, he again avers, a progress material and economic. The Father will not refuse to Protestantism the power of realising, by great industrial enterprises, enormous individual fortunes. But he regards, and here we should be disposed to agree with him, material progress as that which best produces that happy mediocrity of competence which we call general prosperity. And as regards this, he demands in what Catholic France and Belgium are behind other powers whose industry makes so much noise in the world?

We would meet this question, simply premising that France and Belgium are not industrious quâ Catholic, but owing to influences which have grown up in antagonism to Catholicity—by another question. Does the Père Felix happen to know anything of the material and economic progress of a city which is wholly under the power of the father of Catholicity? Did he ever try to buy a pair of boots, or a portmanteau, in Rome? Did he ever inquire how much has been done in charity to produce this general well-being in that city, and what has become of the funds? If Catholicism is capable of becoming the leader of economic progress, have we any guarantee from the past and present economic state of that metropolis of its own creation, that it will worthily fulfil that office? If Rome is a fair pattern of what it would make the world, what would become of industry, and its general well-being?

Nor is the progress by Protestantism progress in art. All our efforts now are but imitations of the great Catholic chefs-d'œuvre. Granted for argument's sake. And pray, what are their own? If Catholicism be the leader of the world in art, why did its progress advance up to a certain point and then retrograde? What has been its leading since? Was not decadence just as marked in Catholic as in Protestant Europe? Well then, it was not Catholicism which led the progress: at least if it be the same Catholicism now as then. It was a spring-tide of human genius, carrying it to a point never since attained: the Madonna del Sisto is as far beyond Catholicism as it is beyond Protestantism.

But a wonderful assertion is coming next. The progress by Protestantism has not been a progress of liberty. The religious revolution accomplished by Protestantism has everywhere led to the retrenchment of civil and political freedom: the triumph of Protestantism has brought about among the nations of Europe a recrudescence of despotism.

And how does our pleader manage to give such a proposition anything like the semblance of a proof? Forsooth, in this way. Protestantism has proclaimed the right of temporal princes to govern the spiritual order: their right to enforce the pure gospel: and thus has taken away liberty of conscience. Quis tulerit Gracchos de seditione querentes? And pray, where you ruled once, and where you rule now, where is liberty of conscience? Where is it in Rome? Where was it, when you ruled, in Italy, in Spain? Where would it be, if you had your way, in France?

And now comes the peroration of the act of accusation. The progress of Protestantism is not in religion. In order to shew this, the Father lays to the charge of Protestantism all the forms of unbelief, which he describes as the decomposition of its elements, but of which a vast portion, as matter of fact, has sprung out of the ranks of Catholicism itself. He quotes as authoritative prophecies of its destiny, the words of Rénan and of others: and he sums up all thus:—

"Protestantism has already existed three centuries: a long life for a heresy. It is entering on its fourth, and everything tends to shew that it will die without seeing the morning of its fifth. Without being a prophet, I venture to prophesy: before a hundred years have passed, there may yet be Protestants, but there will be no more Protestantism. Yes, messieurs, if, a century hence, there still subsist isolated fragments of defunct Protestantism, they will be like those few stray bits which remain visible only to attest the fact of a great ruin. It is my earnest faith, it is my profound conviction: the Protestant religion will not subsist. There will remain of it in humanity only that which was its origin, the pride of reason, the eternal parent of every heresy; but Protestantism as a religion will disappear; the last remains of its vitality will betake themselves to one of the religious poles,—either to the universal affirmation of Christianity or to its universal negative—to Catholicism or to Rationalism. And this alternative, inevitable as destiny itself, proves to me invincibly, that the religious future of the world, and the progress of humanity, belong not to Protestantism."

What may be in the womb of the future, it is of course as easy to assume as it is impossible to know. But at all events, appearances do not favour the prophetic view here taken. The duration of Protestantism is bound up with the lifetime of that against which it protests. The day of its death will be the same as that of Romanism; the same as that of the birth of true Catholicism. And as regards the "other pole," the great mass of unbelief at present is within the Roman Church herself. For I call emphatically and in the worst sense an unbeliever, not him who in the honest proving of all things looses his hold on some of that which is good, grasping intensely the rest, and shaping his life by it; but him who while seeming to hold, and rigorously exacting, a prescribed dogmatic system, has in his inner thoughts no living echo of its tenets. It is this, and not the other unbelief, that human progress has to fear. That progress is there checked and stamped out, when men feel by rule, worship by prescription, persecute on principle: but it is there advancing, however imperceptibly, however disappointingly, where there is the soul's life in the sight of God and in the daylight of truth. And it is none among the "isms" which shall guide that progress to its end: no Pope, no Bishop, no Dictator, that holds the helm of mankind: that is turned by another and a mightier hand. From the unsearchable riches of Him who knows what is in man, break forth, when He sees fit, good and wise and holy thoughts over the great heart of humanity: thoughts which no enforced uniformity can create, and no manifold variety can frustrate: which shall reach their end, as the great waves reach the shore, not by binding the ocean, but by leaving it free. Platforms of human croyance, systems of human worship, representing the mind of families of men, satisfying the yearnings of races,—these are all one-sided, these are all un-catholic: some may be more or less true, some may be all true, but none are all the truth: these contain not the warranty for human progress: but He who has made us, He who redeemed us, He who is purifying us, He has these all in His hand: to Him we look as the only sufficient Conductor of our race to its end: and in the course of that progress we are moving onward, as long as we are TRUE TO HIM, AND TRUE TO OURSELVES.

THE LAST DAYS OF RAJA BROOKE.

"If exertion can benefit our race, or even our own country; if the sum of human misery can be alleviated; if these suffering people can be raised in the scale of civilisation and happiness—it is a cause in which I could suffer, it is a cause in which I have suffered and do suffer. Hemmed in, beset, anxious, perplexed, and the good intent marred by false agents—surrounded by weakness, treachery, falsehood, and folly, is suffering enough; and to feel myself on the threshold of success, and only withheld by the want of adequate means, increases this suffering."—Journal of Sir James Brooke, published in Keppel's Expedition to Borneo.

THE public journals of June, 1868, contained in some form or other, and with more or less of correctness, biographies of Sir James Brooke. It is to be hoped that hereafter one fitted for the task may write in detail his eventful history. The general outlines are well known, and it is not purposed to repeat them here, but rather to take up the thread where most let it drop, and to speak of him as he moved among us during the last few years of his life. So entirely had he withdrawn from public observation, that to many the notice of his death was probably their first intimation of his having resided in England. His last visit to Saráwak occurred in 1863, and was not of long duration. Trials of many kinds had greatly broken his health, and leaving a nephew, the present Raja, as viceroy, Sir James returned home. In Borneo an unquestioned king, responsible to none but God and his own conscience, here he was a simple country gentleman, living in the most quiet way at Burrator, a picturesque and sequestered spot in the parish of Sheepstor, on the borders of Dartmoor, thirteen miles north of Plymouth. The wild freedom of the surrounding scenery, and the seclusion which many would term isolation of Burrator itself, attracted him to the place, and when, after the destruction of his fine library at Saráwak by the Chinese in 1857—a destruction which he used to say, half in jest half earnest, that he minded more than any misfortune that had ever befallen him—his friends made a collection to reimburse him, he bought Burrator from the fund thus raised. A few extracts from his letters will give a glimpse of him here:—

"Dec., 1864.—I am living a solitary life in my secluded retreat, with which I am well content; and when I sally forth to the world again I shall be refreshed by it and better fitted for society, for I am not equal to its continual wear and tear. . . . Upon Christmas Day I had a party in the kitchen, but took my own dinner alone, reflecting how merry was the world and wishing for the sake of the poor it could be Christmas all the year round. . . . I quite sympathise with you on the condition of finances at the end of the year. To have little and want less is the definition of philosophical riches! But the little or the much maketh wings unto itself at Christmas time."

"Sept., 1865.—I have literally had nothing to tell you since we parted. I stayed two days in Ryde, and then home, where I have been living in seclusion ever since, and the last few days keeping up the festival of St. Partridge, which I do more as an inducement to exercise than for the sake of sport. My house, the greater part of which I am rebuilding, gets on towards a finish, and I think the difficulty of adding a new house to an old will be surmounted successfully. The rooms will be large enough, and it will give me two spare bed-rooms. It is the first and shall be the last house I have built in England, for I have no love for stone and mortar in which so many take pleasure."

"Jan., 1866.—I greet you with all the good wishes of the season this really old-fashioned new year, instead of at the spurious one we had twelve days ago. Upon Wednesday night we had the severest snow-storm I ever saw in my life, and blowing a hurricane the while. I had fixed Thursday morning for starting for Bath, but our roads were level with the hedges in snow drift, which in places was twelve feet deep, and I have just been told that I am a prisoner until Monday before a way can be cleared. The weather is befitting winter. The sheet of snow glittering in the brightest sunshine, and an atmosphere which exhilarates the spirits and braces the frame. A few days doing Rasselas will not be unpleasant to me, fond as I am of my solitary home and inhospitable country. . . . I have been staying at Torquay, and feeling not over strong, but am pretty well again. If winter could be bright with sunshine, I should not pine; but the cloudy, muggy weather tries me as it does you. . . . I must tell you of the few very pleasant days I passed at R. It pleased me to see the spots where I used to play as a boy. I cannot play more, but I can recall its joys."

It was not necessary for him to be long in a place to win the hearts of the poor people; none within his reach were uncared for, and he would go into their cottages and talk to them with gentle unaffected kindness till they looked to him as to a father. "Some are wished under ground before their time; but the Raja, O that we could have had him twenty years among us!" is now the expressed feeling of their hearts. He was as good to them as though he had no other care, but never absent from his mind was the thought of his people in the far East, and to go back if only for a few months to witness with his own eyes the prosperity reigning, was an idea he never gave up, though its execution was deferred from time to time. So late as January, 1868, he wrote that his "great dream was to return to Saráwak." Any trouble there would have taken him at once to the spot, for in his quiet English home, enfeebled by long sickness and advancing years, he was unchanged from the days when he had written words which shall be given here, for they breathe the very spirit of the man, and being fulfilled by every action of his life serve now to shed a lustre over his grave:—

"Saráwak, 1841.—Difficulty following upon difficulty; the dread of pecuniary failure; the doubt of receiving support or assistance: this and much more presents itself to my mind. But I have tied myself to the stake: I have heaped faggots around me. I stand upon a cask of gunpowder, and if others bring the torch I shall not shrink. I feel within me the firm unchangeable conviction of doing right, which nothing can shake. I see the benefits I am conferring. The oppressed, the wretched, the enslaved, have found in me their only protector. They now hope and trust; and they shall not be disappointed whilst I have life to uphold them. God has so far used me as a humble instrument of his hidden providence; and whatever be the result, whatever my fate, I know the example will not be thrown away. I know it tends to a good end in his own time. He can open a path for me through all difficulties, raise me up friends who will share with me in the task, awaken the energies of the great and powerful, so that they may protect this unhappy people. I trust it may be so: but if God wills otherwise; if the time be not yet arrived; if it be the Almighty's will that the flickering taper shall be extinguished ere it be replaced by a steady beacon, I submit, in the firm and humble assurance that his ways are better than my ways, and that the term of my life is better in his hands than in my own."

That the path he then hoped for was opened out, and that the flickering taper did grow towards the steady beacon he desired, is shown in some measure by the following extracts from letters to one who, attracted by his romantic history and satisfied after close investigations that all accusations against him were groundless, had finally sought him out in Saráwak and there laid the foundation of a lasting friendship. It was only to such, or when special inquiry was made, that Raja Brooke talked or wrote of his life's work. He never took people by storm, but required rather to be taken by storm himself. "Mind you tell me when you want me to go with you, for I'm shy of being in the way," was his answer one day to a lady who regretted that he had not joined her party in their walk: and this dread of wearying others kept him often silent on subjects that deeply interested him.

"Dec., 1864.—You will be glad to hear that the accounts from Saráwak are highly satisfactory. Revenue increased and increasing, trade growing, population immigrating, and a general state of prosperity reigning. The English consul has made a most favourable report of the country, its government, finance, politics, &c., and it is very gratifying to me that he bestows high but just praise on my nephew and representative the Tuan Muda; and fully appreciates the principles on which our rule is founded and the advantages of their practical working. When we meet in the spring I can enter more into detail."

"May, 1865.—My accounts from Saráwak are very good, of prosperity and progress. I did intend returning next April, but I am now inclined to postpone it for another year, as there is no prospect of a final settlement with this country. . . . I pity you being obliged to come up (to town) on business, and the remorseless Circumlocution Office if you once get in will never let you out again. Happy the man who has nothing to do with government, parliament, or courts of justice in this old country. Pray tell G. that my highest ambition is to beat her at croquet!"

"Jan., 1866.—My news from Saráwak is constantly good. Our recognition is a great boon, and in time we may get protection. I have just written a short preface for the book about to appear by my nephew in Sarawak, the Tuan Muda. There is a great deal of interesting matter in it."

Full of that charity that "thinketh no evil," and inclined to believe that all were as honest as himself, it was not difficult to deceive him. That people were too good to be spoiled seemed his fundamental maxim, and his life had perhaps been spared a little of its pain had he possessed that "somewhat over-stern" spirit he has been given credit for. Be that as it may, he had his reward in the enthusiastic devotion of his people, and in the not less warm while more discerning affection of that small band of his own countrymen who felt that when brought into contact with him, whatever was worth anything in their own souls sprang forth to meet the appeal from his. In past days great and bitter troubles had come upon him. A persecution of an origin and nature so mean that one would for very shame sake disbelieve in it, were that possible, was for long years his portion. It is hard to find a trial that he did not know; but though health broke down beneath the strain, nothing availed to sour his spirit or make him less tender-hearted, or less full of sympathy for any who, in whatever degree, were tasting of the same cup. Writing, in 1865, of a friend, engaged in a weary struggle for truth and justice against trickery and even falsehood, screened by all the resources of officialism, he says,—“I do heartily wish D. success in his undertaking, but I have so much experience in governmental action that I am not sanguine. There are a thousand ways of evading a motion for redress, and Parliament will be dissolved before any inquiry could take place.” With reference to the same subject he continues in a later letter,—“As for the government of this country generally, I have so great an experience that I never want to have anything more to do with it. I cannot value its rewards even under the fiction of being bestowed by the Sovereign. It is vanity, vexation, heartburn, and waste of life to deal with public men, and it is strange that morals are so low generally amongst them.”

To make as little as possible of worries and vexations was his habit. Few will forget the charm of his playfulness, an under-current of humorous fancy ever ready to spring up. Calling on a friend who had suffered from the late financial panic, he remarked on the somewhat thin face that first met him, and received for answer, “One does not fatten on these things, you know!” “No, indeed,” he returned, laughing; “I’ve had so many of ‘these things’ that I feel just like the old miller in the ‘Mill on the Floss,’ when he found the ‘raskills’ too many for him!” “When the money is clean gone,” he went on, “we’ll all live together in a little cottage, and D. and I will work in the garden, and you shall cook the dinner!”

When health allowed him to travel he would stay a week or more at some friend’s house, where on fine days he would always be ready for croquet, playing by himself if he found no one in the humour to join him. At other times reading was an unfailing resource, and he read everything, grave and gay, enjoying a novel with a zest that does not often belong to the years beyond sixty. In former days chess had been a favourite amusement with him, but after his first paralytic seizure it seemed to tax him too much. His handwriting also bore witness to the effects of this attack.

The close of 1866 found him alone at Burrator. An old friend after staying with him had left to spend Christmas at his own home, but had not been long gone when he received tidings of the Raja’s sudden illness. Returning with all haste, he found that paralysis had struck its second blow, and the Raja lay almost unconscious and speechless; almost, not quite, for when asked if he would like his friend sent for, the unselfish spirit had forced the stricken mouth to stammer, “No—Christmas-time.” And the summons had gone therefore without his knowledge, through one who could not bear the thought of his loneliness. Then followed weeks of slow recovery, in which he was cared for well and tenderly. He was one of whom truly it could be said that he was “such stuff as friends are made of; the stuff undiluted: a thousand friends could have been made of that stuff that was in him;” and now in his helplessness he was not forgotten; nephew and friend strove together to lessen suffering and brighten his sick room. By the end of January he was able to report of himself that he was “fast progressing towards health, it is a mere matter of time now,” and early in the following month he moved to Torquay. The fast progress he spoke of seemed, however, but weary work, and the whole of his right side being paralysed, he was forced to make use of another’s hand for writing and even for signing his name; but it was not in the power of sickness to change more than his outward form, and his letters from this time, though short and dictated, have the old ring. “I am very sorry, indeed," he wrote to a friend, Feb. 11, "at being disappointed by not being able to write to you at greater length, but so it is, and without being worse, I am forced to stop writing and leave you to write to me. I have a new physician, who so decrees, and I submit. You must take a very little for a great deal. I hope that the news of you is good, and that we may meet in the summer-time, with such partial evil to both as God permits."

The summer found him strong enough to travel to London, whence he worked his way gradually back to Burrator. That his health was seriously impaired was too evident, and the smallest thing seemed sufficient to bring on a relapse. From Burrator he wrote, October 5, 1867,—

"I fortunately escaped a severe illness by the skilful attentions of the doctors, and now am making some progress towards recovery. I can neither write as I wish nor send a long letter, you must excuse me therefore for delay. D.'s sad news is very grievous, and I have many a dream of being there to comfort him and you. This is about all I have to say, except to tell you that I am better, and hope to be better yet."

The following winter he passed at Torquay, whence he wrote, January 16, 1868, to an invalid friend,—

"I am now well lodged in this place, and under the care of my nephew. I hope you are very well for you, and as well as I am for me. Just let us look at the brightest side of the question, and make the best of it, as you always do. God bless you."

Early in March he returned to Burrator for the last time. Thence he wrote to the same friend,—

"I have as warm an interest in all Indian matters as can well be, and send you my hearty wishes for your success in the annexation question. I know the style of the annexation-mongers, who would shut the door and shut the money in with it.* I fear that it will be a bad matter and result in war. God pity us all in India, I say, though our time is nearly past, and you can only do what in you lies—struck down like myself; but you struggle more than I do."

April 1st he wrote,—

"I am as I usually am, neither better nor worse, and with much sympathy for — who is suffering. The weather here is very fine and bright, and I will away my time with long drives in a Norway cart, and afterwards a kind friend volunteers to read to me."

A new treatment at Passy, near Paris, had been recommended, and at one time he thought of going there to try it, but now he gave up the idea for various reasons, one being that he might be free to spend the time with friends instead. In a letter dated Burrator, April 14th, in which, to one of these, he mentions the change of plan, he adds, "I think I may report a decided improvement in my state of health, as I have certainly mended in my limbs, and feel more life and energy in them, and in my frame generally. . . . The better prospect is for me as well as for you, I trust."

In the beginning of June he was again alone for a few days, a friend having just left, and others not yet come, though expected. Of their looked-for visit he had written, May 23rd, "They shall be welcome whenever my house is prepared for them, which I doubt not will be by the middle of June, but of course I cannot speak positively on the point. . . . I shall put on my best health to welcome them." He did indeed put on his best health, but in other fashion than he dreamt of, and the welcome was for him rather than from him, in another speech than ours. On the 7th of June the fatal attack of paralysis struck him suddenly, and with barely a sign of life he lay until Thursday the 11th. Early that morning those who were watching by saw that the expression of pain and distress had entirely left his face and consciousness returned; he could not speak, but a smile, lighting up his whole countenance, was more than any spoken blessing, and in the radiance of that smile, without struggle or sign of pain, his spirit passed away.

The following Wednesday, June 17th, he was laid in his grave. The day was one of the most glorious of that glorious summer, sunshine enough to render the long sweep of distance perfectly distinct, while a few fleecy clouds gave a tenderness of shadow; there was no glare, and yet brightness everywhere. And the fresh Dartmoor breeze was gentle, and hardly stirred the bells of the fox-gloves that stood up in lordly beauty amid the bowing fern, from beneath whose leaves the ear caught the sound of tiny rivulets, almost hidden from sight. A foot-path leaving the Raja's house descends into the carriage drive, which passing beneath the shade of trees by the side of a sparkling trout-stream, joins the road leading on the left to the high road, and on the right to the parish church. The whole distance from the house to the church is rather more than a quarter of a mile, of which the portion lying within the grounds of Burrator is of singular beauty. The church itself, built of grey granite,

* To rule through the native chiefs, educating and raising these, associating them with himself, and striving to make them feel there was one common interest, viz. the good of all, was the theory of Raja Brooke's government, a theory which always has been, and always will be, successful with Asiatics. But to carry it out needs great discrimination, tact, patience, and forbearance, and a faculty of "seeing ourselves as others see us;" all of which severe and painful exercise of virtue is saved for the nonce by

"The good old rule, the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can!"

stands well on the slope of a hill, catching every ray of sun and breath of wind, save on the north-east, where trees give a friendly shelter, and take off all feeling of bareness, leaving only an indescribable sense of freedom. None present will easily forget the sight of the procession that left the house that bright June day, and wound slowly beneath the over-arching trees, where the little stream ran on its way, careless of human sorrow. No hearse with nodding plumes, but loving hands bore the worn and weary frame that after so hard a battle had found rest. No funeral coaches with hired mourners, no train of empty carriages were there, no vestige of aught unreal, but two by two came men who felt they could not realise their loss, that it was not only that he being their friend was gone, but that he being what he was had been taken away, the unselfish, the generous, and the true, so simple in his greatness, in his strength so gentle-hearted, in his wisdom so guileless; a man every inch, and yet tender and playful as a child.

He who had sought all his life for realities chose to be buried as he had lived. The poor people from far and near left the hay unfinished in the meadows, and clad in such black as they possessed, gathered to do him the only honour worth caring for, such as springs unasked from grateful hearts. They filled church and churchyard, and many a true saying passed among them, while the look of reverence and sorrow on all faces told its own tale. "He was a gude mon:" "He'll be a great loss to the parish"—such expressions fell on the ears of the mourners as they neared the churchyard gate, and then all was hushed, and—"I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die," alone broke the stillness. Then came the wail of the "Dead March," as within the church the bearers paused and laid down their burden for a while. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning," and in the thought of that joy for him the sweet Devonshire voices rose up in the Glorias, and afterwards there broke forth—

"O let him whose sorrow
No relief can find,
Trust in God, and borrow Ease for heart and mind."

"All our woe and sadness
In this world below,
Balance not the gladness
We in heaven shall know.

"Jesu, Holy Saviour,
In the realms above,
Crown us with Thy favour,
Fill us with Thy love."*

The words rang in the ear as leaving the church we sought the grave. There where the shadow of a beech tree met the sun, in a spot chosen by himself, he was laid to rest in "sure and certain hope," and we said the "Our Father" prayer, and heard other words into whose fulness our poor hearts are slow to enter, and then we came away and left him to God.

Since the above was written a subscription has been set on foot for the purpose of erecting a memorial to Raja Brooke in Westminster Abbey. They who do this honour themselves thereby, yet it may be that had not death he might tell us that Sarawak being his monument, good done there for his sake would please him best. "Amidst all the wealth and all the charity of England," he wrote from thence in 1841, "how well bestowed would a small portion be! . . . A small rill from the plenteous river would cheer this distant misery, and bestow the blessing of fertility on the now barren soil of these poor Diaks. O that I had the brass to beg—to draw out a piteous tale so as to touch the heart!"

Let this proposed memorial be but an earnest of higher exertion. We cannot atone for the past, but we should not forget that there is a past needing atonement. It is difficult for men who having stood by that open grave bear in mind the inscription on the oaken coffin—land, in her civilisation, roused herself to a short enthusiasm sufficient to tack a few letters to his name, and then let unworthy suspicion, distrust, and foul slander* stain a page in her history for ever. God is judge between us. If the highest type of greatness that ever lighted up this dark world be His who "came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many," it follows that they only are great who use every faculty of their natures for the good of others; and amongst these, whether in doing or in suffering, those who truly knew him care to seek no brighter name than that of James Brooke. But "let the dead past bury its dead." There is gold, and wit, and energy enough in this England, and only the will is lacking. If all who support the Raja Brooke Memorial Fund will feel that they pledge themselves thereby to support also, so far as may be in their power, the work Raja Brooke began; not by an injudicious and impertinent interference, but by strengthening the hands of the present ruler, working through the already established and effective machinery, it will give an increase to the harvest of good springing up in that far-off land. Otherwise, if a poor stone monument is to be the sole result of our now somewhat softened feelings—considering the character of the man we wish to honour—it might be as well to leave the matter alone.

* Falsehood dies very hard. In Chambers' Encyclopædia, published 1861, the following passage occurs in the notice of Sir James Brooke: "This (the suppression of piracy) was done so draconically as to occasion a very great deal of dissatisfaction in this country, and the result was that Parliament abolished the head-money that had been previously paid for slaughter of pirates, and which Brooke and those associated with him had claimed and received to the extent of £20,000." In Sir James Brooke's "Private Letters," published 1853, the following passage will be found, vol. ii. p. 285. "April, 1850.—Mr. — says I am actuated by 'sinister motives.' What does he mean? Does he mean that I share in the head-money, or that anybody with me or about me, or other than the navy, share in what is given them by Act of Parliament? If he means this, he is notoriously wrong. Does he mean that I gain money from the pirates, or that I have some object to serve beyond the professed and ostensible and most desirable one? He will find this assertion difficult of proof. The government of Bruné is acquainted and approves of what is done, and to establish Sarawak influence is to establish peace and security; for those who come to Sarawak can judge the tendency of Sarawak influence, the effects of Sarawak rule, the benefit of firm government."

THE CHRISTIAN RULE OF SPEECH.

A Sermon preached in Westminster Abbey on July 4, 1869 (the Anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence).

"I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire."—ST. MATT. v. 22.

THE Gospel of this day (the sixth Sunday after Trinity) requires first to be explained, and then to be applied to individuals, to Churches, and to nations.

I. It contains certain allusions to the Jewish language and customs which need to be brought out in order to be understood. The phrases "Raca," "council," "judgment"—the words which are translated "Thou fool," and "hell fire"—all imply some thoughts and usages which were familiar at that time, but which we have lost.

Our Lord is speaking of the sin of thoughts and words, as separate from acts, of anger. There is, first, the causeless anger. No doubt there is such a thing as righteous indignation, just anger: our Lord Himself showed it—no character is perfect without it. But there is such a thing as anger merely for anger's sake—readiness to take affront; rudeness, because we do not take the trouble to be civil; irritation, because we allow everything to irritate us. We sometimes think it no matter whether we quarrel or not. It does matter a great deal. Never quarrel, if you can possibly help it. This is the first thing which our Saviour urges. It is not enough to keep from striking a man dead; we must keep ourselves from those quarrels which lead to murder. "Whosoever shall be angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment"—that is, although it may not be a very great fault, yet it is a fault—a fault fully as worthy of condemnation as many of those which are condemned by the judgment of the courts of justice which condemn a man to a month's imprisonment or to a pecuniary fine for some assault or theft.

But besides the feeling of anger, there is the still further mischief of angry words; and of these our Lord takes two instances. One is "Raca." That is a Syriac word, meaning "empty," "shallow," "thoughtless"—such an expression of contempt as is often used in common conversation, and which leaves a rankling sore behind, because it is contemptuous. "Whoever uses such a word," He says, "ought to feel that he deserves such a severe condemnation as would be pronounced by the highest court of appeal in the whole country—by the great council or Sanhedrim itself." It is another step in the scale of offences; and though it is quite true that no council, civil or ecclesiastical, can take cognizance of mere expressions—though the law of England has long since ceased to regard words as treasonable—yet, in the judgment of God, and in the court of conscience, these light and contemptuous phrases have a significance which do injury both to those who utter them and to those who hear them.*

There is yet another form of angry words that is still more mischievous. There are some words which not merely express general contempt, but gather into themselves an intensity of virulence, from being associated with political or religious passions, and thus convey a bitterness of meaning far beyond their own. Such a word was that which in our English version is translated "Thou fool." It may be interesting for those who can follow the original to know that this is not, as is often supposed, a Greek word, nor does it perhaps mean "fool." It is a Hebrew or Syriac word, moreh—like the other word raca; and though it probably gains an additional strength of meaning from its likeness to the Greek word more ("fool"), its own proper signification is "rebel" or "heretic," one who willfully breaks the laws of his Church or country—one who would presume to teach his own teachers.† It is the same word which Moses (Num. xx. 10) uses to the Israelites: "How now, ye rebels?" It was, according to the Jewish tradition, for using this offensive word to God's people that he was forbidden to enter the promised land. And, accordingly, it is this which our Lord visits with his severest condemnation. He says that though it is beyond the reach of any earthly tribunal, though it is a word used by religious men and grave authorities in their own defence, yet it deserves as much shame and reproach as belongs to those whose carcases were thrown out into the valley of Hinnom—Ge-henna, as it was called—where they were burned up in the fires which consumed all the offal of the city. This is the meaning of the words which we translate in this place “hell fire.”* It is the fire, the funeral pile, the burning furnaces of that dark valley, the Smithfield, the slaughter-house, the draught-house of Jerusalem. It is like that other saying: “Salt is good; but if the salt has lost its savour, it is good for nothing but to be trodden under foot of man.” All such words may have had a grave religious use once, but when used for mere polemical or revengeful purposes, they are as irreligious and as profane as the common cursing and swearing which belongs not to the city of Zion, but to the valley of Gehenna.

* This is well put in Professor Maurice's "Kingdom of Christ," vol. ii. p. 322.

† This meaning of the word, and the mistake of the usual version of the New Testament, was first brought before me in a tract published in the spring of this year by Professor F. W. Newman. It is also noticed by Dean Alford, as one out of two or three interpretations. This is confirmed by Mr. Deutsch, of the British Museum, who, from his profound knowledge of the Talmud, has been kind enough to add this important comment:—"The word moreh," says the Midrash, "has many meanings. It means 'rebel,' it means 'fool' for thus they call a fool in the sea towns (i.e., the Greek colonies). It means such as would presume to teach their own teachers. It means throwers of poisoned arrows, calumny, &c."

II. This is the original meaning of the passage. Now let us turn to its general application. It teaches us, like all other parts of our Lord’s teaching, that not the outward act, but the inward spirit, is that which God judges. But it also calls our special attention to the mischief and the sin of our words. This is what He said on another occasion: “By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned;” and it is what His apostle St. James insists upon as the distinguishing mark between true and false religion—the power of governing the tongue. Considering the vast number of words that issue from our lips—considering how much of our life is carried on in talking, speaking, preaching, writing, reading, listening—this is a truth which cannot be too much insisted on. No doubt there is a precision in words which is pedantic; but all honour and praise to them who, consciously or unconsciously, obey their Lord’s command, and try to measure their language—to define what they mean to themselves—to avoid phrases without meaning, or which may injure and hurt the interests and feelings of others. No doubt there are cases where, like our Lord Himself, we are bound to use strong words against folly and sin. But there are some whose lips act not as a fence to their tongues, but as a mere opening, through which flows an unceasing cataract of words—good, bad, light, heavy, wise, foolish—without care or thought of who may hear or of what may follow. There are also some whose pens are dipped in gall, who seem to delight in saying what will vex or annoy their neighbours—who have a cynical sneer, a scornful jest, a bitter insult for any one whom they meet. Their whole conversation is one long repetition of “Raca, Raca.” Truly they are in danger of the condemnation of the council—not of any earthly council, but of the council of all good and wise men everywhere—of the council of the calm, and just, and holy—of those who know, with our own Hooker, that “the time will come when three words spoken in charity will be worth more than ten thousand words of disdainful scorn.”

But there is yet a still more special application. The judgment of our Lord is yet more penetrating. There are many men who, whilst they avoid the common profane terms of abuse and contempt, yet think it even a duty to use those words of bitter inextinguishable hatred which have come down to us like the Hebrew word morch, charged with the passions and prejudices of a thousand generations—those names which, having been invented long ago by political or religious animosity—perhaps almost with an innocent intention—convey now a depth of offensiveness which no other words from the mouth of men could convey. I hardly venture in this sacred place to call up the black catalogue of such names before you, yet from places as sacred as this they have unhappily been often heard. They are legion. On one side they are “heretic, schismatic, rationalist, infidel, deist, Socinian, atheist;” on the other they are “papist, antichrist, Babylon, idolater, blasphemer, traitor;” on one side or on the other they are followed by a brood of other like names. They are one and all repetitions of the same old word, “rebel,” “heretic,” expressed by the Hebrew word morch—they combine within themselves the intense virulence, as did that word, both of the Jewish and of the Gentile race; they have one and all been applied in their day to the best and wisest of men; and they are one and all good for nothing, but to be thrown into the valley of Hinnom, and burnt up with the filth and offal, and offscourings of dead abuses, and worn-out hatreds, and extinct controversies. Even though, like the word morch itself, they may once have come out of Scripture, and from the pure fountain of life, they have now become full of fire and brimstone; they are as worthless, as mischievous, as polluting, as the coarse oaths and scurrilous epithets which are used by the less refined in their daily quarrels and wrangles in taverns and in fish-markets.

These thoughts are unhappily never out of place. Everywhere there will be some who are tempted to use these or like words against their neighbours—everywhere there will be those who in sermons, or in newspapers, or in speeches, if not in common conversation, think it a sacred duty to use them. And everywhere our Lord's warning thus needs to be lifted up. We have given up the ancient practice of killing our neighbours by slow torture in deep dungeons, or of carrying out our quarrels with murderous weapons. Feudal vengeance and the barbarous custom of duelling are both abandoned. The more necessary is it that we should be reminded that this is not enough, unless we restrain our tongues from those fierce words of scorn which duelling at least attempted to control; the more do we need to be reminded that not only every duellist is a murderer, but he who says to his brother "Raca," that is, who uses those insulting words which set the human heart on fire, and leave a blister there for ever.

And again, we have given up the practice of killing our neighbours by fire, and sword, and rack, and scourge, for holding different opinions from ourselves. So much the more necessary is it for us to remember that this is not enough, unless we restrain our tongues from those biting and burning words which show that we nourish in our hearts the same feelings of undying wrath that our ruder forefathers expressed by carrying faggots to the stake, or tearing the flesh from the bones of our victims. So much the more do we need to be reminded that not only the old Inquisitors or the old Puritans were persecutors, but all who say to their brethren, Moreh, that is, "rebel," heretic," that is, who use those anathemas and furious words of ancient hereditary reproach, which are meant to break up Christian union, and destroy Christian fellowship.

These expressions are beyond the reach of earthly tribunals of judgment and of council; but not the less are they doomed to that extremity of condemnation of which the valley of Hinnom was the type and symbol. They belong to that mass of worthless chaff, and of stinging briars and brambles, which will be burned up, as we hope, at last in a fire unquenchable.

III. This warning, spoken first against the language of individuals, is also needed for the language of churches and nations. It is needed for them even more, because the interests at issue are greater; because also their temptation to indulge in these words is stronger. Look at the churches of Christendom. How many a solemn document has issued from press or pulpit, which is, after all, nothing but a long reverberation of Moreh, moreh, "Thou fool—thou rebel." Look at the anathemas hurled in former times by East against West, and by West against East, by Presbyterians against Prelates, and by Prelates against schismatics. Listen to their echoes in our own times—fainter, let us hope—but still coming of the same stock—springing out of the same bottomless pit. Look, too, at the contemptuous insolence with which nations have invented words of reproof for hostile or oppressed or subject nations—words which stick in the memory when the occasion, the excuse for them has long ceased—fountains of bitterness, which from generation to generation keep alive the sense of soreness and revenge, and stimulate to deeds of bloodshed and war.

What is the check to all this? It is contained in one word, which occurs throughout this passage—"Thy brother." Each man, in common life, has a brotherly, family relation to his neighbour, even to his enemy, which ought to make him feel and practise towards him something of a brother's respect, something of a brother's consideration. Each church and nation—at least of Christendom—has a brotherly, sisterly relationship with all other churches and nations; flesh of the same flesh, bone of the same bone, called by the same sacred name; which ought at least to induce courtesy, sympathy—fear to give offence, wish to bury the past, determination never to quarrel, hope to avoid irritating words, as well as irritating acts—malignant names, which are but covers of malignant deeds.

There are many cases to which these remarks might specially apply. There is one immediately at hand. This day is the Fourth of July. It is the anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence—the anniversary of the breach between the mother and the daughter country. On such a day may we not feel that our Lord's warnings have a peculiar significance and force? The sons of that great Republic are, indeed, our brothers—brothers in a sense in which no other two great nations on the face of this earth are brothers and sisters to each other—speaking the same language, inheriting the same traditions, descended from the same ancestors, entwined with the same dearest relationships, rejoicing in the same history, in the same faith, in the same hopes.

Both, no doubt, of these two mighty brothers have, like the actual brothers of an actual family, had their temper tried or their passions roused—sometimes the elder by the younger, sometimes the younger by the elder; but not the less are the ancient bonds of union indissoluble—not the less of them are the poet's words true:—

"No distance breaks the tie of blood,
Brothers are brothers evermore;
Nor wrong, nor wrath of deadliest mood,
That magic may o'erpower."

And how specially true is it of these brothers that hard words may kill, and gentle words save, the peace and life between them! How deeply was that first breach widened on this first anniversary by the bitter recriminations of king and statesmen, of the mother country and of the departing colony! How fiercely were the words tossed to and fro across the Atlantic—"Raca" on one side, and "Moreh" on the other; "tyrant" from the one, and "rebel" from the other. Yet how speedily, how easily was that wound closed—how soon did the Declaration of Independence become the name for the peaceful birth of a new and glorious nation—how soon did the minister of the young Republic pay respectful homage and receive respectful recognition in the court of the ancient sovereign. What American is there who is not now proud of that history, which he then spurned behind him? What Englishman is there who is not now proud of the once dreaded name of Washington?

So, as years roll on, may all those fierce watchwords of party strife and national hatred perish and cease to be. So may each succeeding generation learn to leave those ancient curses to consume away in the fires of the dark valley whence they came and whither they have returned to their natural offal and carrion.

Woe on either side to those who revive those relics of barbarous days—those signals of strife and bitterness. Blessings on those peacemakers who, from either side, by gentle phrase, by conciliating temper, by determination not to give or take offence, by rigid abstinence from insulting words, as from something altogether unholy and accursed, bind together the two nations in one communion and fellowship of good deeds, great thoughts, and undying hopes of a yet more blessed future for both, in the far distant history of which this day was the first inauguration—when neither distance of space nor wrath of man shall put asunder those whom God, by speech, by blood, by the wonders of science, and by the grace of Religion, has joined together.

A. P. STANLEY.

"NOBLESSE OBLIGE."

In English Story of To-day.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CITOYENNE JACQUELINE."

CHAPTER XXVII.—A DRAWBACK.

WHEN the gentlemen, who dined that day at the ordinary at Wellfield, returned to Brockcotes, all was life again. Phoebe saw what noble-men could turn their hands to at a pinch. Even Lord Dacre was wide awake now. Standing on steps with his hands above his head, he nailed together the improvised frames. If Lady Dorothea was the leader of the company, Lord Wriothresley was their ubiquitous servant; and he was particularly helpful of Phoebe, in her outlying strangeness. The very Countess was pressed into an office in the Beauties' green-room to-night, and was engaged in holding pins, trains, and lights. Phoebe had become sufficiently acquainted with the etiquette of noble service to be aware that the real Thorpes and their fellow-servants could not be expected to condescend as the Countess condescended, although she did no more than utter a few halting phrases, suggestive of commendation or amendment, which seemed only to check and mortify the rest of the performers. But her children caught at her words as pearls and diamonds of encouragement and counsel, and eagerly adopted her faintest hint.

All went to make a marvel of brilliant scenic effect.

But that same evening a formidable drawback revealed itself, threatening to put an end to Phœbe's part in the Brockcotes tableaux. After the receipt of the evening post and its letters, Frank Hall craved allowance, and with very humble apologies for spoiling sport, announced that he must leave early next morning. The managing editor of The Bat wanted him in town without a day's delay, to report on the Chinese loan, or on a new vanity which had appeared in the parks. Seeing that Frank Hall was at Brockcotes as a friend and equal, and not as a satellite, nothing could be done against his determination, save to marshal a host of sincere regrets, and support them with a division of cordial hopes that the press-man would soon find his way back to the stronghold of the Latimers.

Phœbe had not realised how much of her fancy was enlisted in playing with the party and completing the tableaux. Now, a blank sensation of the world's having come to an end took possession of her. It seemed inevitable that Lord Wriothlesley must take up the dropped part of Sir Kenelm, and play it to Miss Dugdale's Venetia, letting his own character, Lord Hervey and its Molly Lepel, fall to the ground; and this even though he should faint under the necessary stuffing, and Phœbe have to return as she came, like a Griselda, to her father's house,—go up with the broad stream, and stare with the common mob of spectators in the banqueting-room.

But poor Phœbe's carefully-concealed blank looks and chagrin were soon shown to be uncalled for. Mr. Vernon, with a little pressing, and the stipulation that the voluminous Spanish cloak should serve for the stuffing, was willing to do Sir Kenelm for the sake of the glamour of being Miss Dugdale's partner.

But Phœbe that same evening had a separate and strictly confidential explanation of the reason of Frank Hall's departure as he took leave of her.

"I have had enough of Brockcotes, Phœbe. I won't have it my Caprera. No; it is not the wines, though the white port is pretty fair. I drink better at the Garrick."

"Granted, Frank; but the wines are not everything," suggested Phœbe. "You must have enjoyed the shooting."

"Oh, as for the shooting, I'll never make a dead shot. That blind bat, Lord Wriothlesley, aims better with his glass in his eye than the city bat, used as he is to burrow and moil in dark corners. It is nothing so low as the 'grub' though I am of Grub Street, or the sport, or the company of the first estate. With regard to the last, one gets used to it soon enough, and finds its members, after all, dolls of men and dolls of women. I don't go in for the white devil among women of any school, from old Webster to Miss Braddon's stock in trade. Of course, I except the real Jezebels and Lady Macbeths; I allow they have a footing both in nature and art."

"I never expected you to speak with so much enthusiasm on such a point," alleged Phœbe.

"Well, perhaps, I may be excused, Phœbe; it's a woman who has done for me. I cannot remain any longer near your Lady Dorothea, else I shall be spoiled for domestic life, and lose my chance of becoming a family man—responsible and content. I could close my eyes at the present moment, and see a pale, bright-eyed woman, simple in her dress, and inexpensive in her habits, flitting about my writing-table, keeping guard at my elbow, never weary of reading notes, looking over 'copy,' correcting proofs, learning short-hand to report in her turn, and never flagging in her interest and zeal. I open my eyes and am tempted to curse poor innocent Lord Fairchester, plain and heavy and sensible—holding thousands of acres, booked for the blue riband, possibly for the strawberry leaves. I don't envy the man his other goods, particularly since he seeks to do the best he can with the burden which weighs upon him and renders him as silent as Dutch William."

"You strike me as being rather fanciful to be in earnest, Frank."

"Excuse me, Phœbe, if I say you are wrong there. I don't deny that Fairchester is a fair match for her; only I won't play (since playing is the order of the day) the bachelor Sir Christopher Hatton to my Queen Elizabeth; so I'm off with the train to-morrow. What are your commands, Phœbe? should I take Folksbridge on my way to town, or should I find anything to do in town beyond secretly writing for your bumptious benefit in The Bat?"

Phœbe could not tell whether there was or was not the slightest foundation of fact in Frank Hall's rhapsody. He had got into the habit of general mystification, till it was hard for any simple man or woman to follow him in his flights, and tell whether he was making a saucy pretence, in order to turn round and deny it absolutely, and thus cover the credulous listener with ridicule, or whether he was, after all, speaking in genuine earnest. Phœbe thought that simaplicity of tongue had its revenge. Frank Hall had gone so far in clever affectation, that now he was on the point of bewildering himself, and was so unfortunate as not quite to know his own mind, and what he would be at, in more instances than one.

Certainly Phoebe had remarked that Frank Hall and Lady Dorothea had taken latterly to noticing each other, and sparring with each other, very considerably. If there was a shade of suspicion on Frank Hall's side that he was gradually more and more venturing his all in the light drawing-room strife, he was a wise man to draw off his forces, and retreat with flying colours while it was still in his power.

In her uncertainty, Phoebe could not regret Frank Hall's departure, as Lady Dorothea did, in perfect unconsciousness.

"I am so sorry that the autocratical, conceited cousin of the press is called away, Phoebe," her Ladyship confessed; "for, between you and me, he was teaching me a thing or two. Wriothlesley calls his leaders incisive, luminous, epigrammatic, and says that that is what 'takes' in the present day; but I am not sure whether his conversation, like Dr. Johnson's, is not better than his leaders. One enjoys coming in contact with all sorts of power."

CHAPTER XXVIII.—INOPPORTUNE.

IN former years the race-week assembly had been, to the ladies of Wellfield, the most momentous and acceptable event of the year. But in this, Phoebe's first grown-up year at Wellfield races, her imagination went far beyond balls. And she was farther tempted to forget the assembly on the very morning of its occurrence. First, Mrs. Edgecumbe sent for her, that she might get the news, and cross-examine the girl on the arrangements at Brockcotes. When she had made her report, she was puzzled by the unusual reserve of the old lady, rather than troubled by her wonted freedom.

"You are to be my young Lord's partner," Mrs. Edgecumbe said, with a meaning look. "Well, well, times have changed; and you are a good girl, Phoebe Paston, and one of nature's gentlewomen: Edgecumbe, whose immense penetration I can trust, acknowledges it. However, such grouping would not have done forty years ago, and would not have been my doing to-day."

Mrs. Edgecumbe was more explicit in her opinion of Miss Dugdale, and that to Lady Dorothea herself, when her Ladyship called a little later in Woovers' Alley.

"But, Lady Dorothea," she said, "the Dugdales have been what Edgecumbe calls 'such frightfully broken-kneed fillies.' We who have been—"

Lady Dorothea was very angry at this, and drew herself up like a queen, stopping Mrs. Edgecumbe in what threatened to be a long tirade. "Which is it best for us to do, Mrs. Edgecumbe—to pick holes in a poor girl's mantle, or to cover her with ours?"

Even Mrs. Edgecumbe was silenced by this rebuke, and Phoebe hung her head a little at the recollection of her own particular aversion to Miss Dugdale.

But Phoebe was recalled by being left to herself, and by Mrs. Paston's "twitters" with regard to the creases in her cream-coloured moiré, and the still more important question of when the cab was to come for the Woovers' Alley party, and what extraordinary ruse was to be tried in order to betray Mr. Paston into being a quarter of an hour before, rather than ten minutes after, the time when Lord Exmoor and Lord Wriothlesley would open the ball.

When Phoebe began to dress, she entered into the spirit of the thing, and was careful about the fit of her gown, the size of her gloves, and the wreath of oak-leaves which Lady Dorothea had chosen for her to wear in her hair, like Norma, the British princess and priestess. With a little hesitation, too, and less gratification and gratitude, she accepted Mrs. Edgecumbe's ruby cross, pressed upon her with many assurances.

"Child," said the old lady, "it becomes your little round white neck a thousand times better than my lean, yellow one. Did you ever read Mr. Pope's famous lines on such an ornament?"—

"Which Jews might kiss, and infidels adore."

Phoebe had read them; and, in opposition to her father's appreciation of Mr. Pope, simply detested them.

Arrived at the ball, Phoebe found that she was a person of consequence—to the Wellfield world at least. She would be able to point out to the simple town's worthies which was Lady Louisa, and which Lady Penelope Blount; and to prevent the natives from mistaking Lord Dacre for Lord Fairchester. Had it not been for her, who could have answered the breathless questions as to all that had got abroad of the amateur concert, and the spectacle which was to follow at Brockcotes?

Phoebe had not counted on Barty Wooler being at the assembly; although, when she came to think of it, she remembered that everybody, young and old, who had no scruple of principle or purse, attended to see the race-company, and enjoy their own and their neighbours' fine clothes. Mrs. Wooler was not there, because, as she explained curtly, she did not "set" balls; but she was almost the solitary exception. Miss Rowe was present of course, Mr. Mossman trotting after her with meek suggestions of service in the form of negus. The two Miss Staceys, and the forty Miss Medlars, and their father's clerks, all swelled the crowd.

Barty Wooler early in the evening asked Phœbe to dance with him, and she had no choice but to comply with his request, although she would rather not have done it. The county people, after the example of the Exmoors, behaved very well at the race-balls, which were moves for popularity to begin with. They mixed freely with the town's people, and were apt to select them only too persistently for their partners and vis-à-vis. But the town's people were not in the habit of taking the initiative. Phœbe felt far shyer than if she had had nothing to do with Brockcotes, and was too embarrassed to remonstrate and resist the situation when Barty Wooler placed her opposite Lord Wriothesley and Miss Dugdale in the same set with Lady Dorothea and a brother of the Hammonds. Either Barty, who ought to have avoided the association, was unapprised of the usual customs, or defied them.

Lady Dorothea nodded cordially to Phœbe, and while her Ladyship waved off her friend from an impulse to fasten her sash, which had come loose, she stooped down and picked up a stray evergreen that threatened to trip

Phœbe. Lord Wriothesley made an observation, in passing, on the air of the room and the withering of some of the flowers of Phœbe's bouquet, which had been mindfully sent that morning from the Brockcotes green-houses.

Even Miss Dugdale greeted Phœbe politely, though why Miss Dugdale should not have been polite to her it would have staggered Phœbe to explain.

Still Phœbe was very uncomfortable. It was not that she was ashamed of her partner. She hardly looked at Barty; but she had an inward vision of him, with his chestnut mane and beard severely trimmed for the occasion—the finest looking man in the room without a single exception. Neither did she so very much mind that Lady Dorothea's intelligent eyes should see double for once in carrying conviction to her mind that there was a fit understanding between Mr. Wooler and his partner. But in spite of this, Fortune had never been so unkind to Phoebe as now—she had never been placed so little to her mind as in this quadrille.

But she did not know what it was to live (metaphorically) till Barty Wooler asked her almost within hearing of the others, if it could be true that she was going to row in the same boat with the noble players. On being answered in the affirmative, Barty urgently and emphatically protested against it.

"I have a delicacy in mixing myself up in your father's relations with Brockcotes, and therefore I am remonstrating with you. Perhaps you may not think that comes very well off my hand either," added Barty, with a laugh, which, unlike his usual laugh, was not pleasant; "but I think you may at least believe that I do it for your own sake, Miss Phoebe."

Phoebe had never before been so indisposed to yield to Barty Wooler's bluntness—never so wroth with him for spoiling her enjoyment. For he did spoil it; even while he spoke the peach, primrose, and cherry-coloured trappings, and the whole tableau, with the speculation and the admiration it would excite, faded and changed in her imagination, and struck her as being a forced and idle piece of vanity. It might be well enough for the great people, who had nothing else to do, and whose position gave them carte blanche for frivolity and extravagance. (How Lady Dorothea would have rebelled against the imputation!) But it was not well for a girl like her. She took her stand on belonging to that class, and was fain to pledge herself that she would never meanly crave to abandon it by crazily dreaming of being translated to another sphere.

But Phoebe did not betray a glimpse of her disconcerted state of feeling when she answered Barty Wooler with cold carelessness.

"I have passed my word, Mr. Wooler, and had my part cast for me. And it is a very nice character, if you will condescend to see it. Surely you would not have me go back from the one and throw up the other, disappointing and displeasing some of my best friends, in an affair to which papa does not object,—with which it seems nobody but yourself finds fault?"

"There are plenty of objectors," Barty maintained, "if they had only the courage and the honesty to come forward and say what they think. I can only hope that you will not see cause to regret the step. I cannot conceive how your father, with all his bondage to the Exmoors, could consent to it."

This speech was too much, was utterly unjustifiable, indeed; and Barty Wooler was without the excuse of a right to make it. It could only be met by an indignant silence, which he did not seek to break when he led Phoebe to the bench which she indicated.

CHAPTER XXIX.—GOSSIP AND MORE.

As Phoebe sat there with conscious stiffness, of which she could not get rid, Lord Wriothesley came up and engaged her for the next dance but one, dropping the merest hint, as he noted down the engagement, that he had been doing duty till now as the great dancing representative of the Latimers.

She was still smarting under the late rebuke and reproach, and was inclined to hold this communication no business of hers. She felt Lord Wriothesley had no call to make it. She would have had a mind to be offended by the inference, if Lord Wriothesley had not been so friendly and innocent-looking, and if she were not ashamed of herself for such carping self-consciousness.

"Barty Wooler has done all he could to put evil in my head," she reflected, bitterly, "by putting a false construction on my unavoidable acquaintance with Lady Dorothea's brother; and he has attained his end, so far, at all events, as to give a silly constraint to my manner."

Miss Rowe, gossiping with Mrs. Medlar, sat near Phoebe. She either did not measure the distance to which sound travels, or did not heed, for snatches of the conversation reached the subject of it. Phoebe turned another way, and did everything but put her hands on her ears, or cross the ball-room alone, to prevent the contrectemps.

"Did you not see how she dropped down on the first seat, and dismissed him in no time, because she has higher game to-night?" questioned Mrs. Medlar. "Why, the foolish thing's head must be turned by the notice the county folks are taking of her—very injudicious, and what I should not like for my girls, Miss Rowe; and there is Watkins going to dance again with Bella. I ought to interfere, but one does not like to interfere with one's girls' pleasures if one can help it. But I thought better of Phœbe. I really did, though the mother is not over-wise, and the father, however quiet and diligent, belongs to a flighty profession, always dependent on high customers, unless a man takes to the portrait line—and these cheap photographs have done that up, too, I understand, and compelled even portrait-painters to keep their sitters in good humour, which my husband says is the hardest work he gets with voters in election times."

"Yes, and that's no easy task either way," said Miss Rowe, twirling her fan, "especially as most sitters nowadays are so little in the habit of really feeling at ease, and are always trying to look what they are not," she wound up, unable to resist this wicked little home-thrust, even at the expense of a temporary ally. But Mrs. Medlar was impervious and adroit at diversions.

"Now, would you say that lace of Mrs. Stacey's was French, or only Maltese?" she went off at a new angle; but she immediately returned to strike poor Phœbe yet more sharply. "I should have thought a girl who knew so much of the grondees and their ways would never have been so presumptuous as to lay herself out for attention from that quarter. She will put her foot through as fine prospects as ever a Wellfield girl commanded, and ruin herself with the other, if there was any truth in that story, which Milly always doubted. As an old married woman and a mother, I cannot help regretting it. Girls never do know what is good for them, though I don't think my girls would have behaved so badly, risking fine prospects, putting them in the fire with their own hands, a crying sin so much as to think of. No, they are better brought up, though I should not say it."

"I don't know as to girls' upbringings, Mrs. Medlar," returned the other: "but I do know she is serving the painter as I have seen his mother serve other men. You must remember Miss Judith Clay bouncing with her yeoman friends at the subscription-balls, and pretending to sprain her ankle when poor Clerk Wooler happened to look in."

"He has brought this upon me also; surely I have a great deal to thank him for," Phœbe said to herself, employing a woman's logic to pile up the charges against her rejected suitor. She did not recover her spirits in dancing with Lord Wriothsley, though she believed that he danced with her from taste and with a will. She could not wind up again the curious mechanism of her spirits, which, in place of being at a high pitch, had now suffered collapse in a style that was quite out of keeping with a Wellfield belle's first appearance—and a distinguished appearance too. She had often pictured such an appearance, just as she had pictured her walk up to Brockcotes on the morning after her return home, with no reason to expect particular distinction, nor, for that matter, particular mortification and pain.

But she reckoned on the tableaux making up for the ball.

The company that gathered in the Brockcotes banqueting room next evening had an entertainment of which they might talk for many race-weeks to come. It might even serve to grace a conversation when Miss Dugdale's beauty should be matured and matronly, Lord Wriothsley have grown stout and prudent, Lady Dorothea—even Lady Dorothea—have settled down into inactivity, and Phœbe Paston have no more to do with the county families than her father after he had painted his last picture.

The initiatory concert was so hurried over that, while the listeners prided themselves on the rank of the performers, no one had time to weary of any part of the programme, unless of Thalberg's piece. Lady Louisa sang "Mia Vendica," without drawing down retribution on herself for a rattling hail of false notes. Miss Dugdale and Mr. Vernon adjured and responded to each other in "Dis moi ce mot," without either asking or answering a word worth the hearing.

Then followed the tableaux in rapid succession.

Lord Fairchester and Lady Dorothea were discovered on a rampart, which was at least as good a rampart as Pyramus and Thisbe's wall was a wall.

Lord Dacre and Lady Penelope were surprised at a banquet, which enabled him to sit and pull his moustache, while she flashed forth her blazing girdle, bracelet, and rings, in the act of pouring out his wine.

Mr. Vernon was gingerly making-believe to paint Miss Dugdale, in his anxiety to retain a facsimile of her charms as another and a crowning proof of the exquisite æsthetical faculty of the bragging virtuoso—the same anxiety which gave Sir Kenelm presence of mind to have Venetia Lady Digby's effigy taken from her corpse, when she was found dead in bed.

Lord Wriothsley, with his hat below his arm, extended his hand to Phœbe Paston to conduct her out of one of the boxes at Ranelagh, among the flaunting lanterns which decorated the shrivelled, dusty trees, as if he were leading her out to one of the minuets that Lord Hervey and Molly Lepel "walked," and which were familiar to the readers of the accounts of the Northern rebellion, and the earthquake of Lisbon.

Everybody allowed that the groups were prettily designed and faithfully rendered, and there appeared that night to be only one sentiment in the audience—that of gratified admiration. But Phœbe had only half a heart for her part. It was a mistake. She should not have been there; she admitted that to herself now, not blaming Lady Dorothea for being misled by her own wishes, and not blaming her father for being supine in the matter. She did not even blame Lord Wriothesley in the slightest degree, but felt grateful to him for the forbearance and delicacy with which he managed their tableaux, when she had become alive to its incongruity and awkwardness, and found these elements nearly intolerable; she blamed herself for her short-sightedness and vanity, and she blamed Barty Wooler with a great swelling grudge for enlightening her—and for not even coming to see the show.

CHAPTER XXX.—A LULL.

DURING the whole of the autumn there had been a hurry and a clashing of events which were now to be followed by a lull. The month of October was stormy. The winter set in suddenly with mud, mire, and frost, bringing shooting-parties to an abrupt termination, and limiting the number of hunting-days. There were not many occasions favourable for Phœbe's walking up to Brockcotes, since Mrs. Paston had a horror of damp dresses and soaked feet, and was as determined as she could be about anything, that her daughter should not consume her folly by going off in a galloping consumption. Even Lady Dorothea, though the Countess was far less afraid of damp than Mrs. Paston, was not able to reach Wooers' Alley above once a week on account of important consultations on her approaching marriage.

But as it happened, the great merging into each other of the houses of Blount and Latimer was postponed. Lord Exmoor's gout transferred itself as pure rheumatism to Lady Exmoor, threatening to render active movement impossible for the rest of her life. It did not seem so inappropriate or intolerable a fate considering the habits of the Countess in relation to the world without. But Lady Exmoor's immediate circle rallied round the still, stiff-natured woman, threatening now to become stiff-jointed also. The Earl was to give up his attendance at a score of meetings where his countenance was solicited, and to forego his pleasure at all the winter races and agricultural shows, in order that he might be in close attendance on his wife. Lord Wriothesley was to stay on at Brockcotes to be ready to take his father's place when a substitute was possible. Lady Dorothea's marriage, with its ceremonies and festivities, as coming in the way of Lady Exmoor's cure, was deferred indefinitely in spite of the Countess's remonstrances. Dr. Mitford, who devoted his best skill and the most of his time to the Exmoor family, keeping an assistant for the rest of the world, and who, in spite of his most conscientious exertions, was said to be growing rapidly grey and nervous under the weight of his responsibility, requested further professional advice, and despatched the whole family to town a month before Christmas—three whole months before Parliament should open. Everybody the Exmoors knew were then at their own country-places, or at Brighton, or abroad. To break the journey to the Countess, Dr. Mitford accompanied the party himself. In the solitude of the upper walks of London, the high authorities in medicine found leisure to lay their wise heads together respecting the Countess's limbs, and ordered her off to the winter wretchedness of the German baths. Casting objections to the winds, and spurning obstacles, if they might but spare the elasticity of an ankle or a thumb, her faithful people carried the Countess thither. The escort consisted of Lord Exmoor and Lady Dorothea, Mr. Richardson as factotum, Mr. Simmons, his Lordship's man, Thorpe, her Ladyship's woman, and Thorpie, Lady Dorothea's maid, with their satellites. Lord Wriothesley was forced to remain to discharge his father's duties at Brockcotes, Swinely, and other portions of the Latimers' territories. But his place was, to some extent, supplied by Lord Fairchester, who felt warranted in setting his own duties aside or letting them lie over this year, that he might discharge the more pressing claim of paying court to Lady Dorothea in going and coming as an intermittent member of the Exmoor suite.

Phœbe had always thought Wellfield more or less desolate when Brockcotes was given over to Mr. Clarges and Mrs. Bald. But she contemplated with edification the sacrifices the men of the family made for the Countess. It was not that she thought her father would not sacrifice even art itself to confer real benefit on her and her mother. But her position, and much more her mother's position in Wooers' Alley, was essentially different, in more than what related to purple and fine linen, from the footing occupied at Brockcotes by Lady Dorothea and Lady Exmoor. Mr. Paston was very fond of his daughter, and was indulgent to her mother; but he frequently took little notice of the one, and almost uniformly spoke ironically to the other. He might excuse himself for this last breach of good taste on the ground that Mrs. Paston was incapable of perceiving or resenting irony, and that the complaints in which she indulged were the natural dropping and oozing out of a feeble nature—and one, too, a little jealous in its feebleness.

Phœbe could not help contrasting her father's self-engrossment and Barty Wooler's want of freedom in the society of cultivated women, with the courtesy that was a second nature to the men of the Exmoor family—the half-chivalrous deference which marked all they did in connection with their women. The domestic virtues, as practised at Brockcotes, she had heard sung all her life, and she was not in a position to guess how much of a whited sepulchre such class manners in other cases might be. She simply saw, or imagined she saw, that the balance was largely in favour of the noble families. She had the impression that it was very fine for the Countess and Lady Dorothea to be thus waited on, consulted, and courted by husband, brother, and lover. She would have been justly offended if any one had told her that she did not value at their true worth her father's peculiar affection, and her mother's half-scolding, half-fretting tenderness. Still she thought it would be nice—a thing any girl might covet—to have her chair, footstool, and screen constantly found for her, her bell rung when she wanted anything, and the book she was reading remembered and brought to her; above all, to have the gentlemen of her house more or less at leisure to lend her a portion of their company when she required it, and to pay special visits with her.

As the winter deepened, there was a general impression in Wellfield that it must be lonely for Lord Wriothesley, living all by himself up at Brockcotes. He was mostly there, of course; Swinely, and the other localities in which the name of Exmoor flourished as that of the ruling proprietor, having less call for the presence of a member of the family. But if Lord Wriothesley must be lonely, most people, the men especially, said what an excellent opportunity it was for his Lordship acquiring those business habits which would be of immense importance both to him and his dependants afterwards. The old Latimers had set him a good example. They had been very much their own chamberlains and inspectors of works. And Lord Wriothesley seemed inclined to avail himself of the opportunity. He did not shut himself up with his books or his canvas and brushes, as had been feared. He was interested in more things than the meets of the hounds. He did not content himself with dilettanti patronage of mechanics' institutions, parish clubs, and little essays at speechifying, which might be of use to him after he stepped into a borough. He really set himself to know his work, and do it much as Lady Dorothea would have done; only where his sister would have been largely practical, he theorised and generalised, and was full of schemes and visions. In the morning he was about in the gardens, the stables, the kennels; after luncheon, he was abroad on his horse or in his drag, going far and near over the estate in all weathers. He looked into the boundaries and investigated clauses in leases, and disputes founded on them; he visited and ascertained for his own private satisfaction the state of the line of railway in process of being made, in which Lord Exmoor was the great shareholder; he inspected personally the wood-mills, the tile-works, the new farm-buildings with which Lord Exmoor was then busy. He had been sworn in as a justice of the peace, and he now took his seat on the bench almost as regularly as his father had done. He surprised the market-town of Nannton by appearing occasionally in the market, and gravely applying himself to prices, very much as if he meant business.

Certainly no stout young farmer at the ordinary at Nannton, nor fervent young high-church curate within three parishes, rode or strode about in more unwavering pursuit of his calling than did Lord Wriothesley. If he did not return home to write sermons or keep accounts, he audited the steward's papers, burrowed in the charter-chest, kept up with the literature—both classical and scientific—of the times, and dined out in the few neighbouring country-houses on a visiting level with Brockcotes.

Lord Wriothesley's subjects were ready to smack their lips approvingly on him as one of the right sort. They spoke of him as an active-minded and public-spirited young nobleman—neither a milksop, nor a wilding, nor a nincompoop. The country worthies were rather doubtful when his Lordship's talents were spoken of, regarding these in the light of brittle, precarious ware, but at least his Lordship's talents did not interfere with his attention to business. They saw in him a solid yet sharp youngster, with a brain, a heart, and a conscience.

When it was found that Lady Exmoor could not return till Easter, Lord Wriothlesley, with his father's approval, set on foot a new clearing of the more overgrown portions of the Brockcotes woods, and took the first steps towards bringing in water at the family's expense to the town of Nannton, in the same manner as it had been brought in to Wellfield. These were the improvements which he had convinced himself were the most desirable in the meanwhile, and with which he would do well to commemorate his deputy-reign. To his other duties, and at the risk of being dubbed a busybody, he added an energetic individual superintendence of the two works which he had inaugurated.

Phoebe heard of the thinning of the trees and the leading of the water into Nannton as Lord Wriothlesley's measures, and at first turned up her nose foolishly. How should she know and consider that one of the noblest acts of the last noble Percy, and one on which he spent three hundred thousand pounds, was to build dwellings of no higher architectural pretension than labourers' cottages? She was curious to know, and perplexed herself in trying to guess, what Lady Dorothea would think of this commencement of the campaign. Of course, she would approve in a way of anything useful, but were these quite small, commonplace endeavours any sign of the great enterprise with which Lord Wriothlesley was to signalise his wearing of the Earl's coronet, and still further ennoble Exmoor? Were they even indications of the legislative genius, the financial skill, which were one day to promote Wellfield's young Lord to be the head of her Majesty's cabinet, or the Chancellor of her Exchequer? These were such small beginnings, that they struck one as very peddling and pottering. Yet it was true that all the poor men out of work—and this was rather a hard year at Wellfield—had found employment in the woods, and it might be a great boon for the old and infirm women, the "grey mothers" of Nannton, not to be forced any longer to toil up side lanes, carrying muddy water from the Nann; finally, if the cholera raged in the town again, as it had twice raged already, then, indeed, Lord Wriothlesley's measure would not be judged trifling: and Phoebe Paston would be pronounced a supercilious goose of a girl to have carpied at it.

CHAPTER XXXI.—LORD WRIOTHESLEY'S APPEAL.

CHRISTMAS was over, and there were some faint tokens of milder weather. Lord Wriothlesley's unremitting exertions, combined with his comparative isolation from society, began to tell on his slight body. More than one competent Wellfield acquaintance remarked how fagged and worn he looked, and apprehended that he was on the eve of one of the spring influenzas, which had attacked him before, and which it was understood had excited alarm in the family.

There were respectful remonstrances from Dr. Mitford, the Rector, and Mr. Paston, as well as from Mrs. Bald and Mr. Clarges up at the house. But if Lord Wriothlesley had a stubborn point in his temper, it was on the question of his constitution. He maintained that he could do more work and stand more fatigue than most people, which was true so far as it went. He preferred to call his slight frame wiry, till the contrary should be proved against it.

Mr. Paston was particularly impressed by Lord Wriothlesley's sickly look.

"What can Mitford be thinking of?" he protested. "The doctor ought to write and warn the Earl that Lord Wriothlesley is using himself up. I declare, I think Mitford is afraid to do it. I believe he is frightened to look the thing in the face—the heir whom he brought into the world with a flourish of trumpets, and saw safely through his infantine ailments—suppose he should go out of the world without ceremony at this time of the day! The Countess's rheumatism is nothing to it—really nothing to it, Phœbe."

"But perhaps you are cheated by appearances and symptoms which tell the doctor a different tale," said Phœbe, not looking up from her sewing.

"Well, I hope it may be so; but Mitford allows the young fellow too much line. The fact is, the doctor dare not admit to himself the great reason there is for contradicting Lord Wriothlesley. But if Mitford won't report to Lord Exmoor, I must incur the odium of going out of my province to send off bad news; or do you think you could do it when you write to Lady Dorothea, Phœbe?"

"To be sure I can, if it be thought necessary," answered Phoebe.

Mr. Paston's concern issued in what was a great demonstration for him. The young nobleman looked in at Wooers' Alley one afternoon on his return from an expedition, and showed himself, as even he acknowledged, "done for the day, and fit for the dogs." Mr. Paston detained him, and, taking him up to the drawing-room, in spite of his splashed boots, ordered Mrs. Paston to get a cup of tea for him, while he rested and dried his boots before proceeding home.

"Now, I think this is just what I need," exclaimed Lord Wriothlesley, suddenly, as he leant back in one of the fantastic lounging-chairs, sipped his tea, and glanced round him. "I don't mean that I need a fuss made about me, or indeed that I am worth it; so you are not to plume yourself on your turning courtier, Paston. As for your tea, Mrs. Paston, it is as near as possible to perfection, and quite beyond my deserts. For that matter, they make a fuss about me up at Brockcotes. Having nobody there but myself, Mrs. Bald and Clarges let off their whole steam upon me, until the effect is stunning. But it is so snug here, with you all at home bearing each other company, and it is so desolate up at Brockcotes, with my father and mother, Dorothea and Fairchester, all falling into bad ways without me to keep them in order, in these horrid German holes, where they cannot have a comfortable carpet, or a fire, or a cup of tea like this," he said, turning to Mrs. Paston.

"Goodness me! go there for health and recovery, and can't get a cup of tea or a fire in such weather as this, when the evenings still have a touch of frost?"

"Well, so it is, Mrs. Paston; nature does a good deal there; but man does little to help her in the work of cure. I suppose man is made to rile his family, and pour his woes into their ears, as well as to draw forth their woes in return? If you would put up with the infliction," pleaded his Lordship, humbly, "and let me look in on you like this, or come down after dinner when I am not too late, and sit a while with you in the evening; if I could have Mrs. Paston to coddle me, Miss Paston to laugh at me, and you, Paston, to take a tough wrangle with me on the principles of art—after that I should go home refreshed, and retire to bed at an innocent hour, like a Christian, in place of half-dropping off my chair before I can make up my mind to perform the ceremony. I am persuaded you would set me up again in no time. I own, since I am in the character of a miserable beggar, that I think I should be the better at present of a little solacing by good company as well as of bracing by work and duty."

"Pray come, my Lord, whenever you like. We shall always be glad to see you. I need hardly say that we shall be only too thankful if we can offer any entertainment, or be of any service to your father's son."

Mr. Paston answered his Lordship almost in the words in which he had bidden Barty Wooler welcome, but with a different meaning in his hospitality. As Barty had nothing to do with it now, and as Mr. Paston had never put much weight on his friend's opinion as to the intercourse between Brockcotes and Wooers' Alley, he saw no serious objection to Lord Wriothlesley coming about the house as his father had done before him. He would have held himself guilty of a suspicious, carping temper, which would have been a sorry return for all the obligations he owed the family at Brockcotes, had he denied to the cherished son the small boon he sought.

To do Lord Wriothlesley justice, so long as he had been well, he had been content with his work, and had not tried to infringe the rules which Mr. Paston had laid down for visiting in Wooers' Alley. It was not till he felt his need of rest and relaxation that he acknowledged a craving for what was wanting in his lot, and gave in to the demands of his nature. Even yet he would have resisted them, if it had not been true of him that, like Mr. Paston, he had not seen any serious objection to their indulgence. Why should he not visit intimately in the house which, with its advantages and its patent defects, had taken his fancy? Why should he not cultivate the friendship of the girl who was his sister's friend, and who had taken his fancy also? None knew better than he did how utterly free he was from any idle vanity where Phoebe Paston was concerned. It would be affronting her, and making a coxcomb of himself, to suppose that association with him could be dangerous to her peace or well-being. If he ever saw any danger—and he coloured, pshawed, and felt his heart beat at the foolish idea—why then he would withdraw at once.

Whatever might be the delusion, there came a new lustre on Phoebe's life with Lord Wriothlesley's naturalisation in Wooers' Alley.

His Lordship threw on the permission granted to him, and rapidly recovered his normal, youthful elasticity of health, until all anxiety vanished regarding his overworn looks and jaded air.

CHAPTER XXXII.—FRIENDS SPEAK THEIR MIND.

IN the town's new craze of confidence, not only in the virtues, but in the lucky star, of the house of Exmoor, no fault was found for an exceptionally long time with Lord Wriothesley for resorting to Wooers' Alley for his entertainment and cure. It was not until the Earl and the Countess, with Lady Dorothea and Lord Fairchester, were expected home, and an astounding rumour concerning them had flashed within the orbit of Wellfield, that an awful interpretation—more like the flare of an ill-omened comet than the peaceful gleam of a lucky star—went abroad concerning Lord Wriothesley's close intercourse with the Pastons.

"I'd never have thought it," panted Mrs. Medlar; "I was put out, I must say, at Phoebe Paston's shaking off Barty Wooler, and much too good for her, if so be she did shake him off, and he did not think better of it and shake her off. What a hussy the girl, who has kept company with my girls, must be, Miss Rowe, to think to draw in the young Lord to marry such a paltry, cozening creature as she is! It is almost as bad as having anything to say to him, poor lad, without marriage."

"Well, Mrs. Medlar, I think you go a little too far there; but I fancy her father and mother might have had more sense," answered Miss Rowe, whose chief art lay in seeming to dissent, and yet draw out the speaker.

"You have said it, Miss Rowe," Mrs. Medlar resumed. "How can Mr. Paston and Mrs. Paston, though she do be a fool, wink at it? Are you cock sure, as Medlar says—I beg your pardon, Miss Rowe—but is it main certain it is for that minx Phoebe? I never saw anything in her but ordinary girl's good looks. There is no great things of her—just an insignificant brown monkey."

"You may depend upon it it is for her," said Miss Rowe, deliberately. "The marvel is that we could be so senseless as to believe it was for daubs of pictures, when he has so much better, galleries on galleries of them, up at Brockcotes. For anything I know, Lord Wriothesley may be able to paint as good pictures as Caleb Paston. You know the family have always prided themselves on his Lordship's being an accomplished youth—though I must say I formed no great opinion of his manners in the race-week: very likely he was hankering after the girl by that time. There is no accounting for tastes. And as to Phoebe Paston's clutching at such a chance, it is not over-wise, I dare say, but it is no more than might be expected. I haven't known above one or two women who would have done otherwise, and they were not to be found among new-made ladies and gentlemen. However, there is no denying it is damaging to the girl's reputation—I would not say worse than that; and Paston, though he is a new-made gentleman and a genius, need not be so flighty as to venture such a risk on the wildest possibility."

"I believe Mrs. Paston has the monstrous presumption to believe that there is every likelihood of her daughter dying a countess. Did you notice, Miss Rowe, how she sidled like a peahen into the meeting of the Clothing Society the other night, as if she expected everybody to rise up and speak to her, and was not sure whether any one was good enough to be spoken to back again? What a fine mystery she made about Miss Paston's not being able to come out, and what a difficulty about her attending the sewing meeting that the Miss Staceys attend, and Miss Adelaide Coke sometimes looks in upon! I have known Phoebe Paston reckoned a deal cheaper. More than that, I declare, Miss Rowe, the last time I called in at Wooers' Alley, it was perfectly disgusting to see the attention Mrs. Paston paid to her daughter. I, who had walked from the Bank, in the teeth of a March wind, was nobody. She called Phoebe Miss Paston, and it was, Would Miss Paston have a footstool or a fire-screen, and did she prefer claret to sherry at lunch? The Pastons have a regular hot lunch with the best of us. I could not believe my eyes when I sat down, and Phoebe, who was worried with her mother's notice of her, asked me to have a cutlet."

"I take a bit of bread and cheese, as I have always done, Mrs. Medlar," announced Miss Rowe; "I have no liking for new-fangled ways."

"And I am sure," replied Mrs. Medlar, "it is only to please Medlar and the girls that I ever do otherwise. One must try to please one's husband, Miss Rowe; we have Scripture for that."

"When one has a husband to please," suggested Miss Rowe, candidly.

"Of course. I did not mean—you could not think I was twitting you with—ha! Miss Rowe, you might have had your pick and choice of gentlemen in the army and the navy, like your relations."

"I do not know. I never had my choice of an earl—that I can say, with a safe conscience, Mrs. Medlar."

"No, nor Phoebe Paston neither, I lay you all the gloves in Orme's shop. But I was going to say that I am indulgent to my girls, poor things; it stands to nature, and nobody can say I am unnatural—but to make idols of them, as Mrs. Paston is doing of that Phoebe of hers, I should be ashamed to dream of such a thing. Certainly there's many of mine, and that may make some difference; but don't you think, Miss Rowe, that one girl may need knocking about even more than a dozen?"

"I quite agree with you, Mrs. Medlar. But about Mrs. Paston's folly—she was on another tack with me when I sat next her at the Loyds' the other night. She was as low as low could be on the deceitfulness of men, and no faith to be put in the great. If I had not known my woman, I should have thought either that Lord Wriothsley had refused to sign a bill for Paston, or that Phoebe had been caught running off with his Lordship that morning."

"Goodness! it has not come to that, Miss Rowe?" protested Mrs. Medlar, her hair standing on end. "I never heard Medlar hint that the Pastons were not in a good way. Paston has done very well for himself as an artist. Of course art is not a trade to make a fortune by. I call the Clays a fortune. There can be nothing so shocking as a clandestine correspondence or private appointments between Phoebe Paston and Lord Wriothsley. No doubt it is not to the credit of a girl like her, and a nobleman like him, that there should be the suspicion of philandering between them, and one cannot be too careful; he should not be allowed to speak twice to Bella or any of the others—not though he would give his life to do it, now. But as far as I have heard tell, he sees Phoebe Paston only in her father's house, quite open and above-board, that I must say for them."

"I have no objection," vouchsafed Miss Rowe, with a little gape. "Did you not see I was simply pointing the moral of Mrs. Paston's lowness of spirits, by supposing extreme cases to account for it?"

"Oh! that was it, was it?" exclaimed Mrs. Medlar, with her perplexity increased by the fear of offending Miss Rowe—not that Miss Rowe was so easily offended as she was unscrupulous in giving her tongue play. "I dare say Mrs. Paston, poor woman, does not know what to think; and as she never had a mind of her own, but depended on borrowed opinion, she could not be the same two days on end."

"And in place of leaping at ugly conclusions," counselled Miss Rowe, ruthlessly, "I should be very careful, if I were you, of what I said and how I behaved to Phoebe Paston. I speak for Mr. Medlar's sake; for you know it does not do for a professional man like him to cut himself off from the great people. It don't much matter for an old, single body like me, though even I should not like to miss the yearly concert or theatricals, or the little presents of fruit and game with which the Exmoor family favour me. When Phoebe Paston is Lady Wriothsley, not to say Countess of Exmoor, I shall make her my lowest curtsy, and cease to remember that I ever made her anything else. I shall talk of brunette beauty being unapproachable, though at present I think it can no more compare with that white-faced thing Lady Dorothea's style, than my old plain head can match with your girls' full bloom. But after all, there is only a little bit of a chance, not above the balance of a straw, that Phoebe Paston will ever reap any harvest but a barren one of mortification, ridicule, and a soured temper for life, from her impudence in getting herself mixed up with my Lord."

"Serve her right!" cried Mrs. Medlar, in exasperation. Mrs. Medlar found herself looking at both sides of the question in disagreeable uncertainty. She was puzzled whether she should forbid her girls to speak to Phoebe Paston in future, or whether, the next time she met Phoebe, she should drop a curtsy, like a charity school-girl, and beg and beseech Phoebe to accept the loan of her umbrella, on the plea that she, with her periodical bronchitis and lumbago, would take no harm in an April shower.

"I don't believe one word of it," said Mrs. Wooler, folding her hands behind her scrubby laburnums, "unless, indeed, God be going to make Caleb Paston a spectacle to man and angels, in his height and in his fall. But I shall never trouble my head with such an idle tale."

DEBENHAM'S VOW.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S HISTORY."

CHAPTER XLIV.—THE FORTUNE OF WAR.

DEBENHAM was right when he said that it was perhaps well for Archie and himself that they should be off again on the morrow. Men who live with "one foot on sea and one on shore" become, by the mere force of circumstances, more susceptible than other men to the influence of such bright eyes as they chance to encounter on terra firma; and it was by no means desirable that either should suffer himself to be slain by the bright eyes of a demoiselle Ashby. De Benham, at all events, had no mind to be so slain. Next to the misfortune of being captured by a Federal cruiser, no accident that could befall him would, as he well knew, so impede his labours and mar his prospects as an engagement, or anything approaching to an engagement, with Diana Ashby. Her lover, of all men, must be devoted like herself to her country's cause; must, most unquestionably, mount the palmetto tree and fight for the Stars and Bars. No alien would have a chance with her—unless, indeed, he became, in very truth and earnest, a naturalised citizen of the Confederate States. This De Benham knew that he would never do. He knew that he would never lay down his coronet, renounce his ancient title, give up his native England and every hope of winning back the fiefs and lordships of his ancestors, for any eyes, blue or black, Transatlantic or otherwise. . . . No; not if they were the brightest that ever rained influence on knight or poet. It behoved him, then, above all things, not to fall in love with the eldest Miss Ashby—and he felt that he was fast drifting that way. It was, indeed, well that he should be off and away before he drifted farther.

And now they were again on the point of starting. Hitherto all had gone well with them—so well, that the ship's crew began to boast that the Stormy Petrel was born to good luck and proof against all those perils that blockade-runners were heirs to. Two round trips had been made in safety, and the half of another. Three full cargoes of miscellaneous stores had been sold at an almost fabulous rate of profit. Two of cotton were even now on their way to Liverpool, on board the Sabrina; and a third was just bought, stowed on board the Stormy Petrel, and ready for the run. The blockade-runner, it is needless to say, had in the meanwhile paid her expenses ten times over. It was no wonder that captain and crew, highly salaried as they were, should exult and make merry.

This time, however, De Benham felt more than commonly anxious, and even somewhat depressed. Diana Ashby counted, perhaps, for something in the matter. He told himself that she certainly did so, and that he was a fool for his pains. He would not for one moment allow, even to his own thoughts, that his depression had in it anything of that vague uneasiness that goes by the ugly name of evil presentiment. And yet, in his secret heart, he would have given much to put off the start for just twenty-four hours longer. Had any cause for doing so presented itself, his relief of mind would have been great. Could he even have devised any reasonable pretext for delay, he would have put that pretext forward, and have acted upon it unhesitatingly. But with these unacknowledged presentiments and anxieties, Diana Ashby's eyes (bright as they were, and reluctant as he was to turn away from the sphere of their brightness) had substantially nothing whatever to do.

By eleven A.M. of the day following the events last related, the Stormy Petrel had taken in her coal and gone down to the old point below Castle Pinckney, to be searched and smoked as before. At six P.M. they were to weigh anchor, so as to be ready to go over the bar as soon as it was dark. In the meanwhile, Polter had to go to headquarters to get posted up in the signals; and for De Benham there were papers to be signed, farewell visits to be paid, and so forth. Among the farewell visits, last on the list, but certainly not last in importance, came that which was due to Colonel Ashby and his daughters.

Colonel Ashby was from home, but they found the ladies in the garden—a charming garden, all grass down to the water's edge and dotted over with clumps of spreading trees; yet less like a garden, than a corner taken from a well-kept English park. And there were rocking-chairs, and pieces of matting, and a table covered with books and needlework, set out in the shade. De Benham thought, as the black footman ushered him and Archie across the lawn, that he had never seen a more exquisite picture than was made by this group of beautiful young women sitting together in their white dresses, with the deep gloom of the trees behind them, the green grass at their feet, and the glowing sky above. It was a picture that might have been painted by Watteau or Lancret; or, better still, by our own gentle English Stothard.

"But it is not good-bye for long," said Elinor Ashby, when, after sitting for some little time, the visitors rose to say farewell. "You are only going to Nassau?"

"We are only going to Nassau," replied De Benham; "but our boat must undergo certain necessary repairs before we venture on another trip; and while that is being done, I hope to run home to England for a week or so."

"But you will come out again when your boat is ready, and then we shall see you back in Charleston?"

"If the blockade does not, in the meanwhile, become too stringent. I have heard rumours of a stone fleet to be sunk across the mouth of the harbour."

"Do not believe it, Mr. Debenham," exclaimed Diana Ashby. "They dare not do it!"

"The question, I fear, is not whether they dare do it, but whether they can do it," said De Benham.

"Then be assured that they cannot do it—that we will not suffer them to do it. Do you think, Mr. Debenham, that our Southern men will stand passively by, and see our noble harbour—God's own gift to those who go down to the sea in ships—destroyed for ever?"

"Not, certainly, if the most dauntless gallantry on shore can prevent it."

"You mean that we want a naval force; but we shall have our own iron-clads and gunboats before long."

They were now strolling towards the house, and De Benham, pausing for a moment as if to look back at the view over the harbour, contrived to linger somewhat in the rear.

"Will you not give me something before I go?" he said, presently. "Something to keep—I will not say, to remind me of the happy hours I have spent here, for I shall need no reminding. I shall remember them all my life—perhaps, only too well."

"Nay, what can I give you, Mr. Debenham?" asked Miss Ashby, smiling.

"A flower—a glove—a scrap of your handwriting. Anything you will!"

"You shall have a photograph in which we are all three grouped together, like the Graces, or the Fates, or, if you prefer it, like the Witches in Macbeth."

"I shall be most thankful for the photograph, Miss Ashby," said De Benham; "but—but I also want something which shall be of you, and from you, alone. May I—forgive my presumption!—may I have that little knot of ribbon from your sleeve? See—it hangs only by a thread."

She blushed—hesitated—but complied.

"They are the Confederate colours," she said. "Let them remind you, not of me, but of my country's cause."

Then, without giving him time to reply, she called her youngest sister to her side, and begged her to fetch two photographs—one for each of the friends.

Archie received his with profuse thanks and protestations, making no secret of the regret with which he said good-bye.

"I'm sure I don't know how I should go away at all," he said, "if it were not for the hope of coming back again. Tell me, Miss Janet, what I shall bring you from England? Do, please, say something—and let it be something that I shall have a deal of trouble to get. The more trouble it gives me, the better I shall like it!"

To which Janet Ashby, of course, replied at first that she wanted for nothing in heaven or earth; but confessed at last, after much entreaty, that it was the desire of her heart to possess Mr. Tennyson's autograph. Whereupon Archie vowed that it should be hers, though he walked thrice round the Isle of Wight with peas in his boots to get it.

"Unboiled, you know," he added. "No hedging, by Jove! All on the square."

In the meanwhile De Benham, having said farewell to the two others, was holding Diana Ashby's hand—holding it, indeed, much longer than the business of leave-taking demanded; and much faster, too, as if fearing she would withdraw it. But she made no effort to do so.

"Good-bye," he said, reluctantly. "Good-bye, Miss Ashby. Pray do not quite forget me."

"Good-bye, Mr. Debenham," she replied. "All good fortune attend you."

"And you—and you, dear lady."

He fancied that her voice wavered. He glanced round; saw that the others were already at the gate; saw, too, that none were looking; bent low over her hand; whispered "Forgive me!"; raised it to his lips, and turned precipitately away.

"I never was so sorry to leave a place in my life!" exclaimed Archie, when they had gone about a quarter of a mile on their road back to Charleston. "As for Janet Ashby, I'd—I declare, I'd do anything for her!"

"A dangerous frame of mind for any man to be in!" said De Benham, thinking of his own peril.

"But isn't she charming?"

"My dear fellow, they are all charming—so charming, that if we get through this time, I think I'll never venture over the bar of Charleston harbour again!"

"You don't mean that?" said Archie, with a look of dismay.

"Most positively."

"Then where will you go for the cotton?"

"To Wilmington. It is simply taking up our head-quarters at the Bermudas, instead of at Nassau; and, from all I hear, Wilmington is easier of access, now, than Charleston. But hark! that was five o'clock, and we are due on board at six."

As they were due, so they were on board to the minute; and found a group of Charleston friends waiting to wish them farewell. Among these were Colonel Ashby, Major Prideaux, and Senator Shirley; the latter armed with two huge boxes of choice cigars, one for De Benham, and the other for Archie.

"If there's smoking in Paradise," said he, "these are the cigars you may expect to find there. And Mr. Debenham, I have been blocking up your cabin with a case of that old Madeira that you liked the other day at dinner. No—no—pray do not thank me! you should have six dozen dozen of it, if you could spare the stowage. Bon voyage!"

Then they shook hands warmly all round; and the visitors, with much waving of hats, pulled off in their own boat. By a quarter past six, the Stormy Petrel was once more under way.

Now it happened that the tide was low this evening, and that the navigation of the boat, owing to some shifting in the sandy bed of the estuary, was more than usually difficult. From off Cumming's Point and along the beach of Morris Island, they were keeping as near in under the land as possible, and taking soundings the whole way.

"It's the darndest river for sand in all creation," said Mr. Zachary Polter, savagely. "Take another cast, mate!"

The mate obeyed, and sung out:—"Twelve feet and a half!"

"Twelve and a half—look at that, now! One hour later, and we couldn't hev got her threw nohow. Here's six channels, and . . ."

"Twelve feet!" sung the mate.

"About she goes!—six channels, and nary one with more than eleven foot of water at low tide—nor that to be keownted on! Another cast, mate!"

And so, with the pilot grumbling and growling, the mate casting the lead, and the dark fast gathering about her path, the Stormy Petrel, following the sinuosities of the Main Ship Channel, wriggled her way slowly and painfully out as far as the sand-bag batteries; and then made ready for her final rush over the bar.

And now it was night—cloudy overhead; somewhat raw and damp; with a faint breath of north-west breeze coming and going; and a boil of foam upon the bar. Looking out anxiously ahead, it seemed to De Benham that the blockading squadron formed an almost continuous chain.

"There are more cruisers yonder, than when we came in a fortnight ago," he said, addressing the captain.

"Not a doubt of it."

"And three times as many as when we made our first venture."

The captain nodded.

"We oughtn't to have all these bales on deck," he said gravely. "The boat's one mountain of cotton—we're safe to be seen."

"Do you think so? Shall we put back, before it is too late?"

"It is too late," said the captain; "we're on the bar."

As the words left his lips, the Stormy Petrel plunged into the surf—struck the bar—recoiled—seemed for one brief instant to stand still—righted—ploughed forward, grinding her keel into the solid masonry and shuddering through all her timbers—and slipped off into deep water.

"Ten minutes later, and we couldn't hev done it—not for all the dollars on airth!" exclaimed the pilot. "And now, I guess, them chaps down below must show what their injines air made of."

So, trusting wholly to good speed and good luck, the brave little boat rushed out towards the open.

But instantly, as if from beneath her very bows, a fiery thread shot up, comet-like, through the darkness, and broke into a crimson star high overhead; and then, for the first time, they saw that they had all but run over a tiny row-boat lying just outside the bar. Quick as the answering flash of a duellist's pistol, a blue light broke simultaneously from three points along the line of the cordon. The row-boat (already left far behind) then sent up a green rocket; and those on board the Stormy Petrel saw some five or six large vessels immediately hastening to their encounter.

"Stop her!" shouted the pilot.

And the boat, going then at a headlong pace, stopped suddenly, like a pointer.

"Reverse one injine!"

A creak—a wrench—a strain, like the straining of a desperate swimmer swimming for his life—and the blockade-runner spun round, and made again for the bar. Over she dashed, as it seemed by mere force of speed and steam; and in less than four minutes from the moment of running out, was back again on the safe side of the surf-line.

Then Mr. Zachary Polter rose into a towering passion.

"It's all along of their busted signals," said he, dancing up and down the deck with rage, and stringing his sentences together with volleys of the choicest transatlantic oaths. "They've fixed 'em up into a reg'lar code, as plain as talking; and now we shall hev to lie snug for the next three or four hours, till the tide turns, and they've forgotten us a bit—darn 'em!"

"But why didn't you make a rush for it, pilot?" said De Benham, half angrily.

"Make a rush for it, and them ahead of us?" exclaimed Mr. Polter, with inexpressible scorn. "Perhaps, sir, you'd like to send 'em a note next time, jest to say we air coming? No, sir—if we'd only bin 'tother side of the line, I'd hev shown them the cleanest pair of heels they ever saw in all their busted lives; but I aint partial to suicide, whativer your tastes may be. Cap'n, I'll thank you for a tumbler of cold brandy and water—pretty powerful. My nerves air considerably upset."

The next three or four hours went by slowly and heavily. The Stormy Petrel drew off as close under the batteries as the excessive shallowness of the water would permit; and there lay, waiting. Captain and crew, supercargo and pilot, were alike disappointed and annoyed. It was their first failure—their first stroke of anything approaching to ill-luck—and they knew not how to put up with it. The captain, to soften matters, ordered out a double allowance of grog.

At length, between half-past one and two o'clock A.M., Mr. Zachary Polter gave the word, steam was got up again, and they prepared for another start.

The tide was now setting in with a strong, eager current; and against this current the good boat had to make head. So far, circumstances were against her. But on the other hand, a light mist had come up with the morning, and there were already fourteen feet of water on the bar:—important facts in their favour.

And now, all seemed destined to go well with them. Gliding noiselessly above the bar, they saw no signal-boat this time, and were seen by none. The mist, though so slight and transparent, helped to veil them from observation, as it also helped to veil the enemy from their sight; and it was not till they were actually darting through the cordon, that they could see, looming vaguely to right and left of their course, the shadowy outlines of two large ships of war. Their own grey-green hull and piled-up cotton bales matched too nearly, however, with the waves and the mist to attract attention; and they flew out to sea, unchallenged.

"We shan't see New York for nothing, this time, by Jove!" laughed Archie, exultingly.

"I'm not so sure of that," replied De Benham. "We've lost three hours of darkness, remember; and it will be broad daylight at four."

It was broad daylight at four—the sun shining, the mist clearing, the sea just ruffling before the breeze. About five, the breeze freshened, and blew off the last shreds of fog. Then from three voices at once, the voices of De Benham, of the first mate, and of the watch in the crow's nest, there went up a sudden cry of:—"Steamer ho!"

And there, not four miles distant, was a large paddle-wheel steam-sloop, on their larboard bow.

The pilot rushed to the speaking-tube the captain to the engine-room; and the good boat leaped under the sudden access of pressure, like a racer under the spur. At the same instant, the cruiser ran up the stars and stripes, wheeled about to give chase, and sent a shot clean over her bows.

"Pitch them cotton-bales overboard!" shouted the pilot.

And over went the cotton-bales—the precious cotton-bales, worth perhaps fifty, perhaps sixty, pounds apiece—splashing into the sea as fast as the combined efforts of every man on deck could heave them over the gunwales; splashing and plunging like lead—rising and floating like feathers—and left behind in an instant.

Meanwhile came another shot—and another—and another; all too well aimed to be pleasant.

Suddenly, just as the blockade-runner was beginning every moment to make more and more way, something like a slight shock—a concussion, as it were, that seemed for a moment to thrill the deck beneath their feet—was felt by all on board. Then, before they had time to ask themselves what had happened, the ship's pace slackened—she came to heavily against her helm (i.e., lurched half round) and lay broadside to the chase.

The pilot flew to the stern; the captain came rushing up from the engine-room, breathless, with the perspiration streaming down his face.

"In heaven's name, what is the matter?" cried De Benham, seeing them both hanging over the gunwales.

"Matter enough, I guess," replied Mr. Zachary Polter, bringing out his words slowly and savagely, and shutting up his glass with a click. "One of them darned cotton bales has got tangled in the starboard screw! We air cooked this time, and no mistake about it!"

And so it was. Swept under the starboard counter by the force of the waves, one of the ejected cotton-bales had been caught in the sweeping blades of the screw. In a moment it was ripped open, and bagging, roping, and cotton were being whirled and twisted about the shaft. In a moment, the screw was hopelessly clogged, half the boat's speed was gone, and the game was up!

De Benham turned an appealing look to the captain; but the captain only shook his head, and folded his arms. At this moment the cruiser fired again twice—one of her shots tearing through the water not a dozen yards in their wake.

"There ain't nothin' for it but to lay tew with a good grace, cap'n," said the pilot.

De Benham heard, turned on his heel, and went aft in silence.

Archie followed him.

"Dear old chap," said he, the tears in his honest eyes, "I am so sorry!"

For a moment De Benham looked away—gnawing his moustache; listening with a heavy frown to the shrill rush of the escaping steam.

"I expected as much," he said, at length. "I felt, before we left Charleston, that we should come to grief this time. But, there!—it's nobody's fault."

"It's awfully hard," said Archie.

"It's the fortune of war," replied De Benham, bitterly.

The Stormy Petrel was now lying passively to, just swaying with the swell of the sea; and they could already hear the approaching clatter of the cruiser's paddle-wheels.

"It might have been worse," continued De Benham, more to himself than to Archie. "It might have happened the first time—still, I wish we had got through this once."

Then, muttering again that it was "the fortune of war," he went into his cabin and shut the door. He could not endure to be present at the surrender.

CHAPTER XLV.—IN DURANCE VILE.

WHEN De Benham came out of his cabin, he found the Federal commander accompanied by two of his officers, a detachment of marines, and some twelve or fourteen seamen, already in possession. Said commander—a fine, bronzed, bearded, authoritative man—turned an eagle eye upon the new-comer.

"Who are you, sir?" he asked, sharply.

"I am the supercargo," said De Benham.

"Part owner?"

"No, sir."

"And this young man?"—pointing to Archie.

"Supercargo's clerk."

"Good. Where is your pilot?"

Mr. Polter, his hands in his pockets, his quid in his cheek, stepped forward.

"Wa'al, I ain't ashamed of myself no ways," said he. "I'm the pilot."

"What's your name? Where do you come from?"

"Zachary Hannibal Polter—Martha's Vineyard—Massachusetts."

The Federal captain turned towards his men.

"Put that rebel in double irons," he said.

Mr. Zachary Polter gave his quid a twist, screwed up his mouth, and submitted.

Then the Federal captain again addressed himself to De Benham.

"Have you any specie on board?" he asked.

"About eight hundred dollars."

"Paper securities? Bills of exchange?"

"Some—on London and Liverpool houses."

"Produce them—and the specie. Lieutenant Kissick, accompany the prisoner, and see that he conceals nothing." Then, turning to Captain Frank Hay:—"And you, sir; have you any gunpowder on board? Any munitions of war?"

"None whatever."

"Hand over your papers."

The captain of the Stormy Petrel went to his cabin for the papers, followed by the other Federal lieutenant. In the meanwhile, the captain of the cruiser had the whole crew up one by one, asking each man his name, age, and nation, and then sending them, two and two, below the gangway, to be handcuffed. This done, and the others having returned upon deck, he took possession of the money, and glancing over the ship's papers, said:—

"You are all Europeans, it seems—except the pilot."

"We are, sir," replied Captain Frank Hay.

"So much the better for you—so much the worse for him. I shall send you all to Philadelphia, to be dealt with according to law. Lieutenant Kissick, I leave you in command of this vessel."

So saying, he went aft, and leaning against the binnacle, conversed with his lieutenant for some minutes in a low voice; giving his orders, apparently, and looking across every now and then, towards his prisoners. He was then seen to hand over the ship's papers and De Benham's papers into the custody of the new prizemaster, himself retaining only the specie; and then he prepared to be gone.

One by one, passing through a double file of marines at the head of the gangway, the crew of the Stormy Petrel were then conducted down the ship's side and removed in two large boats already waiting to convey them to the Federal steam-sloop. All were thus drafted off, excepting only the chief engineer, two firemen, the pilot, Archie, De Benham, and the captain.

Twelve seamen were then told off from the crew of the man-of-war, all armed. These, together with a huge Mexican creole named Manuel, who, being master's mate on board the sloop, was now deputed second in command, remained as prize crew on board the blockade-runner, under Lieutenant Kissick.

The first watch was then set; the engineer and firemen were sent below under charge of an armed seaman; the ship's head was put about to the North; the stars and stripes were run up; the lieutenant and mate took off their hats; and the captain went back to his ship.

"Keep that rebel in irons, Mr. Kissick!" were his last words, as the boat pulled off.

"Ay, ay, sir," replied the prizemaster.

And then the prisoners on board the Stormy Petrel were left alone with their captors.

It was a weary day for them—a weary, heavy, listless day; the air raw; the sky dull; the good boat crawling dismally along at the rate of about eight knots an hour. At two o'clock P.M. they, going northward, re-passed within a few miles of Charleston harbour, sighting many vessels on the way, most of which were Union cruisers. With these they exchanged signals. No more doubling and feigning, now—no more speed—no more excitement! All dull, plodding, cheerless work, with captivity at the end of it.

Archie, who could not by any possibility continue melancholy for long together, plucked up his spirits in the course of an hour or so, and chatted quite pleasantly with the mate and the prizemaster. But Captain Frank Hay, who had lost his command, and with it the best pay he had ever touched in his life; and De Benham, who knew that the blockade-runner and her cargo would inevitably be confiscated, did not even affect to shake off the gloom and bitterness of their thoughts. But of the two, De Benham's thoughts were the gloomiest, and the bitterest. Captain Hay might get himself appointed to another blockade-runner. The trade was increasing; and his previous experience would be in his favour. But De Benham knew that Mr. Hardwicke would never be brought to repeat the speculation. Besides, his own personal loss upon this very cotton now on board amounted to ten or twelve thousand pounds. But even that was as nothing compared with all that the capture of the Stormy Petrel entailed upon him in the loss of prestige, of future opportunities, of his employer's confidence.

As for Mr. Zachary Polter, sitting heavily ironed, in a dark little hole between-decks under lock and bar, with only his own apprehensions to amuse him, he was, perhaps, in the worst case of any.

Towards evening, the prizemaster and mate being busy in the captain's cabin, going over the supercargo's books, the ship's papers, and so forth, the three prisoners at large—De Benham, Captain Hay, and Archibald Blyth—found themselves alone on the after-deck with only a single seaman pacing to and fro, and the man at the helm. The cook was standing at the door of the galley, in his shirt-sleeves, smoking his pipe. Some five or six of the crew were gathered about the windlass, listening to a long yarn which was being spun by one for the entertainment of the rest. Two others were coming and going, sweeping down the decks, and so forth. In short, it was just that twilight interval during the dog-watches, when the crew are all on deck, and those who are off duty enjoy their only hour of leisure in the twenty-four. With the exception of the seaman on guard in the engine-room, the whole of the prize crew were now above deck; but only two of these were on the after-deck, near the prisoners.

Lieutenant Kissick, it should be mentioned, had appropriated the captain's cabin, while Manuel, the master's mate, had installed himself in De Benham's.

"Archie," said De Benham; "go and talk to that Yankee, and take off his attention. I have a word to say to the captain."

Archie did as he was bidden, and the two others, leaning listlessly, as it were, over the bulwarks, exchanged a few rapid sentences.

"Captain Hay," said De Benham, in a low eager voice, "this is a great misfortune; but is it beyond remedy?"

The Cornishman looked at him.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"I mean that you and I, Mr. Blyth and the pilot, Davis the engineer and the two firemen, make seven. Seven against fourteen."

A dark flush mounted to the captain's swarthy brow; but he said nothing.

"It seems to me," continued De Benham, "that there are always six of these men off duty and six on; and the six off duty keep below in the fore-castle."

"Of course they do—port watch and star-board watch. That's the rule."

"Then it would be easy at any moment to let down the hatches and secure the six below; and we seven ought to be a match for the rest, including mate and prizemaster, the helmsman, and the seaman on guard in the engine-room."

"We're not seven, though. Can't count Davis or the firemen—they're tied to the engines. Can't count Polter—we couldn't set him free till the job was done. Say three."

"Well, say three. Three against eight. We ought to be able, even so, to recover the command of the ship."

"I'm ready to try, anyhow," said the captain. "There's my hand on it."

"And there's mine. Hush! here's the mate."

The creole came up at this moment from the cabin—a huge, lumpish giant of a man, with gold rings in his ears, and an habitual scowl.

"What are you talking about there?" he said, suspiciously.

"Well, Señor Manuel," said the captain, "we're wondering how you mean to stow us to-night. You won't put us in the fore-castle, I hope, along with the men?"

"You'll have to go there or nowhere, I reckon."

"I'd far sooner stop on deck," said De Benham.

The Mexican grinned contemptuously.

"You must go where the master chooses to put you, Mr. Supercargo," said he, with an oath; and so turned on his heel, and began pacing the after-deck, keeping his eye upon the trio, however, and passing so close at every turn that they dared not exchange another syllable.

Presently eight bells were struck; the first night-watch was set; the man at the helm and the men in the engine-room were relieved; and the master came on deck. He then ordered a blanket and a piece of matting to be thrown on the floor of the galley, and Captain Hay was locked in with the pots and pans for the night. This, however, was a concession to his rank. De Benham and Archie had no alternative but to go down among the men.

CHAPTER XLVI.—THE CASE OF MADEIRA.

IN a little vessel built for speed, like the Stormy Petrel, where every inch of space was precious, it may be supposed that the men's quarters were small and comfortless enough. Now, however, they were more than usually crowded, for even the fore-castle was blocked up with a pile of cotton bales in the midst, so that there was scarcely room to move round in any direction. The atmosphere, too, was fetid and unwholesome; and there was a nauseous smell of tar and bilge-water about the place which made it almost unbearable. As for De Benham and Archie, they stretched themselves upon the cotton bales, and there lay, scarcely closing their eyes for a moment the whole night through. At four A.M., when the morning watch was called, they were allowed to go on deck, thankful for the fresh air and the grey dawn; thankful that the night had gone by and the day was at hand.

In the meanwhile, De Benham had spoken to Archie of his plan for recapturing the vessel, and Archie was wild to begin without the delay of an hour. When De Benham told him that there must be a delay of many hours, perhaps even of a day or two ; that everything must be done under the advice of Captain Hay ; and, above all, that it would be better not to make the attempt at all than to make it prematurely and so fail, Archie chafed with impatience, and accused his friend of over-caution. Then De Benham told Archie that he was hot-headed and rash ; and so sharp words were spoken on both sides. But it is not easy to quarrel in whispers ; and all this took place in the course of the night, in pitch darkness, as they lay on the cotton bales with six Federal seamen snoring within a few feet of them. So they snarled at one another for a moment, and went on deck at dawn of day better friends than ever.

They had been up nearly two hours before the cook released the captain and took possession of the galley. He came out, however, rubbing his eyes ; having slept profoundly. At seven bells, breakfast was served ; the three deck prisoners faring the same as the prizemaster and master's mate. The prizemaster and mate, however, took their meals together in the little closet styled by courtesy the captain's cabin ; whereas the prisoners had theirs served out to them in wooden pannikins called "kids," and ate on deck. At a few minutes before noon, Kissick and Manuel brought out their sextants for the purpose of taking an observation. As the sun crossed the meridian, eight bells were struck ; the new sea-day began ; and the cook, having first supplied the prizemaster's table, served out the dinner.

"There goes poor old Polter's allowance," said Archie, as the cook went by presently with a key in one hand and a "kid" full of pea-soup and salt junk in the other. "I wish one could give him a bottle of wine to keep his heart up."

"By Jove!" exclaimed De Benham, "there's that case of Madeira."

"Ah, it's theirs now, confound them," said Archie.

"I don't believe they've even noticed it, shoved away as it is under my standing bed-place."

"Then don't enlighten 'em," said Archie, sitting cross-legged on a coil of yarn, with his "kid" between his knees, eating away vigorously. "Don't enlighten 'em, if you love me. They wouldn't give us a single bottle, depend on it."

"I shall enlighten them, nevertheless," replied De Benham ; "and they shall be welcome to drink the whole case. Madeira is heady stuff, and it's thirsty weather."

Captain Hay shook his head.

"No use, Mr. Debenham," said he. "Those Northerners can swallow any amount of wine, and be none the worse for it."

"Well, if it only puts them into good humour and throws them a little off their guard, it will be always something gained."

So De Benham waited till the Mexican came on deck, and then, knowing they had dined, went and knocked at the door of the cabin.

"Lieutenant Kissick," he said, "I come to ask a favour. There's a case of capital Madeira under the bed-place in my cabin, and we prisoners find it hard work to keep up our spirits—have I your permission to open a couple of bottles?"

The prizemaster, who was leaning back in his chair, smoking, with his feet on the table, sat up on hearing this.

"A case of Madeira!" said he.

"Yes—three dozen of it."

"That's the best news I've heard to-day. Yes, Mr. Supercargo, open a couple of bottles for yourselves, and welcome—and send the case in here."

So De Benham and Archie dragged out the case, prized it open, extracted a couple of bottles, and sent the rest to the captain's cabin. Manuel, pacing the after-deck with his glass under his arm, eyed them curiously ; but said nothing. Presently, being summoned by one of the seamen, he went to the prizemaster's cabin, leaving the messenger in his place. And then the prisoners, eagerly listening, heard from time to time the drawing of corks and the sound of laughter and loud talking. By and by, Manuel came out, looking flushed and hazy, and went to his cabin ; but Lieutenant Kissick, no whit the worse for aught that he had taken, came aft, and swept the horizon with his glass.

"Mr. Supercargo," said he, "that's jest about the best Madeira I ever tasted. Where did you get it?"

"It was given to me by a gentleman in Charleston," replied De Benham.

"A darned rebel, whoever he may be," said the prizemaster ; "but a good judge of wine."

"It may be," said De Benham, "that he is a good judge of wine because he is a rebel."

"How so?"

"Because your rebel is generally a man who dares to think for himself ; and the man who dares to think for himself is likely to be a fair judge of many things. Of justice, for instance ; and political rights. Perhaps of beauty ; most likely of wine."

"But not of his own interests, sir," retorted the prizemaster. "He's an on-common bad judge of that article, any how."

At this moment they were joined by Captain Hay.

"Well, Mr. Kissick," said he, familiarly, "what is the position of the boat?"

"Somewhere off Cape Hatteras, sir," replied the prizemaster.

"There's a folding chart in the locker in my cabin," said Captain Hay, "if you would like to prick off her position."

"Wa'all, now, I rayther should," replied the American, "if yew hev it handy."

"I can find it in a moment," replied Captain Hay, leading the way. "Come along."

So the Federal lieutenant followed, and De Benham brought up the rear.

"You have done justice to three bottles, at all events," said the latter, seeing the empty bottles and the two glasses still upon the table.

The prizemaster laughed.

"Yes," he said, "that Madeira raly is worth drinking. But Manuel had the lion's share; and now I guess he can't keep his eyes open. Can't yew find the chart, captain?"

Page 602.

"Yes, here it is."

And Captain Hay, after some fumbling in his locker, brought out a large map in a leather case, and spread it upon the table.

"Now you want the compasses," he added. "Mr. Debenham, will you oblige me by reaching down that case of instruments from the shelf behind the door?"

De Benham shut the cabin-door, as if to get at the shelf; exchanged a rapid signal with the captain; and slipped the bolt.

"What's that?" said the prizemaster, turning sharply round.

But, instantly, his arms were pinioned behind by Captain Hay, and De Benham was standing over him with an iron belying-pin snatched from behind the door.

"Silence!" said the supercargo, in a low, hurried voice. "Submit, and you shall be well treated—utter one cry for help, and, by heaven! it's all over with you."

The Northerner darted one desperate glance at the door—another at the window—struggled for a moment fiercely but silently—and then, finding resistance useless, desisted.

"Now, look here," said Captain Hay, gripping his elbows back with a grasp of iron; "it's no good struggling. We're resolved to get back the command of this boat; and we don't care a straw for our own lives, still less for yours. Will you give in quietly, and submit to be gagged and handcuffed; or must we knock your brains out?"

"You're two to one against me," muttered the prizemaster, through his set teeth.

"Then you yield yourself prisoner?"

"— Under protest."

"Mr. Debenham, you'll find a gag in that locker. Now, sir—open your mouth."

Livid with rage, the Northerner opened his mouth hesitatingly and unwillingly.

"Now the handcuffs."

De Benham found the handcuffs in the same place, and in another instant their prisoner was helpless and speechless, the gag between his teeth and his hands made fast behind his back. Then Captain Hay snatched off his own black silk neckerchief, and with it lashed the prizemaster's feet securely together. This done, they laid him on the floor, and there left him.

"And now," said De Benham, "for the mate!"

"Let's see first if we can't find a weapon or two. Where's Kissick's revolver?"

"Here—under his pillow."

"That's right—keep it yourself. My bowie knife's enough for me."

Thus armed, they locked their prisoner in, took the key, and went on deck. For the supercargo's cabin, it will be remembered, was just opposite the galley, with the funnel and a mountain of cotton-bales between; and of this cabin, the creole had taken possession.

They found the door ajar, and, listening outside, heard by his breathing that he was asleep. They could also hear the cook whistling and cleaning up in the galley close by. De Benham pushed the door softly, and peeped in.

"Hush!" he said. "He's lying on my bed—fast asleep."

They opened the door an inch or two farther; crept in; closed it behind them; and slipped the bolt as before. The bolt was rusty, and creaked; and the sleeper stirred uneasily. Awake, he was not pleasant to look upon; but sleeping, he was hideous.

Half on, half off the little narrow bed, he lay with his head hanging over, the veins on his forehead all swollen and knotted, his eyes partly open, his tawny throat uncovered. His cap had fallen on the floor; his belt was unbuckled; and his revolver lay on the table beside him.

Stealthy and noiseless as a cat, the captain stole forward and seized the pistol. It was of the same make as the prizemaster's, and carried six shots.

The man was such a giant, and looked, in his sleeping strength, so formidable, that for a moment they paused, not knowing how best to secure him.

"Knock him on the head with the belaying pin, and stun him," whispered the captain.

But De Benham could not bring himself to strike a sleeping man.

"Better muffle his head in something, and then tie him hand and foot," he answered, looking round for some cloth or curtain for the purpose. But there was nothing—nothing but the counterpane, which, kept up at only one corner by the foot of the sleeper, was dragged nearly off the bed, and trailing on the floor.

"Give me your bowie knife," whispered De Benham.

The captain gave him the knife. It was about fourteen inches long, and as sharp as a razor. With this, kneeling on one knee, De Benham then began, cautiously and quickly, to cut the counterpane away. Captain Hay stood by, ready with the belaying pin in case of need.

Suddenly the creole opened his eyes. As suddenly, before the light of recognition had time to come into them, the iron descended on his head with a dull thud—there was a gurgling sob in his throat—a convulsive quiver of the limbs—and then death-like unconsciousness.

"You have killed him!" exclaimed De Benham.

"Not a bit of it. His skull is as thick as an elephant's. Look sharp. He'll be all right again, before we know where we are."

Quick as lightning, they tore the counterpane into strips, and bound him to the framework of the bed—bound him hand and foot, ankle and wrist, with a strong band over his chest as well; so that, giant as he was, he should not be able to stir one hair's breadth. And then, for they had not a second gag, De Benham took from his desk a large lump of india-rubber about two inches square, rolled it tightly in a folded handkerchief, and while Captain Hay forced the locked teeth apart, fixed it firmly between them, and tied the ends of the handkerchief behind the man's head.

"There," he said, "I don't think that will interfere with his breathing. I wish he would come to!"

"He'll come to soon enough," replied the captain coolly. "And now, the sooner we can set Polter free, the better. Where the devil has he stowed the key of the cuddy?"

"The cook has it," said De Benham.

"The cook had it, and the cook took it back again. It was in the mate's keeping, of course—and here it is, in his waistcoat pocket. Now hide your revolver."

They buttoned their coats over their revolvers; locked the Mexican in, as they had locked in the prizemaster; and went aft to reconnoitre. Here they found Archie chatting with the watch; one man in the crow's-nest; one at the helm; and one holy-stoning the deck. These, with the guard in the engine-room and the cook in the galley, made up the six on duty.

"We're going to have a glass of Madeira in the prizemaster's cabin, Mr. Blyth," said Captain Hay loudly, that the men on deck might all hear him; "and you are to come with us." Then, turning to the helmsman, "how's her head, messmate?" he asked good-humouredly.

"North, half-west, sir," replied the seaman, touching his hat.

Captain Hay went up to the binnacle, glanced at the compass, looked round at the sky, muttered something about a change in the weather, and turned as if to go to the prizemaster's cabin. Passing the seaman who was on his knees holy-stoning the deck, he tapped him on the shoulder and said:—

"Look here, my man, there's a packing-case in the scuttle, that's to be taken to Mr. Kissick's cabin. Just call the cook to help you carry it, and I'll show you where it is."

The man jumped to his feet with a ready, "Ay, ay, sir," and ran to fetch the cook, who came out rubbing his hands on his trousers, and redolent of onions.

Captain Hay opened the scuttle hatch, and bade the men go in. It was a dark hole of a place, where the crew of the Stormy Petrel had been used to keep their old junk, chafing gear, and so forth.

"We don't see nary packin' case, sir," said the cook, doubtfully.

"It was there," replied the captain, "a week ago. Go on to the end, and open your eyes a bit wider."

The men went on, stooping as the roof sloped lower. And then suddenly the hatch was clapped on; the hatch-bar was drawn; and they were prisoners, in pitch darkness, out of sight and hearing.

"That makes four," said De Benham.

"Ay," said Archie; "but there's ten more to come!"

Six out of the ten, however, were down in the fore-castle, off duty. They could hear them, talking and laughing loudly among themselves; and De Benham, stooping cautiously forward, could see one man leaning with his back against the ladder, smoking.

"We've not a moment to lose," whispered the captain. "It's seven bells past, and at eight they'll expect to be called. Now, Mr. Blyth, bear a hand!"

So Archie and he took up the heavy hatch; while De Benham, standing ready with the bar, gave the word.

"One—two—three."

At three it came down, like the stone at the mouth of a sepulchre, followed by a shout and a rush of feet below.

"Quick—the bar!" cried Captain Hay, jumping on the hatch and dragging Archie with him. "By heaven! they'll have it up in spite of us!"

And, as he spoke, the trap heaved beneath their feet.

Then De Benham also sprang upon it, and the force with which this fresh weight came down, sent it into its place. Instantly he dropped upon his knees, slid the bar dexterously into the staple, and—the thing was done!

"Hurrah!" cried Archie, triumphantly. "That makes ten!"

"They'll be safer," said the captain, "when we've heaped on some of these cotton bales."

At that moment they heard a shrill cry up aloft, and saw the watch in the crow's-nest gesticulating to his shipmates on the after-deck.

"He has seen us," exclaimed De Benham.

"He's giving the alarm!"

"He's a lubber not to have done both long ago," said the captain, drawing his revolver. "Arm yourself with that handspike, Mr. Blyth. I shouldn't wonder if these fellows show fight."

The seaman in the crow's-nest dropped like a bird, and snatched an iron stanchion from the bulwark. The watch on deck drew his cutlass. The helmsman, not daring to let go his wheel, raised a shout for help.

Captain Hay went up, revolver in hand.

"It's no good shouting, my men," he said. "The ship is ours. The starboard watch, the prizemaster, and the rest are all our prisoners. Will you lay down your weapons, and surrender?"

Still standing on the defensive, the two seamen fell back a step, keeping close together, but answering never a word.

Then the captain stamped his foot upon the deck, and swore a tremendous oath.

"Quick!" he said. "We want no bloodshed; but if you resist, by the Lord! I'll shoot you down like vermin."

At that moment, a swarthy face emerged from the engine-room hatchway—emerged unseen by the three Englishmen, whose backs were turned that way; but not unseen by the three Yankees. It was the face of the guard placed over the engineers below.

With one swift glance fore and aft, he took in the whole bearings of the scene—hesitated for an instant, as if uncertain whether to attack the enemy in the rear or release his comrades in the fore-castle—then, with his revolver in one hand and his drawn cutlass in the other, he crept along by the gunwales, swiftly and stealthily, towards the fore-deck.

A flash of triumph shot from the eye of the helmsman. Archie, following the glance, caught sight of the retreating figure and, with a loud cry, rushed in pursuit.

In one second they were all at the other end of the boat, three against three, wrestling together in a hand-to-hand struggle over the fore-castle-hatch.

CHAPTER XLVII.—THE PERILS AND DANGERS OF THE DEEP.

SHORT and sharp was the struggle over the fore-castle-hatch; the Americans directing all their efforts to force it open—the Englishmen, to keep it fast. Archie flung himself desperately upon the bar, defending his position gallantly with the handspike. Then the Americans rushed in—each closed with his man—blows fell thick and fast—a shot was fired—the captain and the engine-room guard rolled together on the deck—De Benham, being gripped by the throat, dragged his assailant up against the bulwarks, and there jammed him back till he was fain to loose his hold and call for quarter—while Archie, though hard pressed, still kept the third Yankee off the bar.

Suddenly a new actor appeared upon the scene. Grimy, smoke-blackened, armed with a huge engine-room poker, one of the assistant firemen came rushing to their aid.

—Came just in time; for Archie had lost his footing, and was getting the worst of it. The Yankee's knee was on his chest—the Yankee's hand approached the fatal bar. . . .

Down on that Yankee's head descended the terrible poker, and stretched him senseless on the deck! Then Archie flew to De Benham, who was pinning his man down by main force, and could not loose his hold. In another moment, the Americans were all three disarmed, and the struggle was over.

Then Captain Hay summoned the helmsman to surrender, asking him whether he would be willing to help navigate the vessel into some neutral port. The man hesitated; but only for a moment.

"Wa'al," he said, "you'll dew it, I calc'late, whether I bristle my back, or whether I don't."

"I'd do it," replied the captain, "if I'd only one pair of hands to help me."

"Then I cave. Guess I may as well hev my libbaty."

To open the cuddy and relieve the pilot of his irons; to lock up the three prisoners in his place; to heap cotton-bales over the fore-castle-hatch, was the work of the next few minutes.

Then, shaking himself like a water-dog just landed, Mr. Zachary Polter looked round with a grim smile, and said:—

"I reckon I'd hev been more obliged to yew if yew had turned that thar key a bit sooner, and let me go shares in the fun. Don't you think, cap'n, we'd better put her head about and steer for Bermuda?"

Charts were at once brought out, and a hurried council was held. The boat was found to be about thirty miles due east of Cape Hatteras. To resume their interrupted course and make for Nassau, skirting the blockaded coast the whole way, was now out of the question. It was therefore anxiously debated whether they should steer for St. George's, Bermuda, or adopt the more daring course of running direct for the Azores.

Polter, who was perhaps unwilling to go very far afield, inclined for the Bermudas. The captain and De Benham voted for the Azores. Each alternative had much to recommend it. St. George's was a British port, and lay within some five hundred and fifty miles of the point at which they then found themselves; whereas the nearest of the Azores was more than four times that distance. But then, to go to St. George's, they must in some measure run back upon their course in a south-easterly direction, just keeping in those waters where the American cruisers swarmed thickest; while by making for the Azores, they would be steering almost E.N.E., nearing home, and leaving the American coast and all its perils farther and farther behind at every turn of the screw.

Then there was the cotton! They could not take it to Nassau now; yet it must go to England, somehow. And then there was the refitting of the Stormy Petrel, which could be done better and cheaper at Liverpool than by Mr. Wilbur H. Sakem at Victoria Creek, Nassau.

The time for deliberation was short; but this plan of shaping their course for Europe seemed on all accounts so much the best that it resolved itself at last into a mere question of coals.

They were now in Lat. $35^{\circ} 15' N.$ and Long. $76^{\circ} 08' W.$, and hence, supposing no accidents, it would take them with their one efficient engine, from twelve to fourteen days to reach the port of Horta in the island of Fayal, 2,270 miles away. Had they fuel for so long?

The chief engineer was sent to examine the state of the coal bunkers. He came back, looking somewhat grave.

"Well, Mr. Davis," said the captain, "shall we hold out for fourteen days and nights?"

"We can hold out, sir, for just nine days and nights, and about eight hours over," replied the engineer.

The captain bit his lip.

"All right, Davis," he said, after a moment's pause. "Go a-head. We'll put a hundred miles between ourselves and the coast first; and to-morrow we'll hoist fore and aft sails, and eke out your coals that way." Then, turning to De Benham, he added, grimly smiling, "If it comes to the worst, Mr. Supercargo, we must burn a few bales of your cotton."

And so the matter was decided.

The engineer then made his scrape, and the Stormy Petrel was put upon her course for the Azores.

De Benham beckoned Archie aside.

"I'm afraid we've half-murdered the Mexican," he said. "Hay dealt him a blow on the head that might have killed an ox."

"Never mind the Mexican," said Archie. "Suppose we attend to this wound of yours first."

"Wound!—what wound?" And De Benham, who had no idea that he was hurt, looked down, and saw for the first time that his shirt was full of blood. To unbutton his waistcoat and tear the shirt open was the work of a moment.

"I saw the fellow's knife glitter," he said; "but I never felt it touch me. It's nothing of a cut, I fancy."

"Do you call it nothing?" said Archie. "Why, it's four inches long—but I don't think it's very deep. It seems to have glanced off the ribs and struck upwards. Don't it hurt awfully?"

De Benham laughed.

"Not yet," he said. "I didn't even know I was scratched. But there!—'tis not so deep as a well, nor so wide as a barn-door."

"The sooner it's seen to," said Archie, "the better."

And then he insisted on calling in the aid of the captain, who being, like most naval commanders, a bit of a surgeon, bound up and strapped the wound together; not perhaps very skilfully, but somehow.

This done, they hastened to De Benham's cabin to see after the master's mate.

They found him, however, recovered from the blow; his eyes rolling; his face and throat purple from the efforts he had made to burst his bonds; and the india-rubber pad nearly bitten through. So they clapped him into the double-irons, from which the pilot had just been released, and marched him off into solitary confinement in a little dark closet by the captain's cabin.

And now an anxious time began—a time of great toil and hardship, when there was much to be done, and but few to do it. Of their whole crew, the American (upon whose good faith it would have been unsafe to rely implicitly) was the only able seaman. De Benham and Archie were "green hands;" the firemen, if taken from their regular work, were not much better; and the chief engineer was bound to his engines. To make the most of such inadequate material called for the nicest management. Hours and duties had to be parcelled out with the greatest exactness, allowing the minimum of rest to each, and taxing to the utmost the endurance of all.

It was arranged, therefore, that the captain and pilot should take the command by turns and the helm by turns; only entrusting the wheel now and then to the American, while one of them snatched a brief hour for sleep. This American, however (whose name was Rawle), was chiefly employed about the sails and rigging; while to De Benham and Archie was assigned all the drudgery of the voyage, such as the cooking, cleaning up, and so forth. By night, they took it in rotation to do two hours' stoking and stand a two hours' watch; so relieving the assistant firemen, and getting each four hours for sleep. On these two devolved also the duty of attending to the prisoners. This might have proved a service of danger, but for De Benham, who solved the problem by cutting a hole in the fore-castle-hatch, and lowering the men's food and water in a bucket. This hole, which was only just big enough for the purpose, they closed over between whiles with a cotton bale. The others, being confined by twos and threes, were more easily managed; and as for the prizemaster and mate, they had the honour of taking their meals under the charge of an armed guard, with the additional advantage of two aids to digestion in the shape of a pair of six-shooters held close against their heads all the time they were at table.

Toiling thus by day and night, haggard, unshaven, unkempt, black with coal dust, and smeared with grease and tar, the two green hands—one of whom was weak and feverish from loss of blood—had the hardest berth of all.

On the first day—that is, the day when they re-captured the Stormy Petrel—they sighted several vessels, mostly to windward, and cruising, apparently, close in shore. But these they evaded, almost without alteration of their course. Then came the cover of night; and still prodigal of their coal, they pressed on at the utmost speed of which, in the crippled state of her machinery, the vessel was still capable. By dawn, they had left Cape Hatteras one hundred miles astern.

The second day, about noon, the wind being in their favour, they hoisted fore and aft sails. All that day, and all the next, aided by wind and steam, they went on with unabated speed. By this time they were justified in deeming themselves tolerably safe against all danger of pursuit from United States' cruisers.

In the meanwhile De Benham bore up, doing his work unflinchingly, and refusing to admit, even to himself, how much he suffered from his wound. Yet there were times when his limbs failed under him, and his brain swam, and the sky and sea seemed to turn red, like blood. The wound, in fact, had never been properly dressed; and now, weak as he was, he would not spare himself in any way.

"I'm sure you're ill, old fellow," Archie would say from time to time. "You've lost an awful lot of blood, depend on it. Now just go and lie down, and let me take your work for an hour or two."

But De Benham always protested that he was well and strong, and able to take Archie's work as well as his own.

As the afternoon of the third day wore away, the wind began shifting more towards the westward; irregular troops of thin copery clouds were seen to scud fitfully across the horizon; and the sun went down in a wild mist of crimson and gold.

On the morning of the fourth day, the wind veered round to the W.N.W., and the barometer began to fall.

By noon the sky was densely overcast; the wind was freshening and the sea was getting up. Then Captain Hay ordered the hatches to be battened down, the hole in the fore-castle hatch to be boarded over, the sails to be furled, and the cotton bales (such of them, at least, as remained on deck, not having been flung overboard in the chase) to be made fast amidships.

Meanwhile the barometer fell to 29.00.

And now sudden gusts of rain swept up from time to time; the sea-birds darted, screaming, along the crests of the waves—the sky came down blacker and lower like a pall—the breeze rose to a gale—the ship's course was altered in such wise as to keep the wind and sea upon her quarter—the gale rose to a hurricane; and by five bells in the afternoon watch (i.e., 2.30 P.M.) the full fury of the storm was upon them.

Then the sea became one sheet of boiling foam; and the wind raged and thundered, as if there were again war in heaven.

To the two "green hands" it seemed as if the sea and sky were coming together. Blinded by the salt spray, deafened by the roar of the elements, they held on, as it were, for the bare life, clinging to anything that offered, and expecting to be carried off their feet with every fresh gust.

The barometer was now down to 28.33.

"Send Wilson on deck and Blyth below, and bid Davis slow down the engine," shouted the captain through his speaking trumpet.

He was holding on by the binnacle at one side and De Benham at the other, with little more than an arm's length between them; yet the supercargo heard the words but vaguely, as from a vast distance. Wilson was one of the assistant firemen.

De Benham tried to make his way over to where Archie was standing backed up under the lee of the galley, trying to keep up a look-out through the mist and darkness; but he might as well have attempted to walk through a stone wall as face the direct force of that tremendous wind. It met him like a solid body, and almost felled him where he stood; so he tacked about like a ship, and, crawling on his hands and knees, crept round by the gunwales.

"Go below to the engine-room—send Wilson on deck—bid Davis slow down the engine," he shouted, repeating the captain's orders.

But though he gave out the words with all the power of his lungs, he could not make Archie hear them. It seemed to him that his voice was caught up and whirled away into infinite space as soon as it reached his lips.

At this moment a tremendous squall—swift, shrill, howling a wild war-whoop that seemed to cut the other thunders like a knife—hurled itself upon them from the North-West. The seas, checked in their running by this sudden shift of wind, struck the Stormy Petrel on her port quarter, and broke over her decks with a crash like the disruption of an Alp. The good boat heeled over—a shriek of terror burst from the lips of all on board—and Archie and De Benham found themselves rolling together in the lee scuppers, drenched and breathless and half stunned.

They had expected nothing less than to be washed away into that terrible ocean. They got up clinging to each other, wondering to find themselves alive, dreading to see the decks cleared of all but their two selves. But there, thank heaven! was Captain Hay, holding on by the five-rail; there were Polter and the Yankee still safe at the helm. But there was a ruinous gap in the port bulwarks where the waves had broken through, and the cotton-bales which they had taken such pains to make fast amidships were clean swept away.

Then holding Archie tight round the neck with both arms, De Benham put his lips against his friend's ear and once more shouted a repetition of the captain's orders.

Archie heard, and crawled away; but found the furnace sputtering and hissing like a reptile under torture, and the atmosphere one fog of steam and smoke. That overwhelming sea had poured like a cataract down the engine and fireroom hatches, and even through the ventilators; and the water was up already to the grate-bars of the furnaces. Another such sea, it was plain, must put out the fires and stop the engine altogether.

All this time, the prisoners in the forecabin and cuddy were in mortal dread, thinking they should go to the bottom under hatches and be drowned like kittens in a bucket. But in vain they hammered, and clamoured, and dashed themselves against the battened-down hatchways. Had every throat been of brass, and every cry a salvo of artillery, no echo of the sound would have been audible to those on deck.

De Benham thought of the poor fellows, however, promising himself, should the vessel threaten to founder, that he would be the first to break open the hatches and set them free to fight for their own lives as best they might. Till then, he could do nothing. Yes—one thing he could do, and did. He found a large hatchet and hid it in a safe cranny close by, that it might be ready to his hand when the moment of extreme danger came.

And now, just as Archie had gone below and Wilson had come on deck, another frightful squall rushed up in the track of the first. This time, they heard the coming shriek, and so put the helm hard up, just in time to meet it.

Again the Stormy Petrel staggered and heeled over—again she shipped a sea. Each man there, seeing that huge, black, impending precipice, shut his eyes and held on to whatever was nearest, expecting instant destruction. But the flood burst, buried them, and passed, carrying with it the roof of the galley, and snapping the foremast like a reed; yet mercifully sparing those five gasping units.

The ship had now broached to, and was rolling helplessly in the trough of the sea, when Davis, the engineer, came crawling upon deck, and reported the fires out, the engine stopped, and three feet and a half of water in the engine-room.

There was now but one chance between them and destruction; and that one chance was to get the ship by the wind by means of some scrap of after-sail. The captain shouted, "All hands aft!"—himself flew to the after-mast; climbed it like a cat; and with Polter's help lashed a stout rope about the head and body of the already close-reefed sail. This done, the lower half of the sheet was set "goose-winged" and hauled flat aft—so bringing the ship to the wind, and getting the sea upon her port bow. She now rose, with a long steady lift, to the waves; the steersman recovered command of the helm; and all hands were ordered to the pumps.

And now, cleaving the dreadful blackness like the sword of the destroying angel, came the first flash of lightning; but the thunder scarcely made itself heard above the din of winds and waves. For some twenty minutes—it seemed like two hours at the least—it went on lightening incessantly. And then the wind shifted back again suddenly to the W.N.W.—torrents of rain came down, hammering the decks like small shot—the terrible pall overhead became less dense—the barometer began to rise—a faint, coppery light gleamed along the horizon ; and, compared with what it was in the crisis of its fury, the storm might be said to have abated.

And now, little by little, the clouds parted ; lifted ; rolled off, ragged and still threatening, before the wind—rolled off, as it seemed, in endless succession, ever coming up upon the one horizon and vanishing upon the other. And still the unwearied wind lifted up its awful voice, and the sea raged, and the rain came down in floods.

Meanwhile the Stormy Petrel was in perilous case ; her engines stopped, one screw disabled, her foremast gone, two-thirds of her slender crew at the pumps, and not a hand to spare to clear the engine-room and relight the fires.

Then Captain Hay bethought him of the two prisoners in the cuddy.

He went to them, and found them crouched close against the hatchway, in pitch darkness, with the floor one pool of water.

"Look here, my men," he said, "we've had a devil of a gale, and are short of hands. Will you help work the boat as far as the Isle of Fayal, or stop here doing nothing for the next eight or ten days?"

"Wa'al, cap'n, I guess we'll come out," replied the cook, with considerable alacrity.

Four days of black hole, ending off with the pounding and pitching of the last two hours, had already been more than enough. They would have shipped with the Prince of Darkness, rather than endure more of it.

"You must first give me your word of honour, both of you, that you'll attempt no rescue," said the captain. "For, look you, I'll scuttle this boat and sink every man of you, sooner than give her up a second time."

They promised eagerly, thankful for fresh air and liberty on any terms. So he gave them each a glass of grog (the first they had tasted for four days); sent them to the pumps; and despatched Davis and Wilson to the engine-room.

Gradually, as evening drew on, the storm wore itself out. The wind, though still sweeping up in wild, mournful gusts, no longer battled with the seamen for their lives. The rain came and went, as the clouds passed and parted. Only the sea raged on, crested and terrible, and sullenly roaring.

By and by, under a lurid arch, the sun went down. Then for a moment every cloud was flushed with purple ; every wave was tipped with fire. And then, suddenly, it was night.

By this time, the pumps had done their work ; the furnaces were glowing again ; the Stormy Petrel was getting her steam up ; and a jury-mast was being rigged in place of the foremast which they had lost in the gale.

Refusing to take a moment's rest, Captain Hay now sent Polter to turn in for a couple of hours ; himself looked to the prisoners ; set the night-watch ; and went round the ship, inspecting the damage done, and seeing that all was made snug for the night.

"You can patrol the fore-deck, and keep guard over the prisoners, Mr. Debenham," said he, when all this was done. "That is, if you are equal to two hours more before you turn in."

"I am equal," said De Benham, "to any duty you may assign me."

Saying which he went to his cabin, armed himself with revolver and cutlass, swallowed half a wineglassful of raw brandy, and hastened to his post.

But he over-rated his fast-failing strength. Till now, the excitement had kept him going ; but he had been on duty sixteen hours, and had done a heavy day's work before ever the storm came upon them. Since then he had been helping with the furnaces, preparing the men's suppers—doing with his two arms, in short, the work of six. But now he was at the end of his powers. Scarcely had he taken a dozen turns when he became deadly faint. The deck swam before his eyes—slipped from under his feet. He fell without an effort to save himself, and so lay, till Archie stumbled over him, fetched assistance, and carried him to his cabin. There they laid him on his bed, bathed his hands and forehead, and brought him to. Presently he fell into a feverish sleep that lasted till daybreak.

He was no sooner awake, however, than he insisted on getting up and standing his morning watch. He declared that, having slept, he felt well and strong, and so would not be dissuaded. All that day he kept up, doing his share of the work as usual. The weather was still rough and squally, and bitterly cold ; but he protested that he enjoyed the cold—that his wound gave him no pain—that he never felt better.

Meanwhile the Stormy Petrel, strained, and knocked about, and driven out of her course by the hurricane, made less way than ever. Two of the Americans, moreover, were found hanging about the fore-castle hatchway ; for which Captain Hay promptly consigned them to the cuddy, thus reducing his slender crew to its original numbers.

That night De Benham went to bed with his teeth chattering, his head and hands on fire, his feet like ice; and was dreaming, waking, talking, starting in his sleep the whole night through. The next morning his pulse was at a hundred and twenty, and his temples were throbbing like to burst. Still the indomitable will prevailed. He rose, prepared breakfast for the crew and the prisoners, and helped to get up a keg of meal, a bushel of split pease, and other provisions from the store-room. About an hour later he called Archie to his side, and said:—

"Archie, old fellow, I give in. I can't keep on my legs any longer. I suppose this confounded cut has been too much for me."

"You ought to have given in long ago," said Archie.

"Perhaps—but never mind. Now look here

.... my head's all confused I want you to remember that my books and papers are in the locker beside my bed. If I am too ill to take care of them myself, I place them under your charge."

"If you'll only be quiet and take rest till we get to Horta," said Archie, anxiously, "you'll be all right again."

"I don't know. At all events, Captain Hay is responsible for the ship and cargo as far as Liverpool. At Liverpool you, as supercargo's clerk, must not leave the boat till you have Mr. Hardwicke's instructions about the cargo. Now just help me into bed, and report me on the sick-list to the captain."

With a heavy heart, Archie did as he was bidden; and ere nightfall De Benham was in a high fever, and raving of the old student days at Zollenstrasse-am-Main.

STARS AND LIGHTS ;

Or, The Structure of the Sidercal Heavens.

V.—THE ARRIVAL OF HERSCHEL'S FAITHFUL ASSISTANT.

THE name thus naturally attached through kindness of feeling to the new planet, was not generally accepted by foreign astronomers. Perhaps it was felt to be incongruous with the mythological designation of the older planets. For a considerable time the name of the discoverer himself prevailed, and especially abroad. In England the planet was long known as the Georgian. But science is cosmopolitan in its issues and its aims, and it matters but little to mankind under what dynasty or in what country the accessions to its progress are made; and hence the designation of Uranus, recommended by its intrinsic insignificance, has been generally adopted.

On December 6, 1781, nine months after the discovery of the planet, Herschel was enrolled among the Fellows of the Royal Society. The honour was mutual; but it is a circumstance worthy of a passing remark that Wollaston is the only astronomer whose name is attached to the usual certificate. His name, however, occurs in worthy companionship with that of the celebrated Smeaton.

There can be no doubt that Herschel felt considerable anxiety regarding the angular measure which he and the professional astronomers had assigned to the planet's diameter, and which at first caused so much perplexity in the computation of the orbit. As soon, therefore, as he was settled at Slough, he commenced a re-examination of this important element. It will here be necessary to give the reader some adequate notion of the thing proposed to be measured. It is the diameter of the image of the planet formed in the focus of the telescope: an impalpable dot of light hanging, as it were, in mid-air within the tube, in size about the six-hundredth of an inch as formed in the seven-foot reflector. Upon the knowledge of the exact size of this microscopic dot depends entirely our knowledge of the dimensions of the planet itself, provided always that we know the distance of the latter from the earth. The mode adopted at first was to place two parallel fibres of unspun silk from the cocoon, in exact contact with the circular dot of light hanging in the focus of the telescope. The two fibres are carried each in its own frame, and are then moved closer or further apart by means of two delicate screws, until, after many trials, the impalpable image of the planet exactly fills the interval between them. This interval is itself measured without any great difficulty, for the number of turns and parts of a turn made by the screws settles this point with great accuracy. It is otherwise, however, with regard to the judgment formed of the exactness of the fit; perhaps the judgment of no two persons would prove coincident, and, moreover, successive repetitions of the same process by the same person are often provokingly discordant. Such are some of the difficulties, and such are some of the infinitesimally small quantities, which it is the business of the astronomer to grasp.

In Herschel's paper of November 7, 1782, wherein he gives the account of his second series of attempts to measure the planet, he says that "almost every sort of micrometer is liable to some inconveniences and deceptions; it will, however, often happen that we may correct the errors of one instrument by the opposite errors of another." Accordingly this scrupulous observer devised another instrument, constructed on a different principle from the one described above. Like every other effective instrument, it is extremely simple in its conception; and being such, we shall not scruple to explain it to the reader.

Let him take any ordinary telescope or opera-glass that lies within his reach, and let him with his right eye look through it steadily at any well-defined object, remote or near. While thus looking through the telescope, let him look at the same object with his left and naked eye: to do this may require a little humouring and a little patience, but with patience success is certain. Now let him gently humour his eyes and his instrument until the two images overlap, or are apparently placed side by side, and he will then perceive that the telescopic image is much larger (and fainter) than the real object viewed with the unassisted eye. If the object be small and accessible, let him place a graduated scale, such as a two-foot rule, against it, and then, repeating the operation before described, he will be able to calculate the magnifying power of the telescope, because he will see the natural object and its telescopic image simultaneously projected against the same graduated scale. The courses of a brick wall, for instance, furnish at once an object and a scale of comparison for an opera-glass. It was in this way that Galileo, from the very first, ascertained the magnifying power of his new invention; and, in fact, there is no better. Now Herschel proposed to adopt the principle thus enunciated for measuring the angular diameter of the new planet. He prepared a set of circular discs of oiled paper, of various colours, thicknesses, and sizes. One of these he set in the front of a lantern, and thus obtained a bright circular disc at a known distance from his eye. He then patiently altered this distance, or the size, or brightness, or tint of the luminous disc, until, when viewed with the left unassisted eye, it exactly coincided with the image of the planet as viewed with the other eye through the telescope. When this coincidence was obtained, he could measure with accuracy the angle which the artificial disc subtended at his eye; and this, of course, was the same as that subtended by the image of the planet in the telescope. A knowledge of how much this image was amplified by the telescope (which, by the way, he obtained as above described) then led him to the true unamplified or real diameter of the planet as seen by the naked eye of an observer on the earth. The knowledge of the distance of the planet from the earth finally leads to the true dimensions of the planet itself.

It will here, probably, interest the reader slightly to touch upon the peculiar difficulty which besets even a process so simple as that just described. It was found that increasing the brightness of one of these paper discs increased perceptibly its apparent size. Of two circles strictly equal, that which was the brighter appeared also the larger. We have an instance of this effect during the earlier phases of the moon. While the thin crescent of the young moon is shining brightly, by reflecting to us the light of the sun, the remaining and larger portion of it is feebly illuminated by light reflected from the earth; hence both portions are visible at once: the effect is to make the bright crescent appear the larger, and the old moon is said to be in the arms of the new. Until lately the cause of this effect, which is called irradiation, was very imperfectly understood: the reader who is curious may find a probable explanation of it in an article which appeared in the January number of GOOD WORDS, under the title of "Perceiving without Seeing." Herschel evaded this difficulty by an ingenious process. If the bright discs, or standards of reference, on a dark ground appeared larger than they actually were, then he argued that dark discs on a bright ground would appear just as much too small; so he adopted both these standards, and then took the average of the results. In this way he concluded that the magnified image of the planet appeared of the same size as a circular disc, having a diameter of three inches and six-tenths, viewed at the distance of sixty-seven feet. He divided this by 227, the magnifying power of the telescope, and thus arrived finally at the apparent size of the planet when viewed from the earth. Technically, this is four seconds, and consequently the planet might be viewed through the letter "O" on one of these pages, placed at the distance of 140 feet! But minute as is this dot of light, it represents a globe whose diameter is very nearly four and a half times that of the earth, taking M. Lalande's distance of the planet from the sun to be very nearly nineteen times that of the earth.*

* The distance, as deduced from the Nautical Almanack

Herschel stated his intention of pursuing these measures to a greater degree of exactness, waiting for the planet's nearest approach to the earth; but it must be borne in mind that astronomical precision is arrived at only after very many observations generally taken at distant intervals of time, and the Georgium Sidus, since its discovery, had only just completed one of his revolutions round the sun by the year 1855.

The question here naturally arises, and it did present itself to the mind of the discoverer, is this planet accompanied, like Jupiter and Saturn, by satellites? And does it, like the earth and all the other planets, rotate with a uniform diurnal motion round an axis within itself? Both these questions, on account of the distance and the feeble light of the planet, were exceedingly difficult to resolve. If there be any satellites, in all probability, on account of their excessive remoteness, they would be excessively minute and indistinct. There was also another motive which at the first deterred Herschel from pursuing the inquiry; the planet at the time of its discovery was situated in a portion of the heavens where small telescopic stars abound, and it would be all the more difficult to ferret out a moving satellite, when surrounded by a multitude of other points of light. In the month of January, 1787, it occurred to his mind to apply his largest telescope of twenty feet focal length, and more than eighteen inches aperture, to the work, now that he had by a new and ingenious contrivance greatly increased the amount of light which it reflected. The reader will probably be aware, that in a reflecting telescope, the large mirror would form an inverted image of the object viewed, at the focus, but before the rays of light meet to form this image they are turned aside by a small plane mirror, producing no other effect than that of enabling the observer to look in a direction perpendicular to the original course of the light. But then, by this second reflection at the small plane mirror, an additional quantity of light is lost, and the illumination of the image is enfeebled. If it were not for this turning aside of the rays, the head of the observer would be entirely in the way, and the intention of the instrument frustrated. When, however, William Herschel completed a mirror having the unprecedented diameter of eighteen inches, it was possible for him to tilt his large mirror slightly, so as to form the image of the object just at the edge of the mouth of the tube; this image could then be viewed through a magnifying lens, without the interception of much light by the observer's head. This ingenious device was found to increase the light of the field of view to a very advantageous extent, especially when the object gazed at was feebly illuminated. This mode of using the telescope was called the front view. In January, 1787, Herschel applied this front view to a search for satellites to the Georgian planet. We cannot do better than describe the process and its result in the fresh and graphic language of the original memoir; the reader will thereby be able to form a conception of what serious astronomical observation means and involves:—

"The 11th of January, therefore, in the course of a general review of the heavens, I selected a sweep which led to the Georgian planet; and while it passed the meridian, I perceived near its disk, and within a few of its diameters, some very faint stars, whose places I noted down with great care. The next day, when the planet returned to the meridian, I looked with a most scrutinizing eye for my small stars, and perceived that two of them were missing. Had I been less acquainted with optical deceptions, I should have immediately announced the existence of one or more satellites to our new planet; but it was necessary that I should have no doubts. The least haziness, otherwise imperceptible, may often obscure small stars; and I judged, therefore, that nothing less than a series of observations ought to satisfy me, in a case of importance. To this end I noticed all the small stars that were near the planet the 14th, 17th, 18th, and 24th of January, and the 4th and 5th of February; and though, at the end of that time, I had no longer any doubt of the existence of at least one satellite, I thought it right to defer this communication [to the Royal Society] till I could have an opportunity of seeing it actually in motion. Accordingly, I began to pursue this satellite on February the 7th, about six o'clock in the evening, and kept it in view till three in the morning on February the 8th; at which time, on account of the situation of my house, which intercepts a view of a part of the ecliptic, I was obliged to give over the chase: and during those nine hours I saw this satellite faithfully attend its primary planet, and at the same time keep on, in its own course, by describing a considerable arch of its proper orbit."

We shall leave the reader to make his own comments on this nine hours of nocturnal chase. The second suspicious little shadow of a dot of light then required his attention: he soon came to the conclusion that if a satellite, its orbit was more contracted than the former, and he proceeded with patience to track its course.

"I had an opportunity," he says, "to see it [for the fourth time] for about three hours and a quarter, during which time, as far as one might judge, it preserved its course. The interval which the cloudy weather had afforded was, however, rather too short for seeing its motion sufficiently, so I deferred a final judgment till the 10th; and in order to put my theory of these two satellites to a trial, I made a sketch on paper, to point out beforehand their situation with respect to the planet and its parallel of declination. The long-expected evening came on, and notwithstanding the most unfavourable appearance of damp weather, it cleared up at last. And the heavens now displayed the original of my drawing, by showing, in the situation I had delineated them, the Georgian Planet, attended by two satellites. I confess that this sight appeared to me with additional beauty, as the little secondary planets seemed to give a dignity to the primary one, which raises it into a more conspicuous situation among the great bodies of our solar system . . . I have not seen them," he adds, "long enough to assign their periodical times with great accuracy; but suppose that the first performs a synodical revolution in about eight days and three-quarters, and the second in nearly thirteen days and a half."

It is refreshing thus to watch the great philosopher in the very ardour of his pursuit: it is instructive to read how he represses, and yet how he cannot quite conceal, the emotions which possess him, but without which, we may rest assured, no philosopher can persevere in his lonely work: alone, yet not alone; for he lives in a world peopled with a thousand associations, brightened with the light of a thousand imaginings, animated with the settled conviction that the truth lies in his track, and that in due time he will find the truth. Happier still, if in his secret heart he sees these lines of truth all converging, in the far distance, to the mind of the Eternal Father.

William Herschel continued to prosecute this most difficult and troublesome line of research as opportunities occurred; and in the year 1797, ten years after the discovery of the two satellites, in a memoir addressed to the Royal Society, he announced a circumstance regarding their motions, which was hitherto without a parallel in the case of any other heavenly body permanently belonging to the solar system. It is well known that the planets, and their satellites, and such comets as permanently circulate round the sun or their primaries, move in one direction, from west to east. To the great surprise of all astronomers, Herschel announced that the two Georgian satellites moved in a contrary or retrograde direction—in fact, they moved backwards. Such retrograde or backward motion is also the case with certain comets, whose orbits are considerably inclined to that general plane, to the neighbourhood of which planetary motions are in general conformed; and it is a notable circumstance that the Georgian satellites move also in orbits which are very highly inclined to this general plane (the ecliptic) of planetary motion. There appears, in fact, to be some relation between the direction of the motions of the several bodies forming the solar system, and the approximate conformity, or otherwise, of the planes in which they move. When we come to that hypothesis which, to a certain extent, explains the formation of the whole planetary system from a gaseous condition, we shall revert to this subject, and then lay before the reader what light the present state of our knowledge throws upon the question.

In addition to this apparent anomaly in the motions of the two Georgian moons, Herschel in this same memoir announced the probable discovery of four additional satellites, though he is not able to speak of them with absolute certainty. The truth is, that even in the very largest telescope, these specks of light are so microscopic in size, and so extremely feeble in their illumination, that even the light of the planet itself is sufficient to extinguish them when they approach their primary. For the same reason it is not probable that the Uranian astronomers, if such there be, have ever caught so much as a glimpse of our own earth: to them we, with all our Titanic constructions, are utterly extinguished in the superior light of the sun, though itself reduced to less than the 3-100th part of the lustre with which it shines to ourselves.

In the year 1815 Herschel, in another memoir, collected the results of all his observations on the Georgian satellites. He is still unable to assign with precision the periodic times of the four additional satellites, the existence of which he still very strongly suspected. With respect to the two originally discovered, he confidently assigns the respective periods of 8d. 16h. 56m. 5s. and 13d. 11h. 8m. 59s., periods which have received no material corrections from more recent observations. He also thought that he observed certain periodic variations in the light of these, to us microscopic bodies, indicating a rotation round their axes, similar to that in which all other heavenly bodies appear to partake.

Some conception of the difficulty attending the observations of these remote and feebly-illuminated members of our system may be formed from the circumstance that when Sir John Herschel, in 1834, repeated his father's investigations with similar instruments, he was unable to obtain any satisfactory results until he had kept his eye steadily fixed to the telescope for a full quarter of an hour, and then defending it from all extraneous light: Sir John (then Mr.) Herschel found no traces of any of the four satellites either seen or suspected by his father. M. O. Struve* discovered a third, with the magnificent refracting telescope at Pulkowa, and Mr. Lassell, with an instrument larger than Herschel's twenty-feet reflector, discovered a fourth at Liverpool; but neither of these is included in the four whose existence was suspected by the elder Herschel. Since that time Mr. Lassell has constructed a still more gigantic reflector with his own hands, and with it he, in the clearer atmosphere of Malta, has scrutinized the neighbourhood of the planet with great assiduity, and he speaks with much confidence of the non-existence of the four additional satellites suspected by William Herschel in 1797. All the four Uranian moons, whose existence is certainly known, move backwards, and in planes nearly perpendicular to the ecliptic.

We fear that we may have detained our readers on questions of no very general and great interest; but it appeared not unadvisable to give some notion of the exceedingly great difficulties which beset the philosopher in his inquiries nigh to the confines of the solar system, and to that exercise of the patient confidence which is absolutely essential to surmount them. We shall now turn to a theme which no doubt will meet with a deeper and more general sympathy.

For this seems a natural place for us to introduce to our readers a lady who was closely associated with William Herschel in all his labours, and without whose faithful and constant aid it is not possible that he could have brought them to a successful issue. We allude to his sister, Miss Caroline Herschel.

This most remarkable lady—we have here the advantage of writing from an unquestionable source of information—was born on March 16, 1750, in Hanover. In the year 1772, William Herschel visited his family there; and it was on this occasion arranged that his sister, Miss Caroline Herschel, should return with him to England, to take charge of his house at Bath, and assist him in his professional engagements. In the passage to England she narrowly escaped shipwreck, the vessel on which she had embarked having been dismantled and materially damaged in a storm.

When her brother commenced his astronomical pursuits, she also read such books upon the subject as came within her reach (Ferguson, for instance); and under his direction acquired a knowledge of geometry, trigonometry, and logarithmic calculation, sufficient to enable her to reduce her brother's observations by means of the mathematical formulæ with which he furnished her.

with a salary of £300 per annum, his sister was also formally recognised as his assistant, with a salary of £50, which she continued to receive until her decease in 1848. During the forty years of her brother's astronomical labours, whether at Bath, or Datchet, or Slough, she acted as his one and only assistant. She always sat up with him at night, writing down the observations from his verbal dictation as they occurred, and reading off and noting the clock at each observation requiring a register of the time. In such calculations she was perfectly indefatigable, and when she had not work enough to do for her brother, she struck out a course of calculation for herself. For example, in 1797, she re-examined all the original observations of Flamsteed, the first astronomer royal, and detected no less a number than 860 stars which had been omitted in the catalogue, which professed to contain the results of the Greenwich observations.

During her brother's absence from home on holiday trips or other occasions, she supplied his place; and on such opportunities, as well as whenever she could be spared during the progress of other observations, she would take her little Newtonian telescope, constructed especially for her use, and sweep the heavens in search of nebulae and comets. Of the former entities she discovered several, which had escaped even her brother's scrutiny, and of comets she could claim priority in the discovery of no less a number than five. But her most important work was the construction of a complete catalogue of all the nebulae discovered by William Herschel, reduced to the places in the heavens which they would appear to occupy on January 1, 1830. For this very valuable result of her labours the Royal Astronomical Society awarded her their gold medal in 1828. At that time her nephew, the present Sir John (then Mr.) Herschel, was president; and, in consequence, the speech which it is customary to make on such occasions was delivered by the late Mr. (subsequently Sir James) South. We can scarcely do better than quote one of the paragraphs from the speech itself:—

“She it was,” said Mr. South, “whose pen conveyed to paper her brother's observations from his lips: she it was who noted the right ascensions and polar distances of the object observed: she it was who, having passed the night near the instrument, took the rough slips to her cottage at the dawn of the day, and produced a fair copy of the night's work on the subsequent morning: she it was who reduced every observation, and made every calculation: she it was who arranged everything in systematic order; and she it was who helped her brother to obtain an imperishable fame.”

The reader will not be surprised to find the character of this most admirable lady summed up by one who had every opportunity of forming a judgment, as a person of singularly primitive habits and notions, idolising her brother with a singleness of mind and entire devotion which were most remarkable. Nothing seemed to her a sacrifice, or a hardship, or privation, if made in furtherance of his objects. But she never felt herself quite at home in England; and so soon as she lost her brother (in 1822), she at once returned to Hanover, where she remained until her death. It was after her return to Hanover that, true to her genius, she finally completed her great catalogue, for which she received the gold medal of the Astronomical Society. That same learned body conferred an equal honour upon themselves and on Caroline Herschel, by enrolling her name among their associates—a distinction conferred on no other lady, with one honourable exception of Mrs. Somerville, who happily still survives, and whose name, we trust, will long continue upon the roll as the precursor of other distinguished members of her sex.

While at Hanover, Caroline Herschel naturally received many tokens of friendly and respectful recognition from the members of various royal houses on the continent of Europe; and there she died, at the ripe old age of ninety-eight. The Princess Royal of Hanover, as a touching mark of respect, sent a wreath of palm leaves to be laid upon the coffin, which contained that which was mortal of her remains.

It is by such labours that the world's great work of progress is carried on: it is for such self-sacrifice that mankind accord imperishable fame.

BY THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

SECOND PAPER.

FROM a rapid view of Columba's Time, let us pass to a closer inspection of Columba's Home. We have seen the place which his age occupied in the history of the world, and the character of those events in which he bore a part, or of which he must have heard the fame. Let us now visit the Island which is sacred to the memory of his illustrious life, and look upon the landscape which was familiar to his sight. Dr. Johnson, in a celebrated passage, has condemned the "frigid philosophy" which could regard without emotion the scenes which are associated with the triumph of piety or of learning; and yet in many cases those scenes are so wholly changed that nothing of identity remains except mere geographical position. The places where great men or great communities have flourished and decayed, and which now "know them no more for ever," would often be as little recognised by them, if they were to rise again from the dead. The learned historian of "Latin Christianity" speaks of the beauty of the situations which were invariably chosen by the Benedictine Monks for the monastic sites in England. But when the structure of a country is comparatively level, almost everything which is characteristic in the landscape depends upon features which change in the course of a very few generations. It depends on the progress of enclosures, on the distinctive colouring of cultivated and uncultivated ground, on the disappearance of forests, on the new disposition of woods and trees. In such situations nothing that we see now may be as it was seen by those whose memory has brought us to the spot. With Iona the case is very different. We may be sure that what we now see is very much what Columba saw. Its distinctive features depend upon the enduring Hills, and upon the still more enduring Sea. To the eye of a geologist, indeed, I know very few situations where every outline tells so distinctly of the most tremendous agencies of change—of volcanic heat and of glacial cold, of upheaval and of subsidence, of rupture and of abrasion, and of the waste of time. But all these agencies, except the last, have been so long at rest that the human race has been slow to believe in their existence. It is, indeed, the most difficult of all things to form any distinct conception of the nature and the method of their works, or of the part which each of them has had in moulding and configuring the world we see. And, as regards the waste of time, not only all the centuries since Columba's birth, but all the centuries since the birth of man, are but "as yesterday when it is past, or as a watch in the night." The Ocean has been called, by Hugh Miller, "that blue foaming dragon, whose vocation it is to eat up the land:" but the rate at which it eats up the Hebridean rocks is very slow indeed. The singular and beautiful clearness of its waters round those shores is a sufficient proof how infinitesimally small is the amount of spoil. Nothing, therefore, can be more certain than that, when we look upon Iona, or when we range even the wide horizon which is visible from its shores, we are tracing the very outlines which Columba's eye has often traced, we follow the same winding coasts and the same stormy headlands, and the same sheltered creeks, and the same archipelago of curious islands, and the same treacherous reefs—by which Columba has often sailed. A few changes, of a very superficial kind, may have been brought about. Forests can never have flourished on those outward slopes which front the Atlantic blasts. But some shaggy brushwood has doubtless disappeared,—the introduction of sheep has made the pastures greener—to some extent the heather has given way to grass. But this is the whole amount of change. All the great aspects of nature upon and around Iona must be the same as they were thirteen hundred years ago.

What, then, are those aspects? To Montalembert they are all mournful and oppressive. He paints the landscape in the gloomiest colours. Its picturesqueness, he says, is without charm, and its grandeur is without grace. The neighbouring isles are all naked and desert. The mountains are always covered with clouds, which conceal their summits. The climate is one of continual mists and rains, with frequent storms. The "pale sun of the north," when it is seen at all, gleams only upon dull and leaden seas, or upon long lines of melancholy foam. Those who know the Western Isles know how unreal all this sort of language is. The appreciation of natural beauty in its various forms depends mainly upon association, very little upon knowledge or upon conscious thought. The scenery of the Hebrides is altogether peculiar, and to those whose notions of beauty or of fertility are derived from countries which abound in corn and wine and oil, the charms of that scenery can perhaps never be understood. And yet these charms are founded on a wonderful combination of the three greatest powers in nature—the Sky, the Sea, the Mountains. But these stand in very different relations to the early memories of our race. As regards the Sky there is no speech or nation where its voice is not heard; there is no corner of the world where the sweet influences which it sheds do not form, consciously or unconsciously, an intimate part of the life of men. But it is not so with the Ocean. There are millions who have never seen it, and can have no conception of the aspect of the most wonderful object upon earth. To many who have seen it, it inspires nothing but dislike. By the Prophet of Patmos,—although no image is more frequent in his visions as an emblem of glory and of brightness,—the Ocean is classed in a sublime passage along with Death and Hell, as among the Holders of the Dead (Rev. xx. 13). And so, in this character at least, we are told that it is to have no place in the New Heavens and the New Earth, where "there shall be no more Sea" (Rev. xxi. 1). The gentle spirit of Mrs. Hemans was troubled by the same aspect of the Ocean, and few more touching verses have been left us by her pen than those which she addressed to the "hollow-sounding and mysterious Main :"—

"To thee the love of woman hath gone down, Dark flow thy tides o'er manhood's noble head."

The feeling is natural, and, like so many others connected with the dead, we find it enshrined in "In Memoriam :"—

"O to us,
The fools of habit, sweeter seems
To rest beneath the clover sod,
That drinks the sunshine and the rains,
Or where the kneeling hamlet drains
The chalice of the grapes of God,
Than that with thee, the roaring wells
Should gulf him fathom deep in brine
And hands so often clasped in mine
Should toss with tangle and with shells."

But, after all, the Ocean is something more than a "vast and wandering grave." Its associations are not mainly with the Dead. Neither is it the only power which seems to dissipate beyond recovery this Tabernacle of the Flesh. The question, "With what Body do they come?" is asked more often of the Forms which have been returned to the dust of earth than of those which have been lost in many waters. To eyes that have been accustomed to rest upon the boundless fields of Ocean, there is nothing in nature like it. The inexhaustible fountain of all the fertility and exuberance of earth—the type of all vastness and of all power—it responds also with infinite subtlety of expression to every change in the face of heaven. There is nothing like its awfulness when in commotion. There is nothing like its restfulness when it is at rest. There is nothing like the joyfulness of its reflected lights, or the tenderness of the colouring which it throws in sunshine from its deeps and shallows. I am sorry for those who have never listened to, and therefore can never understand, the immense conversation of the Sea. It is a deplorable incapacity, but tolerable in them—if only they will hold their peace.

Of the third great power in landscape—of the Mountains—there is less need to speak. This at least is more generally understood. There are not many places in the world where those three great voices—"each a mighty voice"—the Sky, the Sea, the Mountains—can be heard sounding in finer harmony than round Columba's Isle. It is true that the climate of the Hebrides is a wet one; and hence the perennial verdure which flourishes to the very summits of the hills, in happy contrast with the absolute sterility of a great proportion of all the mountain ranges in the south of Europe. Hence also the wonderful beauty of the skies. "Cloudland, gorgeous land," is a truthful exclamation of the poet. For nowhere is the face of heaven more various in expression than along that line of coast where the vapours of the Atlantic are first caught by the highland hills. Byron's famous lines, in which he touches on the difference between the sunsets of the south and of the north, give by no means an accurate idea of that in which the difference really consists. I have seen from Athens "morning spread upon the mountains" along the opposite range of Parnes, and the low sun streaming up the Gulf of Corinth upon the hills of the Morea. Those tints are certainly beyond measure beautiful. But the sunsets which are to be seen constantly among the Western Isles are not, as compared with those of the Mediterranean, "obscurely bright." It is true the colouring is darker, but it is also deeper—richer—more intense. Nothing indeed can exceed its splendour. And so of the Sea: its aspects around Iona are singularly various and beautiful. On one side is the open Ocean, with nothing to break its fetch of waves from the shores of the New World. On the other side, it is divided into innumerable creeks, and bays, and inlets, which carry the eye round capes and islands, and along retreating lines of shore far in among the hills. Its waters are exquisitely pure—of a luminous and transparent green, shading off into a rich purple—where the white, sandy bottom is occupied by beds of Algæ. Into these greens and purples on the opposite side of a narrow Sound, dip granite rocks of the brightest red. Then there is the busy population of the teeming Sea—its shoals of fish—its great mammalia, which are the hugest of living things—its snowy and its swarthy birds, with all the movement of their wings, the arrowy flight of the wild Rock Pigeon (the origin of all our domestic doves), and the occasional sweep of the Peregrine. Whatever a modern Frenchman—even a man of genius like Montalembert—may think of such scenes as these, there is every reason to believe that they were not repugnant to Columba. He was an Irish Celt. His own early home was in the wilds of Donegal, where the climate is not less weeping, and where a coast of far more frowning aspect fronts the Atlantic Ocean. Some poems in the Erse language have been handed down as written by Columba; and although they may not be actually his, they are at least very ancient, and represent the kind of imagery which was familiar to his race, and those aspects of nature in which they took delight. There is no melancholy moping over the Sea because it is not always blue, or over rocks and mountains because they are not rich in foliage.

Headland of Bourg, and Ben More.

"Delightful to be on Benn-Edar,
Before going o'er the white sea:
The dashing of the wave against its face,
The bareness of its shore and its border.

"Delightful to be on Benn-Edar,
After coming o'er the white-bosomed sea,
To row one's little coracle,
Ochone! on the swift-waved shore.

"How rapid the speed of my coracle,
And its stern turned upon Derry;
I grieve at my errand o'er the noble sea
Travelling to Alba of the Ravens.

* * * *

"Beloved to my heart also in the West,
Drumcliff, at Culcinne's strand:
To behold the fair Loch Feval,
The form of its shores, is delightful.

"Delightful is that, and delightful
The salt main on which the seagulls cry
On my coming from Derry afar;
It is quiet, and it is delightful.

Delightful." *

Columba may indeed have missed the "oaks of Derry," and that intense love of place which is a passion with the Celt doubtless made all lands but Erin appear to him as lands of exile. But if his eye rested with delight on the "dashing of the wave," and on the "form of shores," no spot could have been better chosen than that on which he lived and died.

Iona is situated at the southern apex of that long triangular tract of mountain-land which lies to the north-west of the great Caledonian valley, and which, stretching from Inverness on the one side, and from Cape Wrath on the other, terminates in the lofty summit of Ben More, in Mull. In approaching Iona along the south coast of Mull, the massive hills of igneous rocks which constitute the great bulk of that large Island, subside somewhat suddenly into a long promontory of comparatively low elevation, at first with sharp and broken outlines, due to mica slate, and then with rounded knobs and knolls of granite, swept naked by the blast along the margin of the sea, but farther inland covered with sheets of moss and heather. Off the point of this long promontory, called the Ross, and separated from it by a Sound of shallow sea about one mile broad, lies Columba's Isle.

The causes which determined Columba in his selection of Iona are not mysterious. Some of them have been preserved in traditions, which are as poetical as they are probably true; whilst others are obvious on a moment's consideration of the position and of the character of the spot. In the first place, it was an Island; and islands have been always popular with the Monastic Orders. They give seclusion, and, with seclusion, they afford facilities for the enforcement of discipline. Is it wrong to conjecture, also, that they satisfy that sense of possession which lies deep in human nature, and which has made even hermits rejoice in some rock which they could call their own? And then comes that ground of preference which has lived in the memory of the place for thirteen hundred years, and which must be true, for it stands in unmistakable harmony with the earlier events of Columba's life, and with a natural character which was full of strong and fierce emotions. He had been the cause—and by no means the innocent cause—of war and bloodshed in his native land. It was the censures of the Church and the contrition of his own soul which drove him into exile and to the undertaking of some great labour in the cause of Christ. But the passionate love of an Irish Celt for his native Ireland seems to have burned in him with all the strength which is part of a powerful character. It is most true to nature—that which is related in the memories of his race—that he could not bear to live out of Ireland and yet within sight of her shores. On his voyage north in his boat of hides, he must have passed many islands—Islay first, but that, probably, was too large and too near; Jura next, but this also was no place for a hermitage, and the rocks of Antrim were still too close at hand. Colonsay, with its little outlying islet, Oronsay—here was an island of the fitting size. Columba landed; but, on his ascending the heights, the blue land of Erin was still above the Sea. On, then, northwards, once more; and, as the same old poem represents him saying—

* Reeve's "Adamnan," p. 285—9.

"My vision o'er the brine I stretch
From the ample oaken planks;
Large is the tear of my soft grey eye
When I look back upon Erin."

The next land he touched was the land which he has made his own. If he landed, as no doubt he did, at the spot which continuous tradition has pointed out, he cannot have known, or he must have missed, the entrance to the Sound. Passing through a labyrinth of rocks, his boat was received into a creek which to this day retains the name of the "Port of the Coracle"—a port guarded round by precipitous rocks of gneiss, and marked by a beach of brilliantly coloured pebbles of green serpentine, green quartz, and the reddest felspar. Again he mounted the nearest hill, and here at last the southern horizon was nothing but a line of Sea. And so this hill has ever since been marked by a cairn, which is known to the Gael as "Cairn cul ri Erin," or, the "Cairn with the back turned upon Erin." Farther exploration must soon have discovered to Columba that the Island on which he had now landed had other and more substantial recommendations. On the eastern side was the channel which he had missed, giving much-needed shelter from prevailing winds. Above all, it was—pace Montalembert—a fertile Island, giving promise of ample sustenance for man and beast. It is true Iona is a rocky island, the bones protruding at frequent intervals through the skin of turf. Even there, however, Columba must have seen that the pasture was close and good, and not far from the spot on which he first swept the southern sky, he must have found that the heathy and rocky hills subsided into a lower tract, green with that delicious turf which, full of thyme and wild clovers, gathers upon soils of shelly sand. This tract is called in Gaelic The Machar, or Sandy Plain. A little farther on, he must soon have found that the eastern or sheltered side presented a slope of fertile soil exactly suiting the essential conditions of ancient husbandry. At a time when artificial drainage was unknown, and in a rainy climate, the flats and hollows which in the Highlands are now generally the most valuable portions of the land, were occupied by swamps and moss. On the steep slopes alone, which afforded natural drainage, was it possible to raise cereal crops. And this is one source of that curious error which strangers so often make in visiting and in writing on the Highlands. They see marks of the plough high up upon the mountains, where the land is now very wisely abandoned to the pasturage of sheep or cattle; and, seeing this, they conclude that tillage has decreased, and they wail over the diminished industry of man. But when those high banks and braes were cultivated, the richer levels below were the haunts of the Otter, and the fishing places of the Hern. Those ancient plough-marks are the sure indications of a rude and ignorant husbandry. In the eastern slopes of Iona, Columba and his companions found one tract of land which was as admirably adapted for the growth of corn as the remainder of it was suited to the support of flocks and herds. On the north-eastern side of the Island, between the rocky pasturage and the shore, there is a long, natural declivity of arable soil, steep enough to be naturally dry, and protected by the hills from the western blast.

And so here Columba's tent was pitched, and his Bible opened, and his banner raised for the conversion of the heathen.

The ancient ecclesiastical buildings which are now slowly mouldering to decay, and which are all grouped within a short distance of each other, mark beyond all question the few acres of ground on some part of which Columba's cell and church were built. And yet the first thing we must do in standing on the spot is to imagine it denuded of all these buildings. They have their own interest, and their own beauty. But one and all of them belong to a very different age from that in which Columba lived. One of them—the least and the most inconspicuous, but the most venerable of them all—St. Odhrain's* Chapel, may possibly be the same building which Queen Margaret of Scotland is known to have erected in memory of the Saint, and dedicated to one of the most famous of his companions. But Queen Margaret died in A.D. 1092, and therefore any building which she erected must date very nearly five hundred years after Columba's death; that is to say, the most ancient building which exists upon Iona must be separated in age from Columba's time by as many centuries as those which now separate us from Edward III.!

But St. Odhrain's Chapel has this great interest—that in all probability it marks the site of the still humbler church of wood and wattles in which Columba worshipped. There are some things for which tradition may be safely trusted. The succession of generations among men has been compared to leaves of the forest; but, unlike forest-leaves, which all die about one time, and reappear at another time after a long interval that cuts off the seeming continuity of life, the generations of mankind are renewed from day to day and from year to year; so that the young hold fast the memories of the old, and that which was dear to the fathers is dear to the children also. And so it is difficult to conceive that the site of Columba's church could ever have been forgotten. It must have been always a sacred spot. Nor it is probable that when Queen Margaret built, she would leave the place which was hallowed by associations so dear to her. We are indeed expressly told by the annalist from whom our information in this matter is derived, that Queen Margaret's work was a restoration of St. Columba's church, which had fallen into decay.* But if there be any doubt as to the identity of that spot, there is none as to another spot which is close at hand. This is the "Reilig Odhrain," the ancient burying-place of Iona. Among the tenacious affections of the Celt, there is none more tenacious than that which clings to the place which is consecrated to the Dead. Here, during more than a thousand years, were carried Kings and Chiefs, even from the far-off shores of Norway, with other men of high and low degree, that their bodies might mingle with the dust of the Holy Isle. And close beyond the Reilig Odhrain, a little to the north-east, and nearly opposite to the western front of the cathedral church, there is a natural hillock of rock, but covered on most sides by turf, which is perhaps the most interesting spot upon Iona. From its isolated position—from its close proximity to St. Odhrain chapel, and to the ancient place of sepulture—from its rising beside the old path which runs along the foot of the rocky hills, and divides them from the cultivated grounds—from the splendid view it commands over the sacred objects close at hand, over the sloping fields, the Sound, the opposite coast, and the distant mountains,—this knoll must have been a favourite resort of all the generations of men who have lived and worshipped on Iona. Tradition, too, has faithfully preserved in its Gaelic name the identity of the spot. It is called the "Torr-Abb," or the "Abbot's Knoll." I cannot doubt that it is "the little hill" respecting which Adamnan tells us, perhaps, the most remarkable anecdote in his account of Columba's life. On the last day of that life, being now very infirm, Columba, we are told, ascended a "little hill" (Monticellulum) which overlooked the Monastery; and here, standing up for a short time upon the top, and lifting up both his hands, he blessed his now long-adopted home, and he pronounced this prophecy on its fame: "Unto this place, albeit so small and poor, great homage shall yet be paid, not only by the Kings and people of the Scots, but by the rulers of barbarous and distant nations, with their people also. In great veneration, too, shall it be held by the holy men of other churches." Considering that this prophetic benediction was recorded within the lifetime of men who had seen Columba, and considering the long course of later centuries through which it has been literally fulfilled, we cannot doubt that this is one of the many instances in which men who have left their mark upon the world have exhibited a proud and grateful consciousness of the life they were yet to live when dead, in the memory of mankind.

Standing on this old rocky mound, we can re-animate the scene with very tolerable correctness, as it must have appeared in Columba's life. It is certain that the buildings of his time were all of wood. Probably some external plaster covered the timbers and the wattled walls of which they were constructed. Like all other works of man, the edifices in which we live, and those also in which we worship, have had their forms determined by a process of development—that is to say, by gradual modifications of rude and early types. It is exceedingly probable that in the very old and ruined stone chapels of the Highlands we see something not unlike the shape and proportions of the wooden structures of the Columban age. The form is that of a low and simple quadrangular building with steep roof. The brethren of the community lived each in separate huts or "cells," constructed of the same materials. There was some provision for strangers, who often, though not probably in great numbers at one time, were attracted to the place. There was a refectory for the common meal. Columba's own abode was erected on a rising ground above the rest. Some brethren attended to the cattle, to the milking of cows on distant pastures, and to bringing home the produce in closed wooden vessels carried upon horseback. Others tilled the soil for the raising of oats and barley. There seems to have been an abundant dairy, a well-stored granary, and by no means a deficient larder. The island now supports upwards of 200 cows and heifers, 140 younger "beasts," about 600 sheep and lambs, 25 horses, and some three-score of the pachyderms so dear to all the children of Erin. It grows also a considerable quantity of grain. But even these resources, ample as they might seem to be, were not enough for the growing number of the Columban monastery. Very soon royal grants of neighbouring islands made them tributary to the sustenance of the Abbot and his brethren, and foremost among these came the productive corn-bearing soil and the rich pastures of Tyree. Fish were abundant and could be obtained at all seasons. The large flounders of the sound of Iona are still an important item in the diet of its people. The rocks and islets all around swarmed with Seals, and their flesh seems to have been a favourite article of food. Their oil, also, doubtless supplied the light with which, during many long winter evenings, Columba pored over his manuscripts of the sacred text, or performed midnight services before the altar. With all these various occupations there must have been constant life and movement both on land and sea. Nor must we forget Columba's own frequent embarkations—sometimes only in little boats to cross the Sound, or to visit those adjacent islands, some of which were soon colonised from the parent Monastery; sometimes in larger vessels, starting on some distant expedition, to preach among the heathen Picts. Columba and his brethren must have been skilled and hardy seamen. How often from this very hill must the monks have watched for their Abbot's returning bark—rounding the red rocks of Mull from the southward, or speeding with longer notice of approach from the north. From the same spot, we may be sure, has Columba often watched the frequent sail—now from one quarter, now from another, bringing strange men on strange errands, or old familiar friends to renew the broken intercourse of youth. Hither came holy men from Erin to take counsel with the Saint on the troubles of clans and monasteries which were still dear to him. Hither came also bad men red-handed from blood and sacrilege to make confession and do penance at Columba's feet. Hither, too, came Chieftains to be blessed, and even Kings to be ordained—for it is curious that on this lonely spot, so far distant from the ancient centres of Christendom, took place the first recorded case of a temporal sovereign seeking what appears to have been very like formal consecration from a minister of the Church. Adamnan, as usual, connects his narrative of this event, which took place in 547, with miraculous circumstances and with Divine direction in his selection of Aidan, one of the early Kings of the Irish Dalriadic colony in Scotland.* The fame of Columba's supernatural powers attracted many and strange visitors to the shores on which we are now looking. Nor can we fail to remember, with the Reilig Odhrain at our feet, how often the beautiful galleys of that olden time came up the Sound laden with the Dead, "their dark freight a vanished life." A grassy mound not far from the present landing-place is known as the spot on which bodies were laid when they were first carried to the shore. We know from the account of Columba's own burial that the custom was to wake the body with the singing of psalms during three days and nights before laying it to its final rest. It was then borne in solemn procession to the grave. How many of such processions must have wound along the path that leads to the Reilig Odhrain! How many fleets of galleys must have ridden at anchor on that bay below us, with all those expressive signs of mourning which belong to ships, when Kings and Chiefs who had died in distant lands were carried hither to be buried in this holy Isle! From Ireland, from Scotland, and from distant Norway, there came, during many centuries, many royal funerals to its shores. And at this day by far the most interesting remains upon the Island are the curious and beautiful tombstones which lie in the Reilig Odhrain. They belong, indeed, even the most ancient of them, to an age removed by many hundred years from Columba's time. But they represent the lasting reverence which his name has inspired during so many generations, and the desire of a long succession of Chiefs and warriors through the Middle Ages and down almost to our own time, to be buried in the soil where he had trod.

ON THE COLOUR OF AERIAL BLUE.†

It may be supposed that in considering the conditions upon which, as it seems to me, the aerial blue of the sky and landscape depends, I ought also to refer to such collateral subjects as the colour of blue in the sea, or in the region of clouds; but this I must do very briefly, as, in both these cases, colour is dependent upon many circumstances, the consideration of each of which would require to be entered upon separately, while it is not so with the colour of blue in the sky and the landscape, the occurrence in

* Reeve's "Adamnan," p. 197-2, and notes

† Read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

Such bodies as rain, mist, escaped steam, or aqueous vapours, do not meet the conditions under which the colour of aerial blue is formed, but smoke of the more gaseous kinds, and free from sooty admixture, being to a certain extent transparent, does so, and, as we shall see, is fitted to serve as an illustration, though imperfectly, of the subject of the following remarks.

What light is, has not, I believe, been fully discovered, but whence it is derived we know in so far as our system is concerned. Streaming from the sun, it travels unseen through space, dark as night, until coming in contact with matter, it is revealed in its power to illuminate—to generate and support life—and as the agent by whose potent ministry is produced all that we now rejoice in as pleasant to the sight and good for food.

Light is the source of colour, and when decomposed is seen to consist of three elementary constituents, namely, red, blue, and yellow, the infinite variety of local tints which we see in the world around being but modifications of these three as they more or less influence each other, singly or in combination.

No surface in the absence of light possesses colour, and the complexion of any substance when exposed to the sun shows what amount of power it has to absorb or reject certain rays: where this power is great we have intensity of colour, where it is weak we have paleness; and were there no other element influencing the aspect of external nature we should find ourselves in a world hard and sharply defined, having objects in the most distant parts pronounced in all their details of form and colour with equal force to those which are near; and the whole devoid of that sweetly modifying middle tint which we see prevailing everywhere, harmonizing all, and so gently soothing to the mind and eye. This beneficent quality we possess in our atmosphere, constituted as it is to transmit light pure and white as it comes from the sun.

Atmosphere, without vapour, and with the sun at noon, is full of white light. Various examples show this. If, for instance, we range our eye from the zenith to the horizon, the azure blue, so deep overhead gradually becomes paler as the eye moves downwards, until, in the extreme distance, it has merged nearly all its colour in whiteness. Were the blue of the sky resident in our atmosphere, we should expect to find that where the atmosphere was most compressed—which it is on the surface of the earth—the colour would be deepest; but the reverse of this is the case, as the blue nearly all disappears from it as it nears the horizon.

The accompanying diagram will show this more clearly. Suppose A A to be a section of the circumference of the globe, and B B the overlying atmosphere. A spectator standing at c, and looking up towards D, looks through the most limited portion of air—forty or fifty miles—as viewed from that point; but turning either to the right or left in the direction of E F G, the lengthening lines indicate the increasing amount of space filled with light through which his eye ranges, and, to which has to be added, the increasing density of the atmospheric medium as it approaches the earth's surface.

Again: Directing our view to a range of mountains capped with snow, and distant twenty, thirty, or forty miles—such as the Oberland seen from the terrace at Berne—we find that, though the space through which we look is so great in extent, and composed of the densest part of our atmosphere, the white of the snow when the sun shines upon it seems entirely unchanged in its purity, while the parts of the mountain range uncovered with snow, and the shadows on the snow-clad parts themselves, are of an azure blue.

Further: No white object, seen at whatever distance, is, with the sun-light upon it, at all affected in its purity as white, while every other colour in the same relation is more or less so, we are thus led to the conclusion that, as white alone remains unchanged under the conditions we have stated, the atmo-

Alpine climbers tell us that the higher they ascend toward the mountain-top the deeper the colour of the sky becomes, until, arriving at a height where respiration has become difficult, they find that the vault above, which at the base of the mountain seemed of so lovely a blue, now appears to the eye of an oppressive black, the change being due to this, that, the higher the traveller ascends the less is the amount of atmosphere interposed between him and the absolute darkness outside this thin veil encircling our globe.

The colour of azure blue is not peculiar to the region of the sky, as the same cause produces the same effect through the whole of external nature, giving rise to those sweet gradations and harmonizing tints, which—like charity in the relations of life—bring all discordant things into a softened unity, seen by all, and felt by all, though as a cause, recognised perhaps by few.

Let us look to yonder mountain-range we left but a few hours ago, after wandering over steps of trap, and among braes of heather and fern, where the musical stream sings in the deep gorge its song to the wakeful aspen; and what do we see there? Nothing but a mantle of blue enveloping those varied features which in the morning gave such a charm to the rough hill-side, while we wandered over it. Now, however, twenty miles of atmosphere intervene, and the change we see is due to this cause. Suppose we travel back and examine the gradual unrobing. First, as we return, shortening our distance, comes out from the mantle of blue the lightest of the local colours—grass withered on the steep slopes, and bleached rocks lightened by the sun. Next, as we advance, those of a more positive kind; the purple heather, the bright orange of the withered fern, the decomposed rock with its hues of russet and chrome, while the grim trap, and the darkly shaded ravines maintain their hold of their azure investment until we reach within a mile or so, when, gradually, they too are unveiled, and we wander once more among lichen-covered rocks, and crisp oak woods, with all that charm of rich and varied under-growth which gave us so much pleasure before. From this stand-point let us cast our eyes along the long range of retreating hills, with their edgy crests and softened bases, and, as they retire, mark the gradually increasing shade of blue tinging the darker portions of their rugged structure; the scarps, and clefts, and shady hollows, until, in the distance, the whole has mellowed into one uniform hue, and dark mountain masses are seen to assume the colour, and the filmy impalpable look of the bright blue sky, rivalling, sometimes, the latter in its cerulean lustre. Suppose we leave the mountain spur on which, in thought, we now stand, and fancy ourselves transported to those blue hills seen far away. What shall we find there? Nothing but surfaces jagged and rough, and clothed in all respects like those we have left, while, seen from thence, these latter have assumed in their turn the radiant hue of the bright blue sky.

The darker the local colour of the landscape is, the more speedily and decidedly is its colour affected by the interposing air. In the Isle of Skye, for example, the range of the Cuchullins shows this strikingly in the black hypersthene formations composing the mountains in that wild district. Standing at Scurm-a-Gillean and looking towards Blabhein, the dark, rugged mass of the latter appears of the deepest blue. Two hours' walk transfers the point of view to Blabhein, from whence looking back towards Scurm-a-Gillean, we find that this has now assumed the azure tint; the intervening eight miles of air being sufficient to change, in either case, the black corrugated mountain mass into a form of deepest blue.

In countries where the air is dry, and free from vapour, the vault above looks vastly expanded, while objects below look hard in their outline, and very delusive as to their seeming distance. The pure air being thin in body, is comparatively weak in overcoming the darkness of far-off space, or modifying the sharp details of forms on the earth beneath.

This other appearance may be often seen. A grey, unbroken cloud, over-arching like a roof, stretches away into the distance, throwing the remote mountains into deepest shadow, which the intervening air and sun-light beyond change into intense aerial blue. Such an effect is not unfrequently seen from the castle at Stirling. Looking across the level plain towards the Grampians, the picturesque range from Benlomond to Benvoirlich seems, in such circumstances, a belt of blue clipped from the summer sky, while in the lift above no blue is to be seen, but below and between, the undulating land has the look of the billowy sea, each dark retreating curve having its quota of relative blue, until merged in the flickering, palpitating bases of the shadowy hills, thirty miles away.

The blue of the sea is due mainly to the cause we have been considering, though perhaps also to others in particular circumstances. Still, as a rule, it will be found that the colour in this, as in the instances we have referred to, is to be attributed not to the colour as residing in the water, but as an effect produced upon the water's surface under the conditions I shall now specify.

When undisturbed by wind, the face of the sea is simply a mirror reflecting the aspect of the sky at the time, but, when broken up by a passing breeze, the consequent rippling motion is composed of an infinite number of waves, or wavelets, each having several distinct facets, with some of which it reflects the light and colour of the sky, while in others the light is refracted so as to show a tint darkish in hue, and deepening towards the crest, where it becomes sharply black. The infinite multiplicity of these tiny and varied forms diffused on the broad surface of the ocean appear to the eye one uniform shadow, increased, sometimes, by a passing cloud, and when seen from the coast margin,—the horizon in this case being limited, as to distance, from the dip of the sea,—the colour is merely a bluish grey; but when the horizon is extended by increasing the altitude of the point-of-view, this bluish grey becomes more distinctly blue, and if seen from a still greater height of a tender azure, the increase of intervening air through which the eye now looks being sufficient to produce these various results. The level horizon of the sea has not the range of space which mountains towering above this level possess; consequently we seldom see, even when looking from an elevated position, the colour of the sea so blue as that of mountains farther removed when under the same conditions of air and weather.

In the region of clouds this colour likewise prevails; not, however, in the burnished cirri, nor in those of diaphanous texture, with the light shining through, is it seen; but on the shady side of the massive cumuli when the evening sun-light falls slanting upon their snowy and seemingly solid forms. The gorgeous shapes of cloud-land—gigantic cliffs, castles in the air—grotesque suggestions of sublunary things, fluctuating and fleeting, receive light and give shadow with the apparent compactness of substance belonging to their prototypes on earth; each shadow having, according to its depth and distance, its amount of relative blue; and as layer after layer retires into the distance, so great in proportion does the likeness in hue and tone of the shadow become to that of the sky itself.

Analogous to this, but with smoke as a medium, we find similar results proceeding from less perfect causes, namely, a dark body seen through a white and semi-transparent one, producing in sun-light the colour of aerial blue. Observe this smoke,—not the murky discharge from the coal-fires of busy factories, offending the sight and polluting the air with clouds of unconsumed carbon,—but the gaseous exhalations rising on quiet moorlands, when the cottager's fire of wood or of peat has been lit for preparing the morning meal. As it rises from the chimney embowered in its dark greenwood, the smoke seems white and partially opaque; but, gradually diffusing itself in filmy expansion, it becomes bluer and bluer as its body becomes thinner, until, widely spread, it covers as with a veil of azure gauze the softened texture of the landscape. Look also for a moment at this fire smouldering on the moor itself, and mark what takes place. While the smoke has for its background the dark brown turf, it is blue; rising higher, it is seen against the white-washed wall of a cottage, and it is of a palish brown. Then, again, as it mounts upwards and is seen against the dark hill-side, the blue is restored; and, finally, the sky, against which it is ultimately seen, brings back the delicate brown.

Here the smoke rises against four separate backgrounds, two dark and two light; against the dark it seems blue, and against the light a delicate brown, while the smoke itself remains unchanged in everything except its relation to the foil, or background against which it is seen.

Without multiplying examples which might easily be adduced, we come to the conclusion that this intangible aerial blue, which forms our sky, and is so important an element in giving harmony to the landscape, is a relative colour, owing its existence, not, like those which are local and positive, to the breaking up of the sun's light and appropriation or rejection of certain portions of its rays, but, as it seems to me, solely to the mingling of the whiteness of light with the darkness of space—of the deep blackness of the latter as seen through the clear transparency of the former. These two elements, thus simply combined, reveal to our loving gaze the body of heaven in its clearness—the sapphire radiance enveloping the throne of Him who dwelleth in light, and who hath made all these things.

"The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy-work. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard."

CARMINA NUPTIALE.*

PART I.

WEDDED LOVE.

THIS little spring of life, that feeds the root
 Of England's greatness, giveth, underground,
 Bloom to the Flower, freshness to the Fruit ;
 Then wells and spreads, with golden ripples round,
 In circling glory to a sea of might,
 Embracing Home and Country of our love :
 Half-mirroring the beauty beyond sight—
 Taking some likeness of the abode above.

THE WEDDING.

All Women love a Wedding! old
 Or youthful ; Mother, Widow, or Wife :
 It lights with precious gleam of gold
 The river of poorest life :

For one, the gold is far and dim ;
 For one, a glimpse of things to be ;
 But here it sparkles, at the brim
 Of full felicity !

And they will cluster by the way ;
 Crowd at this Eden-gate, with eyes
 That run, and pray that this pair may Keep their new Paradise.

Green is the garden, as at first ;
 As smiling-blue the happy skies,
 Where float the bubble-worlds that burst,
 And leave us smarting eyes.

They seem to think that these must clasp
 The jewel turned to dew or mist :
 The glamour they could never grasp,
 Tho' wedded lips have kissed ;

That this gold Apple of promise, crown'd
 With redness on the sunny side ;
 Will gradually grow ripe all round ;
 That this new Lover and Bride

Must reach the breathing Magic Rose
 Such cunning Spirits hold in air,
 On which our fingers could not close,
 Even when we knew 'twas there !

This nest of hopes shall bring forth young Unto the brooding heart's low call—
 Not merely pretty birds'-eggs, strung
 To hide a naked wall !

Al! many start thus, hand-in-hand—
 Few only reach the blessed goal ;
 But these shall surely see the land
 Hid somewhere in the soul ?

And delicate airs creep sweetly through
 Old bridal-chambers dusty and dim :
 Down from a far heaven warm and blue,
 The mellow splendours swim.

The Woman's eyes grow loving wet ;
 They dazzle with the morning ray :
 The Woman's longing will beget
 Her own dear wedding-day !

In his network of wrinkles, Age
 May veil their virgin beauties now ;
 Faces be furrowed—a strange page
 Of writing on the brow :

The smiling soul cannot erase
 The sad life-lines it shines above ;
 Yet, imaged in the dear old face,
 You see their own young love !

The sleeping Beauty wakes anew
 Beneath the touch of tender tears ;
 The Flower unfolds, to drink the dew,
 That seem'd dead for years.

All hearts are as a grove of birds
 Spring-toucht and chirruping every one ;
 And each will set the Wedding-Words
 To a music of her own.

Some withered remnant of old bliss
 Flushing on faded cheeks they bring,
 Telling of times when Love's young kiss
 Was a fire-offering ;

And spirits walk in white, as starts
 This bridal-tint that blooms anew ;
 And so, with all their Woman-hearts,
 They fling Good Luck's old shoe !

SERENADE.

'Awake, sweet Love, for Heaven is awake !
 And waiting to be gracious for thy sake !
 All night I saw thy fairness gleam afar
 With fresh, pure sparkle of the Morning-Star :
 Awake my Love, and let the veil be drawn
 From Beauty bath'd at the springs of Dawn.

'Awake, sweet Love, for Heaven is awake,
 And waiting to be gracious for thy sake.
 A touch upon some silver-sounding string,
 As all the harps of bliss were vibrating
 Within me, woke me, bade me rise and say
 "Awake, my Love, this is our wedding-day."

'Awake, sweet Love, for Heaven is awake,
 And waiting to be gracious for thy sake.
 It is the tender time when turtle-doves
 Begin to murmur of their vernal loves :
 Spirits that all night nestled in the flowers Shake perfume from their wings this hour of hours.

'Awake, sweet Love, for Heaven is awake,
 And waiting to be gracious for thy sake.
 To feel thee mine my faith is large enough,
 And yet the miracle needs continual proof !
 One minute satisfied, the next I pine
 For just one more assurance thou art mine.

'Awake, sweet Love, for Heaven is awake,
 And waiting to be gracious for thy sake.
 Thy presence sets my cloudland round about Glowing as heaven were turning inside out.
 And all the mists that darkened me erewhile
 Are smitten into splendours at thy smile.

'Awake, sweet Love, for Heaven is awake,
 And waiting to be gracious for thy sake.
 Our great sunrise of life begins to glow,
 And all the buds of love are ripe to blow ;
 And all the Birds of Bliss are gaily singing,
 And all the bridal-Bells of Heaven are ringing.'

HEROES OF HEBREW HISTORY.

BY THE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

VIII.—MOSES.

"It shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light" (Zech. xiv. 7). The working of God in Time is evermore, from generation to generation, the fulfilment of this promise. It is when the hour is darkest, when sorrow is heaviest, when hope is dying, when the clouds are thickest, and the hollow moaning of the voice of despair is beginning to awake upon the dull night breeze—it is then that He interferes to whom Time is not, save as the setting wherein He has been pleased to place His work.

So it was, eminently, when Moses was born to be the deliverer of the children of Israel. The darkness of the clouds which veiled their sky hardly could gather into a deeper blackness. They had long lost the peaceful security of the land of Goshen. There they had multiplied with the unusual increase God had promised to their great forefathers, until they became a terror to the jealous people among whom they tarried. The fame of the great Vizier of their race, before whom Egypt had bowed, had passed away. The internal troubles of the land, the changes of dynasties, and the vicissitudes of events had almost swept away his memory, and long ago another king had arisen who knew not Joseph. What if these Syrian herdsmen were to join with some Arab tribe and subjugate the whole land? This was the ruling terror, and it must be guarded against with all the subtlety of Egyptian policy. One of these guards was found in depressing them to the rank of slaves; in breaking up their sense of independence and nationality, and thus bowing the neck betimes. Another resource was to reduce their numbers by the slaughter of their male children. Both were practised. To the eye of sense the old promise seemed dying out. The fertility of which it spoke had brought their doom upon them, whilst a slavish heart was rapidly being bred within their bosoms. The leeks and the cucumbers, the flesh-pots and the abundance of their store—for these they were growing to long; and their softened, debased spirits bowed to the oppressor's rod, and did, with an abject obedience which their rugged ancestors would have spurned, the foreign tyrant's bidding.

There is no harder task for any man than to rouse up again into life such an expiring national spirit. Woe to him who attempts it, and wavers or fails in his endeavour—the oppressor's utter hatred, and a timid and treacherous abandonment by those whom he has stirred only to bring on them a heavier servitude, is his inevitable end.

This was to be the work of the son of Amram; for this he was born of the family of Levi; for this God's electing purpose had from eternity designated him; for this, in time, God's providence wrought in secret ways to fit, furnish, and perfect his servant. He to whom all things are open, saw that the time was come in which His promise to Abraham should begin to stir towards its fulfilment. He knew that the character of the reigning Pharaoh was that which, by the mingling of obstinacy and fear, was tempered to be the passive instrument of His high designs, and so provided in Moses the fit agent of His will. As under Joseph the family had grown into a tribe, so under Moses the tribe was to be raised into a republic. The formation of such a character as was needful for the fulfilment of the leader's after-work required a long and most varied fashioning—we may read it in the lines of the prophet's life.

Saved from the destruction of the male children of his tribe by an incident familiar to Egyptian life, and a caprice characteristic of an Eastern woman, Moses is brought up as the son of Pharaoh's daughter. For forty years this was his life. In the simple record of his own narrative it is compressed into fifteen verses of the second chapter of Exodus. In the great argument of St. Stephen (Acts vii. 20—29) his brief history swells out into striking facts as to which his humility kept him silent. Thus we read, besides the simple and exquisitely pathetic record of Exodus, speaking across the chasm of three thousand years in whispered words to which every mother's heart still responds, "She saw the child, and the babe wept, and she had compassion on him," that he was "exceeding fair;" thus we read, too, that "he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and deeds."

If we turn from this brief narrative of Holy Writ to what Jewish, Moslem, Heathen, and even Christian legends have recorded of these forty years, the story, keeping the same general outline of fact, expands again marvellously on every side; tradition, according to its wont, playing halo-like in many-coloured hues around the single point of truth. Thus we are told that on the night of his birth all the idols in Egypt were cast down (Weil, "Bible, Koran, and Talmud," p. 96), and that this portent roused the Egyptian priests to seek to destroy the new-born deliverer, of whose advent and mighty deeds they had been already warned by prophetic intimation. "One of the slaves of the daughters of Israel," so ran the warning, "will bear a son, who shall hurl thee and thy people unto the lowest abyss" (Weil, 92). Thus again, to the Scripture record of the beauty of his infant countenance, described both in the Acts and in the Epistle to the Hebrews by a word applied to none beside himself in the New Testament, Josephus adds that it was such that those who met him on the road were forced to turn again, leaving their business behind them, that they might gaze upon him, whilst yet beyond this is added the account that the Pharaoh's daughter who looked at him in the ark was cured at once of the plague of leprosy from which she had long suffered, and the single cure is expanded into that of three of the king's daughters. Then when he is rescued, he refuses the milk of the Egyptian nurse his foster-mother had provided. For "shall the lips which are to speak with the Shekinah touch that which is unclean?" (Weil, 101).

Who, in Egyptian history, the Pharaoh's daughter was it is not easy to decide, though an ingenious threading together of hieroglyphs and history leads Mr. Osburn to believe that she may be identified with Thouris, daughter of Sesostris, king of Upper Egypt, married by her father, from ambitious motives, to Siphtha, the infant king of Lower Egypt, in whose name she administered the kingdom. Her going down to the sacred river was to fulfil certain sacred rites which her position required at her hands; her ready adoption of the beautiful Hebrew infant a natural result of the childlessness of her enforced wedlock. Thus the "being called the son of Pharaoh's daughter" involved for Moses more than a mere introduction into the royal palace of old Egypt. It was the design of the foster-mother to breed him up as her successor in her royal dignity.

Wilder legends yet paint the Egyptian life and exploits of the future lawgiver. His youth, spent in the midst of dangers from the caprice and jealousy of Pharaoh, grows up into a manhood of early power, and even glory. Not only is he learned in all the lore of the then centre of the old world's civilisation, but he becomes at Heliopolis, Oarsiph, the Priest of On, and leads successful armies into Ethiopia.

This reach of his life terminates, in sacred history and legendary lore, at about the age of forty years, and with events generally alike, at least in outline.

He was great, learned, and powerful. There lay before him a future of unlimited earthly splendour. He had the burning aspirations which belong to genius. What would be his course? All the purposes of God for the family of Abraham, all the mighty promises for man which hung on that election, seemed to tremble on the issue of his choice. If he yielded to the temptations of a worldly ambition and chose the throne of the Pharaohs, Israel would become, as other tribes already had become, incorporate with Egypt, the separation of the family of God lost, and the evil world triumphant. But so it was not to be. Already, as a typical fulfilment of a yet greater calling, it was to be accomplished in Moses, "Out of Egypt have I called my son." The Spirit of God brooded on the heaving waters of his yet unenlightened heart. His natural ambition took, under that mysterious moving, a higher tone. Faith in his fathers' God began to struggle within him for the mastery. Was he, a son of Abraham, the friend of the personal God, to sink down into the defiling superstition of Egyptian idolatry? Was he to forget the holy seed, and mingle himself altogether with the family of Mizraim? Was the bond that held him to his princely foster-mother as strong as that which bound him to the seed of Israel? So the Spirit of the Lord whispered to his inward ear, and he hearkened to it. "He went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens." The old hieroglyphics help us to realise the scene. In them we see fixed in yet remaining figures, the hard and bitter toil of the enslaved sons of Jacob toiling in the brick-field beneath their Egyptian overlookers, who are armed with rods of chastisement, and are exacting without pity the labours which were designed quite as much to bow the spirit and even reduce the numbers of the serfs as to add to the riches of their masters.

It was a great and noble choice that he was led to make when he "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

Herein, doubtless, that divine germ of faith, which was struggling for its birth within his great but as yet unpurged heart, was reaching forth far beyond his own consciousness. Already as it was read by the All-discerning Eye to which all things future are ever present, he was, like another great spirit after him, "counting all things but loss that he might win Christ;" for "he esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward." No treasure cities, with all the countless stores which the magnificence of old kings had heaped up in them, could compare, in a soul once touched by God, with the possession of Him as its portion, to whom already, in all its darkness, its every aspiration pointed. Yet in that heart, chaotic strivings still wrought together with an undirected violence. There had been formed within it great volumes of power: he was thoroughly conscious of their presence; and as he mused upon the debased condition of his people, he felt himself impelled to be their deliverer. The breath of the divine impulse fell upon him, mingled with, or for the time seemed lost in, the storm of a mere earthly ambition. Uncalled, uncommissioned, unstrengthened, he yields himself unconsciously to the divine leading, consciously to the impulses of his own great heart. The favoured son of the servile race goes out from his palace ease and mingles himself with the sorrows of the oppressed. He has but a doubtful welcome. Slavery is an utterly debasing element in human life—debasing both to the master and to the slave. Fear, suspicion, jealousy, meanness—these are bred, as evil creatures breed in filth and darkness, in the slave's heart. They dare not, they will not understand their champion; and when he rescues even by violence a suffering brother from the tyranny of the Copt, and in doing the act of liberation with the inherited vehemence of a son of Levi, slays the Egyptian, he only awakes against himself the murmurs of his tribe, and is driven by their narrow-hearted and obstinate rejection of their prince to fly from Egypt.

That flight from Egypt had in it the elements of faith. For it was "by faith he forsook Egypt; not fearing the wrath of the king, for he endured as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. xi. 27). "By faith," beginning to teach him that not by his high place in Egypt, that not by his learning, that not by his power or might or resolution, but that by God's arm, in God's way, at God's time, the deliverance he longed to work, but had so failed in working, should be accomplished. He left the mighty unfulfilled design, which with too great human heat he had sought to accomplish, in the hand of God, and at the leading of His providence abandoned all his high designs to bury himself afar from all the stir of Egypt's life in the life of a wanderer and an exile. He seeks a shelter in the land of Midian amongst the Abrahamic tribes sprung from Keturah, and instead of the busy life of a courtier, a politician, and a tribune of the people, he associates himself to the pastoral pursuits of the dwellers on those Sinaitic ranges, which would support no larger animals than the flocks of their innumerable sheep. The natural sinking of that bounding spirit must have been profound. Hopes suddenly dashed; high desires burnt out and choked in the deadness of their own ashes, the sadness of separation from his brethren, the aimless uselessness of what he had dreamed of making a more than imperial life, all lay heavy on him. The name of his first-born son still mourns on our ear, charged with the record of this utter sorrow. "Zipporah bare him a son, and he called his name Gershom (Banishment), for he said, I have been a stranger in a strange land" (Exod. ii. 22).

Yet it was not all sorrow. It was a sharp discipline through which he was passing, but it was the discipline of God. We may even read its progress in the name he gives to his second son. There is a certain tinge of bitterness in the "Banishment" which breathes through the name of Gershom; but in Eliezer, the second, "My God is an help," we may measure something of what he had learned whom God was training. That fiery Levite spirit was being duly tempered; that longing to use for the redressing of wrong the arm of flesh was being curbed; that lofty estimate of what his natural powers, his high attainments, and his pride of place might enable him to accomplish, was being brought down to the far stronger basis of a self-distrusting humility. What a training it was:—with the half-stranger wife, unable even to the end to enter with wife-like sympathy into his deepest life and greatest hopes;—following the almost self-guided steps of the flocks of Jethro;—mounting with them as the summer heat increased from the lower valleys high up into the roots of the great peaks of that stony range;—listening to the unceasing voice of the crumbling rocks as in that silent air their roaring fall echoed through the stillness of the day ;—communing with his own heart and with his God ;—hardly daring to look back at the past, and having before him no revealed future ; his life suddenly shut in by bars as close as those with which the ribs of the mountains closed the ever-narrowing valley ! Had it been his own rash, impetuous zeal which had led to such an issue ? Might he not have stirred to fiercer heat the Coptic jealousy and hatred towards Israel ? Might he not by this uncommanded act of violence have put back their deliverance, and checked the present development of the merciful purposes of God for them ? Dark thoughts like these, heavy-faced and threatening in their presages, would close in upon him in the waste places of the wilderness, and threaten to bow down utterly his spirit. What a discipline it all was ; what a preparation ; what a strengthening of the will ; what a beating down of self ; what a realisation of God ! How in after years, when again he trod the same paths, but with the thousands of Israel to guide instead of the few sheep in the wilderness, must he have looked back on those days ! How would every familiar mountain scene, with its marvellous power of imbibing and returning to us the long-past life, remind him of those years of meditation, prayer, and silence, and again and again amidst the murmuring of the stiff-necked people how must it have animated his fainting heart for new acts of faith, patience, and daring !

In the midst of this life which had spread its level, unvarying outline over forty years, the call of God suddenly aroused him. For four hundred years that voice had not, it seems, been heard within the chosen family. Since the death-bed of Jacob, prophecy had been dumb. The family of promise grew, multiplied, abounded, but no voice from God visited them, no breath of heavenly inspiration stirred the sleeping chords of their tribal being. In the wilderness of Midian, at the foot of that great mountain of Horeb which was to be hereafter “the mount of God,” the old dry river-courses filled again with the heavenly stream ; the old voice which had called Abraham, and directed Isaac and comforted Jacob amidst his many troubles, woke up to give his great commission to Moses. The strange sight of the thorn-tree of the desert, instinct with fire and unconsumed, at once invited the curious investigation of the man to whom Egyptian science had opened all the then known secrets of nature. “I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt” (Exod. iii. 3). But as he draws near to gaze, a greater wonder than any which nature could display arrests his inmost spirit. Whether it was then given him to read the riddle of the sign we know not. Whether it was still to him but a burning bush, or whether in the dwarf thorn amidst the forest trees he read the form of suffering Israel, penetrated everywhere by the living fire of their fathers’ God, purifying but not consuming the race He was searching with His judgments and upholding in His love—whether then or afterwards his eye read that parable of providence, we know not ; but from that bush we know that the voice spake to him, called him by name ; bid him put aside in humble adoration the shoes from off his feet, and filled him with such a sense of holy awe that he sank astonished at the manifested presence of the God with whom these forty years he had been walking. He whose educated gaze had known no fear in looking at the strange natural phenomenon of the burning, unconsumed thorn, trembled to the centre of his being at this revelation of the nearness to him of God ; and “he hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God” (Exod. iii. 6).

Then to that awe-struck spirit was given the commission which with mere earthly heat he had reached out his hand to seize some forty years before. Now the sufferings of Israel were accomplished. God had heard their groaning, and looked upon them, and had respect unto them (Exod. ii. 24, 25). What words of wonder embodying, what stores of consolation for all after-generations of suffering humanity, until the last task-master is cast out, until the last son of Abraham is made free of all his inheritance, until Egypt has given up to Canaan the last weeping exile, are those of the deliverer’s commission !—“I have surely seen the affliction of my people—I have heard their cry, I know their sorrows” (Exod. iii. 7). This was the utterance of his fathers’ God to him who long ago had dreamed of delivering his brethren. And now the dream was to be fulfilled. For now had come the moment for which the manifold discipline of a life prolonged to eighty years had all along been preparing him. He was passing through that great crisis which every life that yields itself consciously to God must in some mode or other experience. With him it was gathered up unto an awful suddenness of act and sharpness of feature. Doubtless he had known from a tradition, which four hundred years could not destroy, the being and the name of the God of Abraham. Doubtless, through his wandering in Midian, his spirit had been learning the secret of communing with its unseen Lord. But all this had been as the twilight to the sunrise. He had heard of his God by the hearing of the ear, but now his eye saw Him—the “I Am.” The “I Am,” the everlasting, self-existent, Almighty God, stood beside him; called him by his name; stood beside him a person by a person; manifested Himself by words of wonder, by signs of power, by revealed purposes of love. Moses passed through that awful crisis, and he was another man. The sage learned in all Egyptian lore; the great soul mighty in word and deed; the deep philosophic intellect furnished with all transmitted wisdom, trained in all school subtleties, practised by the often-handling of great affairs, ripened into mellowness by solitude, nature, and self-converse—these remained; but on them all had passed a mighty change. Just as there settles down upon the mountain’s brow the wreath of the morning mist, investing every peak and pinnacle and crag with the glow and the glory of the molten sunlight which has drenched its folds, so on them had settled down the glory of the Lord, transmuting the earthly into the heavenly, raising the intellectual into the spiritual, making the man of power into the man of God, the noble philosophic patriot into the prophet of the Lord. His soul’s eye had, indeed, seen the King, the Lord of Hosts. He receives at once his commission: and how different now from what it once had been is the voice of that trained heart! Instead of “supposing,” uncommissioned, that “his brethren would have understood how that God, by his hand, would deliver them” (Acts vii. 25); now, even with the direct commission which interpreted to him and authorised all the long-cherished aspirations of his soul; with the “Come now, therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people, the children of Israel, out of Egypt” (Exod. iii. 10)—he shrinks back with a humbled sense of his own unfitness for being God’s instrument. “Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?” The long training had done its work. The heated iron of his natural impetuosity had been hardened in those cold waters of his banishment, and the tempered steel was fitted for the mighty enterprise for which God would wield it. The path by which he is led is wonderful even to himself. The name of God has been revealed to him; the promise of God’s presence has been made sure; his bashful self-distrust turns into a growing confidence in his God; and at last, as one who trembles at the venture, and yet fears still more to disobey, he accepts the high commission, and prepares to be and do and suffer whatsoever the Heavenly Wisdom shall have ordered for him.

One other merciful assistance is granted to him before he is called on to endure the last appalling trial of his courage—his standing before Pharaoh. Having left his wife, with her children, at his Midianitish home, he sets out from Jethro’s house, as forty years before he had come to it, a solitary man. But at the roots of Horeb he meets his elder brother Aaron, the future partner of his mighty cares. What a meeting it was! The great prophet lawgiver and the great high-priest of the future—with that gap of forty years in their lives to bridge over with long histories of the past, with the loving greetings of the present, with so much to tell and so much to hear, with such recitals of the wonders God had wrought already, such hopes from His great promises, such fears from the threatening aspect of the darkened sky, with its canopy of cloud, and all that it might contain for them in the unknown future. So they travel into Egypt, lonely wayfarers, with high resolves, with Egypt’s and Israel’s and the world’s future waiting on their course.

How simple is all truest greatness! Here is the whole record of that pregnant march: “Moses returned into the land of Egypt, and he took the rod of God in his hand” (Exod. iv. 20). “The rod of God”—what mysteries that name summed up! How did the presence of that rod mingle itself with all the chiefest wonders of the next forty years; with Pharaoh’s chastisement and death, with Egypt’s plagues, with Israel’s passage through the Red Sea, with the overthrow of Amalek, with the feeding of the multitude throughout the desert, with the water-springs which the rock of mystery should yield, with the prophet’s greatness and his fall, with Israel’s entrance into Canaan and the great leader’s exclusion from it! Surely here are mysteries connected with that rod greater than all which legend has babbled, though it has well-nigh wearied itself in its stories of that sign and instrument of power; tracing it up to man’s unfallen state in Paradise; recording its creation on the sixth day, its gift by God to Adam; bringing it with Adam through the gates of Eden as he passed a weeping exile under the flaming sword; and then carrying down the mystic gift through Enoch, Shem, Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph, to the house of Pharaoh; and thence carrying it with Jethro, then one of the king's chief magicians, to the wilderness of Midian, and so at last into the hand of Moses.

Thus he enters Egypt. The first work there is for the brothers to call together the heads of the family of Israel, and announce from God their coming deliverance. The suffering people hear with thankfulness that their God has remembered them, and "believe; and when they heard that the Lord had visited the children of Israel, and that He had looked upon their affliction, then they bowed their heads and worshipped" (Exod. iv. 31).

The next message of the prophet-messengers is to Pharaoh himself. Without reserve or fear they speak their summons, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go." The king's reply is the natural answer of an irritated self-will to such a summons. "Who is the Lord that I should obey his voice?" At once, from those lately stammering lips of the messenger of the King of kings, the voice of a sovereignty asserting its supremacy far above the throne of the haughty Pharaoh, spake out its warning, "The God of the Hebrews hath met with us,—let us go, lest He fall upon us with pestilence, or with the sword." And now the strife between Jehovah's messenger and the great earth king was indeed begun. So far as Moses was concerned, it would have been ended in an hour, if Pharaoh had dared to drown the prophet's voice in his blood. But such an act was prevented by the state of Egypt. It was shaken to the centre by the power of the Canaanitish population which had settled in it. Between these and their brethren across the desert there was such a living sympathy, that every great movement of the one vibrated through the other. Fear of the power of Israel, should it join in one of the many insurrections which had raised and subverted the Mizraim dynasties, had first led to the cruel oppression through which they might be bowed and subdued. To provoke them to immediate rebellion by violence towards their chief would have been a dangerous policy. For they might be succoured by the Syrian tribes who still, as the seed of Abraham, retained some ties of affinity with the children of the eldest branch of their now wide-spread family. Pharaoh therefore spared the life of Moses, but sought to alienate the children of Israel from him by making their yoke heavier, so that they might rise against him as having by his interference only increased their sufferings. To a great degree the deep device succeeded. The suffering people groaned to their deliverers, "Ye have made us to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and of his servants, to put a sword into their hand to slay us."

Here was for Moses the first experience of that utter unthankfulness in his brethren which so often in the forty years which followed made his life a burden to him. Yet this time so true was the complaint that he returned unto the Lord and said, "Wherefore hast Thou so evil entreated this people? Why is it that Thou hast sent me? for since I came to Pharaoh to speak in Thy name he hath done evil to this people, neither hast Thou delivered Thy people at all." To this intercession, as to so many afterwards from the prophet's mouth, the Lord hearkened; He renewed his promise: He raised the fainting spirit of His faithful servant, and He bared His arm against the persecutor.

Then began that series of ten plagues by which at the last Egypt and her king were bowed and conquered. They began, as all God's judgments do begin, in the muttered and distant thunder of the voice of warning; they passed next into the crash and peal of instant sentence: this, in its first execution, touched but lightly those who would not be warned; next it hemmed them round in ever-narrowing circles; until at last, in the death of the first-born, it closed indeed in blackness and desolation upon the very heart of Egypt.

Never once throughout this awful strife of the great earth king with the unseen Lord did His prophet faint or falter; condemned at first, then flattered and cajoled; then threatened, and at last driven with violence from the Royal presence, he, with a hand which never shook and with a voice which never trembled, stretched forth the rod of power and spake the word of judgment.

But when the conflict was over and the victory won, and Pharaoh and his host drowned in the depth of the sea, the trials of the great messenger rather began than ended. To lead forth indeed, as it was given him to do, a mob of slaves, debased as slavery only can debase humanity; sunk below the dead level of pagan Egyptian civilisation; to form them into a daring army, a free commonwealth, and a believing Church; to be exposed to all the ready and violent vicissitudes of their desires, and hopes, and fears, and so to have to suffer their manners in the wilderness; to have them upbraid him for their very deliverance when their sensual natures lusted after the flesh-pots of Egypt; to have them talk of stoning him when the wells were dry; to have them dispute with him for his command, and rebel against his rule; to have them break their covenant with Jehovah, and turn to the sacred calf of their old Egyptian oppressors—all this was such a burden as was never laid on any other. It was at times too heavy to bear: it was such that even from his deep-enduring, princely heart, when he "heard the people," in their grovelling sensuality because the heaven-sent manna was not flesh, "weeping throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent," it extorted the passionate cry unto the Lord, "Wherefore hast Thou afflicted Thy servant . . . that Thou layest all the burden of this people upon me? . . . Have I begotten all this people that Thou shouldst say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom?" (Num. xi. 10, 11.)

Yet such had been his training, such was the grace given to him, that but once throughout these weary forty years of daily-renewed trial and vexation did his faith fail. Most full of warning to those less tried by uttermost temptation is the history of that one fall. It suggests to us how the peculiar taint of our fallen nature may linger on, with an unsuspected presence, ready on any unwatchfulness to break out. The ignorant idea of Moses, formed upon the mistranslation of a word, calling him the meekest instead of the most enduring of men, is in direct contradiction of the whole character set before us in the Pentateuch. Impetuous ardour, asserting itself in even ill-considered action, is evidently the basis of his character, who set unsent about the task of delivering Israel, who slew the Egyptian, and put to flight the shepherds of Midian. Under this strong temptation his natural heat of spirit for once broke through the long-established control under which it had been brought. This is spoken of as the root of his offence. The ceaseless provocation of the rebellious people "angered Moses at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with him for their sakes: because they provoked his spirit so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips" (Ps. cvi. 32, 33). When anger ruled his heart, even his firm faith faded. The people were mad with thirst. God had bidden him speak unto the rock before their eyes, and promised that at his word it should give forth the needful supply of water. But for once he distrusted the command of God. He had known before this that the rod of God could bring forth water from the rock. Merely to speak and call for the hidden springs was a new and a yet stranger act of power. He looked upon the wild faces of the angry people; he felt the general murmur rising into a roar of madness; he heard the fierce cry of the leaders, "Wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt into this evil place, where there is no water to drink?" and for once his lion-heart sank within him. "What," unbelief whispered, "what if thou shouldst call, and call in vain?" And so, half doubting, and yet half believing, instead of speaking to the rock, he smote it twice with the rod, the power of which he had already proved. The faithful God would not forsake His servant even in that hour of his weakness. The waters in their deep spring-head obeyed the uncommanded summons, and gushed forth in abundance, and the people drank and were filled. But the sentence of the righteous Lord was spoken, "Because ye believed me not . . . therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them."

And so he, the greatest of the whole prophetic line, he to whom God spake as He spake to no other—he too fell. One only on the whole stalk of humanity unfolded into the perfect flower; one only, "the intercessor" for Moses, as Moses interceded for Israel, could say to the Father, "The Prince of this world cometh, and hath NOTHING in me."

Of that one Righteous Man amongst all the prophets, Moses was the chiefest type. The voice of God Himself declared his pre-eminence over all the prophetic line. "If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so. . . . With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold" (Num. xii. 6—8). All the deep meaning of this wonderful declaration it is impossible for us to fathom. It was fulfilled when, on the summit of Horeb, the cloud which shrouded the insupportable brightness of the Divine Presence, and out of which came "the Voice" declaring the name of the Lord, swept solemnly by the longing, shrinking prophet. Then doubtless there was an immediate manifestation to his spirit of all that it was possible for fallen man to sustain of the majesty of God.

So, again, it was, in the long sojourn in the Mount; in that dwelling in the brightness of God's glory which left a lustre on his own countenance; in those mysterious communings in the separated tent, the entrance to which the pillar of the cloud had closed to all beside him, and where the separate directions of the law were given to him, as on the Mount, had been showed to him the patterns of the tabernacle worship. Language cannot rise above the words of wonder in which these last communings are described—"As Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended and stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the Lord talked with Moses. And all the people saw the cloudy pillar stand at the tabernacle door; and all the people rose up and worshipped, every man in his tent door. And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend" (Exod. xxxiii. 9-11).

A most fit emblem, moreover, was he of the one great Prophet, in his intercessions for Israel,—intercessions based upon his renunciation of himself for his brethren. In all of these most descriptive lines of his figure, we may trace the forecast shadow of "that Prophet that should come into the world" (John vi. 14), of Him of whom the promise, which waited fourteen hundred years for its accomplishment, spake in the days of Moses to Israel—"I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth" (Deut. xviii. 18). In the view of all this greatness, it is the direct record of inspiration, "There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face" (Deut. xxxiv. 10).

Here, as in so many other instances, we may note that the highest prophetic gift is not the mere predictive faculty (though that, too, played around the lips of Moses in his blessings and his songs), but the bearing the message of God to man; the being the witness to the fallen race of the presence, care, righteousness, truth, and love of the Almighty King.

Such a witness Moses bore for forty years, throughout the long wanderings of the wilderness, to that stiff-necked generation. He gave them Jehovah's law, he instituted for them their appointed worship, he lived before them the prophet lawgiver of Israel, he fulfilled his mission, and then the time came that he should enter on his rest. "Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died. His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated" (Deut. xxxiv. 7). What a life it had been, as the old man cast back that clear eye through its tale of years! That early rescue, that courtly sojourning, that grand mastery of the world's learning; those vast vistas of imperial greatness which had opened before his manhood's prime, to be consciously abandoned; that burning patriot-zeal, and its hasty, uncommanded outbreak; those long solitary exiled years; that growing commerce with his God; that crisis of the revelation to his spirit of Jehovah's personal presence; the struggle with Pharaoh; the great deliverance; the people's murmurings and strivings; the ever-renewed, ever-increasing communings with God, which kept his heart firm and his spirit faithful, amidst all the innumerable trials and troubles of his "much enduring" life (Num. xii. 3). He looked back upon it all as, a lone and solitary man, his feet began the last ascent of the mountain Abarim. The solitariness in which all great spirits are wrapped, was cast eminently around him. Miriam was long since dead. He had closed the eyes of Aaron when they had climbed together the Hill of Hor. Two only of all who had come with him out of Egypt survived—both still young men beside the aged prophet. One wish only of his heart remained to be accomplished, and that was denied him. He would fain have led the people into the land of their possession. But the word of the Lord had been spoken, "Get thee up into the Mount Abarim, and see the land which I have given unto the children of Israel. And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered to thy people as Aaron thy brother was gathered. For ye rebelled against my commandment in the desert of Zin, in the strife of the congregation." Meekly was that reverend head bowed to the will of God. One prayer only remained to be breathed up for Israel, "Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation . . . that the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep that have no shepherd" (Num. xxvii. 12-17).

And then began the ascent. Tradition, with its magnifying haze, has gathered round the aged man the weeping people, crowding round him for a last farewell, up to the mountain's base, the senate keeping him yet further company; the high priest, Eleazar, and Joshua, his successor, still talking with him as the cloud received him out of their sight (Jos. Antiq., Book II. cap. viii. § 48). But grander far is the simplicity of the Scripture narrative—written in prescience, as Josephus hands down the tradition—"Lest men should say because of his extraordinary merit that instead of dying he went to God" (Jos. Antiq., IV. viii. 48). In the record of the Book of Deuteronomy, he mounts alone at God's bidding, and with His sole companionship, from the plains of Moab unto the top of Pisgah. Thence the Lord showed him all the land, and said unto him, "This is the land which I sware unto Abraham . . . I will give it to thy seed. I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither." And now, the last prayer breathed, his work done, the last sight seen on that mountain-top, far above the sounds of earth, the solitary man lies him down, in stillness and in light, to yield up to his Creator and Redeemer the great spirit which he had so richly trained through manifold discipline and unequalled heavenly communings. No hand of man closed those sinking eyelids; no tool of man dug that unknown grave, or traced over it an earth-born memorial. From first to last, God and he were alone together. "Moses, the servant of the Lord, died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. And He buried him in a valley in the land of Moab over against Beth-peor, but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day" (Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6).

Let us sum up his character and life in the words of another grand and ardent soul, subdued, like his own, by the marvellous dealings with him of the Highest:—"This Moses, humble in refusing so great a service; resigned in undertaking, faithful in discharging, unwearied in fulfilling it; vigilant in governing his people; resolute in correcting them, ardent in loving them, and patient in bearing with them; the intercessor for them with the God whom they provoked—this Moses—such and so great a man—we love, we admire, and, so far as may be, imitate" (Aug., Conf. Faust., vol. viii. 162).

SHORT ESSAYS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRIENDS IN COUNCIL."

SEVENTH INSTALMENT.

THE BEARING-REIN.—It was observed to a poor man, a good-natured man in the main, but somewhat cynical, and apt, when he was in a cynical mood, to use strong language, that all knowledge, but that of heraldry, is worth something. To which he replied, "Do you think it nothing to be able to discern somewhat of the characters of the principal personages who constitute the upper ten thousand in London?"

It was admitted that this knowledge was of some value.

He then went on to say, "Whenever you observe a horse, or horses, in a carriage, which horse, or horses, are suffering from a tight bearing-rein, you may surely conclude that the owner is utterly unobservant of what he ought to observe, or very ignorant of what he ought to know, or pompous, or cruel. He must be very unobservant, or he would see that his horses are suffering from this bearing rein. He must be very ignorant, if he does not know that a horse loses much of its power of draught and cannot recover itself so well when it stumbles, if it have a tight bearing-rein. He must be very cruel, if, observing and knowing these things, he does not provide a remedy. He must be very pompous, if he prefers that his horses should be made to rear their heads on high, and to rattle their trappings about (which is a sign of their exceeding discomfort), to their being dealt with humanely and reasonably.

"Well, then, I observe the equipages where this irrationally tight bearing-rein is used. I then look at the arms on the carriages; and I know who are the greatest fools in London in the upper classes.

"The be-wigged brute and idiot of a coachman" (our cynical friend, you see, used strong language), "of course, thinks it a very fine thing to sit behind these poor animals with their stuck-up heads; but his master ought to know better."

It was allowed by the cynical man's friends to whom he addressed this speech, that he had somewhat justified his study of heraldry. And then they bethought them of how the bearing-rein had been tightened most injudiciously in many other greater matters; how, in a family, the bearing-rein is sometimes so tightened that all freedom of action and of development is repressed, and, ultimately, prevented. They then thought how monarchs and statesmen had made such severe use of the bearing-rein, that the people, whom these monarchs and statesmen governed, had almost lost the power of stepping out for themselves. And it was observed that England had so dealt with her sister Ireland in putting on the severest bearing-rein, and preventing that sister from occupying herself in manufactures, that she, England, must now pay for all the incapacity and poverty which she has caused by her injudicious and cruel mode of harnessing.

Amongst this company the simple words "the bearing-rein" became a phrase; and when they met one another, and when the subject of any injudicious restraint or restriction was discussed in their presence, they had the habit of merely nudging one another, and saying, "our friend's bearing-rein, and we need not the knowledge of the Heralds' College to tell us who is the foolish person that has harnessed his horses in this most injudicious manner."

One is seldom more impressed, or at least one ought seldom to be more impressed, with the great achievements of man, and what a wonderful creature he is, than after listening to and seeing an opera.

Think of the exquisite skill of the composer, who has written a separate score for each instrument, and how all these various sounds blend into delicious harmony.

Observe the skill of the scene-painter,—how nicely he has adapted his work to the distance from which it is to be viewed.

Give some credit, too, to the poet who has invented the novel or the drama, from which the opera is taken. Nor is the man who has adapted the graceful fiction to meet the necessities of operatic performers to be without his meed of praise.

Note the mechanical contrivance which is everywhere employed, and how smoothly it all goes.

Consider the skill with which the building has been formed, both with regard to sight and sound.

Again, observe—and this is sure to have gained your observation—what skill is shown by the actors and actresses. Those thrilling notes have not been produced without immense study, labour, and reflection.

Lastly, do not fail to take note of the admirable organization which brings all this thought, and labour, and skill into a mirror, as it were, of representation.

And yet there are some people who would persuade us that the creatures who have done all this are to perish like the beasts of the field. Humanity is to make continuous progress, but the individuals are nought, and will be nought. I cannot believe it.

After all, what attracts us most in animals are their demerits. The fox has ceaseless interest for us, both in fact and in fable, from his wicked versatility of guile; and the cool, demure selfishness of the cat is not without its charm to the lovers of the feline race. Is there anything similar to this feeling in our regard for human beings? I think there is; but then the demerits must not be such as to annoy us much, and so to ruffle our tolerance for them.

Certainly, the lover is no lover, or but a very small-hearted one, who does not see much beauty in the faults of the mistress of his affections.

Mushrooms, in their resolute growth, will lift up large slabs of stone—such is the force of parvenus in the vegetable world.

There is nothing so easily made offensive as good reasoning; and men of clear logical minds, if not gifted at the same time with tact, make more enemies than men with bad hearts and unsound understandings.

Always win fools first. They talk much; and, what they have once uttered, they will stick to; whereas, there is always time, up to the last moment, to bring before a wise man arguments that may entirely change his opinion.

No man, or woman, was ever cured of love by discovering the falseness of his or her lover. The living together for three long, rainy days in the country has done more to dispel love than all the perfidies in love that have ever been committed.

There is certain work that had better be done roughly: indeed which loses all its best effect, if not done roughly. The way-side crosses and "Christs" to be seen in Catholic countries would have little interest for us, if they were finished works of art. In their roughness lies their touchingness.

One of the blackest things in human life, and one which gives occasion for most pain of a most continuous kind, is the practice of teasing. It has been wittily said that if three persons were on a desert island together, two of them would combine to make the third a slave. I do not know how this may be; but I am sure that the two would combine to tease the third, and to ridicule all his ways and peculiarities.

Whenever you come to know well any little knot of human beings, whether in a family, a school, a court, an office, a ship's company, an officers' mess, a factory, a workshop, or any other assemblage, you generally find that there is some poor creature who is perpetually made a butt for the arrows of the poor wit of the assemblage, and whose life is made considerably miserable thereby. This is one of the most cowardly propensities in human nature, and deserves to be treated with the utmost severity.

The victim is often victimised for his good qualities, and especially on account of his differing in some important particulars from the people around him.

A great man said to me the other day, "The boy at school whom we ridiculed most, and despised most, for his many faults and oddities, has turned out to be the best of us. It is he who, as a Christian missionary, has gone out to distant lands, and who has sacrificed everything for the spiritual good of the heathen. He was the boy of greatest soul and mind amongst us; but we did not know it, and we led him a very hard life."

"Portions and parcels of the dreadful past." The poet, I think, means the past in an individual's life; but what I think of is the past for the whole human race. Soothe the present as much as we may; look forward as hopefully as we can to the future, still the dreadful past must overshadow us.

The Oxford edition of Gibbon consists of eight volumes with four or five hundred pages in each volume. The exact number of pages is 3,860. The fondest admirers of Gibbon cannot say that it is light reading. Evening after evening goes by, and, if the reader is conscientious, and does not skip, it is a long time before the work is read. Indeed, in these degenerate days I doubt whether there are many persons in the world who can say that they have read their Gibbon right through. One becomes a little wearied of sentences like the following: "His abject courtiers, pretending great value for his life, might accuse the emperor of a like impetuosity, whether he headed his troops in full retreat, or pursued his flying and defenceless enemies with indomitable vigour." It takes some time to appreciate in sentences like these the studied ambiguity, and to enjoy the full flavour of the relentless sarcasm. In a word, the reading of Gibbon is no slight task, even for a student. Thinking once of what these pages contain, I came to a rash and hasty conclusion, that they chronicled about a thousand deaths by violence for each page.

Resolving to test the accuracy of this conjecture, I went through sixty pages in the volume I had lately been reading, and found that the deaths by violence recorded in those pages amounted, on an average, to about 9,000 per page. But then the historian was narrating the result of some trifling religious differences upon subjects relating to points of doctrine which no man has ever comprehended, and which probably no man ever will comprehend. We can hardly doubt that had these pages been devoted to an account of great wars, or of the irruptions into fair Italy of Vandal, Goth, Hun, Frank, or Visigoth, the average would have been still higher. Then, if turning from the history of that which may chiefly be considered European, we turn to the story still more cruel and bloody in the East, we might find in any such historian as Rollin a still higher average of slaughter for each astounding page.

The past, therefore, as I said, fairly overshadows our minds, make what we may of the present and future.

I may mention, too, that if those which were wounded in past times are at all in the same proportion as in modern times, the victims of such wounds that might be inferred to have existed in Gibbon's pages would, if placed on beds of three feet in width, have encircled the globe four times.

Though, as I have said, the past must overshadow us, yet it is with the present and the future that we have to deal. These ugly wars go on. It is true there is not quite the barbarism of former days, but there is an amplitude of slaughter, which shows us to be worthy descendants of Frank, or Hun, or Visigoth, or Norman. There is not the open and distinctly expressed desire for conquest, but, to use a modern phrase, the nations drift into war; and, when once in that maelstrom, find it as hard as ever to steer into calm waters.

Does anything remain to be done? Nations will not consent to arbitration; and the ideas of glory, of national honour, of the right of each race to exist by itself, and to govern for itself, are as strong, or stronger, than ever. An enthusiast, however, might maintain (and enthusiasts rule future generations, even when they provoke the ridicule of their own time) that something might be done to avert these wars, for most part so purposeless. There might, he would say, be a Peace Party in each nation, which should have intimate correspondence with similar parties in other nations, and thus form a great Peace Federation throughout the world. It is easy to ridicule such a proposition; it is also quite as easy to ridicule the present state of things. For what, after all, as it has been observed, is the end of most wars? Nothing but this, that a number of elderly gentlemen meet together in an official room; and, sitting round a table covered with green cloth, quietly arrange all that might just as well have been arranged before the war began.

The multiplication of small rules of practice is one of the greatest evils of a high state of civilisation. Some great thing is to be done—some act of justice to be carried out; some privilege to be obtained; some right to be maintained—and you attach to it some small formality, which proves to be the greatest hindrance.

Acts of Parliament abound in these dangerous and needless formalities. For instance, such a paper is ordered to be laid before the House of Commons forty days. The consequence often is, that the paper being laid on the table a short time before the end of one session, no action can be taken upon it until some time after the ensuing session. Instances might be given by the hundred in which these small rules and regulations have a truly fatal effect, not only in small affairs, but in great affairs. The smaller the rule, and the less obvious its necessity, the greater is the chance of its not being attended to.

I will give another curious instance of the mischief of a small regulation. There are Acts of Parliament in which it is enacted that certain judges shall be appointed at a certain time, and all at one time, to consider certain classes of cases. The trouble and difficulty which such a regulation has created are immense. A case, we will say, is to be heard three months hence. Who can pledge himself that he will be at liberty enough, or well enough, to hear a case three months hence?

The truth is that the framers of these small rules and regulations should be men of the highest imagination in order to imagine every possible variety of circumstances connected with the rule or regulation; whereas the said framers are often the most pedantic of mankind.

Disfranchisement—I use the word in the largest sense, and not merely as applying to votes—follows inevitably upon the creation of many rules and regulations for the gaining of the franchise in question.

There certainly is a great deal of compensation in the world.

Now the melancholy man, who has the least hope, and takes the worst view of his own prospects and of everybody else's, is much to be pitied. But then there is this compensation—that whatever evil happens to him, though he may be depressed by it, he cannot be surprised or disappointed.

A man I knew being about to take some great office, or to be married, or to take some perilous step or other in life, being of a superstitious turn of mind, resolved to try what direction the sortes Shakesperianæ would give him. He opened his Shakespeare at random, and his eye fell upon the line, "Though nothing sure, yet much, unhappily."

This wise prognostication is one which all melancholy men have already turned up in opening at random the book that chronicles the conclusions of their own minds.

An ox, feeding, as the manner is of oxen, upon grass, and being, therefore, of a placid nature, was much shocked at the conduct of a serpent of its acquaintance, when it saw the serpent first stare at, with its baleful eyes, and then proceed to swallow, a poor frog. "How could you be so cruel?" said the mild-eyed ox. "My dear friend," replied the subtle serpent, "if the frog had hopped one hop away from me, or made a single croak, I would not have eaten it for the world; but, as you saw, it had not the slightest objection, and there is no injury where there is consent."

The ox, though a thoughtful, is not a swiftly-thinking animal. It had browsed for some time, and the serpent had slipped away for its noontide sleep of digestion, before the ox bethought itself of the reply that it might have given to the serpent—"Yes. Fear is often mistaken, or pretended to be mistaken, for consent."

A horse, who had overheard the conversation between the serpent and the ox, made a much shrewder remark; but, with the shrewdness that is gained from suffering, he made it in soliloquy, as is the custom with that patient creature, the horse—"That is the way with my master. Because I am silent, he thinks, or pretends to think, like that hypocrite of a serpent, that I do not suffer when he is cruel to me."

An astronomer and his wife went out walking together. Presently they came to a cottage where there was a well before the door. On the other side of the road there was a little pond.

This well was known to be very deep, and the astronomer looked down into it, hoping to see, as he did see, the stars overhead reflected in it; for the stars do shine into the deep well, even in the day-time.

"Come here, husband, you can see yourself here in the pond," exclaimed the wife. But he had not come out to see a reflection of himself, and he said, "Wife, you are like the rest of the world: when you look at the most beautiful thing in Nature, your first thought is whether you can see yourself in it."

They say that when one has a clear idea one is always able to express it clearly. I rather agree with this doctrine, but am inclined to think that there are exceptions. Now, for instance, I have an idea in my mind, and have had it for a long time, but I find great difficulty in expressing it. I try to do so metaphorically, but always find that the metaphor halts, or is insufficient, or breaks down. However, I will attempt to give the reader my idea, which I know will at first seem to him so simple that he will think there is nothing in it. But I know and feel that there is a great deal in it.

My idea is this—that we should make the greatest progress in art, science, politics, and morals, if we could train up our minds to look straight, and steadfastly, and uninterruptedly, at the thing in question that we are observing. This seems a very slight thing to do; but, practically, it is hardly ever done. Between you and the object rises a mist of technicalities, of prejudices, of previous knowledge, and, above all, of terrible familiarity. You really do not look at the object which ought to be looked at, but at other things which have been said, written, or done about it. To look hard and closely at the object, is, you may depend upon it, one of the rarest and highest efforts of the human mind.

Now consider some of the great abuses which have prevailed in human affairs. I will take four of them. (1) The trial of a cause by battle. (2) The belief in witchcraft. (3) The application of torture as a test for eliciting the truth. (4) The modern duel.

The moment any man looked at any one of these horrors and absurdities straight, steadfastly, and uninterruptedly, of course it faded away and fled before him. Whereas even a Bacon, not looking at it in this way, but only looking at phantoms and idols which were between him and it, was dominated by it, and believed in it.

Scientific discovery almost always depends upon a man's looking at something in the dry light of the intellect, and isolating himself from the previous thoughts both of himself and other men about it. What is called "absence of mind" has always been noted in great inventors and discoverers. Of course this absence of mind only means intense presence of mind directed to the matter of which the great man is thinking. The power of giving supreme attention to one thing is the principal qualification of the greatest men.

The spirit of his age is a thing which often prevents a man from looking straight at his object. How potent the spirit of the age is, may be inferred from a proverb, which, strange to say, was made by the Arabs, who say that a man is not so much the child of his father as the child of the age in which he lives.

There is a subject which I wish to touch upon, and which can be best illustrated by a conversation which took place amongst certain persons known in fiction as "Friends in Council," and who, perhaps, have their prototypes in real life.

Milverton. I had a very bad night last night, for I could not get out of a certain train of thought which prevented sleep.

Ellesmere. Weak-minded man! I can always put myself to sleep by reading history, or doing a long sum. But what was the nature of your lucubrations?

Mil. I was thinking how it is that there are certain characters which are apparently most repugnant to us, and yet the company of those persons who have these characters is most pleasant to us. You can see what a large field this question opens; and how the great questions of congeniality and uncongeniality, of the effects of similarity and dissimilarity, flowed in upon me and prevented sleep.

Ell. I quite understand what you mean, and it is not always that I do understand what you mean.

Mil. There is Alpha, for instance. I like to take the Greek letters of the alphabet, because if you put any English initial, people are sure to connect that initial with some living person.

Well, then, Alpha's mind is apparently most repulsive to mine. Most of his thoughts, opinions, and judgments are thoroughly different from mine. Even when our conclusions agree, he seems to have arrived at his conclusion in some roundabout, or crooked, or sinister way, which is most unwelcome to me; and yet I like the man exceedingly and desire his company. He is a charming person.

Sir Arthur. It is exactly my case with Beta. If there is anything in the world I dislike, it is a uniformity of harsh judgments upon other people. Now, as you know, Beta is almost always harsh, rugged, and severe; and yet, to use Milverton's words, I like the man amazingly: and he is to me a charming person.

Ell. The instance I shall give is still more striking. If there is anything in the world I like, it is clearness. I would like to write a clear handwriting, to talk clearly, to speak distinctly, and to compose sentences of such clearness, that he who runs may not only read, but understand what he reads. Well, you all know Gamma. Do you recollect that novel of Walter Scott's, in which Dugald Dalgetty is the principal figure? I have forgotten the name, though I know the book almost by heart.

Mil. "The Legend of Montrose."

Ell. You remember the Children of the Mist? I always say that Gamma belongs to that tribe, and is a Child of the Mist. I read his books—once, twice, nay, even thrice; but I am as bewildered after the third reading as after the first. His talk, too, produces very hazy weather in my mind. Yet his company to me is most delightful; and, to use Milverton's misssyish phrase, he is a charming person to me.

Mil. It may be a misssyish phrase; but it is a very good one. Charming is the exact word to represent what I mean.

But to give another instance. There is Delta. He is, to use a phrase once used very aptly in Punch, an "argufying beggar." Now I do not in general like "argufying beggars." Then he is always pouncing down upon you for your small inconsistencies. You are putting on your great coat in a hurry, and you say, "Confound these railways! What a nuisance it is that one is obliged to be so punctual! In the good old coaching times one could always give oneself an extra ten minutes or quarter of an hour." Delta tries to remind you, at this most inappropriate time, when your arm has gone into your coat at the wrong angle, that you said the other day that "the punctuality of railways was delightful."

Ell. I know him well. There is nothing, however small, that he will not correct you in. He told me the other day, when I was dining with him, that I did not know how to hold my fork, and he showed me what was the proper way to hold a fork. Moreover, after dinner, he informed me that I spoilt his chairs by not sitting in them properly—which is not a pleasant thing for a host to say to a guest. Then, he is impeccable himself. Nobody can ever find him out in doing anything wrong, either as regards the highest forms of virtue, or the meanest forms of the world.

Sir A. An odious fellow; perfectly odious!

Ell. Nothing of the kind. He is a charming fellow, if Milverton insists that I must use the word charming; and he rejoices in an unusual number of attached friends.

Mil. I agree with Ellesmere. I always say, "Gratior it dies," when Delta comes to see me, though he puts me horribly to rights.

Sir A. I should have thought such a man would have been detestable to both of you, especially to Ellesmere.

Mil. Now how do you account for this phenomenon, or rather, these phenomena?

Ell. Oh! by contrast. We like those people whose characters form a pleasing contrast to our own, and whose opinions differ from our own.

Mil. That will not account for it in my case. It may in yours, Ellesmere; for you must admit you are a contentious animal. For my part, I am always disposed to like the people who agree with me.

Ell. Yes, you do. It is a very notable weakness of yours.

Sir A. I am the medium between you two. I don't dislike a man on account of his differing from me in character, or opinion; but I certainly do not like him on that account.

Mil. It remains for me to give the explanation. It is, in my judgment, this:

You must allow me to talk metaphorically. I can only explain what I mean by a metaphor, taken from geology. There is some stratum in the man's character that is exquisitely pleasing to you, because co-incident with some stratum in your own. It is generally the sub-soil stratum. I breathe better on a chalk sub-soil; you, perhaps, Sir Arthur, on a gravelly sub-soil; Ellesmere, upon a sub-soil of clay.

Ell. That's right; always assign to me whatever is unpleasant.

Mil. Well, what comes up on the surface is comparatively of little account. To keep up the metaphor, I am not particularly fond of the things which grow upon a chalky sub-soil; but the air is fine and pleasant to me.

Now, to drop metaphor, and to take our friend Delta, for example, he is one of the most affectionate of men. That very fussiness and tiresomeness and love of management of his proceed from affection. He is wildly desirous that you should do whatever is right and becoming. He does not want to set himself up. You soon perceive this (no man can for long disguise his real nature), and you can't help liking him, though he may sometimes worry you.

Now, it was not only last night that I thought over this important subject. I have endeavoured, dozens of times, to come to a right conclusion about it, to ascertain why it is that people like one another; and I am convinced that it is likeness, and not contrast, which produces this liking—likeness, mark you, in some essential particular, in some sub-stratum, as I said before, in the mind, which liking is not overcome by considerable dissimilarity upon the upper surface.

This, I know, is a very bold saying; but, take it away with you; examine likings with my view of the subject in your mind; and tell me in a year's time—if we all live till then—whether you are not disposed to agree with me.

To go back for a moment to Delta. Why does Ellesmere like him? Because Ellesmere, with all his many faults, is a singularly affectionate person, and likes affectionate people and affectionate animals—dogs, for instance. That is also a strong point with me. I can put up with anything in a man, if he is a loving man. Hence, we both like Delta hugely, not from contrast, as I said before, but from similarity. I declare, the more I think of this subject, the more convinced I am that I am right, and that I have made somewhat of a discovery in human character in pronouncing rather for likeness, than for contrast, as a bond of sympathy.

PEEPS AT THE FAR EAST.

BY THE EDITOR.

VIII.—IN MADRAS.

THE "Griffin," or newly arrived European, hardly perceives any difference between one native and another, as they move along the crowded thoroughfares of an Indian city. Yet those acquainted with the various races and castes easily observe marked distinctions of feature and expression among the thinly clad and barefooted Hindoos. Some typical specimens of these* we set before the reader (p. 648) without any special description beyond what is suggested by their trades. For each trade or calling is, as I have indicated in my former papers, a distinct caste, with whose specific work no other caste dares to interfere.† Madras, however, is rather a mongrel city in respect to castes. This is chiefly owing to the number of Eurasians, most of whom have Portuguese blood in their veins. There are upwards of 14,000 of such Indo-Europeans in Madras. These furnish a large number of servants to the English and others. The Madrassee speaks a little English, and probably a little Hindostanee. He is generally a Roman Catholic. We had two Madrassee servants, and found them very attentive, honest, and kind. The necessity for such attendants in India arises chiefly from the fact that in every private house, as well as in every hotel, no servant save your own will attend to you at table. Each has his own work, and will do no other.

But one of our cartes de visite is really worthy of special examination, and that is the Brahmin. In this man you see the highest in rank throughout all India. But it is spiritual rank only, like that of the Pope, who would still be the head of the Roman Church,

* I am indebted to the kindness of Colonel Allan Scott, of the Madras Army, for the photographs from which these illustrations are engraved.

† This is the general rule, although there are exceptions, as different castes may be employed, in special and rare cases, in the same work, or the same caste employed in different kinds of work. But to classify such exceptions, in the highly complex, and, in late years, changing conditions of native society, is impossible.

and as such would, in spiritual things, demand the reverence and obedience of monarchs belonging to that Church, although he was as poor and ill-dressed as the dignitary now before us :—for as to dress it would be more misleading in India than in the Vatican to be guided by Carlyle's doctrine of clothes as indicative of spiritual rank or power.

St. Andrew's Church, Madras.

The Brahmin has been the ruling spiritual power in India, since the Christian era began, and long before it. Yet he does not belong to a priestly class who attend only to the temple and its worship. He may follow any trade or profession he pleases. The Rajpoot Brahmins, for example, as we have known to our military glory, and to our sorrow also during the mutiny, filled the ranks of our Bengal army. The Brahmin as a soldier would, while on duty, obey a low caste man as his officer; but off duty, he would say to him, "Stand back, I am holier than thou!" Nor is the Brahmin separated from ordinary society, for he has his wife and family, and is employed in business, from the most common up to that of administering the political affairs of a native state. In ceremonial usages only is he, like the priest or Levite of old, peculiar; for he will neither eat meat nor drink wine; nor will he permit any other caste to cook for him, while, on the other hand, he can cook for all. Nor can he be polluted by contact with what other castes eat or drink, or "touch, taste, or handle." Yet this thrice holy man—this purest emanation of Deity—may be a vile compound of greed, falsehood, and foulest corruption—a very Borgia—without his authority being called in question. His power has thus been so great and so universally acknowledged by the people as of divine origin, that we cease to wonder at his clinging to it with a grasp as for life. Nevertheless, his condition imposes many burdens upon him from his youth upwards, until in the later years of his earthly probation, he is expected to withdraw himself as much as possible from all things material, and by meditation, prayer, and rigorous ascetic exercises emancipate himself more and more from his lanky limbs and defleshed frame. The secret of the Brahmin's power is the fact of the Hindoo religion (of which he is the authoritative exponent and guardian) being a system which professes to reveal and prescribe to man all the details of his varied life. Every art and science—medicine, agriculture, astronomy, the craft of the mason and of the carpenter, jurisprudence and geography—each and all form a portion of the "theology" or "religion" which, according to Hindoo belief, has been revealed to man through the Brahmin, committed to the care of the Brahmin, to be explained authoritatively by the Brahmin. Now this kind of revelation is of great advantage to the Brahmin. Every new work in which a man can engage, indeed every event in his life, requires the presence or aid of a Brahmin, in order that it may be blessed, and be made acceptable to Deity by the proper ceremonies or "pooga" being accurately performed. For this the Brahmin is paid, by a tribute which is rigorously exacted with pains and penalties, involving caste privileges, which he alone can settle, and which to the Hindoo are of more importance than life itself. The system originated with the Brahmins themselves. At first the order probably included all the learned classes, and as such would feel itself justified in punishing and fining ignorance for the benefit of learning. It was, accordingly, made lawful for the Brahmins alone to acquire a knowledge of Sanscrit, the language in which their holiest books are written. They thus hold in their hands, and as by divine authority, the temporal and eternal destinies of their fellow-men. It is equally impossible to denude themselves of this power, or to share it with any other caste; for the wealth of the world could not purchase that which flows from deity alone.

Now look at the Brahmin! He is well worth consideration. We have more to do with him than with the Czar of all the Russias. His power extends over 140,000,000 of people. The battle we have to fight with him is one not against guns or rifles, nor against flesh and blood, but against spiritual principalities and powers, and it can only be fought in the strength of Him who is man's living head and brother—the light and life of humanity, and the only centre of real unity. To Him the Brahmin and his teeming millions of followers are more dear than to all of us. Sympathy with our Master in this love is our stronghold.*

Madras is not a city with many "sights," beyond those which are more or less common to other cities in India. The Fort has nothing attractive in it, although it is not without its associations. The contrast between past and present is forcibly suggested by the fact that at the time we were beating Prince Charles

* As these pages are passing through the press, we notice the following in the Morning Star, which affords additional proof of the revolution now taking place among even the Brahmins:—"The Brahmins are prohibited, under pain of the forfeiture of every social privilege which they hold dear, from crossing the sea, which they therefore, not without reason, designate kala bannee, or 'black water.' According to the Times of India, only six Brahmins of the highest caste have ventured upon this experiment, and they have paid the penalty of the Hindoo law. Time, however, works wonders, and the Brahmins are beginning to discover that there is a good deal of absurdity in their superstitious horror of the melancholy ocean. Mr. Moljee Thackersey visited England several years ago, and on his return to India he soon learnt to his cost that he had been expelled from his caste. But Mr. Thackersey did not fling himself under the wheels of Juggernaut, or even retire into solitude. He simply exercised faith in his own rectitude, and in the ultimate common sense of his countrymen. The result is that he has revisited this country, accompanied by six or eight of his brethren of the strictest sect of Brahmins. But this is not all. When Mr. Thackersey and his companions went on board the steamer they were cheered by hundreds of "castemen," who have learnt the folly of superstition, and its incompatibility with the superior claims of modern civilisation. Another fact which is in its way equally significant, is that two native ladies have applied for admission into the entrance examination of the University of Calcutta. We hope that they may succeed in their laudable attempt to distinguish themselves in a field of intellectual labour quite new to the inmates of the zenana. It is clear, from many facts which are now transpiring, that Hindooism is passing into that stage in which reformers, if they are courageous and enlightened enough, will find their work comparatively easy."

Edward out of the Highlands this fort surrendered to Bourdonnais, who demanded its keys in the name of the French King; and, also, that exactly a century ago, Hyder Ali, with his Mahratta horse, dictated terms to its governor. In its old quaint buildings, too, a clerk once filled up his ledgers, and, with a mind somewhat liable to disorder, twice snapped a pistol at his head, hoping to blow his brains out—a clerk who afterwards was Lord Clive. The other public buildings in Madras, such as the Memorial Hall, the Cathedral, and St. Andrew's Scotch Church, are most creditable to the city. The statues of Cornwallis, Munro, and Neill, who commanded the Madras Fusileers, also "deserve attention," as guide books express it, although were I to give them the attention they deserve, my readers might not be disposed to follow my example.

There is, by the way, a connection worth noticing between Glasgow and Madras in the history of two of its governors. These are James Macrae, "unknown to fame," and Sir Thomas Munro. A short account of Macrae was given in GOOD WORDS for 1866, p. 611. Born in Ayr, the son of a poor man, he mysteriously disappeared when he was a boy. But he returned many years afterwards a man of great wealth and ex-governor of Madras (1725-30)! He behaved in the most generous manner to the friends of his youth, and to poor relations, two of whom, after having been highly educated and endowed by him with large properties, were married to men of rank. One was Lady Glencairn, an admirable woman, the mother of the Lord Glencairn who won the admiration and gratitude of Robert Burns. The governor in 1730 generously presented a statue of King William III. to the city of Glasgow, and it stands at "the Cross" until this day, with an inscription by the donor as "Ex-prefectus Madrasii."

Sir Thomas Munro was born in Glasgow, of respectable parents, and received a good education. He began life as a clerk in one of the oldest commercial houses in the city, that of Messrs. Somerville and Stirling, afterwards Stirling Gordon.* He obtained a cadetship; but, through losses sustained by his father, he had, for a part of the voyage at least, to work his way out as a common sailor. He had no wish to return to Glasgow; for when a poor lieutenant, and "half starved for a dozen years," he was yet full of hope, "and never ceased to look with great confidence for some signal piece of good fortune."* As to his retiring from the service and settling in Glasgow, what would he do there, he asks? "I should be tired in all companies with disputes about the petty politics of the town of which I know nothing, and anecdotes about families in whose concerns I am in no way interested. Among the merchants I should be entertained with debates on sugar and tobacco, except when some one touched upon cotton, which would give me the opportunity of opening my mouth and letting the company know that I had been in India and seen one species growing on bushes, and another on trees taller than any that adorn the Green. . . . In a place filled with nothing but sectarians of some kind or other, I should search in vain for any rational entertainment; and instead of congratulating myself on having been able to return and live in my native country, I should look back with regret to the society and interesting wars in India." When fifteen years afterwards he visited Glasgow as Colonel Munro, it is interesting to notice with what pleasure he recalled his early days, and wandered among scenes on the banks of the Kelvin, now covered with streets and crescents. "I stood above an hour at Jackson's dam looking at the water rushing over, while the rain and withered leaves were descending thick about me, and while I recalled the days that are past. . . . I don't know how it is, but when I look back to my early years I always associate sunshine with them. When I think of Northwoodside I always think of a fine day, with the sunbeams streaming down upon Kelvin and its woody banks."

Why has Glasgow never added a statue of Sir Thomas Munro to those of her other illustrious citizens?

We were most hospitably entertained by the present Governor, Lord Napier, at Guindy, his beautiful country residence, some miles out of town. I need not say that there is always some pomp and ceremony at every "Government House." But instead of this being diminished, it ought, in my opinion, to be increased. Two aides-de-camp, a small guard, and a military band, do not worthily represent the only representative of majesty known to the natives of a kingdom like the presidency of Madras, larger in extent than Great Britain. The fact is, we should invest with far greater

* I quote from his delightful Biography, written by the Chaplain-General of the Forces, a small and cheap volume, as well as charming one, which I cordially recommend to all who feel an interest in Indian history.

* It is a remarkable fact that Sir John Malcolm was also a clerk in the same office.

pomp all our great Indian Prefects, as well as the Governor-General. Such appearances cost comparatively little, and have great value in the eyes of the natives. Our handsome entertainment was followed in the evening by a large party and an excellent concert, in which the well-known professional, Mrs. Bishop, who was on a tour in the East, was the leading performer, while several of the ladies present, one especially, played and sang with the highest art. Young Lord Huntly and some noble friends, who were on a sporting excursion to India, were present. Such meetings in India impress a stranger in many ways. One hardly knows where such a number of gentlemen and ladies have come from to fill these handsome rooms, considering that the European element does not meet the eye when driving through the town. Perhaps the reason is that there are no idlers in India, every one being busy and confined to his desk or office. With such a host and hostess we spent a delightful evening.

And yet—yes, I must confess it—I was almost as much struck by the absence of others as by the presence of those who made up this large party of high-bred gentlemen and ladies. Where were the natives? I asked myself. Of course I knew the replies which could be given to this question—replies in no way implying any blame to this or that governor. And we can at least echo back the saying of the natives, "It is our custom!" But after we have satisfactorily, as we say, accounted for the fact, and shown how caste principles on the one hand, and European prejudices on the other, to some extent operate against anything like complete social fusion, the tremendous fact itself still stares us in the face, and impresses us more at first than perhaps any other in India. There is a gulf which separates the rulers from the ruled—the European from the native. It is hardly possible to take this in fully, so strange and unnatural does it seem; and all the more as it cannot be helped or remedied. Although it has been noticed and descanted upon a thousand times, yet my feeling of wonder at it was not diminished in India, nor, I must add, were my anxious questionings the less earnest as to what it could mean, what purpose it was in God's providence intended to serve, and what the end thereof must be?

The causes of separation between the two peoples are many and powerful. There is first of all the element of race. We have there blacks and whites, Englishmen and Hindoos; and what such antagonism may develop into we have all learned from history, and latterly in a special manner from that of America. I dare not affirm that such antagonism is to the same extent characteristic of British India; yet I am sorry to say that it does exist. I have myself heard an excellent and high-bred English lady, the wife of a high official, deprecate as strongly as any Southern could, the idea of a native woman being in any sense her sister, or of "one blood," accompanied too with something more than hints as to the desirableness of the continuance of the separation between them. "A nigger is not a man," is an axiom not wholly extirpated from Indo-European thought—the weakest kind of it at least; while the prejudice of race is as strong in India as, alas! it is generally throughout the world. And then, not to speak of the separation between the European and the native, which the knowledge as yet possessed by the educated native has but very slightly bridged over, the manners and customs of the two are wholly different. To eat together is impossible, because of the laws of caste; and even were it not so, what fellowship could there be when every native, however high in rank, eats as his forefathers did, squatted on his carpet, with his fingers plunged into his dish of curry?

As to female society in India, how different it is from European! By whatever standard her countrymen may measure a Hindoo lady her position in her own family is to us almost inexplicable. No Hindu wife would ever dare to eat in the presence of her husband, nor speak to him before any of his relations, or address his mother, his elder brother, or uncle! In rare cases alone, and only when under European influence, would she be taught to read or write. She has no domestic freedom, but is at all times under the strictest surveillance of the old lady, or Takhoor Ma, who rules the whole patriarchal establishment with a rod of iron.* How wide, then, has hitherto been the separation between Europeans and natives in social life! And to make matters worse, there is this additional fact, that the governing classes are being constantly changed. The European tree transplanted to India is, indeed, always green, but its leaves are always changing. The ship is always full, yet she is ever full of strangers. No European settles, or can settle with his family, in India. The young white-faces who are born there, must leave it to save their lives. Accordingly no native, except perhaps a nurse, ever beheld European domestic life. The Hindoos never saw a family, met, as we in our colder climate say, "around the fireside." That intercourse between the old and the young, between parents and children, and the general mixing of friends and relations, so familiar to us and so beautiful withal,—the natives may have heard of, but have never seen, far less mingled in. On the other hand, we are just as ignorant of their domestic life and its varied relationships, except from information received from themselves. And strange it is to think that, so long as human constitutions remain as they are, Eastern and Western races can never amalgamate without a loss to both. The Indo-European is inferior in power to either of the races from which he has sprung. The governing power is not in him! Providence has so willed it, and we must seek, as taught by experience, to ascertain its purpose. In the meantime we may see that, with our fresh European blood constantly renewed, and our gifts of mental and physical power, with all the results, direct and indirect, of European civilisation inherited by us, we can govern India better than the natives. But it should never be forgotten that our government must be for the natives, and, as far as possible, by them. And never, verily, to any nation under heaven since time began, was such power given, or for a nobler end! These thoughts have been suggested by one of the pleasant parties which one is so often able to enjoy in India.

* The following law regarding the behaviour demanded from a Hindoo wife I extract from Halhed's translation (published 1781) of the "Code of Gentoo Laws:—" "If a man goes on a journey his wife shall not divert herself by play, nor shall see any public show, nor shall laugh, nor shall dress herself in jewels and fine clothes, nor shall see dancing, nor hear music; nor shall sit in the window; nor shall ride out; nor shall behold anything choice or vain; but shall fasten well the house-door, and remain private; and shall not eat any dainty victuals, and shall not blacken her eyes with eyepowder, and shall not view her face in a mirror; she shall never exercise herself in any such agreeable employment during the absence of her husband. It is proper for a woman after her husband's death to burn herself with his corpse," &c., &c. (p. 253). So much for the ancient "rights of women!"

In the olden time, when such society was comparatively unknown in India, except, perhaps, as in this instance, at the Government House, it must be allowed that the Europeans were much better acquainted with the natives and with female society than now; for the zenana was not confined to Orientals. Europe was then practically four times further from India than it is now. Intercourse with it was difficult. Long residence by our Europeans in the East was the rule. The society of European ladies was rare. Little wonder that habits and customs then existed which could not be suffered now. And if it be said that these enabled our countrymen to acquire a knowledge of the natives,—of their language, their habits, their opinions and feelings,—greater perhaps than is possible in these days, yet it cannot be doubted that this was done by demoralising the European, and indeed Hindooising him. An illustration of this was given to me by an eminent medical man who had attended one of those "old Indians," dying in pain. No man knew the natives better than this old Indian did; for he was himself almost, if not altogether, a Hindoo. Accordingly, when dying, he invoked alternately Jesus and the Hindoo gods, and finally requested that his "body might be burnt at Holy Benares!" Our present separation from the natives, however much it is to be regretted, cannot verily be bridged over and remedied by any such compromises as these!

I had a long and interesting conversation with two educated native gentlemen occupying high official positions. They were not Christians, but, like many of their educated countrymen, wished to put the new wine of Christian morality and Theism into the old bottles of an idealised Hindooism. Among other subjects of conversation, we happened to touch upon one which becomes hackneyed to the "inquiring traveller"—the feelings of the natives towards us and our rule.

"The English are honest, just, powerful, and marvellously united," remarked my intelligent informer, "but they are proud and contemptuous, and have little capacity for sympathising with us, who have lived all our lives in a different world from them, and with different ideas and ways."

I expressed the hope that "none of his countrymen, far less a Hindoo gentleman like himself, ever had offensive epithets applied to them such as, to our great disgust, we were informed at home had at one time been not unfrequently used by Europeans."

"These are not yet abolished," he answered with a bitter smile; "for only the other day I was travelling from Bangalore in a first-class carriage, when an officer looked in at the window and informed his brother officers that 'a black fellow had boned the seat,' and on this another repeated the information in a loud voice, that a 'nigger was in the first-class.' This language," he said, "was confined to the military, and chiefly to the young, and to those among them who were probably without brains, and certainly without manners."

I am sorry to add that the information which I received in India as to the insolent treatment of the natives, and the ill-usage of the native servants, all went to blame European military officers chiefly, if not wholly.

Of all ordinary offences this should be visited with the swiftest and most marked punishment. The insolence of one puppy may tell on the loyalty of a whole Presidency.

My informant acknowledged that since the mutiny an immense change for the better had come over the government of India; he believed that lessons had then been taught which would not be forgotten. This he attributed, not to fear on our part, but to our sense of justice being strengthened, and to wiser conclusions having been arrived at as to the proper way to treat the natives and native states. He was, of course, loud in his praise of education; but he added—

“I lament much that the aristocratic classes in the country are not taking greater advantage of it, or that special efforts are not made to induce them to do so. The old outlets, good or bad, for their energies in connection with their native states have been almost all closed, and they will either sink down to the dead level above which you strangers raise your heads, or the lower classes alone will become educated and take the lead and fill up all important places. That they should do so is fair and good in itself, but it is not the most desirable state of things in governing this country.”

I paid a visit to the School of Industrial Arts in Madras. This institution was begun in 1850, and has been carried on ever since, by the enthusiasm and energy of a good Scotchman who has fortunately made it his specialty—Dr. Hunter, Surgeon of the Madras Army. There is certainly not much art visible in the building itself, which consists chiefly of a number of sheds suited to meet the practical demands of each department of art. The “artistic,” for example, includes engraving on wood and copper; drawing of every kind, photography, modelling, &c. The industrial department embraces a wide range, such as the making of bricks, water-pipes, cooking apparatus, and every kind of ornamental lamp, vase, balustrade, &c. In this as in the case of everything else, the natives labour and study almost solely for their own pecuniary benefit. “Will it pay?” in India as at home is the great question. And because the native youth find that the school—which was begun by a European not for the sake of pay to himself—pays them, and pays them well in many a city and native court, it is accordingly attended by large numbers, I feel persuaded that the genuine benevolence of its superintendent will itself exercise an admirable and permanent influence on the pupils.

I have but little more to relate, calculated to interest the general reader, on the subject of Christian missions—the great object of our journey—as these exist in Madras.

We had a long and interesting conference with some of the representatives of the various English missionary societies who are labouring in Madras and South India. Messrs. Hall and Corbold, of the London Mission; Mr. Fenn, Mr. Royston, and Mr. Symmons, of the Church Mission; and Mr. Burgess, of the Wesleyan Mission, kindly attended. All had the same story to tell—the slow but certain breaking down of Hindooism and caste; the transition state of nothingism, modified by such an amount of success in disseminating Christian truth as strengthened their faith and gave them confident hope in the coming of a brighter day for India. At the same time there were great lamentations over the Church at home on account of its contributing so comparatively few men to the great work of educating India, and on account of the indifference of some Europeans, and the opposition of others, to the spread of the Gospel, both by life and word. This is indeed a source of unmingled sorrow.

We also had the pleasure of meeting fourteen ordained native pastors, who are labouring in connection with the various missionary societies. Some had been ordained nearly eighteen years ago—among them being the Rev. Rajahgopaul, of the Free Church. He had visited this country, and preached often in Scotland. Had I heard him speak only I should not have been able to distinguish him from a Scotchman. The accent, caught from his teachers, was unmistakably from beyond the Tweed. The meeting with these native brethren—their intelligence, their culture, frankness, and earnestness—was deeply interesting to us. They had all, I think, been reared in Hindooism. Some were high caste men, and had passed through the severe and terrible ordeal consequent on their baptism. There was nothing in the information they gave regarding the state of their countrymen which was new to us; but they were unanimous in admitting the remarkable changes which had taken place in the general feelings of the people regarding those who professed Christianity. Caste prejudices and the old fanaticism had immensely diminished. It was impossible to converse with these brethren, and witness the same experience repeated in other parts of India, without feeling, on the one hand, the impossibility of Christian men of such culture becoming Hindoos, and, on the other, that the Christianity which these men had received, in which they rejoiced, and which had revolutionised their whole being for good, was equally adapted to meet the wants of every soul in India, and capable of producing the same effects.

As far as I could learn few immediate or permanent Christian results have been produced upon the caste races in Madras any more than elsewhere. Even among the poorest, little has been effected by mere preaching, however assiduously prosecuted by the ablest of the native preachers. But whatever may be its immediate results, it is wise and right to keep up a witness for the truth in this form by those especially who are also engaged in teaching. As I have before remarked, it casts abroad the seeds of truth and leads to discussion and the ventilation of truth, in a country where a breeze is always beneficial; and of course the more those who have school education increase, the more will audiences increase who can understand the preacher. Thus sooner or later it is the native preachers of power and moral earnestness who will at once test the sincerity and the actual beliefs of the people, at the same time hastening and taking advantage of the turning of the tide when masses are prepared to renounce caste. They too will ultimately reap the harvest from what has been long sowing by the slower process of Christian education. The Missionaries in Madras have, therefore, very wisely made the school an essential and all-important part of their agency.*

We visited Dr. Patterson's medical mission in Blacktown. Whatever can be accomplished for soul or body is done with great skill and warmth of heart by Dr. Patterson.

The native house in which Dr. Patterson has his dispensary afforded me an opportunity of studying the domestic architecture of the Hindoos, and of seeing the marvellous simplicity of their internal arrangements, as well as of their furniture. The street door opens into a small room where all visitors can be received without their having to go into the more private apartments. From this room the interior is reached by a door, which communicates with a small inner square court. The court is open to the sky, but surrounded on every side by a deep verandah, from which the small dark sleeping apartments of the family enter. As far as I remember, there is another court beyond this again, but without a verandah—a receptacle for what we would call all sorts of odds and ends. Now what furniture is needed for such a house as this? Tables, and chairs, and beds, are not required, where a carpet alone suffices for all these. Fingers supply the place of knives, forks, and spoons. Thin muslin robes require no wardrobes; while shoes and stockings are unknown. The cooking utensils required for curry, with melted butter, fish or vegetables, are few; and the sweetmeats which may grace the feast are purchased in the Bazaar. The tanks connected with every temple serve for ablutions, which are thus sacred as well as sanitary, and help the soul as well as the body. No wonder, then, that the Hindoo house can accommodate a great number of inhabitants, and that a "fitting" from it for any cause whatever is always easy and expeditious. In Dr. Patterson's dispensary about seventy persons were squatted; for no people under heaven can pack themselves so closely as the Hindoos. Their thin bodies, thin clothing, and mode of folding themselves up like foot-rules, enable them to arrange themselves side by side like portfolios.

The doctor, or some native preacher, daily reads a portion of Scripture to the patients, and gives an address on some topic bearing directly or indirectly on Christianity, thus preparing the way for the future, if not producing marked changes for the present. There is a subduedness of manner and teachableness in sufferers, which is always touching, and words of Christian sympathy and kindness, as well as medicine, cannot but do them good. What lips among their own countrymen could say to them, "After this manner pray ye, Our Father which art in heaven?"

One of our most pleasing missionary meetings was with our own native church, under the teaching of the Rev. Jacob David, whose father was a catechist in connection with the Tinnevely mission. He himself is not "a convert," having from his childhood known the Holy Scriptures. He has about two hundred persons in his congregation. We received a hearty welcome from them in a social gathering held in the school-house;

* I regretted much that it was vacation time in the Free Church Mission School, which is one of the largest, oldest, and most successful in Madras, and taught by my able friends, Mr. Miller and Mr. Stevenson, and others. It has six branch schools, with five ordained European missionaries, and two native ones—in all forty-two Christian agents, twenty-three being natives. There are about one hundred natives in connexion with the native church, with two thousand in average attendance at school, of whom forty-six are undergraduates at the university. Sixty-three females attend the Anglo-vernacular, and six hundred and seventeen the vernacular schools.

One of the best schools in India was many years ago opened in the Madras Presidency at Vizagapatam, and conducted by Rev. W. Noble, of the Church Missionary Society, a man of learning and singular devotedness of life. An interesting and instructive memoir of him has been published by his brother, a clergyman in the church of England, which should be in every mission library.

and although our addresses had to be translated into Tamil, yet this did not diminish the interest of meeting these our Christian brothers and sisters. On Sunday morning early we joined about one hundred and seventy in partaking of the Lord's Supper, after the simple Scotch form,—the sacramental table having been spread in the chancel of St. Andrew's Church. We hope that before this time Mr. David's interesting congregation are worshipping in their own new church, a free site for which has been given by Government, and the funds for building it raised partly in Madras and partly in Scotland. Immediately after the meeting, I had the privilege of preaching in the handsome Wesleyan chapel in Blacktown. There was a good congregation, including missionaries belonging to different societies, all of whom afterwards partook of the Holy Communion. This was characteristic of the catholic spirit which pervades all missionary bodies in India, to a degree unknown in this country.

I cannot close these brief notes on mission-work in Madras without mentioning the name and labours of my friend, Mr. John Murdoch, from whom I had received many valuable hints before leaving Scotland, and whom I had the pleasure of meeting at Madras. His name deserves to be honoured by all who wish well to India. He knows more of mission-work in Hindostan and Ceylon, from direct personal observation, than any man living, having visited every district north and south very many times. He has also written the best handbook for missionaries which exists, and for some time he published admirable "Year Books" of India, each being a summary of the chief events in the year connected with every department of Indian public life. He is at present the agent for a most valuable institution, the Christian Vernacular Education Society for India;* and I am glad to have this opportunity of expressing my sense of the debt which the Church of Christ owes to this Christian layman for the long, patient, and most successful labours, in which he thinks of every one but himself.

I have no more to say about Madras, although I have said so little, and that perhaps to so little purpose. It is difficult, thus writing, as I now do, once more in the Highlands, and under the shadow of Ben Cruachan, which lifts its bold peak in the sky before me, to realise those Indian scenes. There is little connection between Bengal and Bunawe, or between the Presidency of Madras and the parish of Muckairn, in which I am now enjoying a holiday among wild birch and purple heather. And yet I confess to the weakness of detecting some analogies between the two countries, which, after all, may be but vain imaginations. I, for instance, fancy to myself what the Highlanders and their chiefs would have felt had the Russians, ignorant of their language, and, at best, wretched speakers of Gaelic, taken possession of their country, and carried with them into Lochaber or Skye the ideas which had been stereotyped on their minds at Moscow or Tobolsk—ignoring the old chiefs, the old traditions, the old dress, music, everything national, and Russianising all! Justice there might be in greater measure, and protection of person and property to a greater extent than was ever known. Rents might be less, and battles fewer, and personal freedom greater, than were ever known under the local dominion of Lochiel, Glengarry, or any other chief. But who can realise better than a native Highlander the want which the people would feel of that indescribable sympathy with local feelings, ideas, crotchets, opinions, and customs, rude and barbarous though they might all be, which nevertheless unite men by the force of fancy, imagination, and the thousand tiny threads which, however unreasonable, yet make up the most powerful bonds of union? From where I now write, I see the summits which line the mountain gorge by which Bruce entered the Highlands to coerce its clans; and to this day the people are proud of their own Lord of Lorne, who met and fought him! Yet Bruce was a native sovereign. I see, again, a ridge of hills, immediately beyond which is Glencoe. The story of the massacre there is yet narrated with horror in the "bazaars" of every Highland village. Fort-William itself, and its neighbour Fort-Augustus, were built by the Sassenach, about the time the battle of Plassey was fought, to put down our native tribes, and no doubt with success. But these forts are looked on as badges of Highland subjection, albeit erected by a native monarch, in whom were united the crowns of Scotland and England. Why then should we think it strange that chiefs and their retainers in India should abhor the English? It is all very nice to speak of security of property, and the like, which sounds so well in our ears, but I can understand a Highland, like a Hindoo cateran of the olden time—say the “Dugald Cratur” of Rob Roy—moaning over the days of pillage and free life of the past! I picture Dugald as he sits by his peat-fire discoursing on the glories of the olden time, when he could kill all sorts of game without hindrance; brew his own whiskey ad libitum without a license; make a raid upon the cows of the Lowlanders without the law or the Lowlander being able to reach him in his mountain retreats; fight with any other clan, and fight it out, without any one interfering between them; free to draw broadsword or dirk in a private quarrel, and to kill his enemy if his enemy did not first kill him; owning no king but Rob Roy, and no right but might! Glorious times! But now! alas for law, and sheriffs, and the tyranny of the Sassenach!

* This society was founded in 1858 as a memorial of the mutiny. Its object is to establish everywhere in India schools in which the masses may be instructed in secular and religious knowledge through the medium of their own mother tongues. For this object it trains native Christian teachers, in four central institutions, and provides school books very carefully prepared. It endeavours also to take under its care, for improving them, and conveying Christian instruction to them, heathen village schools. No less than one hundred of these, with five thousand children, have already accepted of this arrangement. Three millions of school-books, and two hundred and fifty different publications, have already been supplied to schools in every district of India. It also publishes magazines, tracts, &c., with which to follow up the school instruction. The society is not connected with any Church, but has the confidence and receives the support of all our Protestant Churches, and of their influential clergy and laymen at home and in India. The office is 7, Adam Street, Strand, London; and I mention this as some of my readers may wish further information regarding its operations.

Now all this we admit was quite natural for a savage native of the olden time like a Highland or Hindoo Dugald. But, on the other hand, when gazing on the fertile fields before me, and seeing the smoke of a steamer on the loch, and a coach with four horses rolling along a good turnpike, and rows of wooden posts connected by telegraphic wires, and a post-office with a savings-bank, together with churches, schools, and perfect security to life and property, and Highland chiefs in Parliament, and Highlanders in every kind of situation from the North to the South Pole, sharing all honours with the English, and proving an honour to their common country, what can one think of the changes from the past? And what would the people, from the humblest cottier to the wealthy farmer, think now if they were obliged to live in Dugald's paradise? What comfortable artizan would exchange his life for that of any one who inhabited those ruined keeps, which are the fittest emblems of the olden time, and of the native rule sentimentalists mourn over because they know nothing about it!

In the meantime I must leave Madras.

“NOBLESSE OBLIGE.”

An English Story of To-day.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “CITOYENNE JACQUELINE.”

CHAPTER XXXIII.—A DAWNING SUSPICION.

NE spring day, when Phoebe was pluming herself on soon seeing the lilies in blossom in the court, and the daffodils in the Brockcotes woods, and on having to clothe herself anew in Hoyie's printed calicoes and summer muslins (nothing half so beautiful!), she encountered Lord Wriothsesley at the Wellfield gate, where he had waylaid the twelve-o'clock post. He told her that all the family were coming home directly. His mother was nearly convalescent; and there was his sister's marriage to see to, besides some business of Fairchester's to be settled beforehand.

“What good news!” cried Phoebe, joyfully; “summer is coming, and everybody is coming with it. If only Lady Dorothea would not go away again. But what a stir there will be at Brockcotes for the wedding! I am to help to dress the bride, and she is to get us as good places as she can in the chapel. She is so thoughtful, you know, she will not forget us. I am sure you are delighted, Lord Wriothsesley.”

“If you are sure of my delight, Miss Paston, I need not indulge in ecstasies before you,” he said.

Phoebe was struck with something in his tone—a strain of effort, an absence of alacrity, and an almost smothered accent of reproach which did not sound like the unqualified pleasure of a young fellow welcoming his own people round him again.

The two were standing below the sycmore, now budding, and hanging over the cold iron in the tenderest green brushed with delicate brown, as the first instalment of its deep, sober summer livery. Phœbe had been on her way to ask Mrs. Chenevix for some feathers from the foreign game birds which Mr. Paston wished to see; but she was so startled and perplexed, although nothing tangibly amiss had been said or looked by Lord Wriothlesley, that she thought no farther of her intention, and turned to go home, with Lord Wriothlesley walking by her side. She went back to Wooers' Alley as she came, in a kind of stupid panic.

Till to-day, Phœbe in such circumstances would have said, that if Lord Wriothlesley were going into the town, she would gladly return with him. Till this moment, she would have said that she would be very proud of Lord Wriothlesley's company.

But now, for the first time, in a sudden fit of strange shyness, and consciousness of what she would not even admit to herself as yet, Phœbe did not desire Lord Wriothlesley's attendance. She stopped, that he might part from her. Then he said, gravely, as if on an afterthought—

"I am very thankful that my mother is so much restored, and that this banishment has done all that could be expected from it. I believe, too, that all the benefit to the constitution does not show at once, so that we may hope for continued improvement. Pray tell them all about it in Wooers' Alley."

Accepting Phœbe's cue, his Lordship fell back, and proceeded by a short cut across the park to the kennels. Phœbe felt relieved and thankful to a degree that she could not account for—why should she? Why should there be any mixed feelings about Lord Wriothlesley's release from his temporary burden of government and its loneliness? He could not have become so enamoured of them, when they had nearly cost him his health, unless, indeed, he was keeping to himself farther news, and there was some foundation for the muttered mystery of trouble to Lord Fairchester. Again, why need there be any awkwardness in his discussing with her the arrival of the family, because of trouble to Lord Fairchester?

Phœbe went home in that state of dawning suspicion, which dyed her cheeks crimson with excitement and agitation. At the same time, she tried with all her might to hush it down as preposterous—an incorrigible, distracting fancy. Meeting her father at the door of his painting-room, she apologized, her cheeks flushing a deeper red.

"Papa, I am so sorry that I have not got the feathers. I met Lord Wriothlesley at the gate, and he told me there had been letters from Germany, and the family are coming home immediately. I suppose that put the feathers out of my head, or I did not like to speak of them, lest he should think himself bound to stay and hunt after them. He will have a great deal to do now, in seeing the Earl's last commissions executed, and making preparations for the family."

Mr. Paston received the explanation as a matter of course. "Very well, Phœbe, the feathers will do another time; indeed, I think I have managed to get the shade of golden-brown without them. I am happy to hear the time is fixed for Lord and Lady Exmoor's leaving Germany. You said the time was fixed, I think?"

"Yes, they are coming home immediately," said Phœbe, who was already at the door, and without looking round.

But when Phœbe told Mrs. Paston, she started up, throwing down her knitting.

"Oh, dear, dear! I hope there will not be a great row, Phœbe. I do so hate rows—they frighten me out of my wits."

"Why on earth should there be a row, mamma?" responded Phœbe, in a mixture of vexation and general discomposure.

"Oh! because, you know, Lord and Lady Exmoor mayn't approve of Lord Wriothlesley's having come about us so much in their absence," Mrs. Paston explained with furtive wistfulness out of her weak blue eyes, hesitating and equivocating, and looking at Phœbe. "Although they let Lady Dorothea come, they mayn't like it so well in him; they may think it is idling in a young nobleman."

"Why did you not say this before, mamma? If the Earl and Countess think Lord Wriothlesley has been idle, they must be very unreasonable. Why, he has been almost as busy as Lady Dorothea, without frittering away his time on too many things; for I always say Lady Dorothea will do too much with her own brain, if not her own hands. If we had not let Lord Wriothlesley come here of an evening, he would have worked himself into a fever. He could not go up to town, and get distraction at his club or the opera. I should think, when it comes to this, we are fitter company for him than Mrs. Bald or Mr. Clarges."

"I don't know, Phœbe," argued Mrs. Paston, with a faint fluttered cough. "Mrs. Bald, besides being a very genteel woman, always wearing silks, is trusted by the Countess with everything—not that she has anything to do that I know of, except to go into every room at Brockcotes once a day, and lock and unlock the linen-presses—and she is old enough to be his mother. For Mr. Clarges, I am sure he is next to the Earl, or, any way, to Lord Wriothlesley.”

“I don’t know, mamma,” objected Phœbe, with a little sparkle of laughter on the surface of her disorder. “There is Mr. Simmons, not to mention Mr. Richardson, to dispute with Mr. Clarges the post of second father to Lord Wriothlesley. Yet confidential and faithful as they two, and Mrs. Bald, and Miss Thorpe are, they are his servants, after all, and we are not strictly so; surely, then, we are more on an equality with Lord Wriothlesley.”

“That is just it, Phœbe,” burst in Mrs. Paston; “you have been made so much of—made quite a friend and companion by Lady Dorothea.”

“Mamma! what have I to do with it?” cried Phœbe, flaming up, brown cheeks and all.

“Oh! nothing,” professed Mrs. Paston, uncomfortably. “He might have gone to Mrs. Adelaide Coke, only there would have been still greater equality, and it might have been still worse. They are such tip-top great people, the family at Brockcotes.”

“They are great people,” assented Phœbe, with somewhat more steadiness and sense of consolation; “and as such perfectly exceptional—no more to be measured by small people in their actions, and the consequences of their actions, than kings are to be measured.”

But Phœbe was not at rest; and when in the evening Lord Wriothlesley came as usual, as if to make good to the last the entrance he had secured, she could not, do what she would, be quite the same easy, companionable friend she had been to him.

Lord Wriothlesley was also different. He had not recovered the dispersion of a mirage of which he was the half-guilty creator. There was a sense of something on his mind, of a terribly serious fact which self-questioning had made vividly clear and undeniable.

No wonder he looked supremely serious, and solemnly in earnest, when he came through the still biting east wind of the spring, with his evening coat buttoned across his chest, and his thin boots, damp and soiled. What might in one light be regarded as a great misfortune, almost as great as any that could threaten Lord Fairchester, had so risen up and confronted Lord Wriothlesley, that he could no longer refuse to realise it. The single point of standing ground he had—and he took care to occupy it immediately—was that that could never be rightly termed a misfortune which made a man of him. In his first brush with it, and in the midst of perfect comprehension of all that was disastrous in it, his instant well-nigh heroic acceptance of it appeared to lend a motive power to his nature, and cause it to spring forward to manhood at a bound.

The ostensible reason for Lord Wriothlesley’s gravity—and the reason was superficial enough—was that he was there to say good-bye. He was going up to town to await Lord and Lady Exmoor.

CHAPTER XXXIV.—MRS. PASTON REVIEWS THE SITUATION.

MR. PASTON was not in the drawing-room when Lord Wriothlesley arrived, nor during his stay. The effect which his Lordship’s announcement produced on her mother was one which keenly vexed Phœbe. Mrs. Paston, grown familiar through time with the heir of Brockcotes, improvised what might almost be termed skittish charges against him. He was going into the gay world. Every Christian knew that it was close upon Easter. Miss Thorpe had often told Mrs. Paston what London was after the Easter recess. He would forget them among so many fine folk like himself. It was only to be expected he should do so; it was the way of the world; but it was a little hard on their quiet family party, which his Lordship had done so much to enliven with his presence during the spring.

“Lord Wriothlesley will have something better to think of, mamma,” interposed Phœbe, impatiently. “He is not to have the family parties at Wellfield constantly on his mind. Wellfield is his own place, and we are his own people, whom he will remember and see again times without number. But I cannot conceive what he has to do troubling himself with the thought of us in the meantime.”

“You are both wrong,” said his Lordship, with conviction. “I shall have my own people with me again, and I shall no longer belong so much to myself—so far as calling my time my own, and making my own engagements are concerned. I don’t say I am altogether glad of this, or of being more in the way of being swallowed up among the shoals of other people. However that may be, I shall never forget you and the happy evenings you have given me. You have made me like a son of the house, Mrs. Paston, and you must permit me a son’s feelings in the future. Wooers' Alley will always be remembered, and I shall never cease to view you all as holding the very first place in my regard. I wish I could feel as certain that the Wooers' Alley people will retain me in as faithful remembrance."

Phoebe felt that there was more than met the ear in this asseveration, strong as it was. It silenced her; it silenced him also after he had made it. It seemed as if he could say no more. After the usual offers of executing commissions, and carrying messages to the family, and one or two more lingering, wistful looks, Lord Wriothlesley said that he would venture to intrude on Mr. Paston in order to take leave of him, and that he could find the way for himself. Phoebe agreed with him, but Mrs. Paston would not suffer Lord Wriothlesley to run the risk of losing himself in the limited labyrinth of the old rectory passages; so he parted from Phoebe with a simple "We shall meet again soon, Miss Paston."

Phoebe was left alone. She sat with her work in her lap, staring before her, as if she were puzzling out the pattern in a square of the Holbein green carpet, illumined by the Pompeian lamp.

What had she to recall? Nothing but Lord Wriothlesley's coming night after night to spend the little leisure which hung heavily on his hands, and being the very spirit of courtesy and kindness, in the gladness of his expansion, when he was with them. He had fallen a good deal to her share, because they two comprised the young people of the circle. He was Lady Dorothea's brother, and she was Lady Dorothea's friend, and her father and mother were more or less occupied. But Lord Wriothlesley had not deserted other engagements or other friends for them. Once, indeed, he had driven home early from Cholmondley, and come in for a moment to tell them that he had hurried back on purpose to let her mother and her know that the Bishop was really to deliver an address at Nannton the next day, and to ask them if they should like to hear it; and to inform her father that Sir William Cholmondley would be charmed to put at his disposal the new President's work in Lady Cholmondley's portrait.

Phoebe remembered how bright and eager Lord Wriothlesley had looked that night, and how her mother had begged the cluster of azalea he had worn in his coat, and received it from him. But they had not interfered with any other of Lord Wriothlesley's friends' claims, or with any of his duties.

His Lordship had only made one offering to the family in Wooers' Alley, and certainly it had been made to Phoebe, and had promised such happiness that she had not stopped to think before accepting it. She stood up stoutly for it at this moment, and would not regret that she had been made happy by it. He had brought for her acceptance a little terrier, telling her that it ought to have been a turnspit, as ugly as sin. But he hoped she would forgive it for being merely a pretty little creature, parcel blind from the long hair which hung over its brown eyes, and rejoicing in no more quizzical title than the homely one of Bess. She doted on Bess, and in her infatuation maintained that it had special attractions. Her affection for her pet was no fine lady's pretence to please the noble donor, as some of the natives of Wellfield gratuitously supposed. It was the simple God-given love of animals, which existed in as great strength in her enemy, Mrs. Wooler, as it existed in her.

By the time Phoebe arrived at Bess in her summing-up of Lord Wriothlesley's relations with Wooers' Alley, she had been fain to cheat her own agitation and alarm by arresting Bess, and telling it that it was a naughty, thoughtless dog, and would get its own poor mistress and poor Lord Wriothlesley into dire disgrace.

Mrs. Paston interrupted the accusation and the defence with her cap hanging to one shoulder by one string, and her hands busy fiddling with the other. Her faded complexion was rosy again, and her blue eyes bright. She looked almost young, and foolishly pretty, as when Mr. Paston thought her prettiness and folly worth all the wisdom in the world. She poised herself on a corner of a chair, at the imminent risk of overbalancing herself, as she cried in shrill exultation—

"Phoebe, have done with that silly trifling with a brute beast, when you have so much more to think of. I wonder at you; you are not worthy of the lots in life you've had to pick and choose from. Not that I intend to scold you any more for your sauciness; perhaps you knew all along what mighty finer things were in store for you; so you were right after all."

"Mamma," said Phoebe, "what do you mean?"

But Mrs. Paston simply pursued her own line of reflection.

"Oh, Phoebe! I wonder you've had the daring. I should never have had a two-penny worth of your spirit, though I was thought an aspiring girl, for as soft as I was.

This quite scares me to think of; and if it should come to pass, child, I believe I shall be in danger of dying, just of not knowing what to do, and how to contain myself. Oh, la! great promotion is not without its drawbacks."

"Mamma," said Phoebe, at last, springing up in despair, "you are dreaming, and must forgive me for saying so. You should not let yourself do it, for it is so mad a dream, and so wrong a one in any of us. I know how innocent you are, mamma; but there are such nasty tongues in the world, even in Wellfield, that if their owners had a suspicion of your words, you do not know what a horrid use might be made of them. And, indeed, mamma, you should not say this kind of thing to me; for although I know it is the greatest nonsense—and I do not wish it to be anything else—if I know myself,—still I am but a girl, a silly girl, as you often say," pled Phoebe, piteously, "and I don't want to be tried by so great a temptation."

Mrs. Paston was too extravagantly elated to be put down to-night by Phoebe's remonstrance. She even protested against the child's boldness in standing up and contradicting her. At the same time, there was stealing into Mrs. Paston's manner—what Mrs. Medlar had described—a proud, anxious deference to Phoebe, which proceeded from a sort of awed, impressed vanity.

Now that the wondering Phoebe began to perceive its origin, the homage provoked and pained her, while she could not altogether keep from being diverted by it. "As if I could ever be anything else to mamma than Phoebe," she said to herself, "or as if mamma could ever be anything less to me than my own dear mother." "But oh! mamma," she exclaimed aloud, "small blame to papa for growing sarcastic."

But Mrs. Paston was determined on having her say out at last.

"Nonsense to yourself, child," she urged. "I will speak my mind to my own girl. I have long suspected what is going on, and it has come to this height, that there is no farther use in making any bones about it. Lord Wriothsley must mean something, if he is worth his ears, or has any of the honour and honesty you are always clamouring that the Latimers are choke full of. Why, any worthy young fellow—that I should class a young lord under such a head, but I don't disparage him, do I, Phoebe, when I class him so? I am sure I don't want to disparage him, and not to you, my dear, above all."

"Mamma, I really wish you would not speak so," persisted Phoebe.

"I know better than speak indiscreetly, Phoebe; I shall mind my words, you need not be afraid. But, as I was saying, any worthy young fellow would think twice before he went on occupying such a footing as he has had here for good two months and a half. He would think half-a-dozen times before he said such words as I heard Lord Wriothsley say with my own ears about not forgetting us in any circumstances, not for a day—about feeling like a son towards us, and our having the very first place in his regard. Then again to Paston—about Paston's being under the necessity of knowing what his Lordship felt, and trusting to him. His Lordship can mean nothing less than making up to you when he can get Lord Exmoor's permission, or when his father is dead; and you know the family are not long livers."

"Oh! mamma, mamma! to count on that, and to speak of Lord Exmoor's permission, or indeed to reckon at all on such vague words of gratitude and good-will! You don't know these people, mamma."

"Well, I do think, Phoebe, that you might consider your mother's being rather an older woman than you, and having been always called on by Lady Exmoor, though I don't pretend to have been made a crony of by the Countess. As for that matter, I believe she has no cronies out of her own family; and that even Miss Thorpe, though she came home with Lady Exmoor when she was married, and has been about her all these years, is not taken into her entire confidence. You will be one of the family; I don't wonder that you are set up a bit. Yet goodness knows, girl, I don't envy you altogether being taken in among these cut-and-dry, high-flying grand people, however caressing they may be. It is a mercy, after all, that you have a spirit and a mind of your own."

"It is a mercy, mamma, were it only to qualify me to argue with you, and to persuade you to dismiss this craze from your mind," declared Phoebe, setting herself to shake her mother's faith. "When did a Latimer make a low marriage? And how low this one would be! He is destined for nobody below Miss Dugdale or Lady Anna Maria Dudley, as Lord Fairchester was for Lady Dorothea."

"He may have been destined for fiddlesticks, Phoebe; that don't make him take them in hand. If all that's said be true, the dogs may run through Lady Dorothea's fine match yet. I don't care though the Latimers have never entered into a low marriage before; that may be the very reason for their beginning now when other people have done it: but I think I have heard something like that of one of them; only my poor head ain't filled with flummery like a girl's, at my time of life. It is not so low a marriage as others have come to. When a girl is thought good enough to be the sister's companion and friend, she is not so down in the depths that she may not be exalted into being the brother's wife. Haven't I been careful for my own only girl?" asserted Mrs. Paston, triumphantly. "I have made out there is no law against you, or any maid-servant at Brockcotes, marrying Lord Wriothesley, now that he is of age, as there is against your marrying the Queen's sons; while there is both law and justice to prevent even the Latimers having you and Paston and me seized, carried out of the country, shut up and hidden somewhere, when the family get word of the heir's intentions. Everybody has always said that Lord Wriothesley is an uncommon young man, and is to do something uncommon in his generation. Who can tell but his stooping to you is the thing he is going to do?"

"A pretty thing! Mamma! what can I say to you? And papa will be wild if he hear you talking such treason against the Latimers."

"Not so bad as you would think, Phoebe," nodded Mrs. Paston; "for of course I had it out with him the moment Lord Wriothesley was gone. I was in the painting-room convenient, so I had Paston, and he could not escape me. I've known him saviour: you see he had been staggered beforehand by his Lordship's address. When I said he had better give me the back of the door at once, that brought him round in no time, for his bark is worse than his bite, is Paston's, that I will say. Though, to be sure, it was 'You'll not breathe a syllable of this moon-struck madness to Phoebe.' 'But that I will, Paston,' I answered him instantly. 'Do you think such a great thing would be likely to happen, and I should not talk it over with my own daughter? What do you take me for, Paston?' I put it to him; 'we shall be separated far enough when she is my lady countess.' He groaned at that, as you are doing, Phoebe; for you are your own papa's image, except that I think you must have something of me in you too, with all your brownness and bluntness. Have I not told you how the great people coming to Brockcotes used to admire my freshness and fairness, when I was the daughter of the poorest attorney's clerk in the place? Who knows what might have happened, if I had had my chance like you, by being educated as we have done our parts by you, and being made a favourite of by some Lady Dorothea? It was my misfortune that the late lord had no sisters near my age."

"But what did papa say when you told him you would speak of this to me?"

"He said something polite about a safety-valve for me, else I should burst out with my discovery in the public street. I told him that I hoped I knew manners, although he did not; that it was Lord Wriothesley's part to speak, of course; and that until he did it (though he should not be able to come to the point for years, you were young and could wait), I should not breathe a syllable of your conquest."

"Didn't papa lament the mischief and misery such an unsufferable story would make between him and his first and best patron?"

"Well, Phoebe, I imagine Paston gave value for the patronage; and I believe he can stand alone now, else he has made little of his art. But even if he could not do without Lord Exmoor, do you think he is such a selfish wretch that he would stand in his child's light, or that I should let him if he were so left to himself? He said something of 'reprisals,' that it had been his destiny to make fine reprisals."

Overflowing as Mrs. Paston was, she did not tell Phoebe that when she spoke of her daughter with an extravagant boast as the Countess of Exmoor, her father had declared that he did not know but that it might be happier for Phoebe to be laid in her coffin than to live to be called Countess of Exmoor. He had proposed for her a different fate, where she would have received true honour and love, and given as much as she got—where she would have discharged an old debt, and not incurred a new one, so deadly heavy that no virtue or grace of hers could hope to wipe it out.

Mrs. Paston was very glad now that Phoebe had been so saucy to Barty Wooler, and was guilty of the small guile of keeping to herself Mr. Paston's "out of reason regrets."

CHAPTER XXXV.—NOTES OF WARNING.

At this period Mrs. Edgumbe came from Summerley on a visit to the Ingrams. Borrowing the mail Phaeton Lady Lucy had set up, she drove into Wellfield one day, and called on Phoebe Paston.

"It is Miss Paston I want to see," Mrs. Edgumbe said plainly to the maid who opened the door; "so you need not announce me to Mrs. Paston. Has the child any den of her own to receive visitors in?"

"Well, ma'am, none as I can think on," answered the maid; "she allays see visitors in the drawing-room, 'cept I've known her to do it in the painting-room once when Mr. Paston wasn't at home."

"She has none? Very well, then, I shall walk back to the carriage, and you go up and present my compliments—Mrs. Edgumbe's compliments to Miss Paston—and I shall be glad if she will come down and find me about Hornby's the bookseller's, and take a little drive with me."

And on this the maid went up-stairs to deliver her message.

"I cannot stand that whether-or-no woman's mewling," Mrs. Edgumbe said to herself; "cipher as she is, one can't open one's mouth before her. Bless you! half the mischief in the world is done by ciphers; they are always pitchers, and they go on filling till they run over, without knowing when to flow, or when to stop."

Phœbe would have excused herself from the drive, but the old lady had been kind to her. Moreover, she was so formidable an old lady, that Phœbe had very little doubt, that if she did not go down to Mrs. Edgumbe of her own will, Mrs. Edgumbe would think nothing of sending up to fetch her down by force.

When Mrs. Edgumbe had received Phœbe, and seated her beside herself on the box-seat, she drove off with the assurance that there was not the smallest cause for nervousness, since she had learnt to drive a drag in Chin Bagot's day. And although she was an old woman now, she would say her wrists were still a match for young Lady Lucy's soft fine bones. Phœbe was not frightened of being overturned; but she did not quite like making a spectacle of herself on her elevated perch. She might be destined for elevation; but if she had got her choice, she would not have chosen to make her first appearance among the quality, after the change in her prospects had begun to transpire freely, with old Mrs. Edgumbe.

Neither did Phœbe like the curious way in which Mrs. Edgumbe looked at her with eyes, still commanding and lively, over the shrivelled cheeks.

"Where shall we drive to, my dear?" asked the old lady, managing her pair of horses skilfully, and looking Phœbe full in the face; "shall we go up one of the Brockcotes avenues, or just a little bit along the high road?"

"I think the high road would be better," answered Phœbe, colouring in spite of herself. "The servants at Brockcotes might think we were some of the family."

"So we are," declared Mrs. Edgecumbe, briskly; "I am a cousin of the Latimers, whom they have not yet shaken off, and you are at home up at Brockcotes, I understand, Phœbe. The only question would be whether I should take you under my wing, or you should take me under yours, eh?"

"I should not think of going to Brockcotes under anybody's wing, if Lady Dorothea were not at home," asserted Phœbe.

"Very well, I daresay you are right. But although I have always thought you a pretty girl, I am not going to let you have a beauty's privilege of sulking yet awhile."

"I am not sulking, Mrs. Edgecumbe," cried Phœbe.

"Aren't you? hum! Then I don't know what a taste of sulking is like. Let me look at you, Phœbe, and see if you are improved since the race-time."

"Don't you think you are putting me to a hard trial?" appealed Phœbe, turning round on Mrs. Edgecumbe.

"No; besides, you must get used to being tried. I don't think you are improved, Phœbe, though you are not gone off. You are just the brave-spirited little rustic I found you. Now you won't mind me calling you a rustic. There is always a pastoral charm in rusticity, and when there is some real education and natural intelligence, rusticity, with its freshness and humanity, is about as dangerous a quality as I know. But allowing all this, there is something more about you, Phœbe, which I am not able to fathom. You have reasonable, modest eyes, child, an open forehead, a trustful mouth—you look horribly innocent and true."

"Mrs. Edgecumbe," Phœbe burst out, laughing, "have you been reading 'Little Red Riding-Hood?' and are you the wolf wanting to eat me up?"

"Many people would say I was a wolf; and the best they could say of me was that I was not in sheep's clothing. But I don't want to eat you up, let them say what they will. I want to help you if I can, for you took my fancy, as you have taken other people's fancies since then. Have I been reading 'Red Riding-Hood?' Pray, have you been reading 'Clarissa Harlowe?'"

"What do you mean, Mrs. Edgecumbe?" Phœbe urged. "You used to be good to me; you would not bring me out with you to insult me; that would be wanton;" and on this Phœbe rose up in the carriage.

"Phœbe Paston, if you don't sit still, I'll not answer for Queen of Hearts. Don't you see how she is pricking her ears at your bouncing? After all, my wrists are not so tough as they have been. What a girl you are to fly off in high dudgeon because Clarissa Harlowe is named to you! It is like poor old King George—Turnip George we called him at one time—taking down Shakespeare. What! are you to sit in judgment on poor sinners whose hard lines you have never dreamt of, you young pharisee?"

"If I am a pharisee, I am not a hypocrite, Mrs. Edgecumbe. You said you were not a wolf in sheep's clothing; and though I may be a pharisee, I repeat I am not a hypocrite. What I say is, that it is a crying sin and shame in a girl to run open-eyed into temptation."

"Now, you are not so bad, Phœbe; but the French are right when they say it is the young who are severe—that is, among honest, good people. What do you call running into temptation, if not accepting the addresses of a prince, as Cinderella did? Wo-ho! Queen of Hearts."

"I have accepted nobody's addresses, Mrs. Edgecumbe; but if I had, should I be bound to tell you or anybody?" Phœbe was badgered into retorting.

"Then he has not paid them? So much the worse or the better for you—cela dépend! I don't know about being bound to tell me. You might do worse. I think you ought to take into account that I have come, for your sake, out of my way, not simply to Wellfield, but to pay a visit to my airy young Madam at this dull season in the country. Then here I am, trusting to Queen of Hearts and Marigold—not only my neck, but Squire Edgecumbe's happiness. He would be lost without me, poor old squire. Nobody else would understand his merits. The world has grown a great deal too proper and virtuous for him, poor dear. The haute noblesse—the best of the upper houses—are loyal to their order, and genuinely noble. But their excellences are bound up ineradically with their faults, and one of the most unmistakable of these is a refined sort of pride, in its refinement the very essence of the article. These aristocrats are so many christened and consecrated Lucifers."

"Can Lucifer be christened and consecrated?" inquired Phœbe.

"I hope he can, for you know I am his cousin; but we have been told how hard it is."

"I fear you are growing profane now, Mrs. Edgcumbe, and what is worse, making fun of the profanity."

"No, no, Phœbe, I am not profane; I am in thundering earnest, as Edgcumbe says: and it can be done. You must know you are not, and have no title to be a Lucifer. Very well, when I have seen girls like you come in contact with Lucifers, why they got burnt up—that was all. But come, you must bear with me and listen," Mrs. Edgcumbe said, taking note that Phœbe was again waxing restive. "I have turned the horses' heads, and in a few minutes more will also have turned the heads of the good people of Wellfield by the renewed spectacle of the wolf and the lamb—or the eagle and the dove, shall it be?—driving a mail-phaeton together. I shall set you down unharmed at the entrance to Woovers' Alley."

"I suppose you mean to be kind, Mrs. Edgcumbe; but I could wish you understood me better."

"Well, have I not said already that I do not understand you, Phœbe, with your pretty spirit, your brave front, your modest eyes? No more do I understand Wriothlesley, though he has got a few drops of my blood in his veins, wandering so wide of his path. Times and persons are changed, for a mercy, I own that; but they are not so much changed that the Exmoors, who destine Wriothlesley for a prime-minister before he dies, will take to their hearts the daughter of a painter, however honourable his fame, and however high her deserts, not even though she is Lady Dorothea's friend—and I grant you Lady Dorothea could not have a better. They will not singe a hair of your head, these Lucifers; but will they not smother you—throw you into deadly sickness, poor Phœbe! with the fumes of their pride? It has very much of the nature of brimstone yet, though it is doubly refined."

Phœbe was just about to rise with renewed protest when Mrs. Edgcumbe went on again—

"Nay, you shall hear me out, Phœbe; for I am more your friend than you think. Sit you still, for Queen of Hearts must not be trifled with. I was going to say that if they are so cooled down by virtue and Christianity that they will not strike a light at all, will they not hold you at arm's length and send a chill into your bones by their coldness? They may keep you in the outer court of the Gentiles waiting,—waiting till the world be turned upside down, which will not be till you are withered and blighted. They are as obstinate as bull-dogs, these stag-hounds of Latimers. Was there not word of another suitor for you, Phœbe—a man of your own degree, a clever painter like your father, and a fortune in your rank? What is the weighty objection against him that his solid advantages do not outweigh the ignis-fatuus of Wriothlesley's attachment? which is so vastly romantic, ridiculous, and disastrous, that I must tell you, Phœbe, it is in the mouth of the whole county. Everybody is wondering and grieving for the Exmoors and the Exmoors' order, shaking their heads over Wriothlesley, surmising about you. My poor girl, it may take a long time and a long trial before you can live down gossip and scandal, whether you abide by the old love or go off with the new."

Phœbe had sat silent, pressing her lips together, for the last half-mile, but when the phaeton stopped in the High Street she could not refuse to take Mrs. Edgcumbe's hand, and say to her, "I am much obliged to you, Mrs. Edgcumbe;" for, though she had shocked and offended her, she sought to do her a service.

Not that Mrs. Edgcumbe's remonstrance was of the smallest use. Phœbe and she were like two planets whose orbits were radically different, so that though the planets might be brought together, they would never amalgamate.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—A SURPRISE.

THE summer was advancing. The Latimers, contrary to expectation, remained in London, until it did not seem worth while to come down and celebrate Lady Dorothea's marriage till the end of the season. It was no disappointment to Phœbe, but a reprieve. She did not long for another look of Lord Wriothlesley, and she was even piteously sensitive to the fact that she had always wished and wearied for the coming of the family and Lady Dorothea.

Then Phœbe had other engagements. On the first of June her cousins, the Halls, paid a long-promised visit to Wellfield. Though it was only of three days' duration, on account of the Halls being on their way to the seaside, where Jane—Mrs. Connel—had been ordered to recruit from an illness, it had the effect of relieving somewhat the even tenor of Phœbe's days.

Phœbe was glad that they had come to Wellfield when the family at Brockcotes were from home. Yet how should she feel now at going up to the great old show-place, and making a display to her cousins of the relics and the magnificence which might one day be hers, in which she had already a breathless interest, and when she was not sure if it were not sacrilege in her to approach them? How should she request permission, as if to spy the land, from Mrs. Bald, with Mr. Clarges looking stonily at her, and feeling that common civility to her and her kindred was nothing short of treachery to the powers that be—to the Earl and Countess, to Lady Dorothea, to Lord Wriothlesley even?

Phœbe was still gladder that the Halls had arrived at an epoch when her mother, unable to stand alone, and receiving no support from her father and her, was suffering from reaction. She had fallen from a state of exultation into one of despondency, when she could do nothing save hear Folksbridge news, and deliver fitful, feeble moralisings on the uncertainty of human affairs, the deceitfulness of men, the sauciness of girls, and, above all, the folly of putting reliance on the great.

"I suppose Aunt Paston is vexed because you have contrived to lose sight of Barty Wooler," argued Olive Hall, who was the clever woman of the family. "I don't wonder that she is displeased by that performance, Phœbe; for most mothers would take it to heart, and most daughters would live to regret it. Of course, I hope you may be the exception, though I gave you good advice the other way, you perverse puss. Kate, with all her fine-lady feelings and fancies, is not half so perverse."

Naturally it was not particularly agreeable to Phœbe to be reminded, at this date, of the inequality of her companionship with Lady Dorothea, but she would a thousand times rather have it so than that Olive or any of the Halls should have the faintest inkling of the real state of matters. She could not be sufficiently thankful that Frank, who had a lawyer's acumen for a secret, had not accompanied his sisters to Wellfield.

Without Brockcotes, Phœbe would have found it a little difficult to entertain her cousins. They were accustomed to the stir and variety of a large town. Olive was energetic, and testified her dissatisfaction by restlessness and uncertainty of temper. Jane and Kate suffered from languor and ennui. Olive was clever, once. Phœbe had thought Olive almost as clever as Frank; but a wider experience of cleverer, more original people, in Barty Wooler, Lord Wriothlesley, and Lady Dorothea, had shown Phœbe that three-fourths of Olive's cleverness consisted in a strong will, some power of application and comparison, together with a quick capacity for detecting errors, and a ready sense of the ridiculous. But Olive was certainly warm-hearted, more so than Jane and Kate; and Phœbe, who had lived a year and a half at Garnet Lodge, had yet to learn that this warmth of heart was limited like other gifts of Olive's, and that it might degenerate into family selfishness, which is but an extension of personal selfishness. Kate Hall, on the other hand, was not clever, and was without any claim to mental superiority, but she was a much prettier woman than Olive, and had more taste and more pretension to accomplishments. She had even some natural grace and elegance. She had a talent, as all the family knew to their cost, for music and drawing.

Phœbe was in the court with the Halls, receiving the somewhat damping opinion from Olive that all the Wooers' Alley roses, carnations, and heartsease were worth nothing, with the additional depressing information, that to get and keep fine specimens such as they had at Garnet Lodge, called for an ample outlay of money, and at least one trained gardener. At the same time Phœbe was trying to divert Kate from pulling idly at the whole of the salvia for a bouquet, when Mrs. Connel came running out to them with an important piece of intelligence.

"See how Jane can run when she has got something in her head," commented Olive. "I declare she looks as animated as she used to do before her marriage."

"You may be glad Walter Connel did not hear you say that," corrected Kate.

"I don't think I may. I mean no reflection on Walter. He cannot be always putting things into Jane's head. That is just what a married woman loses—expectation of change, diversion, excitement; and Jane cannot bring herself to lose anything—not even our lounging-chair or our preserved ginger."

Mrs. Connel interrupted Olive.

"Come into the house, you three," she summoned the others breathlessly. "There is a visitor, and who do you think? Lord Wriothlesley. He came down from town yesterday. I heard him say so, and that the rest of the family are coming to-morrow. If we are to see Brockcotes it must be to-day; and if you wish to see him you had better be quick, for he was shown into the drawing-room beside Aunt Paston and me at the very moment when I was letting her see how we arranged our table-napkins; and, of course, I cannot tell how long he may stay."

"Oh, do make haste!" Kate urged, as poor Phœbe blushed and hesitated. "I should like above all things to be in company with Lord Wriothlesley. I suppose there is no etiquette against your introducing us while he is making a morning call?"

"I wonder to hear you, Kate," exclaimed Olive, quickening her own steps. "What an unsophisticated idiot you are representing yourself! as if Lord Exmoor's son were a hero or a monster, or as if you were a country girl, who had never seen 'a real live lord' before! Lord Holderness and Lord Aylmer were at the last volunteer-ball, and Lord Aylmer was at the bazaar, and bought your scrap-book, and from yourself, too. He said its contents were beyond any attempt of Lady Hester Crawford's."

"Oh! but it is something different to meet Lord Wriothlesley in private, and sit and talk to him like an ordinary mortal. You must grant that, Olive."

Since Lord Wriothlesley was come in the vanguard of the family, Phœbe did not wish to prevent his meeting her cousins. The sooner he knew every one belonging to her, and all about them, the better, if there were ever to be a necessity for his knowing them. And he might know worse people than the Halls. But she did earnestly desire that her mother might not mention to Lord Wriothlesley their project of going up to see Brockcotes.

Instead of this escape, Phœbe and her cousins found Lord Wriothlesley and Mrs. Paston already deep in the arrangement, his Lordship offering, with the greatest courtesy, to escort the cousins himself, and Mrs. Paston inviting him to stay and join the family party at luncheon previous to starting, all on the most friendly footing. This was too much of a good thing, and more than Phœbe had bargained for.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—ANOTHER ORDEAL.

PHŒBE found it very trying to set out for Brockcotes by the High Street of Wellfield, either carrying Lord Wriothlesley in her train, or being carried in his. Every well-informed native they met stood agape at the familiar faces of Lord Wriothlesley and Phœbe Paston seen in conjunction and in company with the Halls. The forty Miss Medlars flew in all directions with the news, causing Miss Rowe to tear the night-cap from her head, since she happened to be in bed owing to an inopportune attack of jaundice.

Mrs. Connel and the Halls were in their stylish sea-side costume of yachting jackets, sailors' ties and caps, bearing the badge of the yachting-club to which Mr. Connel belonged. It was a very nice dress for the sea-side, though not now strictly appropriate, any more than a bathing-machine would be to an inland town like Wellfield. Mrs. Connel had volunteered to be everybody's matron; so that Mrs. Paston was not required to break the even tenor of her way by the unusual exertion of walking out for any purpose except that of paying visits.

The group soon arrived at the Wellfield gate, where they scandalized the rigid propriety, and fairly transfixed the nimble tongue, of Mrs. Chenevix. Phœbe had fancied that the great ordeal of the expedition would be over for her when she had got through Wellfield High Street. But she found that her troubles were only beginning. Lord Wriothlesley was walking on first with Olive Hall. Phœbe ought to have been engrossed with her labour of love in directing Jane's and Kate's attention to the extent of the Brockcotes park (seen even from an avenue), to the side of the larches and the sycamores, the perfection of the American garden, and the grand pile of building coming into view as the crown of the gentle ascent. But poor Phœbe's mind was sorely distracted by speculations on the topic of conversation between the couple before her. It was scarcely speculation. Phœbe was morally certain that Olive would be applying the principles of landscape-gardening, as exemplified in the four acres of ground round Garnet Lodge, to the disadvantage of the park at Brockcotes, which was more than double the number of miles in circumference. Further, Olive would be giving Lord Wriothlesley the benefit of her opinion on woods and forests in general, and the game laws as a statute in connection with them.

The great gateway did not fall and crush the party. Mrs. Bald, whatever might have been her bearing to them under other leadership, deferred to the presence of the son of the house. She came out to receive the visitors, followed by a housemaid to carry the keys and a footman to shut the doors behind her. Mr. Clarges hovered between the doors of the buttery and his private apartments, not coming too prominently forward, yet not denying Lord Wriothesley's right to command his attendance should he also be wanted.

Mrs. Bald was a handsome, middle-aged woman, large in every way, and with the double-chin which is becoming in a housekeeper and a hostess. She could have tucked up the Countess like a baby in the skirt of her brown silk (Lady Exmoor did not insist on a black one); and her respect for the Countess, who did not stammer above a sentence once a week to her housekeeper, was unbounded.

Mr. Clarges wore his hair in the old-fashioned tufts at the side, and the style of whiskers adhered to by the Earl; only Mr. Clarges's hair was much more luxuriant. He dressed, too, very much as the Earl did of an evening. But although Mr. Clarges was a gentlemanlike, elderly man, with something of a military carriage, he had never been mistaken for his master in his life. He would have looked daggers of scorn at the man who should have been foolish or insolent enough to have made so gross a mistake, or pass so scurrilous a jest.

The going over the great house, suite by suite and corridor by corridor, began. Then Olive's inquisitiveness and self-sufficiency, and the ignorance of all the sisters, became conspicuous. Not that any one of the Halls was exceptionally ignorant; only the knowledge which was Brockcotes knowledge was strange to them. The language spoken there, whether or not it was a shibboleth, was foreign in their ears. Olive, especially, had a fundamental want of reverence in her mental constitution, which caused her to see nothing in the old guard-room and banqueting-room, beyond musty apartments which were so many feet in length and breadth. She "loved to be particular" in ascertaining dimensions, in order that she might tell the party that the Queen Anne's parlour was not an inch bigger than the back drawing-room at Garnet Lodge. She was strong on the superiority of modern accommodation. How could people have lived in such dark rooms, with such hard seats and bare boards? What a rude, uncouth life it must have been! Why, a modern mechanic's cottage was better in many respects.

"Do you not think one's ancestors could endure a few hardships in the centre of this, Miss Hall?" suggested Lord Wriothesley, pulling aside the faded window-curtains and looking out on the wide park, with the spreading oaks and sweeping beeches, and the open bountiful country beyond.

"I daresay they never looked at it," declared Olive, "though they hunted its deer and ate its beeves. What did they hear of the beauties of nature and of scenic effect?"

"Not hear—but feel. Don't you think so, Miss Paston?" maintained his Lordship.

"Oh, if you appeal to Phœbe, she was brought up under the shadow of Brockcotes, and in the faith of Brockcotes—down even to caring more for that little puppy dog of hers which came from Brockcotes, than for all the men and women past the pale of cousins in Folksbridge. She is as bigoted a Tory as—you could find," Olive wound up, changing the natural end of her sentence, conscious that she was venturing a little too far.

But Lord Wriothesley only laughed lightly. "I accept the inference. I am quite willing to be counted a Tory and a tyrant, if only Miss Paston will abide in the faith of Brockcotes; though I foolishly thought we were Whigs, and that I was the whiggist member of the family, and, upon my word, rather a fellow of the period."

But Olive, undaunted, proceeded as if she were taking stock of Brockcotes, and putting down at the lowest figure worn Turkey carpets, faded satin couches, with "fleur-de-lys in black velvet and gold." After all, she showed her trade extraction by her keen interest in judging the market-value of every article, and in tacitly proving to her own satisfaction, that although there was a great collection, there was nothing (unless the pictures, the books, the china, the plate, and the jewels, of course, and a few cabinets and caskets) which was intrinsically worth a larger sum of money than the rich merchants of Folksbridge—the Clays, for instance—could pay for their fancies.

Phœbe tried to awaken Olive to the real interest of many of the treasures, and Lord Wriothesley did not fail in his duty. He brought out a fragment of the translation from the Greek Gospel of St. John, in Princess Mary's own handwriting.

Olive impugned the authenticity of the manuscript, standing out stoutly and brandishing her thorough acquaintance with the out-works of history. Bloody Mary help a Protestant version of the Bible—certainly not. She could not swallow that. There was no use in telling her that the same Mary had also supplemented the Dutch Reformer, Erasmus, in the Psalms. She was as fully convinced of her superior correctness in annals approprize to some spoils of the Civil War, with which her unexceptionably founded and digested information would by no means fit in.

"I believe the Boscobel Papers favour our story," Lord Wriothlesley hinted modestly.

Olive had not happened to hear of the Boscobel Papers, and directly said so, with a dogmatism in her tone, which signified that, in consequence, they did not deserve to be heard of. And later down in the ages, Olive was still more at fault. She was fretted by this; and Jane and Kate were wearied of wandering through labyrinths. The inspection of the pictures was hurried over,—and Phoebe was glad of it. None of the Halls—not even Kate, who drew indifferently well, nor Olive, who had a halting ambition after art—could admire a picture except for the merest feat of execution, for glaring effects and sensational strokes, or for stereotyped pasteboard picturesqueness. Phoebe had suspected it before by seeing her father wince under her cousins' comments, especially under their commendations in his painting-room that morning.

The Halls, in virtue of their woman's nature, revived a little when, in the charter-room, not charters, but jewelled collars, richly-set swords, silver-gilt basins and ewers were submitted to their inspection. The ladies consented to do homage to the great glittering drops of the Exmoor necklace. But even here, the abbreviations and the allusions which Lord Wriothlesley innocently made, were a mystery to them. The SS collar was anything to them but the collar of the Golden Fleece; green velvet bags did not necessarily refer in their minds to secretaries of state; or white wands to grand chamberlains; or gold keys to lord high treasurers. Even red and blue ribbons were not, without fail, allied to the Star of the Order of the Bath, and the George of the Garter.

"Weren't you always told that it was low to employ nicknames?" whispered Kate to Phoebe, in considerable confusion. Kate was connecting the SS collar and the white sticks with the Coos, the Bullies, the black Finches, the white Hares, starvation-Dundas, and single-dance Lady Bell, whom Lord Wriothlesley had glibly cited in illustration of their contemporaries among the family pictures.

But Phoebe only said, "Haven't you an idea now what it is not to have a grandfather?"

"We all have the gardener Adam to fall back upon," interposed Lord Wriothlesley, who had been within hearing of Phoebe's answer. "Indeed, we are a little nearer gardeners. You noticed 'Charming Nancy' Lady Exmoor? She was Nancy Reeves, the home-bailiff's daughter."

Then there had been one low marriage in the Exmoor family. Phoebe opened her eyes.

"I have heard of 'Charming Nancy' Lady Exmoor, but I did not know she was a bailiff's daughter," Phoebe observed.

"We don't speak of her as such," Lord Wriothlesley replied readily. "We have preferred to incorporate her with ourselves, and to count her charms to our own credit. You observe we don't forget the charms, Miss Paston, but are proud to own them to this day."

Mrs. Bald could hold her tongue no longer.

"That was only a story, my Lord, got up by our enemies," she remonstrated, with a toss of her head. "If it ever did happen, which I don't say it did, it was in the days of some of them troubles, I forget which, when the man Reeves rendered important assistance to my Lord as then was."

"When are there days without troubles, Mrs. Bald?" Lord Wriothlesley questioned, to tease her. "I am sure I don't know such days, or days when assistance is not wanted. I daresay, now, Reeves took in my great-great-grandfather when he was a little sick of the trouble of living, and of himself, as the greatest trouble of all. I have a notion old Reeves brought old Exmoor into contact with fresh goodness, and so did him good. Naturally Lord Exmoor would not forget the source of the goodness, but would want to have it, and would have it too—what should hinder him?—as a perennial spring in his heart and house. Depend upon it that was the story, Mrs. Bald."

"What affectation these fine gentlemen have, one way or another!" Olive took occasion to say aside to Phoebe. "What a piece of make-believe it is for Lord Wriothlesley, born with a gold spoon in his mouth, to speak of the trouble of living, as if he knew anything about it!"

"Don't you find it a trouble to live as you ought, Olive; and you were born with a silver spoon in your mouth?" Phoebe retorted, taking Lord Wriothlesley's part behind his back. "Isn't it a Christian's life to have a battle to fight?"

"Oh, yes! if you are going to put it in that way," protested Olive. "But, of course, he meant nothing serious."

"Why nothing serious? The Exmoor family are the most in earnest of any people I know, unless it may be papa in his art."

"My dear Phoebe, you are infatuated about the Exmoor family."

At that home-thrust, and in horror lest Lord Wriothlesley should hear more like it, Phoebe was silent.

The work of seeing Brockcotes was so heavy, that Mrs. Bald's unquestioning provision of tea, fruit, and wine, in the library, was not only acceptable, but, as Mrs. Connel thought, imperatively needed. Olive's spirits rose too. Not that she was physically exhausted, but that the tea was Twining's tea, neither more nor less, which the Halls always used. There were slices of ordinary bread-and-butter, Mayduke cherries and strawberries. The fruit was not so much better and earlier than what the Halls could produce at Garnet Lodge. There were certainly ices on the table, and the Halls would not think of sending for ices on a moment's notice, though they lived within half a mile of their confectioner. Olive did not pretend to be a judge of claret and madeira, but she understood that very light wines were in ordinary circulation in a house like Brockcotes, and she believed Lord Wriothlesley made the most of these before the company by calling the one his father's claret and the other his mother's madeira.

Olive's lynx eyes detected club-books in common bindings on the table; so that, notwithstanding the dignity of oaken book-shelves round and round, tier on tier, and Russian leather stamped with the Latimer crest, she was relieved and gratified to think that the Exmoors had their literature from public libraries like other folk.

She proceeded to put Lord Wriothlesley—who, she owned, was good-natured and civil in doing the honours of his house—through an examination on the pursuits of his family. Was Lady Dorothea very musical? Did she play on the harp as well as the piano? Was she a fine player? She asked almost wistfully, aware of her own defects of ear and taste, but remembering that she had Kate's proficiency to fall back upon.

"Well, I can't say," his Lordship answered, with strange uncertainty. "Would you say Dora was very musical, Miss Paston? She likes the opera, I know, and is always wanting a fellow to see her to her box; but then she likes the theatre, too, when Kean or Fechter or Helen Faucit makes a house. But as to playing on the harp, I'm sure of that, for she could never be taught to tune it. She has not much time to play on the piano. After all, you know when she is desperate for music she can get far better performers, professional artistes, than ever she could be as an amateur."

Olive experienced a sense of consolation, and, at the same time, she felt bewildered, for although she did not confess it exactly, she had been accustomed to associate personal proficiency in music and the fine arts with refinement. She recovered herself by declaring decidedly, "She cannot have any musical talent; if she had, she would find time for its development. She must have her time at her own disposal."

"Has she, Miss Paston? Poor Dolly! She has got all the women's part of the family correspondence to keep up, since mamma's wrists have failed; and the heaviest end of the company in the house and of the visiting to carry on. She has to hear one-half of the appeals of refractory subjects, and to attend to three-fourths of the requirements of applicants and pensioners. She says herself that the height of the London season is comparative rest to what she must be up to in the country. She may have grown fat at Wiesbaden, but I expect that her hair will be grey before she goes to do Fairchester's business."

"You will excuse me for saying it, Lord Wriothlesley, but there must be a great deficiency in organization and management somewhere, and a great waste of time in this house," said Olive, as she smiled on him condescendingly. "Yes, my good woman, there must," she went on, nodding to Mrs. Bald, who stood confounded at this mercantile young lady's unutterable conceit and impudence. "You must believe that we have company—see a great deal of it, in fact, at Garnet Lodge. I take an interest in my clergyman's religious and philanthropic schemes. I assure you we are not heathens in Folksbridge. I am a member of several societies; indeed I am the secretary of one, besides being a district visitor. But we get through so much by method and system. I am afraid Lady Dorothea must fritter away her days playing at being the Lady Bountiful of her parish, which is apt to be the fault of country ladies."

"I daresay we should all be the better of lessons from Folksbridge," answered Lord Wriothlesley, meekly; "but is there not something to be said for our influence being peculiar, and for the advantage of personal contact?"

"I don't see it," said Olive. "As for riding with the Earl, and driving with the Countess, these are family arrangements; but cannot Lady Dorothea trust her father and mother alone? Are they not fit to take care of and entertain themselves?"

"To hear you, Olive, one would think that you had no natural affection; yet what daughter could have been more devoted than you were to Aunt Hall in her bad illness two years ago?" urged Phœbe, desperately, by way of diversion.

"When mamma or papa is ill, that is another matter," observed Olive, carelessly.

When Phœbe thought of it, she was forced to admit to herself, that the young Halls, without any radical want of duty or attachment, had drifted away from their father and mother in their pursuits and tasks. Mr. Hall was a very indulgent father, but it bored rather than pleased him to have his daughters' company in his carriage to and from his office.

"Is Lady Dorothea a first-rate artist?" cross-questioned Olive, returning to the charge; "I mean does she draw and paint well,—for you call musicians artistes?"

"No, not a bit first-rate," proclaimed Lord Wriothlesley, frankly. "She sketches with wonderful speed and satisfaction to herself; but as to the correctness—I say she should have damages from Paston."

"Did you ever hear anything so rude—to say that before Phœbe?" whispered Mrs. Connel to her sister Kate.

"But I don't think he can mean it," replied Kate, with a bright idea; "for he and Phœbe seem quite good friends, though they hardly say a word to each other."

"I wish Walter were here," exclaimed Mrs. Connel aloud, as she threw herself languidly back on her chair. "I am ready to die with fatigue. I really think I should not have come."

"I really think you should not," acquiesced Olive, dryly. "It is a pity that you did not discover that in time, Jane, as well as in the case of the other blunders you have made in your life."

Jane possessed but a moderate amount of self-restraint at any time, and little or none when, as now, she was in a state of physical exhaustion. She became almost hysterical in openly rebutting what she took to herself as Olive's intended sarcasm.

"Now, Olive, you mean my marriage with a poor man, and what I gave up when I accepted Walter Connel. You need not contradict me. And I will not be spoken to in this way. Nobody can say that I repine at the step I took. Did you not hear me wishing Walter were here? and really it is high time he were here, when his wife is so spoken to by her own sister."

"It is time we were going home with you, Jane; that is what it is time to do," asserted Olive, with exasperating superiority and coolness. "We must give up the gardens on Jane's account, as usual."

Phœbe was only eager to end a scene which was covering her with mortification. Olive and Jane did not dream of her feelings amidst this little revelation of the weakness and asperity in which they were in the habit of indulging.

Phœbe was unsuspecting of another obligation which was to be incurred. Lord Wriothlesley would see her and her friends home, and, in consideration of Jane's invalided condition, he found it no more than common humanity to offer her his arm. Half recovered by the elation of leaning on the arm of the son and heir of a great peer, she chattered all the way of her sufferings, her feelings, and her sacrifices in exchanging Garnet Lodge for Pembroke Crescent. The cavalcade thus retraced its way after Mrs. Bald had had herself put to bed with rage, shame, and "a bad head;" and after Mr. Clarges had gone out riding to recover his composure and set his appetite to rights for the second table and its whist in the evening. The Wellfield gate and Mrs. Chenevix's twinkling hostile eyes at length were passed. The stares cast at the group in the Wellfield streets were encountered and surmounted. Phœbe and her cousins were in Wooers' Alley, at Mr. Paston's door, with Lord Wriothlesley lifting his hat, and taking courteous leave of them, while he promised himself the pleasure of sending over to inquire for Mrs. Connel before she should leave next morning. And Phœbe had no care to spare on inquiring what her cousins thought of Brockcotes, nor any desire but to hide her diminished head.

DEBENHAM'S VOW.

BY AMELIA B. EDWARDS, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S HISTORY."

CHAPTER XLVIII.—"HOME, SWEET HOME."

L A R G E steamer—one of the Royal West India mails plying between Liverpool and Colon—steamed up the Mersey one drizzly, foggy, unprepossessing afternoon in the month of December, 1861, and before going into dock, stopped at one of the landing stages to discharge her passengers. No sooner was the gangway laid down than there set in from the shore an influx of expectant friends, hastening to welcome their travellers home again; and from the ship, an efflux of those travellers who, having none to welcome them, desired only to land and get off to their several destinations as quickly as possible.

Among some of the first to leave the vessel were two young men; the one fair, bronzed, joyous-looking, and dressed with a sort of semi-nautical smartness that bespoke the landsman bred and born; the other dark, thin, pale, his step feeble, his hands white and wasted, evidently an invalid, and hardly strong enough to support himself without the arm of his friend. They had very little luggage, and they drove at once to the London and North-Western Railway Station. Here they learned that a first and second class train would leave for London in half an hour's time.

"And the next after that?" asked the invalid.

"The limited mail, sir, at eleven," replied the porter; "getting into London at four thirty-seven in the morning."

"The first is too soon, and the second is too late," objected the other traveller. "You ought not to go on without proper food and rest; and a night journey is out of the question."

X—46

"I can go on quite well in half an hour," replied the invalid. "At what time does the next train reach Euston Square?"

"Half-past ten, sir—punctual."

"See that! Half-past ten—I shall be home by eleven."

"Far better go to the Waterloo for to-night, and take an early train in the morning," urged his friend.

"No—no—no. I will go home at once. I shall save twenty-four hours by it."

"Say fifteen, at the outside."

"No, twenty-four. Ten to one but Mr. Hardwicke would be gone before I could get down to the City, if I waited till to-morrow; and now I shall be at Prior's Walk as early in the morning as himself. And then, you know, I've not seen my mother for seven months!"

"'Wilful man must have his way.' Come to the refreshment room, at all events, and get something to eat; I'm famished."

So De Benham and Archie—for, of course, it was De Benham and Archie—went to the refreshment room, and had some soup and a chicken before starting. By five o'clock it was quite dark, and they were speeding towards London by the dim light of the carriage lamp. Then De Benham lay down at full length on the seat (for they had secured a compartment to themselves), and Archie covered him with coats and railway rugs, and he fell asleep.

It was now seven weeks since they recaptured the Stormy Petrel, and De Benham had been dangerously ill. They took him into the port of Horta, as they then thought, only to die. But the crisis of his fever passed over, and he lived. Here he was removed to a quiet lodging on the outskirts of the town, and attended not only by the local physician, but by the surgeon of a large English steam-ship then lying in the harbour. Aided by a sister of mercy from the neighbouring convent, Archie nursed his friend faithfully day after day, night after night, scarcely leaving his bedside for an hour till the doctors pronounced him out of danger.

Meanwhile the captain of the Stormy Petrel had enough to do to bring the steamer into port, and could ill afford to have one of his scanty crew down with fever, and needing constant attendance. He did bring her in, however, in the course of the twelfth day after the storm; and a sorry spectacle she presented—one screw disabled, one mast gone, her galley roofless, her bulwarks carried away in two places, her crew haggard, exhausted, with beards of sixteen days' growth, and features so begrimed, that their own nearest friends would scarcely have known them.

Once fairly anchored in neutral waters, Captain Hay's first act was to give the prize crew their liberty. They went ashore for the most part quietly enough; but Lieutenant Kissick refused to shake hands at parting, and the Mexican, whose repertoire of invective was apparently inexhaustible, left the ship calling down strings of the most frightful imprecations upon the head of every man on board. Having put them ashore, Captain Hay left them to shift for themselves as they best could, till some United States' vessel should touch at Horta, and pick them up.

The Stormy Petrel then lay in port for the space of a week and a day, during which time all was done that could be done in a temporary way to repair damages and fit her for the rest of her homeward voyage. A new foremast was rigged up, the bulwarks were replaced, the galley roofed in, and a skilled diver employed to clear the starboard screw from its entanglement of rope and bagging. Here, also, Captain Hay engaged as many fresh hands as might bring his crew up to its proper complement; and here Mr. Zachary Polter went ashore, waiting to go back to Nassau by the next West-India steam-packet.

Then, having taken in coal, water, and fresh provisions, Captain Hay assumed the responsibility of delivering the cargo; left Archie to take care of De Benham; and, satisfied that the supercargo was by that time out of danger, weighed anchor, and put the good boat on her course for England.

Thus it happened that when Archie and De Benham arrived in Liverpool this dreary December afternoon, the Stormy Petrel had preceded them by nearly three weeks, and was at that moment lying over on her beam-ends, undergoing a thorough refitting in one of the Birkenhead dockyards.

About half-way to London, De Benham woke and sat up.

"And this is England again!" he said. "I can scarcely believe that only seven months ago, I was hurrying down this very line to join the Stormy Petrel. It seems like two years."

"You have lived two years in seven months, old fellow," replied Archie. "That's why. I feel something the same way myself."

"I have lived ten years since that time on the Wye," said De Benham. "And that was—how long ago?"

"About seventeen months."

De Benham sighed wearily.

"I suppose I am greatly changed since then, Archie?" he said, after a pause.

"Well, yes; I suppose you are—rather," replied his friend, somewhat reluctantly.

"For the worse, eh?"

"You're—you're become more a man of the world."

"That is to say, I have become worldly."

Archie hesitated.

"Every man, I suppose," he said, at length, "has a right to make money, if he can."

"Why, then, should it be more worldly in me to make money than it is in any other man of business—in Mr. Hardwicke, for instance?"

"I have not said that it is so," replied Archie.

"You imply it."

"No, I don't," said Archie. "I am not accusing you—you are accusing yourself. I have not even said you are worldly."

"Worldly!" echoed De Benham, impatiently. "Good heavens! if you only knew... It is not for my own sake. It is for my mother's sake—for the sake of the dead—for the sake of the past!"

"I wish you wouldn't excite yourself," said Archie. "You forget how weak you are."

But De Benham went on, getting more and more vehement with every word.

"For money, simply as money, I do not care one straw," he said. "Do you suppose I want to be rich that I may enjoy the common pleasures of wealth? That I may have horses to ride, servants to wait upon me, rich dishes to eat, rare wines to drink? Is that what you think? I tell you, then, you mistake me utterly. I desire none of these things. I could be content to trudge on foot, and eat bread, and drink water, all the days of my life."

Archie looked at his watch.

"Only one hour and forty minutes more," he said, turning the conversation. "Don't you think you'd better lie down again?"

"No, no. I do very well as I am."

"Mrs. Debenham has no idea that you will be home before to-morrow, has she?"

"Not the faintest. But do, for heaven's sake, Archie, remember to call us by our right name!"

"I beg your pardon," said Archie, good-humouredly. "Mrs. De Benham, I should have said. But you only told me of it yesterday, you know; and it's so difficult to change all at once."

"I hope not," replied De Benham; and in all he said there cropped up the latent irritability of an invalid. "I hope not. It is a vile corruption of a noble Norman name."

"Were the De Benhams ever noble?" asked Archie.

"Undoubtedly. The prefix alone is evidence of signorial rights."

"It's a fine thing, after all, to inherit a good old name," said Archie. "I can't think why you ever put up with the corruption."

"Because I didn't know that it was a corruption till—the summer before last."

"Then why didn't you change back to it at once?"

De Benham shook his head.

"I was a penniless beggar then," he said. "I was not going to bring discredit on the name."

"It is no discredit to be poor."

"That depends on the sort of poverty. A man may be in the army, and have nothing but his pay and his sword, and yet be no whit inferior to the first nobleman in the land. But he cannot claim to be a gentleman, or the equal of gentlemen, if he plays the organ at a little City church for twenty-five pounds a year, and gives music-lessons to the children of leather-dressers and meat-salesmen."

"I should have thought music was more gentlemanly than trade," said Archie.

"In the abstract, regarded as one of the fine arts—yes. But in the concrete, as the means of eking out a shabby livelihood—no."

"And your dream of becoming a great composer—a second Meyerbeer or Mendelssohn—is that over for ever?"

"For ever? Ah, no—I hope not. It depends . . . if ever I am rich enough—if ever I leave off this life of work and win my way to a life of leisure . . ."

"Rich enough!" interrupted Archie. "Why, I should have thought you were 'rich enough' already."

But again De Benham shook his head.

"I am getting tired," he said. "I must lie down again. How these carriages shake!"

So he lay down; and Archie covered him again with rugs and wraps, and gave him some sherry from a flask.

"Perhaps you can sleep a bit more, old chap," he said.

To which De Benham replied that he would try; and so closed his eyes, and spoke no more till they reached London.

Arrived at the Euston Square terminus, Archie saw after their luggage, called a cab, and went up with his friend to the door of his own home.

"You'll come in and see my mother," said De Benham, waiting to be let in.

"No, that I won't," replied Archie. "She shall have you all to herself to-night; and I'll be off at once, before the door opens."

In another minute the wanderer was in his mother's arms, welcomed, wept over, adored.

"But you have been very ill!" she said, when the first moment of meeting was over. "I see that you have been much more ill than you told me!"

"Darling Mutter, once the worst was over, where would have been the good of telling you?"

"The worst! Ah, what was the worst? Tell me all, my darling."

"Well—we didn't get back the ship, you know, without a struggle; and I got a slash just here, in my left side, from one of those confounded Yankees" . . .

"Wounded! oh heavens!—and then?"

"And then I had a bout of brain fever."

Lady De Benham uttered a cry, and took him in her arms again, and kissed his forehead, his eyes, his hair. Brain fever! He—her boy—her own, one treasure had brain fever, and she not there to watch and tend him! She could scarcely believe it. It seemed too terrible to be true.

"And for what," she said, bitterly, "for whom have you suffered? In what cause have you risked your precious, precious life? For neither honour nor fame. For trade. For a few wretched cotton bales and a little ignoble gain. For the benefit of that man in the City, whose wages you condescend to accept. Oh, Temple! oh, my son!"

"Dearest mother," replied De Benham, laughingly, "be sure that for Mr. Hardwicke's benefit alone, I would not take the journey from Canonbury to St. Paul's. I am not so benevolent. What I have done, I have done for my own sake—and yours."

"Not for mine!" she said, shuddering. "Oh, no! Do not say that you were wounded and ill for my sake!"

"Well, shall I say for the sake of what you call my 'ignoble gains'?"

"You treat it lightly enough," said Lady De Benham; "but what should I have done if . . . if I had lost you?"

"But you have not lost me, Mutterchen! You have not lost me, and . . . I HAVE MADE SIXTY THOUSAND POUNDS."

CHAPTER XLIX.—A PASSAGE OF ARMS.

DE BENHAM came back to find himself famous. The story of the re-capture had made its way long since into all the papers, and he and Captain Hay were the heroes of the tale. A spirited woodcut of the Stormy Petrel, sketched by an artist despatched to Birkenhead for that special purpose, had already appeared in the Illustrated London News. Two wonderful fancy portraits, in which both captain and supercargo were represented in the costume of bold buccaneers and the likeness of hair-dressers' dummies, graced the pages of a popular pictorial penny serial, and were to be seen in the windows of every petty newsvendor's shop and on every kitchen table in the metropolis. A grand romantic, sensational, nautical drama in six tableaux, entitled "Stars and Bars; or, the Blockade-runner of the Western Main," was announced for immediate representation at one of the transpontine theatres. Throughout the clubs, for one whole day, the story was in every man's mouth. Down at the docks, at Lloyd's, at Trinity House, in the Long Room at the Custom House, and the like, it was still the prevailing topic of conversation. The provincial papers fell upon it en masse, dished it up in a dozen different ways, and fed their readers upon it for a week. In short, Captain Frank Hay, being a plain man with no relish for display and a horror of speech-making, was so disturbed by the warmth of his reception, by the dinners he had to eat, the questions he had to answer, and the bows he had to make, that he fled from his own notoriety at the end of the first week, and took refuge among his relations down in the wilds of Cornwall.

And now De Benham came, and of him the world was disposed to make even a greater hero than it had made of Captain Hay. He was young; he was gentlemanly; he was good-looking. Above all, he had been wounded; and he was still suffering from the consequences of his wound. What more could a sensation-loving public desire, except to persecute its hero with dinners and speeches, testimonials and addresses; to waylay him on staircases; pin him up in corners of drawing-rooms; pester him for biographical materials; for his autograph, his photograph, his monogram, and everything that was his; and lionise him within an inch of his life? All this they would have done, if De Benham could have been brought to submit to it; but he was, in his way, as intractable as Captain Hay. To the compilers of penny-press biographies, he turned a deaf ear. To the young ladies who wrote pretty imploring notes begging for his carte de visite, autograph, and so forth, he got Lady De Benham to indite civil refusals. To the public companies, naval associations, ship-owners', ship-brokers', and other societies which desired to entertain him, his present condition of health supplied a sufficient and satisfactory excuse. He was, in fact, too proud to accept all this miscellaneous hospitality, and too anxious for the preservation of his incognito not to try by every means in his power to divert public curiosity from himself, his antecedents, and his family history.

"I have no mind," he said, talking it over with his mother, "I have no mind to appear before these commercial bodies in the character of a meritorious young man who has done his duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call him, and therefore deserves encouragement. I don't choose to be shaken hands with, and praised, and patted on the back by them. They mean to be very complimentary, I have no doubt, and very condescending; but such civilities need to be accepted in a grateful spirit—and my spirit would not be grateful."

Proud as she was, Lady De Benham could not quite partake in her son's scorn of his own popularity. The incense that these people desired to burn before him, even though it was tainted with the things of trade, would have smelt sweet in her nostrils. Despite her better taste and her better judgment, she could not help feeling that it would have been pleasant to sit in the ladies' gallery, and see him fêted, and hear his health proposed, and listen to the speeches made in his honour. As for the deed that he had done, and the notoriety he had achieved thereby, these were circumstances that went far, in truth, towards reconciling her to the career he had chosen. Living in seclusion as she lived, reading no newspapers and hearing no gossip, she had begun by scarcely appreciating all the gallantry of the first, and by knowing nothing of the extent of the second. But now, finding that the world at large (and especially that narrow, grasping, selfish, commercial world, which she had hitherto held in such contempt) was disposed to regard her idol as a hero, Lady De Benham's views underwent some modification. She ventured so far now as to admit that even in the course of trade, brave and honourable things might be achieved; and (which was still more wonderful) be not only achieved, but appreciated. She would have been far happier, of course, if the whole thing had happened in the Royal Navy instead of in the merchant service ; if, for instance, her boy had recaptured an English ship in time of war. That would have been glory unalloyed ; but even "glory obscured" was, for his sake, worth the having.

Stand aloof as they might, however, there was one entertainment organized in their joint honour, from accepting which neither Temple De Benham nor Captain Frank Hay found it possible to excuse themselves ; and this was a dinner of ceremony at Strathellan House.

Now De Benham, it may be remembered, had once before been invited to dine at Mr. Hardwicke's table, and had declined the honour. That was in the earlier days of their connection, when the young man returned from his journey to St. Petersburg ; and Mr. Hardwicke then proposed that the party should consist of Archibald Blyth, Mr. Timothy Knott, and "one or two City men."

But the aspect of affairs had greatly changed since that time. Nothing was now to be spared that might do honour to the hero of the occasion—for though the captain of the Stormy Petrel came in for his equal share in these demonstrations, still Temple De Benham was in the eyes of most people, and above all in the eyes of Mr. Hardwicke, the hero par excellence of the events they met to celebrate. So there was now to be a dinner of ceremony followed by an immense reception in the evening ; and the grand service of silver-gilt plate was to be used for the first ; a supper was to be furnished by Gunter for the second ; the hall, staircases, and supper-room were to be lined with the choicest exotics ; and the greatest of living violinists was to be engaged for the entertainment of the guests.

"He takes you down, of course, Claudia," said Mr. Hardwicke across the breakfast table. It was the morning of the day of the dinner-party, and they were discussing the final arrangements.

"The man of lowest rank present !" said Miss Hardwicke. "It seems preposterous."

"Not when the whole affair is held in his honour. Read an account of any dinner given to any public character—say, for instance, to a Times correspondent—and you will find that he takes precedence of all the nobility in the room."

"Well, granting that point—the place of honour belongs, I should imagine, in this case, to the captain. This young man is only the supercargo."

"This young man originated the whole enterprise, to begin with, and has put upwards of four hundred thousand pounds in my pocket," replied the merchant, warmly.

"And this young man not only conceived the daring scheme by means of which the ship was saved from confiscation ; but fought, and was wounded, in the act of carrying that scheme into execution. If ever one man deserved precedence more than another, young Debenham deserves it to-night."

"As you please," said Miss Hardwicke, indifferently. "I shall be very glad when it is all over."

And so that knotty point was settled.

The dinner-hour was fixed for half-past eight ; and by a quarter past, the carriages began setting down. At three minutes to the half-hour, De Benham drove up in a Hansom.

The visitors were all assembled, and the general expectation had risen to its height, when, last to arrive, and exactly punctual, the hero of the evening was announced.

Mr. Hardwicke went to the drawing-room door to meet him. Captain Frank Hay had been there more than a quarter of an hour already ; and, embarrassed by the introductions he had to go through as each person arrived, stood turning over the engravings in a portfolio, and scarcely opening his lips. Every one was disappointed in him ; and every one, not unnaturally, concluded that the supercargo would prove equally gauche. When, however, De Benham made his appearance on the threshold, an audible murmur ran round the room.

"Mr. Debenham—my sister," said the merchant, going through the ceremony of introduction.

De Benham bowed profoundly ; Miss Hardwicke extended the tips of her fingers.

"I think we have met before," she said, with some attempt at graciousness.

De Benham bowed again.

"I do not forget that I have had that honour," he replied, smiling ; but the smile had in it something equivocal, and there was a touch of sarcasm in his voice.

Then Mr. Hardwicke presented him to the rest of the guests, among whom were Lord Stockbridge ; a dapper little colonial bishop, with very neat legs ; an Honourable of tender years from the Waste-Paper Office, whose life was consumed in the effort to screw a glass into his right eye ; a dilapidated dowager in diamonds, whose complexion was a miracle of art ; one Sir Philip Mostyn and his wife, from some British consulate abroad ; a certain Colonel Calderon, who wore the Star of India ; two or three members of Parliament, with their wives ; a serjeant learned in the law ; a popular author with a huge beard, who was openly sulky because he was not the lion of the evening ; a Commissioner of something unpleasant—lunacy, or bankruptcy, or sewers ; and one or two others, clergymen, barristers, and the like. A large party—twenty-two in all—and the “aldermanic element,” as Miss Hardwicke called it, carefully excluded.

Then dinner was announced, and the company went down. The table was gorgeous with plateau, and vases, and candélabre of costliest design ; the plates were silver gilt ; the sideboard was a sight to see.

“Gentlemanly-looking young fellow, egad!” said Lord Stockbridge to his next neighbour, as the soup went round.

Next neighbour—banker ; M.P. ; railway director ; fabulously rich—looked up, nodded, and replied :—

“Ah ! supercargo ? Yes, very much so indeed.”

“Was positively an organist, you know—almost starving only two years ago, at some place in the City. And Hardwicke took him in hand ; picked him out of the gutter, by George !—literally out of the gutter.”

“Good gracious !” said the banker.

“Ay, such is life ! He has made his own fortune since then, and, they say, has pretty nearly doubled the fortune of our good friend at the foot of the table.”

“Ah ! never believe in those rapid fortunes myself,” said the banker.

“I believe in this one,” replied Lord Stockbridge, “because all the facts go to prove it. You’ve read about that affair of the Stormy Petrel, of course ?”

And then they talked of the cellar at the Erechtheum, and of a certain wonderful filly in Prince Tchernikoff’s stables, and of a race that was run the week before at Sartory ; and no more was said of De Benham or his adventures.

Others, however, were discussing him freely round the table. The Dowager on Mr. Hardwicke’s right, and Lady Mostyn on his left, plied their host with questions ; and the lady who had been assigned to Captain Frank Hay—a pretty, bright-eyed, blood-thirsty little woman in a cloud of tulle and tarleton—gave that worthy seaman no peace.

“But is it really true, sir,” she said, “that he killed three Americans with his own hand ?”

“Oh dear ! you don’t say so ?” she exclaimed. “Then didn’t he kill anybody ?”

“No, ma’am.”

“And didn’t you kill anybody ?”

“Certainly not, ma’am—God be thanked.”

“Really, now ? Well, I am so disappointed ! But he was wounded, sir, was he not ? The newspapers all say he was wounded.”

“Yes, ma’am. He got a stab in the side, which laid him on his beam ends for a fortnight, raving with delirium.”

“Raving with delirium !” echoed the lady in tulle, with infinite relish. “Dear me, how very dreadful !”

And then she indulged in a long stare at De Benham through her eyeglass.

Meanwhile, the Bishop, and those immediately about the upper end of the table, were making him talk, sorely against his inclination, about the recapture of the Stormy Petrel.

“I have nothing to add,” he said, “to the newspaper narratives. I know less about it, indeed, than any man on board ; for I was ill and in bed the last few days of the voyage.”

“Your position would not have been particularly pleasant, if the attempt had failed,” said the Commissioner. “The American courts would have tried to bring it in piracy on the high seas.”

“I am not at all sure, even now, that it was not piracy,” replied De Benham.

“I don’t think you need be uneasy on that head,” observed a gentleman a little farther down the table. “The blockade itself is only legal so far as it can be enforced ; and, ceteris paribus, the recapture of your vessel would only have been piracy if it had failed. It is just one of those cases where might makes right.”

“The question, at all events,” said De Benham, “is one that I have no desire to consider too curiously.”

“What became of the Yankees whom you out-manœuvred ?” asked the author with the beard. “According to the Shooting Star, you made them walk the plank ; but I presume that’s a slight exaggeration.”

“We left them to amuse themselves at Fayal till the next United States’ vessel should happen to put in. I trust they are safe home by this time.”

“Are you of opinion, Mr. Debenham,” asked the Bishop, “that the war is likely to be renewed in the spring ?”

“It will be renewed, my Lord, and maintained,” replied De Benham, “while there is an ounce of lead in the South, or a dollar in the north.”

"Confounded bad look-out, that, for one's American securities," said the banker.

Lord Stockbridge laughed.

"Egad!" said he, "there's the advantage of being a poor devil like myself. The money-market may turn itself inside out, like a zoophyte, without causing me a moment's uneasiness."

Miss Hardwicke, sitting at the head of the table and speaking only a word now and then, heard most of the conversations that were going on. At these words of Lord Stockbridge's, a faint something which was scarcely a smile flitted across her lips. Presently, the wine having travelled once round the table, she looked across at the Dowager. Then followed a general stir; a gathering up of gloves and fans; a simultaneous rising of all the company. Mr. Hardwicke held open the door—the ladies rustled out in order of precedence—the gentlemen were left alone.

Mr. Hardwicke then took his plate and glass, and moved to the head of the table; one or two of the others changed places; and all closed up nearer the host.

Half-a-dozen separate conversations were at once set going, and the wine began to circulate more freely. The parliamentary men talked politics; the Serjeant and Commissioner discussed an interesting case that happened to be "on" just then in one of the law-courts; Lord Stockbridge and the banker, still deep in sporting matters, brought out their memorandum-books and compared entries; the Honourable from the Waste-Paper Office and a young barrister named Jopling, talked across the table of the decline of the ballet; the author listened to all, and drank his claret in gloomy silence; and the Bishop, who was intelligently interested in the question, continued upon the subject of the American war.

The prevailing opinion in England at this time (especially among the upper classes, whose sympathies, for the most part, inclined towards the cause of the South) was that, however bloody and protracted the struggle might be, the Confederates must eventually succeed in establishing their independence. It was an opinion that De Benham had found himself so often driven to dissent from, that he had endeavoured of late to avoid the topic. To-night, however, such avoidance was not possible; for it proved to be, above all others, the one subject upon which those around him desired to hear him speak.

"I am credibly informed," said Colonel Calderon, "that less than one-third of the men in the Federal regiments are genuine Northerners; and that their ranks, being recruited from the back slums of Boston and New York, are chiefly made up of English, Irish, and German emigrants. If this be so, must not the chances of victory necessarily lie with those men who fight on their own soil for their own liberties, and the liberties of their wives and children?"

De Benham shook his head.

"The strength of the North lies in that very fact, that they can recruit their ranks unlimitedly," he said. "The population of the South, on the other hand, consists of only masters and slaves. There exists no middle class whatsoever. Hence it follows that in a Confederate regiment every soldier is a gentleman. I have myself seen a Charleston regiment, one thousand strong, recruited entirely from among the landed gentry and the learned professions. Granted that the enemy has money, perseverance, and an immense lower class to fall back upon, the ultimate fate of a country so defended is inevitable. Let them fight as bravely as they will, these gentlemen-soldiers must be outnumbered at last. They fall, and fall, and by-and-by there are none to succeed them."

"So that, in fact, it is resolved into a mere question of time," observed the Bishop.

Here Lord Stockbridge put up his memorandum-book, and joined in the conversation.

"According to my creed," he said, "one gentleman is equal to a score of mercenaries."

"But not to five hundred. Besides, you cannot call the Federal soldiers mercenaries. They are naturalised emigrants."

Some question then arose as to the original peopling of the States, and De Benham pointed out how, in Mobile and Charleston, he had come upon families perpetuating to this day (in some instances, without even a variation in the spelling) the old Royalist and Huguenot names of the first settlers—Lowndes, Rutledge, Hampton, Laurens, Prioleau, and the like.

"I observe, by the way," said Mr. Hardwicke, "that you have spelt your own name differently of late, Mr. Debenham."

"I divide it," said De Benham; "but I do not alter a letter."

"It is an alteration that gives the name a Norman air," said Mr. Hardwicke.

"The name is Norman," replied De Benham. "I have only restored it."

Lord Stockbridge looked up, with his hand on the claret-jug.

"Are you going to change your name, Mr. Debenham?" he asked. "So many people change their names now—there seems to be quite a fashion in it.”

De Benham hesitated. He was annoyed by the turn the conversation had taken, and would gladly have diverted it into some other channel. Meanwhile Mr. Hardwicke replied for him.

“Mr. Debenham was just explaining to me that he has not altered, but only restored his name,” he said. “He now writes it—De Benham.”

Lord Stockbridge repeated the name.

“De Benham!” he said. “There was but one family of De Benhams, and they are extinct.”

It was not a civil speech, and it was not spoken civilly. De Benham looked down, displeased and silent. Mr. Hardwicke smiled uncomfortably.

“Apparently not, my lord,” he said, “since we here find the name surviving.”

“But it is impossible that it should survive,” said Lord Stockbridge, persistently. “I knew the last Lord De Benham—knew him well; and he was the last of his name and race. Look in Banks’ Extinct and Dormant Peerage, and there you’ll find it.”

There was silence now round the table. Every one was listening. De Benham still said nothing.

Mr. Hardwicke murmured something about the possibility of a “mistake,” and proposed that they should change the subject.

Lord Stockbridge laughed—a short, disagreeable laugh—and shrugged his shoulders.

“Egad! there is some mistake,” he said; “but not on my part. I knew De Benham of Benhampton as well as I know you, Hardwicke; and better. And a precious scamp he was—ran through everything before he was of age, and died like a dog, somewhere abroad.”

De Benham rose in his place, pale to the very lips.

“I must request Lord Stockbridge to retract those statements,” he said, in a voice that vibrated with suppressed anger. “He is speaking of my father.”

The insolent smile vanished from Lord Stockbridge’s face, and he set down his glass untasted. De Benham, looking at him fixedly, went on.

“My father was a man of honour. He paid his debts with his last acres. He died at a little inn near Capel Carig in North Wales; and he was buried in the vaults of Benhampton Church, among his own people.”

Lord Stockbridge became purple with embarrassment.

“Is this possible?” he stammered.

“I have simply stated facts,” said De Benham.

“Gad, now, I never was so taken by surprise in my life—never, by Jove! De Benham married—name and title surviving—I can hardly believe it!”

He paused, and while he paused there was dead silence. De Benham, still looking him in the face, remained standing.

Then Lord Stockbridge, knowing that something more was expected from him, resumed his self-possession, left his seat, and went round to the other side of the table.

“Young gentleman,” he said, “if you are the son of De Benham of Benhampton, I beg your pardon. I did not mean to imply that your father spent his fortune dishonourably;—if I seemed to say so, I am sorry for it. I was a spendthrift myself in those days, and I’m afraid time hasn’t improved me. But your father was a good fellow—an open-hearted, open-handed fellow—and I’m glad to make the acquaintance of his son. Lord De Benham, I hope you will do me the honour to shake hands with me?”

So De Benham bowed, and shook hands with him, and they resumed their seats.

Great is the art of making an apology gracefully. This little speech was spoken so easily, so frankly, that Lord Stockbridge made capital of the transaction in the laying up of golden opinions.

“Stockbridge?” said the Commissioner, hearing him doubtfully spoken of a day or two after. “Oh, dear! no. A most gentlemanly, candid person; undoubtedly a man of honour. Don’t believe a word of it!”

And of those who were sitting round Mr. Hardwicke’s table that evening at Strathellan House, there was not one, thenceforth, who would not have been ready at any moment to endorse that Commissioner’s opinion.

CHAPTER L.—IN THE LIBRARY.

WHEN the gentlemen went up-stairs, the rooms were already filling fast. Mr. Hardwicke went to his sister and told her of the revelation that had been made in the dining-room.

“A lord!” said Miss Hardwicke, incredulously.

“Yes, a lord—positively a lord! His title, Sir Philip tells me, is one of the oldest in the peerage; and he holds some great hereditary foreign rank as well; I don’t exactly know what. And to think that he has been acting all this time as my supercargo and foreign agent

"DEBENHAM'S VOW."

.... it sounds like a chapter out of a novel!"

"Why has he concealed it so long?" asked Miss Hardwicke.

"Because he was poor. The last lord ran through everything, and this young man has had to work for his bread."

"Well, he is not poor now," said Miss Hardwicke. "Did you not tell me that he had made sixty thousand pounds?"

"Yes; but that's no great capital for a man of his rank. Fancy his having been our organist at St. Hildegard's!"

Miss Hardwicke looked across the room at De Benham with some appearance of interest.

"It is a strange story," she said. "It will be all over London to-morrow."

"No doubt; but he would not have told it, if circumstances had not forced him to speak. If he means to stick to business, it will be very awkward for him. It is awkward for me. He is in my employment at this moment. Our relations are most anomalous—most anomalous. There's Choke—I wonder if he has heard anything about it!"

And away hurried Mr. Hardwicke to retail the news to the rector of St. Hildegard's, who retailed it presently to a dozen others, who went on retailing it all the evening. Before midnight there were three hundred people assembled; and not one of those three hundred had been five minutes in the rooms without hearing and marvelling over this romance of a penniless peer, who began life as a musician, went into trade, and made a fortune in six months by blockade-running in time of war. As for Captain Frank Hay, they seemed to forget that he had borne any share in De Benham's later adventures. He was hopelessly eclipsed; and, luckily, preferred to be so.

Meanwhile, Miss Hardwicke felt that it was imperative upon her to make some allusion to these events, when, in the course of the evening, De Benham chanced to be near her.

"Lord De Benham," she said, "I am anxious to express my brother's regret, and my own, that you should have been compelled, in our house, to speak upon topics which you would have preferred to avoid."

De Benham bowed.

"It is a matter of very slight importance," he said. "I have only published to-day facts which it was my intention to publish hereafter."

"Still, you may have intended that hereafter to be long distant."

"I had intended it to be as soon as I was in a position to—to carry out certain projects," replied De Benham; "and I had hoped that it might be during my mother's lifetime. On the whole, there is nothing to regret."

"I understand from our cousin Archibald, that you reside with your mother," said Miss Hardwicke. "Do you think Lady De Benham would allow me to have the honour of sending her some of our hot-house flowers?"

De Benham bowed again, somewhat coldly.

"You are much too kind," he said.

At that moment, the great violinist began to play, and the conversation broke off abruptly.

Among the evening guests, in the meantime, came Archibald Blyth. The first persons he encountered on entering the room were Mr. and Miss Alleyne, and the American journalist, Washington Flack. Mr. Hardwicke, always glad to leaven the mass of his guests with a certain proportion of artists and literary men, had sought this opportunity of making the personal acquaintance of the painter of "The Athens of Pericles;" and Mr. Alleyne, equally glad to cultivate his new patron, had accepted the invitation for his daughter and himself. When Archie came upon them, they were standing just within the entrance to the first drawing-room, and had apparently but that moment arrived. While Archie was in the act of shaking hands with them, the Transatlantic Exterminator, who was just going away, seized him by the button-hole.

"You close Coon!" said the man of letters. "You mute Opossum! you undecipherable old Hieroglyphic! why didn't you behave to me like a friend, and tell me all about it?"

"All about what?" said Archie, not altogether relishing the great man's playfulness.

"About this celebrated unknown of yours—this peerless peer—this counting-house aristocrat of limited means and unlimited pedigree! Why, I'd have given anything to put the Exterminator a week ahead of the other papers!"

"I declare I haven't the faintest idea of what you are talking about," said Archie.

"I am talking of your Lord De Benham."

Archie looked from Mr. Washington Flack to Miss Alleyne, and from Miss Alleyne back again to Mr. Washington Flack.

"Lord De Benham!" he repeated, in blank astonishment.

"You don't mean to say that you weren't in the secret? That I, Washington F., from across the broad and briny Atlantic, am the first to tell it to you? Now, by the Nine Gods! This is delicious."

And so, in a few serio-comic sentences, the American told as much as he knew of De Benham's story, ending off with:—

"There, you down-trodden Helot of a bloated aristocracy! there's the history of the coronetted viper you've been warming in your unconscious bosom! Good night."

Whereupon, with a wave of the hand, Mr. Washington Flack went his way, to tell the same story, with all kinds of variations, at three more evening parties, and a club-supper in Covent Garden, before going home to bed.

"Can this be true?" said Mr. Alleyne.

"I don't know—it may be," stammered Archie.

And again he looked at Miss Alleyne; but she turned her face away, and was silent.

At that moment came up two gentlemen, friends of her father; friends also of Mr. Hardwicke; who, knowing the house and its ways, carried Mr. Alleyne off to see certain Stanfields and Danbys in the down-stairs rooms; and then, for some minutes, Miss Alleyne and Archie were left alone.

"Mr. Blyth," she said, tremulously, "is he here?"

"Temple?—certainly. He has been dining here—he and Captain Hay; and no end of swells invited to meet them. You didn't know that?"

"I—I did not know it," she faltered.

Archie saw her colour come and go, and his heart filled with compassion.

"He is certain to be in the farthest room," he said, dropping his voice; "and he is not likely to get out of it before supper. You needn't see him at all unless you choose: and he's sure not to see you if you don't go beyond the middle room. I beg your pardon. Perhaps I have no business to say this."

Miss Alleyne looked at him gratefully, and forced a smile.

"Thank you," she said; "I will stay here."

Then, after a few moments, she added:—

"I should like to see Miss Hardwicke."

"My cousin Claudia? Oh, certainly. I will introduce you."

"I don't wish to be introduced. I only want to see her—to look at her. I hear she is very beautiful."

"She is very beautiful," replied Archie; "there is no mistake about that."

And then he hesitated. Miss Alleyne divined the cause of his hesitation.

"We might go just near enough to see through," she suggested.

So they made their way across the middle room, and as far as the entrance to the third drawing-room, where they stood back behind a crowd of people. And there, not far from the piano, they saw De Benham and Miss Hardwicke. It chanced to be during the moment of their brief conversation. Miss Hardwicke was just expressing her regret, and De Benham was assuring her that such regret was unnecessary.

"There she is," said Archie; "the lady in violet velvet."

The colour rushed in a crimson tide to Miss Alleyne's face, and then ebbed suddenly, leaving her paler than before.

Presently, Miss Hardwicke made her offer of the flowers, and made it with a smile. They saw the smile, and they saw the bow with which De Benham replied.

"By Jove!" said Archie. "She's not often so gracious as that."

Then the violinist began to play, and De Benham moved aside, to give place to some ladies. Miss Alleyne shrunk back trembling.

"Let us go, Mr. Blyth," she said. "He is looking this way—pray let us go!"

Archie gave her his arm to the outer room, and placed her in a chair near the door.

"Ought you not to go home?" he asked, seeing her pale and shivering.

"Not yet. We have only just come."

"But you are ill!"

She shook her head.

"No," she said. "Not ill, only tired . . . besides, papa has not yet seen Mr. Hardwicke . . ."

And then her voice broke, and Archie could see that her eyes filled with sudden tears. He clenched his teeth, and ground his heel into Mr. Hardwicke's velvet-pile carpet.

"By heaven!" he growled, "it is too bad. It makes one hate him."

"Mr. Blyth, I will not let you say that of your friend."

"Why should I not say it, when it is true? It is the most heartless . . ."

Miss Alleyne laid her hand on Archie's sleeve.

"Hush!" she said. "I will not hear a word against him. I understand it all now. Many things are clear to me to-night which were not clear before. He has other ends, other duties . . . it is far better as it is."

"But a mere selfish . . ."

"Dear Mr. Blyth, if I do not blame him, why should you? Believe me, I would not have it otherwise if I could. And now, if you please, we will not speak of this subject again."

Archie drew back, silenced; but as soon as the artist rejoined them, repeated his suggestion that Miss Alleyne should go home.

"But, my dear child," said her father impatiently, "you look quite well. You were quite well when we started."

"And I shall be quite well now, papa, if I keep away from those hot rooms beyond," replied Miss Alleyne. "It is Mr. Blyth who insists that I am ill."

"Then, my love, let Mr. Blyth take you down to one of the lower rooms—to the library, for instance, where it is delightfully cool and quiet. You will be quite alone there; and can take a book, till I am ready to fetch you away."

To this proposal Miss Alleyne replied that she should like it above all things; so Archie, who was sufficiently at home in his cousin's house, took her down to the library, wheeled an easy chair to the fire, and fetched her a cup of hot coffee from the tea-room.

"And now, Miss Alleyne," said he, "I suppose I must not stop here—so I will go home."

"But you have not even been through the rooms," she said in some surprise.

"I've had enough of it; and—and, to tell you the truth, I don't care to meet De Benham to-night. They say he's a lord, you know; and I'm not used to lords. Perhaps I shouldn't know how to be quite civil enough. Good night, Miss Alleyne."

"Good night, Mr. Blyth; but—there is one thing you must promise me."

"What is that?"

"That you will not quarrel with your friend."

Archie laughed, and shook his head.

"Oh, no!" he said; "I will not quarrel with him."

"Nor be unkind to him—nor avoid him."

Archie paused.

"I am sure I can promise not to be unkind," he said; "but I think it likely that De Benham and I will see less of each other for the future. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. Now that his secret is known, he must assume his place in society; and the difference in rank will separate us, if nothing else does. I own I am feeling angry with him at this moment; but that has nothing to do with it. He is as much lost to me now, Miss Alleyne, as he is lost to you."

"I hope not," said Miss Alleyne. "With all my heart, I hope not."

Then Archie once more wished her good night, and they shook hands.

"May I call to-morrow," he said, "to ask if you are better?"

"By all means, if you are in our neighbourhood, and have nothing better to do. But I am quite well now."

Whereupon Archie protested that he should call all the same, and so took his leave.

It had been a foggy day and evening, and when he got out into the hall, he found that the fog had turned to rain. The avenue, however, was full of carriages, and the guests were still arriving; so that he had to go some way along the inner-circle road before finding an empty Hansom. Having found it, he paused for a moment with his foot on the step, and looked back towards the lighted windows of Strathellan House.

"By Jove!" said he to himself, as he jumped in and pulled down the glasses, "what man in his senses would throw over such a sweet little girl as that? And she called me 'dear Mr. Blyth!' 'Dear Mr. Blyth!'—suppose it had been 'dear Archie!'"

CHAPTER LI.—A BUSINESS INTERVIEW.

IF Temple De Benham's brain had been less busy and his mood less restless, during this first fortnight of his return to England, it is possible that he would sooner have recovered his looks and his strength. But he would not, or could not, dismiss from his mind those projects and anxieties which had now become as the life of his life—which impaired his sleep by night, dogged him like his shadow by day, and constantly impelled him to overtask his physical powers. Only himself knew how persistently he did overtask those powers—how, while poring over accounts, writing letters, and going to and fro about the City, he was all the time engaged, either latently or actively, in a mesh of speculation regarding his own personal affairs—how he was always pursuing two distinct trains of thought; living earnestly in the present, yet projecting himself no less earnestly into the future; weighing probabilities, balancing risks, forecasting issues. These were facts of mental labour known only to himself.

But they were facts that told upon him heavily in many ways—that kept his pulse feeble, and his hand tremulous, and his eye unnaturally bright—that filled his mother's heart with apprehension, and caused even Captain Frank Hay to shake his head and look doubtful when any talk arose of the next expedition of the Stormy Petrel.

"If, as you say, the young man is really a lord, it ain't in reason that he'll go out again, sir," said Mr. Timothy Knott, discussing this point with his employer the morning of the day after the party.

"That will be for himself to decide," replied Mr. Hardwicke thoughtfully; his eyes fixed upon a letter that lay open on his desk.

"It's my opinion that a man is bound to keep in his own station," said the head clerk. "A lord is a lord—a supercargo is a supercargo."

"He is the best supercargo I ever had in my employment," said Mr. Hardwicke.

"But it ain't becoming in him to fill the situation," urged Mr. Timothy Knott. "I might as well clap on a star and a blue ribbon, and push my way into the House of Lords!"

Mr. Hardwicke shook his head gravely.

"Becoming or unbecoming," said he, "there are few things I should regret so much as the loss of his services. He is to be here, however, at eleven, and then, I suppose, the matter will be decided. By the way, Mr. Knott, let there be no staring or whispering in the office when he comes through."

"Staring or whispering!" echoed the head clerk. "Bless me, sir, how am I to prevent it? The young men will stare and whisper, if they choose."

"And let him be shown in without announcing him by name. It will be less awkward, under the circumstances."

Mr. Knott retired, muttering; and Mr. Hardwicke, having glanced at his watch, went on with the examination of his morning letters. Of these, a goodly pile was lying beside his desk. Some he dismissed with a glance—some he read through twice over—some he flung into the waste-paper basket—some he carefully selected and put aside for future reference. But that particular letter which was before him during his conversation with the managing clerk, he placed under a paper-weight, apart from the rest.

At eleven, true to the clock as a man of business should be, De Benham was shown in.

Mr. Hardwicke received him with a curious mixture of empressement and embarrassment, and placed a chair for him near the fire. De Benham, shivering, stretched his hands towards the flame; and Mr. Hardwicke saw that he looked pale, and that his hands were thin and transparent.

"It is a bitter morning, my lord," he said.

"Bitter, indeed," replied De Benham.

"But we are in December, now; and winter should be wintry."

"Just so," said De Benham, dreamily.

And there the conversation dropped. Mr. Hardwicke coughed; fidgetted; stirred the fire; knew not what to say next. Presently, De Benham looked up.

"There is one point, Mr. Hardwicke," he said, "upon which we had better understand each other at once. After what took place last evening at your house, there will, of course, be occasions when I must take my father's title and do my best to sustain it worthily. But here I am plain Temple De Benham—your supercargo—at your disposal, and subject to your commands."

"Then your lordship proposes to go on . . ."

"To go on with the career I have chosen? Undoubtedly."

"And to venture out again with the Stormy Petrel?"

"Probably. But it is upon that subject that I have come here to consult you to-day."

"It is the one subject I am myself most anxious to discuss," replied the merchant, taking from under the paper-weight the letter he had previously laid aside. "Do me the favour to read this, my lord. It is from my agent in Liverpool. He tells me that the Stormy Petrel will be ready to put to sea again in about a week."

De Benham took the letter, read, and returned it without a word. Mr. Hardwicke looked at him anxiously.

"It will, of course, be an immense satisfaction to me," said he, "if you decide to go. I should no longer have any confidence in the speculation if you were to withdraw from it."

De Benham, gnawing the ends of his moustache, as was his wont when thinking earnestly, paused before replying.

"Mr. Hardwicke," he said at length, "I will be plain with you. The one thing necessary to me above all other things is—money. Without it, I can do nothing. With it, I can do much that is to me of the highest importance."

"Naturally—naturally," murmured Mr. Hardwicke. "A nobleman must have means to keep up his rank in society."

"I am not thinking of society," said De Benham, with a flash of scornful impatience; "nor yet of my rank. I am thinking of an honourable name to be rescued from oblivion—of a ruined home to be rebuilt—of old territorial rights to be repurchased. For these things I must have money—more than I may hope ever to earn as supercargo on board the Stormy Petrel."

Mr. Hardwicke smiled a doubtful smile.

"Your lordship, I think, has not hitherto had much to complain of," he said. "There are not many occupations in which sixty thousand pounds may be made in six months without employment of capital."

"True—but I am now a capitalist."

Mr. Hardwicke looked grave.

"I had hoped," he said, "for permission to offer your lordship the benefit of my experience in the matter of investments. You could not do better, for instance, than repurchase old family property—or worse than embark your first gains in any kind of hazardous speculation. For myself, I have always regarded speculation in the light of an expensive amusement; and speculation in earnest as simple insanity. When, for example, I embarked in our late enterprise, I was prepared to lose fifty thousand pounds. But had that sum constituted the whole, or nearly the whole of my capital, I would as soon have gone through the Bankruptcy Court as risk it in the Stormy Petrel. But I beg your pardon, my lord. I am offering unsolicited advice."

"You speak like a friend, Mr. Hardwicke, and I am grateful to you."

"At all events, I speak candidly."

"So candidly, that I will be equally candid with you. It is my present intention to buy up, if possible, so much of the Benhampton estate as comprised originally the home farm, the park, the church, and the castle ruins. I hope I may strike this bargain for about fifteen thousand pounds. Having tied up so much of my capital, I think I am justified in speculating with the rest."

"I would earnestly recommend your lordship to consider the matter very fully first," said the merchant.

"Good heavens! what else have I been doing but considering it, day and night, for months past?" exclaimed De Benham, getting up impatiently, and walking to and fro about the room.

"I think, my lord, you said you wished to consult with me on this subject," said Mr. Hardwicke. "If so, will you give me some idea of your plans?"

"I have no actual plans as yet," replied De Benham. "I have projects—which are, however, dependent on the results of my visit to Benhampton. And I have a proposal to make to you."

Mr. Hardwicke declared his readiness to listen to any proposal that "his lordship" might make; so De Benham resumed his seat and proceeded, very clearly and earnestly, and at some length, to explain his wishes. He began by reminding Mr. Hardwicke that his (De Benham's) capital was as yet but partially realised. Of the two last cargoes of cotton only a small quantity had hitherto been sold; and the rest, in accordance with his own advice, was being held back till such time as there should be a still further rise in the market. Twenty thousand of his gains—perhaps more—were therefore locked up in Mr. Hardwicke's Liverpool warehouse; so that, supposing he invested £15,000 in the purchase of land, he would have only £25,000 in present money to risk in speculation. He then explained that there were two ways in which he had thought that he might possibly conduct his speculations—one way being entirely to separate his interests from those of Mr. Hardwicke; to buy, or hire, a small swift steamer (numbers of which were already being built for this very work on the Mersey and the Clyde); and go on running the blockade at his own exclusive risk and profit:—the other way being to associate himself with Mr. Hardwicke on equal terms; become a joint proprietor in the Stormy Petrel, and carry on the trade for their mutual benefit.

"It is scarcely necessary for me to point out the advantages or disadvantages that might result to yourself, Mr. Hardwicke," he said, "from this last arrangement. Entertaining it, you would ensure the benefit of my past experience; and your loss, in case of capture, would be diminished by one half. On the other hand, you would doubtless find no difficulty in securing the services of an able supercargo, and your gains would be double. It is for you, as a man of business, to balance the pros and cons, and make your election."

Mr. Hardwicke leaned back in his chair, half closed his eyes, and deliberated.

"When do you propose to go down to Benhampton, my lord?" he asked.

"This evening."

"You will not remain there very long?"

"I propose staying the whole of to-morrow, and returning either by a night train or by some very early train the following morning. Would you like to take till then, Mr. Hardwicke, to consider my proposal?"

"I should. And, in the meantime, I will also consider whether some less hazardous and laborious road to fortune might not be open to you."

De Benham shook his head.

"I think I have exhausted conjecture on that score," he said. "This is a golden opportunity—such a golden opportunity as none of us need hope to see again; and we must make the most of it while it lasts."

And then he rose to take his leave.

"Will you dine with us, my lord, the day of your return?" said Mr. Hardwicke. "I will take care that no one else is invited, and then we can talk these matters over in the evening."

To this invitation De Benham replied that he should be happy to do so, unless detained in Monmouthshire; in which case, however, he would telegraph to Mr. Hardwicke at Strathellan House.

"By the way, my lord," said the merchant, "I have, as you desired, opened an account for you at my banker's, and lodged on deposit in your name the sum due to you on our last division of profits. I have also placed the sum of £2,500 to your current account—as a testimonial, if you will permit me to say so, of the gratitude and admiration with which I regard your gallant conduct in the recapture of the Stormy Petrel."

"Mr. Hardwicke!"

"This is your pass-book," continued the other. "You will find your deposit receipt in the pocket."

"But it is impossible that I should accept this present."

"Pray do not say so; do not even call it a present. It is entirely your due—a pure matter of business on both sides."

"You are most generous," said De Benham, "but indeed I cannot take it."

"My lord, I am not generous. I am only doing what any other ship-owner would do under similar circumstances. I have laid aside £5,000 for this purpose,—half of that sum I consider should be yours; £1,500 I have presented to Captain Frank Hay; and the rest I divide between the engineer and firemen. It seemed to me that this was an equitable partition of the sum."

"And your cousin Archie, who bore his own full share and, when I was ill, part of my share, in all the work and the danger?"

"I have not forgotten Archibald Blyth, my lord," replied the merchant somewhat stiffly. "I have raised his salary."

"Give him this money, or some share of this money which you offer me," said De Benham. "He deserves it, Mr. Hardwicke, as much as any man on board; and he could take such a gift from your hands without any of those scruples which compel me to refuse it."

"Perhaps if I were to offer my testimonial in some other form, you would regard it more favourably," said the merchant.

"No, Mr. Hardwicke, I should not. I had a direct personal interest in the cargo of the Stormy Petrel, and in assisting to recapture the ship I was protecting that interest as well as yours. I deserve no reward, and I will accept none."

Mr. Hardwicke bowed.

"I have no alternative but to submit to your refusal, my lord," he said, "however widely I may dissent from your premises. I hope I have not offended you."

"I should be ashamed of myself if you had."

"With regard, however, to Archibald Blyth. Would it give you the least gratification if I made him a sharer in this testimonial?"

"It would give me great gratification, Mr. Hardwicke."

"Then I will put him down for five hundred pounds."

De Benham was delighted. He would have been still better pleased had the sum been doubled; but he was delighted all the same, and said so openly and warmly.

"I wish you every success in Monmouthshire, my lord," said Mr. Hardwicke, "and shall look forward to the honour of your company at dinner on Thursday."

"Many thanks," said De Benham, already at the door.

"But I should hardly have thought you were yet strong enough to travel by the night train."

"Strong enough, Mr. Hardwicke? Oh yes! I am strong enough to go from London to Soverato again without stopping!"

And then they shook hands, and De Benham went away.

Arriving at home after a long round, some two hours later, he found the little parlour blooming with flowers like a summer garden, and on the table a basket of hot-house grapes and pines.

"Why, Mutter!" he exclaimed, laughing, "has Jupiter descended upon us in a shower of camellias?"

"They are from your Miss Hardwicke," said Lady De Benham.

"So I conclude. What fruit for a painter!"

"I wish she had not sent it."

"Nay—it is meant civilly."

"I know that; but . . ."

"But what?"

"I wish for neither her gifts nor her acquaintance."

"My dear mother, the flowers and fruits are here, and you cannot help taking them; but there is no reason why you should make Miss Hardwicke's acquaintance unless you choose."

"Accepting them, I am bound to call upon her," said Lady De Benham; "and how can I do that? I, who have visited no one for more than thirty years?"

"I will call for you, and leave your card."

"Oh, dear! she will then be at liberty to return the visit."

De Benham smiled.

"But, Mutter," he said, "Miss Hardwicke is a lady."

Lady De Benham sighed, and shook her head.

"A City madam," she said; "over-dressed—purse-proud—ostentatious. I know exactly the sort of person she is before I see her."

"No; Miss Hardwicke is none of those things. She is distant; but, I think, neither purse-proud nor ostentatious—certainly not over-dressed. Mind, I do not like her; but I am bound to say she is a lady."

"But the card, if I can find a card, should be left to-morrow; and you are going away, my son, to-night."

"Then I will go round to Paddington by the Regent's Park, and leave it this very evening."

So Lady De Benham sought, and with some difficulty found, a visiting card—yellow, antiquated, the last of its race; one of those she had in use during the first years of her married life—and Temple, without entering the gates, left it with the lodge-keeper at Strathellan House that evening, on his way to the station.

CHAPTER LII.—A HOUSE OF MOURNING.

BENHAMPTON in December, with a leaden sky over head and a bitter east wind blowing, put on its dreariest aspect for the traveller who came in the next morning tired and shivering, after a long night in the train, a comfortless breakfast in Monmouth, and a drive of twelve miles in a jolting country fly. He had not gone down to the village on the occasion of his first visit; and now, as the driver whipped on his spiritless beast through the long, straggling street, and pulled up at a dismal little inn, called the "Three Bottles," De Benham thought he had seldom seen a more unpromising locality. He alighted, however, at the "Three Bottles;" bade the flyman take out his horse and prepare to wait some hours; and then proceeded to find his way up to the castle on foot.

The village, as he walked back through it, impressed him even more disagreeably than at first sight. The cottages were dirty and dilapidated; the road was full of ruts and pools and heaps of garbage; the two or three women whom he saw standing at their doors, and the half-dozen squalid children playing at the corners, looked sickly and sullen; and the low stone bridge which he had to cross, in order to strike up towards the castle hill, spanned a sluggish rivulet, foul and fetid as an open sewer. All this, he told himself, showed how much a great proprietor was needed in the place. Spend-thrifts and courtiers and absentees, the De Benhams of the Georgian era had, doubtless, been bad landlords, one and all; so that not even a tradition of better times would probably be found surviving among these poor folks. But there had been better times—there must have been better times—when the lord of the soil lived among and for his tenants, and was beloved and honoured by them, as a fine old English nobleman should be. It would be a grand thing, a thing worth working and living for, to bring those days back again—to pull down these miserable hovels; to build; to drain; to plant; to establish schools; to pay good wages; to make the people healthy and happy!

Dreaming thus, De Benham scaled that windy height, on the verge of which, shattered and straggling, the long line of ruined battlements lifted its grey profile to the wintry sky.

He climbed slowly, for the hill on this side was steep, and he soon became tired and out of breath. Having reached the level of the walls, he felt he could go no farther without resting; so, cold as it was, he sat down for a few moments under the lee of a projecting buttress. Decidedly, he was not as good at a hill as he would have been two months back!

All this hill-side, it was plain to see, had once been included in the park; and yonder, in the direction farthest from the village, the boundaries had evidently extended for some distance along the valley. Stately clumps of elm and beech, now leafless, were scattered over the ground: and some three or four very ancient oaks—as old, perhaps, as Herne's oak at Windsor, or Elizabeth's oak at Hatfield—still with gnarled and knotted roots, clung painfully to the soil. The approach to the castle was on the other side, and there had once been an avenue; but of this only a few trees now remained. De Benham, while resting those few minutes, planned a new road that should wind round the base and across the slope of the hill; planted it with young trees; and saw, in his mind's eye, the red deer browsing once again in the summer shade.

Presently he rose and went round to the front, entering the castle precincts by what had once been a grand old Norman gateway. Hence his way to that side of the keep in which the family lived lay through the yard; past the stackyard, which was full of stacks; and the barns, which were fast shut and padlocked; and the sheds in which the great blue and red waggons were drawn up side by side, like boats on a sea-beach.

De Benham looked round, half expecting to see Farmer Bowstead's burly figure emerging from some of the out-buildings; but, instead of the master of the place, he saw only a few cocks and hens scratching about the gate of the stackyard, a large mastiff half asleep in his kennel, and an old man tottering towards the stables with a load of straw upon his back. Altogether there was an air of great quiet—a look almost of Sunday, about the place. Everything seemed at rest, as it were, and put away. The very dog just lifted up his nose and laid it down again—too lazy to bark at the stranger.

Wondering somewhat at the stillness, De Benham then crossed the inner quadrangle, went straight up to the smart green door, and rang the bell.

The door was opened almost immediately by a tall young woman in black, who, being asked if Mr. Bowstead was at home, drew back hastily, called some one from the parlour, and went up-stairs with her handkerchief to her eyes.

A big, hearty-looking man, also in black, then came out, bowed gravely, and said:—

"My brother is dead, sir. He was buried yesterday."

De Benham, shocked at the question he had asked, apologized for his intrusion.

"It is no intrusion, sir," replied the big man. "Will you be pleased to walk in?"

"I had no idea that I was coming to a house of mourning," said De Benham. "I ought not to come in."

"Oh, yes, sir—come in by all means. Are you from Monmouth?"

"I am from London. I came down by the night train."

The big man looked at him somewhat curiously, and preceded him into the parlour, where two more young women in deep mourning were seated by the window at some kind of black needlework.

"A gentleman from London, my dears," said the uncle.

They both rose, and curtsied. De Benham took off his hat.

"And now, sir," said the big man, "what will you take?"

De Benham protested that he needed nothing, having breakfasted at Monmouth.

"Mine," he said, hesitatingly, "is purely a business visit."

One of the Miss Bowsteads had already placed an arm-chair for him by the fire, while the other brought out wine and cake from the sideboard.

"Business or pleasure, sir, it's all one," replied he who acted as host. "You're bound to want a snap by this time. What! no more than that? Well, we dine at once."

The two girls now gathered up their work, and prepared to leave the room. The elder said something to her uncle in a low voice, as she passed his chair.

"What I have to say can be said anywhere," urged De Benham, uneasily. "Out of doors, if you will take a turn through the ruins?"

"You are not in the way here, sir. My nieces are now going up to prepare your room. What have you done with your things? Are they down at the 'Three Bottles'?"

This old-world hospitality—so free—so trustful—so biblical in its unquestioning simplicity—proffered as heartily in time of trouble as in time of joy—and proffered, moreover, before ever the stranger had told his name or mission—struck De Benham with a sort of delightful wonder. He excused himself, however, by declaring his intention of returning to London by the night train; whereupon the Miss Bowsteads retired, leaving him with their uncle.

"I ought to begin," he said, "by introducing myself. My name is De Benham."

"Not one of the old De Benhams of this place?"

"Yes—I am a descendant."

"Really, sir? Well, now, I thought there wasn't one of those old De Benhams left."

"I was down here one day the summer before last," continued the young man. "Your brother took me all over the ruins. I think you said the late Mr. Bowstead was your brother?"

"Yes, sir. Matthew Bowstead was my elder brother. I am Mark Bowstead—at your service."

"And my object in coming a second time," De Benham went on, "was to learn whether Mr. Bowstead would be inclined to part from the property."

"To part from it?" echoed Mr. Mark. "Do you mean—to sell it?"

"Yes. To sell it."

"Humph! And the purchaser?"

"Myself."

Mr. Mark Bowstead fidgeted in his chair, and stared hard at the fire; but De Benham detected a gleam of satisfaction on his face.

"May I speak to you on this subject, regarding you as your brother's representative?" asked De Benham.

"Certainly. I am Matthew Bowstead's representative. I am one of his trustees and executors, and the guardian of his girls."

De Benham then proceeded to explain how, being a descendant of the old proprietary family, he had long desired to buy up the castle and adjoining lands; but that it had not hitherto been in his power to come forward with any proposal to that effect. Being now, however, in a position to offer any reasonable terms of purchase, and being, moreover, on the point of leaving England, he was anxious to learn whether such proposals were likely to meet with a favourable reception from the present owners.

Meanwhile Mr. Mark Bowstead's countenance went on brightening and expanding; and when De Benham paused for a reply, he looked up and smiled. He said at once that he would be glad to dispose of the place, if, by disposing of it, he could do better for his nieces. That they should continue to live there alone was impossible. That the land should continue to be cultivated for their benefit was difficult and undesirable. To let it was what had been proposed; but even to letting it—considering that the proprietors were three young girls, likely, perhaps, to marry and have divided interests—there were many objections. Not the least of these objections lay in the fact that he, Mr. Mark Bowstead, was himself a steel-pen manufacturer at Birmingham, wholly ignorant of agricultural matters, and incapable, so far as his own personal knowledge was concerned, of exercising any kind of general supervision over farm property. To sell the estate "right out," as he expressed it, would, in fact, be a considerable relief to his own mind, and would also, he did not doubt, be satisfactory to the young ladies themselves. He then went on to say that he had spent the previous evening in looking through some of "poor Matthew's" books and papers; and that, although his brother seemed to have purchased the property at a moderate valuation, he had (according to certain statements left in his own handwriting) found the land in an impoverished condition. Hence large sums of money had since that time been expended upon surface-drainage, guano, and the like; all of which would have to be considered in the price paid by the next buyer.

Thus, in discussion and deliberation, the morning went by; and at one o'clock De Benham shared the plentiful hospitality of the farm-house table. The Miss Bowsteads (not even in bereavement unmindful of the good-looking stranger) appeared in their best crape and paramatta, and were not a little fluttered to find that their guest was a De Benham of the ancient De Benham line. Had they not, for their amusement and pleasure, rummaged the old coffers and dipped into the old family records, till, as their father once said, it had made "regular antiquarians" of them? And were they not as well informed about the glories, achievements, and alliances of those headless and noseless barons out yonder in Benhampton Church, as if they—Emma, Isabella, and Matilda—were not Bowsteads, but themselves De Benhams "of that ilk?" All this they knew; and profound in proportion was their reverence for the name and race.

"He says he was here a year and a half ago," said Miss Emma that night, after the visitor was gone. "I remember it well. We never saw him; and poor dear father was so vexed that he wouldn't come in to tea."

"Yes; and father said he wasn't a bit of a gentleman!" exclaimed Bella. "But he's a most perfect gentleman—quite a Pelham; or an Ernest Maltravers!"

"It's my belief that he's heir to the title," said Matilda, the youngest of the three.

But at this the others only laughed. Matty, they said, was so romantic—Matty was always dreaming of heroes in disguise.

"Hero or no hero," said Miss Bowstead, "he looks dreadfully delicate. I'm sure he's not strong enough to be travelling again all night in the train."

Some three days later, however, there came to Benhampton Castle a square-shaped business letter, written on Bath-post paper in a clear, engrossing hand—a letter purporting to come from an eminent legal firm in the City, wherein it was set forth that, acting in the interests of their client, Lord De Benham, Messrs. Balfour and Black would have the honour to send their junior partner to Monmouth on a certain day, there to meet and confer with the solicitors and executors of the late Matthew Bowstead, Esquire, respecting the sale and purchase of such portion of the Benhampton estates as had passed into the hands of the said Matthew Bowstead, and also to inspect the title-deeds of the same.

"There now!" exclaimed Miss Matty, triumphantly, "didn't I say he was a lord?"

But the eldest Miss Bowstead only clasped her hands, and said:—

"Oh, good gracious! And to think that we had only a roast loin of pork and a pair of chickens, and not even the best dinner-service on the table!"

SHORT ESSAYS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRIENDS IN COUNCIL."

EIGHTH INSTALMENT.

THE expression, "dumb dogs," is not a mere phrase, adopted by the Puritans of old, to describe those preachers who did not pronounce, with sufficient virulence, against some particular doctrine in theology. There are such creatures as dumb dogs, and very pleasant creatures they are. They may be seen in the prairies sitting at the doors of their houses, or rather at the holes of their burrows, or flitting from burrow to burrow to interchange visits. These dumb dogs live with their wives and families in delightful village communities.

It happened that an ordinary dog—that is, a dog who could bark, and who lived with men—met a prairie-dog with whom he had some slight acquaintance, and was telling him how much he, the ordinary dog, was respected; what good society he kept, living entirely with a superior animal called man, who walked on two legs; and how everything in his friend's house was put under his charge. The dumb dog could make no distinct reply, but wagged his tail respectfully, while listening to the self-praise of his own friend.

A fox, who happened to be passing by, stayed to listen to this conversation; and, from his stealthy way of movement, his presence had been unknown to the dogs. Now, foxes do not like the dogs that bark; and the fox was not sorry to have an opportunity of putting down this clamorous friend of man. He said to the town dog, "The noise you make, must ever prevent your living happily with other dogs, or with your wife and family; and, as for your fine friend, man, it is well known that the noisiest animals always please him most. He does not make a friend of me, the wisest of all the animals; and, in his own species, it is the public speaker, and not the wise man, to whom he gives lordship over him. He is far too foolish to know the merit that there is in a dumb dog."

The town dog made a hasty bark of farewell to his prairie friend, and returned to the city, with his tail between his legs; for he knew that the words of the fox, though spiteful, were true; and he himself had been jealous of the noisy men who seemed to have so much power over the man friend with whom he lived.

Most terrors are but spectral illusions. Only have the courage of the man who could walk up to his spectre seated in the chair before him, and sit down upon it: the horrid thing will not partake the chair with you.

The chemistry of conduct in life has not yet met with accurate expounders; and probably never will meet with them.

Vast differences of thought between the ancients and the moderns—not to the advantage of the moderns—are expressed in this one fact, that the ancients wrought ornament into, or upon, what was useful, while the moderns take great pains, and apply the choicest materials, to fashion something which, though it have the form of usefulness, is never to be used, and is purely ornamental. This idea is fully exemplified when you see a drinking vessel, or a vase, set up on a bracket, never to be removed, except for the purpose of being shown as an ornament.

Two things, which cannot be brought to perfection, unless they are learnt in youth, are music and decisiveness.

Decisions are carried by momentum. For example, it is not altogether the thing said, but the time at which it is said, that may constitute the greatest part of its potency. A suggestion of itself weighty, if uttered at the beginning of a debate, may not equal a much less weighty suggestion which is made after a long time has been spent in debating. Again, the success of any particular counsel often depends as much upon the reputation and position of the councillor, as upon the counsel given. The longer arm of the lever may make the smaller weight prevail.

There is in most minds a moment of regret and reaction immediately after a decision has been arrived at; and the arguments "on the other side" never appear so forcible as when you have just resolved, and have proclaimed your resolve, to act in contravention to them.

All the other passions condescend at times to accept the inexorable logic of facts; but jealousy looks facts straight in the face, ignores them utterly, and says that she knows a great deal better than they can tell her.

Jealousy is often so absurd that, in climates where the sun is a constant presence, you might almost expect that the jealous would seriously complain of the beloved person being always followed so closely by his or her shadow.

The benefactor always retains some affection for the person whom he has benefited. No extent of ingratitude succeeds in utterly effacing this kindly feeling on the part of the benefactor.

Now, no doubt, a Swift or a Rochefoucault would, in his cynical way, give a very unpleasant reading of this patent fact. But, in reality, it is a beautiful arrangement of Nature, or, as we ought to say, of Providence. The benefactor, just in proportion as he has done his work lovingly, has his "exceeding great reward" in an increase of lovingness; for there cannot be a doubt that it is a far happier, and, if we may say so, a more divine thing, to love than to be loved.

There are some things which it is almost impossible to over-estimate. One of these is the indifference of men to all affairs but those which touch them nearly, or which relate to things that are about to happen to them immediately. A full belief in this indifference would often prevent agonies of shame and terror. Even the murderer, in some flagrant case of murder, who imagines that the whole world is thinking of him, would be astonished to find how a small and transitory attention is given to him, so busy and preoccupied are all men about their own affairs.

To take an interest in many things, is one of the greatest of felicities. This interest may be encouraged by education, may be extended by culture; but it is a gift of nature, and one of her best gifts. "My mind is an inhabitant of many things," said the myriad-minded Lord Bacon; but there are poor peasants who may lay claim to a similar largeness and variety of mental lodgment. You will find in all classes, from the highest to the lowest, men who take an interest in things which have no relation whatever—at least no relation which they can discern—to their own welfare; while you find others, who, similarly situated, never hardly let their thoughts and their cares budge very far from their own firesides.

It is a grand thing for the English language that there is no word for "ennui." If the creation had been drab-coloured; if there had been no horses, dogs, water-rats, or dragon-flies; if science and art had been intuitive; if religion had been clear; if all men's condition had been equal; if men and women were always amenable to reason, and boys were always quiet—then the world might have been somewhat dull: there would then have been a justifiable word for ennui in all languages; at present ennui is simply inanity or stupidity.

There was a beautiful river; but the river was very discontented, and made even of its beauty a source of discontent.

It had a sore grievance. There was a canal which, for a long way, went almost side by side with the river, and at such a little distance from it, that, on placid evenings, when even the fluttering of winged insects makes a gentle noise of joy, the river and the canal could hear one another speaking.

"This straight hideous thing," exclaimed the river, "why do men forsake me for it, stealing the water from me to feed its frightfulness!"

"I may be hideous," replied the canal, "and I certainly am straight; but then you see I am always of the same depth, whereas you brawl along, in a shallow way, over the stones here; while, at the further reach, you are deep enough to drown a giant. Now men, and they are not to be blamed for it, like what is of even depth and always serviceable."

The river murmured to itself something about its unrecognised beauty and merit; but did not make any distinct reply to the canal. For it could not.

Some persons, instead of making a religion for their God, are content to make a god of their religion.

Patience is even more rarely manifested in the intellect than it is in the temper.

"It amuses me," said A., "to hear you all give out your wonderful schemes of education—how science is to be combined with literature, and art be superimposed on both. I do not know how it may be in other countries; but in Great Britain the first rudiments of education are, for the most part, unknown. Show me the man who can read well, write well (I mean the mechanical part of writing), talk well, speak well, and who has good manners. I have not met with him yet. I own I have met with men who can do some one or two of these things very well; but where is the Admirable Crichton who can do them all well? Mark you, I have not said anything about ciphering well, nor about English composition.

"Wait a minute. Let me go to my desk, and I will bring you four or five letters to illustrate what I mean about the mechanical part of writing. Here they are: I have kept them together as curiosities.

"The first is from a man holding nearly the highest position that any subject in Europe can hold. I will defy you to make out even the signature of the letter, though I have given you a hint as to who the man is." (We could not read the signature.)

"The second is from a great official person who has dozens of letters to sign in the course of the day. The body of the letter is written by a clerk—how I pity that poor clerk if he has to decipher his chief's minutes! Can you say whose signature that is?" (The letter was handed round, but no one could make out the signature. It was generally thought to resemble the first step of a centipede after it had crawled out from an ink-bottle.)

"The third is from a great historian—a man whose works the world delights to read, and justly so. How I pity the poor printers who have to decipher his manuscript! I think you will make out the first sentence." (The letter was handed round. B., who prides himself upon mastering handwriting, got through the first sentence rightly, and the second sentence. The third he said was a jungle, which he could not see his way through.)

"The fourth letter is from an eminent peer, who takes a great interest in education. I submit it for your interpretation."

B. "I think, if I could have half an hour's time over this letter, by myself and with a magnifying glass, I could make it all out; but it is an abominable handwriting."

"The fifth letter—the most remarkable of all of them—is from a most distinguished person. He is a poet, a novelist, a statesman, a philosopher. Can you make out any of it?" (B. made out the words "My dear," at the beginning of the letter, and several other words in the course of the letter; but was not able to give us a single sentence complete.)

A. "There is a curious story connected with this letter. It treats of a most important subject, and embodies much of the wit and wisdom of the writer. The man to whom it was addressed called in the aid of a government clerk who was said to be very skilful in deciphering handwritings, and he gave in writing his version of it. That version seemed to be very clever and very deep. Further investigation by other persons showed that the government clerk's rendering was totally wrong. For instance, he had rendered a certain scribble as 'ideal,' when the word was in reality 'inherent.' The letter, therefore, according to the latest views of interpretation, and, as I believe, the right views, gave a new construction—also a very plausible one.

"Then came some acute fellow and said, 'The second reading of the letter is the right one, but the first evolves a very grand theory. To whom does it belong? Not to the writer of the letter, for he never intended it. Not to the government clerk, for he was a plain practical man, who knew nothing whatever about the subject. Not to us, who have thus had a beautiful theory put before us which we could not fail to understand, but which we certainly did not invent or initiate. It is a grand metaphysical theory evolved by chance out of bad writing.'"

But, seriously speaking, what a disgrace it is to these eminent men to write in such a way! What half-educated men they are! One does not like to say anything rude to such men; but one ought to suggest to them to go to school again, or, at least, to take private lessons of some good writing-master.

A. "Well, then, how few men can talk distinctly and clearly! With how many persons, especially the young of this generation, is their talk a moan, a lisp, a mutter, a mumble, and a groan! How many times in the course of a conversation amongst English people do you hear the question, 'What did you say?'

"Then, as to reading, I put it to this intelligent company:—Do you know among your numerous friends and acquaintances ten persons who can read well? You are silent.

"Then as to public speaking, how few have attained to any proficiency in this art, which, however, is not a very difficult art! It is a thousand pities that there are not more proficient in this art; for, if there were, it would not have so exorbitant a value put upon it; and, men, who are proficient in it, would not occupy so great a position in the State as they do. The man who can do a thing well, is often the last man who can speak about it, or talk about it, well.

"Lastly, I come to the question of good manners, about which the extra twopence is to be charged at schools. For the last thirty years, with one or two remarkable exceptions, the most distinguished men in politics and in public life have been deficient in winning manners. Though most agreeable men when you come to know them in private life, when you come to know them "at home" (as we used to say at school), they have manifested a shyness, an awkwardness, a reserve, an abruptness of demeanour, or a sphynx-like impenetrability, which has often separated them from those who would have been their most devoted friends.

"Have you ever seen an owl kept in a cage? How it abhors the light? how it shuffles into the most remote corner of its cage? Its ways of going on have often put me in mind of theirs.

"And now, have I not shown you that, before you make such a bother about art, science, and literature, you had better see that the first rudiments of education should be more attended to, and made more account of, than they are at present in Great Britain.

"Think what an accomplished man he would be, who could read well, hand-write well, talk well, speak well, and who should have good manners."

It is well meant, but it is probably a cruel thing of parents to discourage vanity in their children; for, after all, what comfort can there be in life equal to vanity? Vanity is the only thing which keeps most men's tempers tolerably sweet.

Moreover, vanity is of such a versatile nature that it will accommodate itself to all ages, fortunes, and circumstances. Hope grows old; aspirations become middle-aged; and even strong affections fade away. But vanity knows none of these foolish changes, and remains as unwrinkled as the sea. It is like the insect which always takes the colour of the leaf it feeds upon, and always finds a leaf to feed upon.

There are direct opposites to almost every affection of the mind but vanity. For hope, there is despair; for joy, sorrow; for pleasure, pain; but there is no direct opposite in language to vanity. In fact we refuse to contemplate the possibility of there being a man so miserable as to possess the opposite quality to vanity.

PART II.

ARGUING IN A CIRCLE.

*'When first my true Love crowned me with her smile, Methought all Heaven encircled me the while!
When first my true Love to mine arms was given,
Methought that I encircled all of Heaven.'*

LEAVE-TAKING.

When the wings are feathered,
The birds forsake their nest;
So the Bride will leave her Home
Leaning to her Lover's breast.
The tear was in her eye,
But the soul was smiling through,
Brimful of sunshine
As a drop of summer dew.

AS THEY PASSED.

Within Love's chariot, side by side,
Sweetness and Strength did never ride
More perfectly personified:
One of the dearest Angels out
Of Heaven, the Bride was, beyond doubt;
And his a Manhood fit to be
The mortal Mansion of some deity.
All eyes, like jewels, on them hung,
Glowing with precious life;
As at her Husband's side she clung,
The nestled, new-made Wife.
Glad were they in the happiness they gave,
But in their own proud pleasure they were grave.

EVOË.

In the presence of Spring, our beautiful Spring,
Bliethe bird of the Bosom! the heart will sing.
A Spirit of Joy in the oldest breast
Is stirring, and making it young as the rest:
Wakes a new life to leap in each limb,
And laugh out of eyes that were wintry and dim;
So the old Wine stirs in his winter gloom,
And wants to waken, and climb, and bloom,
As he used to do in the world outside,
When grapes grew big in their purple of pride.

He would laugh in the light, he would flush in the foam;

In a care-drowning wave he would rosily roam;
For his blood is so mellow, so merry, so warm,
Into spirit of joy it would fain transform,
And in human life keep holiday—
Rioting ruddily, ripple and play;
Break on the brain in a luminous spray,
Tinting with heaven our earthly clay;
In a fiery chariot mount on its way,
With spirit-company, lordly and gay,
And pass like a soul that is lost in day.
So the Spirit of Joy in the oldest breast
Is stirring, and making it young as the rest;
Wakes a new life to leap in each limb,
And laugh out of eyes that were wintry and dim;
Bliethe bird of the bosom! the heart will sing
In the presence of Spring, our beautiful Spring.

A FACT THAT FLOWERS DOUBLE.

English John Talbot, Shakspeare's terribly brave
Great Fighter, lay in his forgotten grave.
It was but yesterday they found his dust,
The sheath of that old Sword all gone to rust
In English earth; his burial-place recover
In lands owned by a certain Lordly Lover.
And, lo! a Rose hath sprung from out his tomb,
And climbed about this Lover's life to bloom:
A peerless flower of the old Hero's stock—
The tenderest gush from that heroic rock.
Not oft doth Fate vouchsafe so plain a sign,
Prefiguring the lives that are to twine.
All sweetness to this wedded life be given;
Its root so deep in earth, its perfect flower in heaven.

A WAYSIDE WHISPER.

*'Seven years I served for you,
To Love, our lord of life,
Ere he made me a Master
And I won you for my wife,—
So faithfully, so fondly,
Through a world of doubts and fears,
Seven long years, Beloved!
Seven long years.'*

*'Seven years you beacons me,
My leading, crowning star,
To climb the Mount of Manhood,
And you drew me from afar:
You made my grey hours golden,
You glittered through my tears,
Seven long years, Beloved!
Seven long years.*

*'Sometimes you shined so near me—
Far as we dwelt apart—
I hardly sought you with my arms,
You were so safe at heart!
Sometimes you dwined so distant,
I bowed with solemn fears;
Seven long years, Beloved!
Seven long years.*

*'I built my Arch of Triumph
For you to ride through;
I kept my lamps all lighted
That the warring winds out-blew:
I worked and I waited,
And I fought down my fears,
Seven long years, Beloved!
Seven long years.*

*'Now the perils are all over,
And the pains all past,
My Fortune's wheel full-circle comes
In your dear eyes at last!
For such a prize the winning
Most brief and poor appears,
Yet, 'twas seven long years, Beloved!
Seven long years.*

THE WELCOME HOME.

Warm is the Welcome! 'tis our way to grasp
The hand in love or greeting till it ache;
But, to a tender heart our love doth take
The happy pair it doth so proudly clasp.

And very tender in its love To-day
Is every heart toucht with a thought of Him,
Low-lying in the Cypress-shadow dim,
From which we come to waft you on your way,

And the still face, that looks from Ashridge towers
With smile more regnant in its touching ruth,
And sad hoar-frost upon the dews of youth,
And Widow's weeds to mix with bridal-flowers.

Through Him we lost, we have more love to give.
As some fond Mother yearningly hath breathed
Her life out in the new life she bequeathed,
Our dearest died that this great love might live.

These darling Violets, eloquently mute,
Are rich in sadder bloom and sweeter breath,
And that pathetic sanctity of death,
Because our buried joy was at their root.

These Roses blush with a more vital glow
Of crimson—like pale buds, whose tips are red
As tho' the flower's heart, in breaking, bled—
Because of looks so lately wan with woe.

These are our Jewels! tears that purged our sight
Like Euphrasy; they lay above the Dead
All drear and dim; but the sad drops we shed
Now live with precious lustrous in Your light!

The love that darkly wept at heart hath risen
Transfigured. Lo! its sunburst in each face!
As Earth, with all her flowers, smiles embrace
To Spring, rejoicing from her wintry prison.

These Voices, mounting merry as Larks up-spring,
But now were praying on the low, cold sod:
The night is past—they soar in praise to God;
They make the old English greeting rarely ring.

We lean and look to You, thinking of Him.
Warm welcome for the sake of One that's gone;
Warm welcome for your own! Pass on, pass on;
We wave our hands, and shout till sight grows dim:

And, ere the shouts cease ringing in your ears,
We drink a health—all standing—drink to you,
While in our eyes the tears are standing too:
Old tears, that wanted to be wept for years:

But keep a holy hush 'mid all the noise,
To match the silent music your hearts make:
Pass on into your faery heaven, and take
Our gentlest blessing on your wedded joys.

The Dawn will rise, tho' golden days be set;
The birds sing merrily, in spite of Death:
Young hearts will love while lasts this human breath;
Rainbows bridge Earth and Heaven for eyes tearwet.

Pass gaily on in glory through the gate
Of your new life, beneath this Bridal Dawn;
And when from future days the veil is drawn,
All happy fortunes for you lie in wait!

And, looking on your bliss, with proudest flush
May the dear Mother's face be glorified.
We, now the sound hath ceased, will stand outside
Your Portals—all hearts praying 'mid the hush.

THE BONNY BRIDELAND FLOWER.

In the Brideland sleeping,
Nestled Beauty's Flower;
Came the Lover peeping
Into her green bower;
On her face hung tender
As a drop of dew;
With her virgin splendour
Thrilling through and through.

Now, the shy, sweet maiden
Softly droops her head;
All her heart is laden
With his coming tread!
Now, the new dawn breaketh
In a blush of bliss;
The Beloved waketh
At her Troth-love's kiss.

In our dull grey weather
We have seen her bloom;
Fain as Exiles gather Round some flower from Home
Seen the face that never Fades away, but gleams,
With its still smile, ever
Though the land of Dreams.

Fair befall the bonny,
Bonny Brideland flower!
All things dear and sunny
Bless her bridal bower!
Truest love e'er given
Feed her new life-root;
And, thou God in heaven,
Crown the flower with fruit.

PEEPS AT THE FAR EAST.

BY THE EDITOR.

IX.—CALCUTTA.

THE boom of a gun from the offing of Madras informed us that the steamer from Ceylon en route for Calcutta had anchored. We had therefore to prepare for embarking. With much gratitude and regret, I parted from my good host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. Scott. My co-deputy Dr. Watson had been the guest of our excellent chaplain, Mr. Liston, who had been our constant companion during our sojourn. After bidding many farewells, Mr. Liston and our missionary, Mr. Thomson, together with Jacob David and others, accompanied us to the steamer. On our way thither, we passed our beautiful mission buildings, their verandahs echoing to the roar of the ceaseless surf, and we looked with profoundest interest at the scene of our Christian work, which henceforth would be to us a constant memory. We passed down the long wooden pier which juts out into the restless ocean, where there is neither promontory nor island to form a harbour.

On the shore, high and dry, lay the Mas-sowlah boats and catamarans. This is the only rest they enjoy. There is no repose for them at sea, as they never anchor, but keep on plunging through the breakers. Indeed there is little rest for the ships either, even when they lie at anchor. They rock to and fro with ceaseless motion; for no dead calm ever visits this uneasy roadstead.

We were soon once more on the deck of a Peninsular and Oriental steamer, and met a good countryman in the captain of the Mongolia. Our berth, six feet by six, was intended to accommodate all our necessary luggage, as well as ourselves, and made us again wonder how so much space is required at home, and so little at sea, to form a sleeping apartment. "The fresh air makes the whole difference," say sanitary worshippers of the elements. But why should not this universal commodity of air be obtained on shore as well as at sea? Windows are as easily opened as ports, and do not require to have dead-lights screwed over them in a strong breeze.

There was a large party on board; and among others we found, to our delight, one of the most distinguished civilians in India, Sir Richard Temple, to whom we had been introduced at Lord Napier's. Another passenger who much interested us was the widow of Sir John Franklin. Though seventy years of age, this was her third voyage to the East during the latter and sadder years of her life. She had visited China, Japan, and India, in former voyages, having found the climates highly restorative; and, no doubt, unconsciously to herself, the very movement and change of scene must have helped to relieve her mind, which had suffered so much during her terrible anxieties. She was accompanied by her niece, and seldom—if I may take the liberty of saying so—have I had the pleasure of meeting with ladies who impressed me more by their rare intelligence and high character. We were gratified by Lady Franklin's kindness in telling us much about her husband, confirmatory of what we all know of the character of one of the bravest and best men who ever did honour to the flag of England. We had not the happiness of meeting these friends again in India; but we heard that they had seen all the "sights" in Calcutta, even climbing to the top of the Ochterlonie Monument, (from which my all too solid flesh shrank back!); and that they had travelled up the valley of the Ganges, returning by the Indus to Bombay. Here were pluck and energy which might put young and timid travellers to shame! We were also glad to find on board ship our friends Dr. and Mrs. Murray Mitchell, who were going to Calcutta in connection with Dr. Duff's mission. Dr. Mitchell had been long a successful and distinguished missionary in Bombay, and was full of information on the subject which most deeply interested us. In Sir Richard we had an inexhaustible mine of wealth on all that pertained to India. He was most communicative, and the time seemed short in his society. Our acquaintance with him was renewed and continued in Calcutta, to my great advantage, and forms now one of my most gratifying reminiscences of India.

We left Madras on Friday afternoon, and on Monday morning were in the muddy estuary of the Hoogly. Not a breeze all this time had ruffled the surface of the sea. We steamed on through glassy gleaming waves. Soon the pilot brig was picked up. These brigs are manned by a goodly number of pilots, who receive large wages as they advance in the service. Most of them are high class men, of excellent manners and superior education. It is wonderful what these little brigs come through. They encounter all sorts of weather, from the gales of the monsoons to the cyclone which makes men tremble in their strongest houses on shore. They brave the heaviest seas which roll in from the Bay of Bengal, tossing their heads in fury as their march is obstructed by the sandbanks and waters of the Ganges. Yet when great ships go down, and are "never heard of more," these brigs hold their own, and are ready to send pilots off to board any ship when it is possible for men to do so. With us there was fortunately no difficulty. We anchored in the afternoon off Saugor lighthouse to wait the morning's tide. At nine next morning we steamed up the river, between flat banks, dotted with palm trees, and low huts. My thoughts, strange to say, were not about India itself, but wandered into dreams of the thousands of my countrymen who had gone up this old stream, to begin their work in Hindostan, with honour, glory, and riches full in their eye; and alas! also of the much diminished number who had returned along the same path, with the homes of England and the hills of Scotland, health and old friends before them, and yet the grandest, though perhaps the saddest, memories of their lives behind them!

We reached our moorings about sunset, amid a forest of ships' masts, and black funnels; with crowds of smaller craft, by which we were speedily surrounded. Then amidst a crush of passengers—servants with luggage struggling to get on shore, and streams of people with sun-topees struggling to get on board—steam screeching, boatmen roaring, passengers shouting and luggage whirling about, we found our hands grasped by friends who had come to welcome and receive us, and somehow or other we got on shore, and found ourselves in Calcutta.

Soon after landing I was in the hospitable home of my old friend Mr. Craik, the son of an older friend still. Once more, though for a short time only, I was parted from my "better half," Dr. Watson, who "put up" at the house of Dr. Ogilvie, the principal of our mission college.

In driving through the streets for the first time with my host and hostess, the impression made upon me was that Calcutta is in every respect worthy of being the capital of British India. No other Eastern city can be compared with it—the river making it differ in appearance from any other city I have ever seen. Unlike Bombay and Madras too, it has, among other good streets quite European, one, old Court-house Street, so fine and wide, and with shops so brilliant, that no part of London would be ashamed of it. None of the streets are paved, however, and but for those water kelpies the "Bhesties" would be intolerable from dust. The European residences in Madras, which, so far as outward appearance goes, are a great advance upon the bungalows of the wealthy merchants of Bombay or Malabar Hill, are in turn surpassed by those of Calcutta. The Madras houses may in some cases be as stately, but they are fewer in number. Moreover, they are so scattered and isolated in their small wooded parks and gardens as to produce no general impression on the eye. But in Calcutta the splendid mansions, each within its own compound—self-contained, as we say in Scotland—form a noble line of street. The breadth of the great thoroughfares, the size and the imposing style of the residences which line them, the arrangements necessitated by the climate,—which demands air and shade, and makes necessary a garden also, with its flowers and verdure—all tends to spread the European portion of Calcutta over such extent of ground as no other capital can display. There is no packing or jostling one against another. Every house seems to say to the other, "Keep off, I am hot—let me breathe—let me have air! Besides, I am English, and wish to be as much as possible by myself, without the unnecessary intrusion of neighbours, even in a city." Yet, I must add in passing, that these palaces seemed to me to have a certain sadness and dullness about them in spite of the brilliant sunlight which steeps them in its lustre. This feeling was not occasioned by the thought, in some respects a sad one, that, like public hotels, they had often changed their inhabitants. What probably contributes most to impart this dull and dead appearance is the style of blinds on the windows, whereby those eyes of the home are darkened; although it must be admitted these green goggles are necessary to shut out the heat. Then there is besides the dilapidated look of the walls, which being built of chunam, or plaster, are full of blotches and stains, and have a weather-beaten look, occasioned in great part by the climate with its monsoon rains and summer heat, thus giving an impression of want of repair or of neatness.

But the glory of Calcutta is the Maidan, or Park! (See p. 696.) In shape it is a large parallelogram. At one end of it stands the Government House, stately and imposing, and near it the Townhall, Treasury, and High Court. Opposite is Fort William—occupying the centre of the plain, which is a mile and a half in length—and beyond, the fine steeple of the Cathedral, piercing the sky. Along the one side is the long and noble street, or range of Chowringhee, with its princely dwellings; while parallel with and opposite to it flows what was the greatest sight to me—a noble river, such as is not to be found in any other city in so close proximity at once to the Park, the fashionable drive, and fashionable homes. And, moreover, this river is the Hoogly branch of the old Ganges.

We drove along its bank in the evening when "all the world" was sharing the same enjoyment. Carriage after carriage rolled along with their native drivers and native footmen—without shoes or stockings, cool if not comely. The Viceroy's carriage and four was among the rest, with the fitting state of outriders, and splendid-looking Sikh body-guard. These last were well mounted, with high boots and scarlet uniform, and bore lance and pennon. Native gentlemen—but never ladies—of every hue and rank, from the prince, the rahah or rich merchant, down to the most ordinary and common-place Oriental, rolled along in carriages and dress corresponding to their respective rank or wealth. Fine horses cantered along, some burdened by youth and beauty, others by uninteresting obesity, or by the sombre weight of old Indian experience and authority: but all contributed, as in Rotten Row during "the season," to the liveliness of the scene. I could see no gentlemen on foot; for such exercise, if taken at all, is at early morning. Flowing beside all this busy, restless stream of human life is the grand old river, itself a very embodiment of Indian life, past and present. On its banks can be seen at any hour, and near to the busiest haunts of the commercial city, dying creatures, half immersed in its sacred waters, breathing their last, and dead bodies in process of burning. But at this point, alongside the fashionable park, its broad tide has sights more agreeable. The finest ships of the commercial navy of all nations, lie here silent and motionless at their moorings; and there are no ugly wharves or uglier buildings for storing goods, to spoil the beautiful picture. The river-banks are pure as those of the upper reaches of the Thames, and the waters which lave them have nothing to offend either eye or nostril. The East meets the West by adding to the shipping its own strange-looking picturesque craft of every kind, some acting as "lumpers" to the vessels, and others carrying produce; with many which have come from far-off inland cities, floating for months along some of the innumerable streams which, flowing originally from the great range of the Himalaya, at last find their way in a mazy network, to join the Ganges.

The minor ornaments of the Maidan are the Ochterlonie column (certainly not the least of these); memorial equestrian statues; and the flower garden and ornamental grounds in front of Government House. The want of trees both as to size and number is at once felt. But the cyclones which drive vessels' rigging like feathers through the air are not favourable to arboreal growth. The Park has in this respect suffered much, its banyans, palms, tamarinds, and cocoa-nut trees having been cut down in the terrible storm battle of 1864. Without wishing to depreciate the glorious river, it did seem to me that water—that Eastern god—might be turned to yet better account in the Park, if not for profit, at least for pleasure. The tanks in it have no more beauty than stupid-looking mill-dams. Why has it no jets-d'eau? There are none of them in Calcutta or in any other city in India. The very sight of one, flinging its spray around it, would be cooling; while it could be utilised for communicating, though possibly to only a small extent, more "glory to the grass," which is yet wonderfully green. This has been successfully accomplished on a great scale in Paris and in the Bois de Boulogne, where formerly the grass was brown and dry as dust. Nay more, why is it that water has never been made use of within Eastern European houses, or in their courts, as is done in the grand old houses in Damascus and in the marble palaces of the Mahommedan Raj in Agra and Delhi? Surely some cunning architect could construct at least one retreat, in which streams of living water might be so disposed amidst plants and flowers, as to afford a cool and beautiful spot of luxurious and healthful repose. But apart from these thoughts—inspired perhaps while writing on a day of great heat among the Highland hills at home, as well as by the remembrances of still hotter days abroad—I still think the Maidan of Calcutta worthy of this "city of palaces."

Turning now to the Indian side of Calcutta, we find that it is quite as characteristic of its Eastern inhabitants as the other is of its Western. In our drive we passed through a long, broad thoroughfare—I forget its name, or even that of the city district in which it is situated—whose houses looked, when compared with what I had already seen, very much as the poorest and worst portion of the poorest and worst Irish village would do if transported to somewhere near Belgravia. Miserable-looking huts were huddled together, with no appearance of order. Cows, buffaloes, goats, naked children, lank and lithe natives, roved all about, giving motion and life to the scene. Between this native portion of the city and the road along which we drove there was a deep ditch, that seemed no better than an open sewer. A plank here and there crossed it, by which alone communication was kept up between the opposite sides. There are about 60,000 of such huts in the city. Yet, after all, he who remembers the low parts of our crowded cities in Europe, and the squalor, the filth, and the dens and cellars which are the abodes of poverty and crime, will cease to wonder at these homes of the natives, in a country where heat soon evaporates moisture, consumes all smells, reduces the necessity of clothing to a few rags, and the covering for a roof to a mere shelter or temporary retreat. And then it must be remembered that Calcutta, with its crowded suburbs, contains nearly a million of inhabitants, and covers an area of sixteen square miles.

The native town covers six square miles, and contains upwards of 400,000 natives, exclusive of those in the suburbs. The streets are generally narrow, and the dusty brick houses which line them have not a single picturesque feature. The bazaars would be equally uninteresting, were it not for the dense crowds who move through them. One sees at a glance that these belong to different races. They wear turbans of various shapes, sizes, and colours, giving the impression of a moving bed of tulips. The shops in the native streets have little to attract, but if one leaves his carriage, he on his part becomes an object of great attraction to the shopkeepers, who follow after him and give him the amplest information as to the variety, excellence, and cheapness of their goods. I noticed one most pleasing feature in some of these streets. This was a small stream of water conveyed in an open channel and elevated two or three feet above the roadway. It runs along the elevated platform on which many natives squat at their work or off which their small shops open. This rivulet of Ganges water has value both for soul and body. But it is a gift of yesterday, and has not come down from "the good old time." Much is being done, I may add, and done successfully, to obtain good water and good drainage for Calcutta. This, I fear, will extinguish the poor Bheestie with his water skin on his back, who at present moistens the dusty streets with so much diligence. It was quite an ethnographical study to watch the specimens of the swarthy aboriginal races. They are as different from the Bengalees as from Europeans. Like our Irish labourers, they were excavating the trenches for the water-pipes. A German missionary, puzzled as to the best field of labour, was led to visit the Santhals through conversing with one of them here, and the result has been that 12,000 of them are now gathered into the Church, or are under Christian instruction at Nagpore!

After my first afternoon drive in Calcutta, and before night was over, I had acquired additional experience of the jackals, of whom I have before made honourable mention. Yet, such is my horror of them, that I cannot resist the temptation to devote a few more lines to them, in memoriam. The sun sets, as all know, with remarkable suddenness in the East. There is no twilight, but only a momentary pause, or quiver in the eye of day before it suddenly closes for the night. It is pleasant at such a time to sit out in the verandah, in the interval between sunset and dressing for an eight o'clock dinner. It is then that the jackal music begins, with which no other portion of creation can compete. In a moment, sudden as the first crash of an orchestra when the conductor gives the signal, the howl strikes the astonished ear. In this case, it was as if some demon led the choir of a thousand other demons fierce and ferocious, until in an instant, when darkness fell, the whole horizon resounded. Waa!—waa—waa! waap!—whoo—ooo!—whap—whop—waee—waa! Never on earth can there be heard anything more unearthly! Have these wretches any object? Are they in revenge let loose nightly in pursuit of some foul spirit for his destruction? Does a wild mania seize them, and are they devouring one another? Whatever is the history of this demoniac race, I feel that their wild yells can never be equalled or approached, even at a contested election in "the Isle of Saints," when it culminates with the shrieks of Irish freemen round the hustings. But these creatures—I mean the jackals—are not fierce. Nor are they ever seen in the day-time: then they retire into sewers, and dens of the earth. It is said that they have their hole and corner levees even under the Government House! Sanitary philosophers alone rejoice in them as consumers of garbage and as unpaid scavengers.

The hour of dinner in India is generally eight o'clock, in the cool of the evening, after the labours of the day are over. This would be an excellent arrangement, were it not for the Eastern habit of rising early to enjoy the cool of the morning. But it is rather trying for a stranger who is entertained hospitably every evening, and who consequently retires late to bed, and probably feels the heat very much, even in what is provokingly called by the acclimatized "the cool and delicious season," to have what seems his first sleep broken by the card of some distinguished and kind official being handed to him about daybreak! It is no consolation at such a moment to be told that an early rise is at once delightful and necessary for health.

As to dinners in India, I may state that among the many means of securing good health, a spare rice diet did not strike me as being included. Breakfast and lunch are as substantial as in northern climes, distinguished, too, by rich curries and other equally tempting condiments, none of which are a vain show. It is alleged, indeed, that the European constitution requires to be thus "kept up;" and there must surely be some truth in it, since ladies as well as gentlemen not only assent to the doctrine, but practise it as conscientiously. And judging from their good looks and very pleasing manners the results seem to justify the wisdom as well as the agreeableness of their convictions. Yet I must repeat that the unacclimatized Western who, in ignorance or innocence, follows these bright examples of good living day by day, must make up his mind to suffer for it night by night.

Probably the first sound which greets one on waking at the dawn of day is the kirr kirr of the kite. These birds are protected as aide-de-camps to the grosser jackals in destroying noxious things and creatures. When the bedroom windows are opened for fresh air, one is sure to see them flying about in the still sunlit air and cloudless heaven, swooping down and wheeling round the compound and uttering their peculiar cry. Another marked object in the morning is your Oriental servant. He has, probably, been squatting at the door watching for your waking, or may not unlikely have been walking about the room on his bare feet, like a ghost, arranging your things, and so quietly as not to attract attention. But the moment you cry "Boy!" he suddenly appears, like one of the genii in the fairy tale, and with the instantaneous responsive cry of "Sahib!"

Our first duty, after having rested for a day at Calcutta, was to present our letters and pay our respects to the Viceroy. I had the honour of making his acquaintance when he visited Scotland some years ago, so that I did not meet him as an entire stranger; but had I done so, all who know his urbanity and kindness would anticipate the nature of his reception, even for the sake of the mission which had brought us to India. We were ushered into his private waiting-room. He was alone. We were welcomed with the cordiality, nay, the affection of a friend; and this was but the beginning of a series of most considerate attentions. I like to record my recollection of these, however inadequately I can express my sense of them.

I shall never forget my first impressions of Government House. These were produced not by the fine building itself, nor by its noble public rooms, nor by the grand view of the Maidan from its semi-circular balcony, although in these respects it seemed to me a palace worthy of a British Viceroy. But what chiefly occupied my thoughts was the memory of the men who had lived here as the representatives of Britain, who here held their councils and from hence issued their commands affecting the destinies of so large a portion of the human race; and who had each carried day by day such a weight of personal responsibility and anxiety as seldom falls to any man's lot. I never before felt so proud of my country, as when I thought of all this. I have trod the gorgeous halls of almost every regal palace in Europe from Moscow to Naples, and those of the republican "White House," in Washington. But with none of these could I associate such a succession of names as those of the men who had governed India;—men high-bred and cultivated, with talents of the highest order, both as soldiers and as statesmen; with a rare personal honour such as no money could purchase, and an unselfish desire to do their duty, such as no party objects could destroy. Sir John was the last link in this long chain, which has even in this century included men like Canning, Elgin, Dalhousie, Hardinge, Ellenborough, Bentinck, Minto, and Wellesley (by whom Government House was built), all supported, too, by local governors and public officers of their own spirit and stamp of character. Among all these who lived or laboured here during this century, there is not one whose memory should cause a blush to suffuse the cheek of a British patriot, save only from the emotions of gratitude and admiration!

Orientalism, generally speaking, is singularly tenacious of its primitive manners, social habits, and ideas. In these respects the "East" of Arabia, or Asia Minor, nearest to Europe, is more unchangeable than the farther "East" of Hindostan. The few English who have governed India have done more to bring it into harmony with Western civilisation and culture, than all Europe has done for the world south of the Mediterranean. And no part of India presents a more striking contrast between what was and what is, than Calcutta. The city itself does not date further back than the era of the battle of Plassey. The old fortified English Factory was erected on what was almost a marsh in the middle of a few straggling villages, surrounded by jungle, and given up to tigers. It had a garrison of three hundred men only. This insignificant fort, being rich in merchandise, tempted the Nawab Surajah Dowlah, who attacked it with his huge army in 1756. It was this despot who at last took it, after a splendid defence, and as every one knows, thrust one hundred and forty-six persons into a dungeon eighteen feet square, of which number only twenty-three came out alive. Then came down upon him at Plassey the sword of the avenging Clive, followed, very properly, by acquisition of territory, and soon afterwards by the building of Fort William and of Calcutta as well. Immediately behind Government House is Tank Square, and beside this is the site of the Blackhole, which was long used as a warehouse. I keenly realised the change which has taken place when I remembered how much safer the life of an Englishman is now, when travelling by day or night in any part of India, than it is in some kingdoms in Europe. This sense of change was but a few weeks ago still more forcibly impressed upon me when I gazed on the present Nawab of Bengal, the successor of Surajah Dowlah, as he paid his respects to the Prince of Wales at a levee in St. James's, along with Englishmen—his fellow-subjects.* The Blackhole tragedy was like most instances of native perfidy in its results—it hastened on a brighter day for India and its people.

During my stay in Calcutta I visited one or two of the houses of the native aristocracy; and as I am now writing about the outside aspect of things in Calcutta, we may say something of these houses in passing. One was that of a rich Zemindar. It was large, but gave me the impression of confusion, neglect, and squalor. It entered from a nasty street, and seemed built amidst rubbish, with no attempt at ornament, order, or beauty. There were not even good drains. The rooms, or cells, off its verandahs appeared unfurnished, because native. One room, it is true, looked more comfortable, being furnished in European style; but it was never used except as a show-room to foreigners. Sundry remains of paint, oil, or ghee, with decayed flowers, littered the floor of the verandah, telling of the pooja and religious ceremonies which the family Brahmin had been performing; for every day he has to discharge some such duties as priest. The proprietor was not at home; but his brother, bare to the waist, received us very kindly—we having gone as friends of their European physician. The “laird” himself arrived as we were departing. His loose tunic was so arranged that it disclosed the bare skin within, having been constructed for coolness rather than for elegance. I was not impressed by the residence of this possessor of £10,000 a year. In the house of another native gentleman I saw but one room comfortably and nicely furnished, and it too was for the reception of European guests. Nothing could exceed the kindness and courtesy of the rich host. At the request of my friend the physician, he also displayed the costly and beautiful family jewels, some of which ornamented his splendid hookah. He also introduced a fine-looking boy—his son and heir. The lad was dressed in tartan plaid, in token of respect for our nationality. The servants were all present as part of the household; and it was delightful to watch the eager interest they took in this exhibition—so natural and so kind—of family wealth and power. Another of the native houses—for I refrain from taking the liberty of mentioning even the names of their possessors—was on a still grander scale, and the most aristocratic I saw in India. It was a large, square-looking palace, surrounded by a considerable space of ground, high railings separating it from the street, which was in the native town. A huge bull from some part of India, chained up, was feeding in the large compound. There was a guard of native infantry at the main entrance to the house, assigned because of the high rank of its owner. Around the compound was a very large and interesting collection of beasts and birds, many of them rare, and arranged as in the Zoological Gardens. Whether such a method of spending vast sums of money was prompted solely by love of natural history, or to some extent by beliefs more or less seriously held as to the affection due to animals based upon the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, I cannot say. Among the animals exhibited and preserved with much care was a huge and venerable tortoise. It had been in the possession of the family for, I think, about seventy years, having been more than three-score and ten when purchased by them! It was very curious to study that creature! Why was such long life granted to him? He seemed as stupid as a stone. Yet the whole of humanity had died at least twice since he was born! Why was he blessed with such a thick skin and thick shell over it, when such a vast portion of the sufferings of mankind and womenkind arises from their being thin skinned? Why should he have been alive when Nadhir Shah ransacked Delhi; have attained his majority when our people were choking in the Blackhole, and Clive was fighting at Plassey; have grown into sober years when Warren Hastings was first Governor-General; and have lived during every succeeding reign until now, and yet either cannot or will not tell us a word about these things, or manifest interest in anything except in eating? Yet how many noble historians have come and gone without his advantages! Why should a rich Hindoo preserve such a stolid mass of shell and selfishness? It may be from devotional feelings: a tortoise, they say, holds up the world. And truly he has all the patience and long life needful for such a work. No rough ground would trouble his skin, nor would anything pain him, or put him out, or make him nervous. What a first-rate fellow he would be to govern Ireland, if my many Irish friends will not be so thin-skinned as to be offended at my saying so!

But to return to the house itself. It was built in the form of a square, with an inner court. We were ushered into a splendid drawing-room, furnished in European fashion, and in the most costly manner. Among other pictures was one of her Majesty by the host, or rather by his eldest son, who conducted us through the apartments. It was touching to see the keen desire this native gentleman displayed to do all honour to European tastes by thus expensively furnishing those fine apartments, which neither himself nor his family ever occupied. Nor was it less touching to see his anxiety to show respect to the Queen, not only in painting her portrait himself, but in speaking of her frequently in the most loyal manner. It was evident, however, from the unnecessary quantity of furniture of every kind—great crystal candelabra, bronzes, busts, timepieces, and such like—which crowded the rooms, no less than from the quality of much that was there, that the rich native gentleman's kind heart and want of knowledge, as well as his wealth, had been taken advantage of by tradesmen. An English lady or gentleman of taste could have produced infinitely better results with immensely less outlay. After all, however, this is a private matter with which I have nothing to do. But I never can forget the young host who was kind enough to show us his father's house. He was a high-bred gentleman, and very good looking. He spoke English perfectly, and had manners singularly elegant and pleasing—such, indeed, as are rarely to be met with in any society either at home or abroad. His father was unwell, but kindly came to greet us.

In spite of all this grandeur and show I believe that even the highest natives live in what Paddy calls a "hugger mugger" state. Such is their custom. Their private life is very simple, all their grandeur being reserved for public display only. It would astonish many a European to see the private apartments where an Eastern family of rank live, eat, and sleep, as contrasted with what the outside world is permitted on great occasions, such as Durbars, to see in other parts of their palace home!

But human life, as it exists in Calcutta, deserves a little more attention. Representatives of all the leading races and forms of religious belief in the world are to be found here. Europe is represented by Protestant churches of almost every orthodox denomination of any importance—Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational, and Wesleyan Methodist, and also by those of the Greek,

Armenian, and Roman Catholic communions. The Europeans number from 11,000 to 12,000. The native population is divided chiefly between Mahomedans, who amount to 70,000 or 80,000, and Hindoos, who number 400,000. There are besides, of Indo-Europeans about 8,500; of Jews, 671; Parsees, 100; Chinese, 400; and Asiatics, 1,400.

Calcutta contains upwards of 170 heathen temples, many of which are small and unimportant, save as keeping alive idolatrous worship in every district of the city. One of the most influential of these temples is at Kalighat, from whence the name Calcutta probably derives its origin. We paid it a visit. Kali was the wife of Siva, the god of destruction; and she seems, from all accounts, to have been in every respect a helpmeet for such a worthless and bloody husband. It is needless to narrate the long and wildly absurd fable which tells how this Kali was piously cut in pieces; and how wherever a bit of her body fell a temple was built. A portion of Kali's body descended at Kalighat, and hence the temple. These temples are chiefly shrines, like a large dim hall lighted from the door, and are intended to serve only for the habitation of the divinity. In India no public preaching or instruction of any kind is given in the temples, as is usual in mosques. The form of the head and upper part of the body of Kali is placed in this shrine of Kalighat. A more hideous image cannot be conceived ! The black face is surmounted by long hair, and a red tongue protrudes from the hideous mouth, and descends to the chin. The body has four arms, one of which grasps a scimitar, while another holds the head of a giant by the hair. For ornaments, the figures of two dead bodies serve as ear-rings, and round the neck is a chain of skulls. To represent blood, her eyebrows are coloured with red paint, which descends in streams to her breast ! This is the representation of the deity worshipped at Kalighat !

I need not describe the forms of worship here, which are common to all heathen temples. What—to us at least—was peculiar in this temple were the sacrifices. It is certain that human sacrifices were, at no very remote period, habitually offered to Kali. There are minute rules as to these in the formulas of her priests. “By the sacrifice of three men she is pleased 100,000 years,” is an expression indicating the place men held in her tariff of piety. So recently as Dr. Duff’s residence in Calcutta a man was—very properly !—executed for sacrificing a human victim to Kali ; and a rajah was disinherited for doing the same thing with three British subjects ! It would be bold to affirm that such practices, common during the rule of the native dynasties, never occur even now, amidst the falsehood and darkness of a horrid superstition which, as a religion of fear, takes a passionate hold of its votaries. We ourselves saw several goats sacrificed. A few ceremonies were performed over them by a Brahmin, who received the head of each as a small fee. The head of the animal was inserted in a square frame made secure by a pin, and then severed at one blow by the executioner. The priest received the head, and the body was removed by the officer, to be eaten, I presume, by him and others. Those animals are thus offered every day. On great festivities oxen are killed and hundreds of goats. It was a painful scene of blood and suffering, and with no end or purpose that I could discover. I tried in vain to ascertain whether these people really had any intelligent theory of sacrifice ; whether it was intended to appease divine wrath, to express gratitude, or to purify offences ? Or whether, if the appeasing of wrath was the object, the wrath was appeased by the sufferings of the animal or by the gift of it ? Whether, again, the offering was a gift or a substitute ? or whether the offerer was purified by the offering of the gift of the animal, or merely by the physical blood ? Others may be able to throw light on these questions, but as far as I could learn there was a dim idea only of doing that which was pleasing to the bloodthirsty goddess.

The officials connected with these temples seemed to me stolid and ignorant creatures, with a large share of grovelling superstition. They had also the aspect of being stimulated by bang. One observes no sign of reverence, unless, perhaps, on the part of the poor worshipper, who sits cross-legged before the image in silence, yet with a most stupid and inane look. Before him are arranged his small, simple offerings,—tiny saucers filled with rice, flowers, lemon water, and so on.

Kali’s temple left a most horrible impression on my mind. To those who have no faith in a living, personal God, all acts and forms of worship must appear childish—mere matters of indifference, in which the ignorant worshipper alone can have any interest. But to every one who believes in God as our Father, whose character is perfectly revealed to us in Christ, and imperfectly, although truly, reflected in the life of every good man, such foul worship as this is very shocking. To say the least, it never can in the very nature of things be pleasing to God that his only representative should be so hideous a demon as Kali. Is it by such means that men can be educated to say “Our Father which art in heaven ?” And who dares accept the terrible responsibility of withholding from brethren grovelling in such superstitions the knowledge of a common Father ? Talk of the necessity of our being ourselves agreed as to our theology before preaching to the heathen, as if Christendom could not send anything better to India than Kali ! Those Europeans who think thus have more to be ashamed of than the most ignorant heathen who ever worshipped at her shrine.

We saw one idol festival only. Not being well versed in the festival days of the Hindoo pantheon, I cannot at this moment recall the name of the distinguished god or goddess who was honoured on the occasion to which I allude. I think it was the festival of Suruswatee, the goddess of learning, in honour of whom every Hindoo who can read or write makes this his holiday. Every street was crowded with carriages and processions. So much, indeed, was this the case, that in one place we were brought to a stand-still for nearly half an hour. Procession followed procession, each group bearing aloft a doll-like image, with surroundings more or less gorgeous and expensive, according to the wealth or liberality of the party exhibiting. Each procession had also its band playing their wild screeching instruments, accompanied by the hard monotonous beat of the tom-tom. These so-called bands of music always impressed me with an eerie nightmare feeling of idolatry—they sounded so determined, inharmonious, and unearthly. One procession especially arrested my attention. It consisted of about eighty persons, all dressed with tartan kilt, hose, plaid, and bonnet, in imitation of Highland soldiers. “I could hardly believe my eyes,” as astonished people say. My native guide and interpreter said he knew no other reason for this European costume having been adopted on such festal occasions, than that the impression made upon the native fancy by the Highland regiments which they had seen on parade in Calcutta was peculiarly strong, and had been increased by what they had heard of their brave deeds during the mutiny.

In connection with the processions there were also many tolerably good fireworks, their variously coloured lights blazing in the streets. The end, strange to say, of each procession was the river, into which every god was hurled with shouts of glee! We saw this ceremony in connection with two other phases in the customs and life of India. One was the burning Ghat. It is a large, handsome, lofty shed, open to the winds of heaven, in which the bodies of the dead are housed. Officials like our gravediggers do the work of selling the wood and making all arrangements for consuming the body. We saw iron machines like small locomotives, minus the mechanism, which were intended at once to conceal, and to consume, the body, as in an oven, but they had not as yet been used. I will not describe the appearance of those funeral pyres, and the sad remnants of mortality upon them. No relations or friends were near. The body was left alone with the officials. The other was—Well, on drawing near we saw an old woman breathing her last as she lay motionless upon the wet oozy sand with which her grey hairs mingled. Her feet were in the water, and a wet cotton cloth partly concealed her emaciated form. Four women, apparently her daughters, sat round her, watching for her last breath. They sprinkled the holy water of the stream on her thin face, her glazed eyes, and silent lips. An old man, her husband, with a young man beside him, stood a few yards off, and turned away their eyes, as if in sorrow, from the place where the dying one lay. When at last neither eyelid nor lip quivered, a great cry of anguish rose from the little group to the sky—to them empty of a Father and a Redeemer. The boisterous crowd rushed along with shouts of laughter, and the wild din of pipe and drum filled the air; but these mourners found no comforter!

Those who have witnessed the peaceful death-bed of one they loved, amidst all the sanctities of Christian home, will surely thank God for their being able to share such hallowed memorials with their brothers and sisters in India, who “sorrow as those who have no hope.”

Some Account of our Working People, and How they Live.

By “GOOD WORDS” COMMISSIONER.

V.—THE BANFFSHIRE FISHERMAN.

It is August, but August six hundred miles north of London. The night before last, at half that distance north, the sun sank into the calm sea like a huge disc of glowing ruby, its level beams turning the unfoaming waters, in a long line of trembling spangles, into rich-red wine; but here, on the shores of the Moray Frith, sheep and cattle, shepherds and cowherds, are covering under any shelter they can find from the fierce blast, and the drenched wild-flowers are shivering in ague-fits; and last night every fishing-boat that ventured out had to race back into the little harbours, laden with cold hail instead of caller herring.

A keen breeze still blows strongly from the sea. As far as the eye can reach long ranks of “white horses” are galloping over the green, grey, and blue Frith. Silvery spray curves and cascades, snowy foam boils over the rough walls of the tiny fishing-harbours. The men and carts and horses down on the sodden sands, and the dark seaweed that is being forked into the carts from the dark rocks, are all flecked with creamy scum. The bold headlands that run into the Frith like Roman noses foam at the nostrils like war-horses, and then are blotted from the view by passing rain-squalls. In creeks that give no notion of refuge the sea is churning itself into viscous cream against, and over, and between fantastically jagged needles and masses of grey-black rock, that would crunch any boat luckless enough to run foul of them, far more easily than a monkey cracks a nut. The wind catches up the scum in balls the size of humming-birds, and whirls them about very much as the perplexed grown-up gulls are wheeling. Solitary under the lee of lane-corners, in little groups upon the strand, or sitting in their boats, which pitch and roll even in the comparatively smooth water of the inner harbour, the herring-fishers are anxiously, but, for the most part, silently, speculating as to their chance of getting out within the week.

Sometimes they stoop to a little chaff.

"Ye'll nae win oot the nicht, Sandie," says one, pointing to the "white horses" that are flinging about their flying manes with fiercer joy than ever.

"Hech, man, ye're nae wise," answers Sandie. "Twull be a fine nicht the nicht."

A manly-looking race are these bearded, copper and bronze-complexioned, silently-waiting fishermen. There is a real look in their rough sea-clothes that suggests, from contrast, very contemptuous recollections of the quasi-naval (with a dash of T. P. Cooke) costumes in which fair-weather yachtsmen, and sham yachtsmen, parade themselves on shore. Salt-candied bonnets and cloth and fur caps; round "shiny" hats, with all the shine taken out of them; black and yellow sou'-westers; grey and striped night-caps; comforters as grizzled and bristly as their owners' beards; blue guernseys with dim-red initials still partially distinguishable on the breast; blue shirts, grey shirts, shirts the colour of coffee-grounds; double-breasted waistcoats and trousers of dingy blue, rust-hued, and fucus-hued cloth; trousers tucked into sea-boots, smugglers' breeches hanging over sea-boots like a pair of petticoats; tarry-fustian jackets and trousers; oilskin jackets and trousers, as stiff as boards, and oilskin waistcoats not coming much below the armpits; tarry-canvas jackets and trousers; dark trousers, particoloured in the legs with canvas like a horsebreaker's, and patched on the stern with a pannus albus of the same that gleams in the sunlight like a freshly-burnished door-plate: that is the Banffshire Fisherman's list of fashions—and whatever he wears looks picturesque, because he looks such a man to the backbone in it.

Whilst this wind lasts, however, even Banffshire fishermen must stay at home, and so, until we can get out to sea with them, let us wander along their foaming Frith. The shore-paths wind in and out, and up and down, the treeless, grassy, limestone-faced and limestone-littered hills. Here and there they dip into a warm little hollow, with its one or two boats drawn up on the beach, and its one or two thatched or stone-roofed, grey or white fishermen's cottages, nestling in the snugger corners, with sloping potato-crofts behind; elder-bushes in blossom hanging over the rough stone walls. No sooner does the path rise out of the sunny hollow, however, than the wind catches the wanderer again, and, spreading and swelling out his clothes, drives him along as if with stu'n sails and balloon-jib set; or else it blows right down his throat until he thinks he has carried away his teeth, and begins to fear that his hair as well as his hat will be blown off his head if he does not beat up, against a breeze that pushes like a beam, for the shelter of yonder table-land of crushed road-metal stored in a craggy nook. Under such circumstances it is astonishing to see corn at all, but not at all astonishing to find that the little crofts of oats and barley that are seen are about a foot high, and very sparsely tinged with yellow. Still there is no lack of vegetation on these shore hills, whistling in summer with November's "angry sough;" stunted furze, with sea-bronzed wilted blossom; broom with green pods and with black; red clover, white clover; thistles galore; rusty-spined sorrel; patches of pink and purple heather, softening the harsh angles of the outcropping boulders; clusters of big bluebells, more plentiful even than separate daisies in England; great dog-daisies; dwarf hemlock; ground-ivy; creeping shoes-and-stockings; thousands of pale purple, purple and white, and purple and yellow wild pansies; and millions of the constellated heads of the golden rag-weed. Cows, herded by old men, and little boys, and girls with their frock-skirts over their heads, crop the rough grass, and tethered sheep, black and white, butt at one another for the possession of promising hillocks. A little farther inland the crops are still, for the most part, "as green as kale," but here and there rise a few yellow cocks, like small white-ants' hills, garnered between black posts covered with black fishing-nets. A little farther still, the road and the telegraph wire run between good crops of unfenced corn, potatoes, and turnips. Here is a pretty new farmhouse, with a park-like front-paddock, and a cart-lodge crammed with modern carts that are resting, like Yankees, with their legs up. Yonder is a low, closed white smithy, with an assemblage of out-patient ploughs, harrows, cultivators, &c., of the most scientific make, clustered on its little green. Not far off, on the evening I am thinking of, I witnessed a scene of dreamy peace, although the wind was wailing, and the waves were thundering, on the other side of the bare hill that sheltered it. One of the primitive little, rough-built, woollen-factories of the district was taking its deserted evening rest. Its tiny water-force no longer turned its tiny water-wheel, but hurried, like a boy let out of school, down to a sunny-sparkling burn. On the other side of the little rustic bridge spread a dark pool, shaded with richly-drooping trees, out of whose lush foliage the silver bark of the "lady of the woods" and the coral clusters of the mountain-ash gleamed like mellow lamps; a pool absolutely unruffled, save when a rare fish leaped for food or fun. On the grassy bank of the dark pool, at the foot of a thickly-treed old orchard, stood, or rather tottered, two hoary old cottages; one of them roughly inscribed "To Let." The only visible or audible tenants of the buildings were a little girl, sitting on the stone threshold of the one to be let, and a white-haired, bare-legged toddler who was pelting half-a-dozen waddling, quacking ducks; his little nurse meanwhile exclaiming, with far more pride than reproof in her tone, "Hech, Wattie man, wad ye stane the dookies?" Close by the sea, moreover, woods and lawns encircle Duff House, with as softly luxuriant a verdure as if they sloped down to the Thames at Richmond instead of to the Doveran at Banff. The policy-trees are bearded with moss, lichen, and creepers; the hedges blush with red dog-roses; and a wild-flower-spangled hay-crop might be mown off the obliterated roofs of the lodges and outhouses. And not far from the sea the road runs through noble deer-forests, disfigured by straight, railway-cutting-like deer-drives, and raw scars of clearing, but still feasting the eye with miles of stately Scottish firs, standing shoulder to shoulder, on ridge, on hillside, and in valley; their red boles buried up to the ankle in glossy bracken and amethystine heather.

But it is time to get back to the shore. The Banffshire fishing-stations differ in size; some are quaint old towns that do not depend solely upon fishing; more are quaint old villages, to which the "take" is a matter of literally vital importance. But, in all, the fishermen's quarters are so much alike that a typical sketch may be drawn of them. Scattered singly, and gable on, upon the braes, arranged in lanes, that cross at right angles, right down to the shore, stand the fishermen's cottages. A railway runs along part of the shore of the Moray Frith; but there are fishermen's cottages outside the single line of rails. Close by the shore stands a life-boat house. On the top of the highest brae is perched a low, white, flagstaffed coast-guard station, with a black cannon, and drying fishing-nets, and bleaching linen, upturned linen-baskets, and staggering linen-posts, upon the green outside. Most of the cottages nearest the sea obstinately refuse to peep at it even. There is not a window in the backs they have turned upon the Frith that moistens and mildews their thatch with its spray. Other roofs are of stone, and slate, and tile. Some of the cottages are of white-washed rough plaster, others are picturesquely mottled—stones red and white and grey and brown and blue and black and yellow, with, now and then, a bit of curiously-charactered "Portsoy marble," being welded into their walls with broad lines of white cement. Some of the cottages have kale-yards behind, and tiny gardens smothered with flowers in front. Scarlet geraniums and green-and-golden musk-plants bask in a good many of the windows. Sometimes a black peat-stack is piled against the white gable. Split fish and strings of herring dangle on the walls. There are a few dismantled cottages, whose roofless, dilapidated gables stand up black and jagged as decayed teeth; but, although the Banffshire fishermen's dwellings are not all as clean as they might be inside, they generally have a trim, business look outside, which is a refreshing contrast to one who has seen that melancholy jumble of dirt, damp, dilapidation, dilatoriness, and destitution, the Claddagh colony of fishermen in Galway. At the doors stand women in white hip-jackets and white nightcaps, nursing babies in white nightcaps that are comical miniatures of the maternal pattern. Other women and girls, with kilted petticoats, which disclose, in a good many instances, what Mr. Charles Reade calls "grand and powerful limbs;" and hooded with gowns and skirts and plaid shawls, out of whose covert peep, sometimes good, if rather hard, features, and almost always keen good eyes, are clustered round the roadside well or spring, carrying water from it, or trudging along with fish-creels at their backs. A bronze-faced, black-haired, classically-featured little girl, and a red-haired little girl with huge freckles running into one another and overlapping one another on her broad flat face, discover a stranger mooning about, and accost him with "If ye please, wull ye gie me a ha'penny to buy a fush?" A "fush" seems a queer thing for those little mermaids to be in want of; and there is a dash of satire on the "pock-puddin' fule-body" in their "Thank'ee" when he complies with their request. In spite of sea-air, sea-water, sea-weed, and reiterated complaints of the badness of the fishing, there is everywhere an outcropping smell of fish. The sanded parlour of the fishermen's public, punctuated with round spittoons, and hung round with prints of Osborne, vessels in full sail, and vessels in distress, reeks of fish like an empty herring-barrel. There is the same odour in the atmosphere of the red-flagged hovel that advertises refreshments by means of a single biscuit tilted against its little window, and an announcement of "Small Beer" displayed outside—a quart bottle of the said mixture of watered vinegar and blacking being procurable for 2d. Herring-barrels are serried in the courtyards, of which a glimpse is caught under low archways of beetle-browed black buildings, and herring-barrels are stacked along the two quays of the little harbour, over whose walls the Moray Frith is boiling, or dribbling down in lanky grey corkscrew curls, and at the end of one of which a sturdy little red lighthousekin sticks up its lantern as if it thought its Eddystone congener a pretentious sham. Heaving in the harbour, drawn up high and dry upon the shingly beach, fishing-boats are clustered—grey, green, black, brown, red, and some of a "golden-syrup"-like yellow. If it were not for the B F, number something or other, painted on their bows, it would be hard to distinguish their stem from their stern when their rudders are unshipped. Some look mere gigs, and even the broad-beamed herring-boats, being undecked, do not look the most comfortable of craft to spend a stormy night at sea in. Other such boats are building in the seaside yards. There is scarcely any shop which does not minister in some way to fishermen's wants—layers of oilskins, that have to be wrenched asunder with a Milo-rending-the-oak expenditure of strength, being even stored in ladder-approached lofts over shops in which the lassies of the locality are buying muslins. Fish is King in this part of the world.

"If you want to see Banffshire fishermen, you must go to Buckie," said the courteous proprietor of the Banffshire Journal; "although I am afraid you will find most of them away—at Fraserburgh, and Peterhead, and Wick. There is not much chance of your getting out, if this wind lasts; but Buckie men will be readier than most to risk their lives with you, if they think they have any chance of a take."

Accordingly for Buckie I started. The locally famous fisher-colony is in the world-beyond-gas, but it is linked on to the gas-burning world by the telegraph wire; the humming of which, Buckie bee-masters say, sadly disturbs their bees. It hummed drearily as the wintry August breeze swept over it and the fenceless fields, when I travelled to Buckie. In the little 'bus that carried me part of the way, I witnessed a touching scene of ruggedly gentle sympathy. We stopped to take up two weary fishwives waiting by the roadside. One was tall, gaunt, and weather-beaten as Meg Merrilies, although originally of a lighter complexion. She was muffled in a red-and-black shawl, and had an uncanny habit of dropping her jaw, which made her white nightcap look like a Lazarus-napkin. The other woman was shorter, darker, and plumper, and carried a white-nightcapped baby, tightly swaddled in a heather-and-black shawl, under the green-and-black shawl with which the mother was hooded. A fat, rosy-faced, merry, winsome, though strongly fish-scented lassie, was this little Mary, but her mother seemed to have no heart to respond to her little coaxing pranks and prattling; and so Meg Merrilies took the child upon her lap. Presently the mother dropped back in a fainting fit. Mary was instantly bundled on to the nearest passenger's knees without a word of apology, and Meg began to stroke her gossip's face, smooth back her hair, and croon over her with a childlike softness that was startling in a woman who looked as if she could have knocked down an ox with her gnarled knuckles. When the fainting fit had passed, the poor woman drew her shawl closer over her head, squeezed herself tighter into her corner, and sobbed as if her heart was breaking. Meg still held and stroked her hand, but found a moment to glance round and explain, "Hech, sirs, she's heard that her man is lost at the Wick fushin'." And then down dropped Meg's jaw, as if it never could come up again; and during the rest of her ride she continued to stroke her friend in silence, with the most genuine expression of sympathy I ever saw on her harsh, leather-skinned features.

"Wives an' mither's, maist despairin', Ca' them lives o' men."

Those pathetic lines came to my mind again the first morning I spent in Buckie. I went with the Inspector of Poor to see a poor girl identify, by the clothes, the body of her drowned father, which had been washed on shore the night before. In April last eight Lossiemouth salmon-fishers were lost, and now in August the sea had given up the last body.

The girl was not the bereaved fisherman's daughter an artist would draw from imagination. She carried a parasol, and wore craped black silk, and a chignon under her black straw hat. The bitterness of her father's death had passed, and she asked questions and answered them in a voice that was quiet, but still seemingly unmoved. This matter-of-fact way of regarding the fisherman's end made it, however, somehow, all the more pathetic to a stranger. We went into a curing-shed, half full of barrels, baskets, crans, tubs, vats, &c. At one end hung a great slate chalked with “487 boxes.” Herring-barrels were ranged on the little quay outside, above which rose the masts of herring-boats. Nightcapped crones peeped in at the door, in greedy enjoyment of the temporary excitement which the scene afforded. Larking boys peeped in also, until sent flying by an official, “What's the use o' ye?” In a dark corner stood a knot of old fishermen, hushed, but not much graver than their wont, and all with their hats on, although they stood beside a black coffin with rope handles, on the top of which lay a pair of sodden sea-boots, and a bundle of sodden woollen rags. In spite of the fresh air that blew into the shed, and of the disinfectant that was sprinkled over the rags, and dribbled by means of a bit of paper beneath the prized-up coffin-lid, it was sickening to stand in that dark corner. A kneeling policeman methodically turned over the clothes, and the daughter identified them in as business-like a manner.

“Your faither had nae waistcoat on?”

“Na.”

“Was this his shirt?”

“Ay—mither made it,” &c., &c.

When the dreary catechism had been gone through, it was strange to see the gusto with which the waiting crones received the official intimation—

“They maun hae a hearse. In fac', nae railway-station would tak' in yon corp.”

Stolidly as the Lossiemouth fisherman's coffin was regarded, a great many of the Banffshire fisherfolk are still very superstitious. “They hae married in and in, until I won'er they arena half fules,” an informant remarked to me. At any rate, they have handed down from generation to generation the not very wisely weird beliefs which the “ever-sounding and mysterious main” is apt to breed in those who dwell upon its banks and have business on its bosom. The fisherman on the west side of the little burn that divides Buckie plume themselves, however, upon their superior intelligence, and speak with amused compassion of the superstitions which still obtain amongst their east-side brethren. No very fraternal feeling, though, exists between the west and east sidiers. Not very long ago they were forbidden to intermarry, and if an east-side man did marry a west-side girl, he was sent to Coventry for life by all his tribesmen. To this day, I was told, there are east-side men who, if any stranger asked them “Whar are ye gingin'?” would turn back without a word, and refuse to go to sea. “Are ye sure your name's no Ross?” was the cross-question put to me, more Scotico, when I was inquiring as to the likeliest way of getting a night's herring-fishing. “Ay, but that'll mak' them think of a herrin', and, maybe, they won't coont it lucky,” was the rejoinder, when I had given my right name. “Ye'd better ca' yoursel' Pritchard. Port Knockie men, if they thoct they'd got a Ross or an Anderson on board, would pitch him overboard like Jonah, an' the east-side Buckie men would do the same to a Coull.”

Owing to the system of marrying, the stock of both Christian and surnames is very limited in the Banffshire fishing-stations. The wag who wanted to get a seat in the crowded pit of a London theatre shouted into it, “Mr. Smith's house is on fire!” and instantly had a couple of hundred seats to pick from. There are analogous names which would half empty Banffshire fishing-villages, if all the owners of the names rushed out when they heard them. I saw three nearly adjoining cottages in Buckie, each tenanted by a John Cowie “Carrot”. As a consequence of this state of things, “tee-names” are largely used, not only in conversation, but also in the addresses of letters. And sometimes a long string of tee-names has to be run through before the individual wanted can be differentiated satisfactorily. “Where does Such-a-body live?” “Philk Such-a-body?” “Lang Such-a-body.” “Philk Lang Such-a-body?” “Lang Sandy Such-a-body.” “But philk Lang Sandy Such-a-body?” &c., &c.

A word before we go to sea on the religious status of the Banffshire fishermen. It may be the case that hysteria is too often characterized as the “work of the Spirit.” The patients temporarily recover from their physical disease, and, as might be expected, show little sign of moral improvement. But in Banffshire I heard of a revival which seems to have done permanent moral good. Gardenstown, a fishing-station a few miles to the east of Macduff, was and is famous for its exceptional fishing "luck," but it used also to be famous for the exceptional quantities of whisky it consumed. Some time ago a revival took place in Gardenstown: the demand for whisky there instantly dropped to almost nil, and at that nearly negative register, I was told by indisputable authority, it still continues. The recent revival in Buckie was almost confined to the United Presbyterian Church. Omitting the Roman Catholics—Scotch Roman Catholics—who muster strongly in the parish, and have built its handsomest place of worship—I may rank, I was informed, Buckie's church-members in the following descending scale:—1. Free Church; 2. Established Church; 3. United Presbyterian; 4. Methodists; 5. Episcopalians.

But the wind has gone down considerably, and at last there is a chance of getting out to sea. The shrewd, straightforward, brusquely-civil little fisherman to whom I am introduced, at first objects to take me. "Such as you canna stan' what we can—ye maunna think it's pleasin'," he says. He looks as if he thought me considerably nearer the status of a rational being when I explain that it is for the sake of business, and not pleasure, that I want to go out; but still, when he does at last consent to take me, he warns me with a "Hech, weel, ye maun expect to hae your boo's shakken oot."

Muffling from observation the oilskins which have provoked the inextinguishable laughter of the maid of mine inn, I repair at the appointed time to the appointed trysting-place, but find that my skipper is already in the harbour. "The fushers are a selfish an' an eematawteeve race—if ane wins oot, a' maun win oot," I had been told in Buckie. But though I run a chance of losing my trip, I really cannot see why Buckie fishermen should be sneered at for taking Time by the forelock. Do not landsmen of all kinds hurry towards a chance of profit? Have not a good many of them, at any rate, the sense to follow what experience has proved to be a good example? My skipper's wife kindly leaves her shop and pilots me to the harbour, where she hands me over to the care of a man, who points out the Diadem, just getting under way. Good-tempered grins greet me as I hop on board from an inside boat; and then the business of getting out engrosses all professional attention.

Some of the boats have got out. One, strongly pulled by four long oars, is rising on the wave that curls in at the harbour's mouth. But there are still a score or two, poling and pulling out. On both the harbour-quays there is a crowd of women and children, with a few sulky stay-at-home men, who seem to resent the excitement which the going out of the boats occasions. Presently the women toss their hands, and rush towards the harbour-mouth, wailing wildly. Men scramble on shore from the boats, and rush along the quays, and try to force their way through the crowds of wailing women. My plucky little skipper, whom I had thought so impassive, scrambles past me as fleetly as any (though he has a lame leg to trail), lustily shouting, 'Get oot the oars o' Freedom.' "A man overboard," he finds time to explain as he hurries past me; looking half disgusted, because, quite unable to discover what all the hubbub is about, I sit still. The sea is coming down in the aforesaid lanky grey corkscrew curls over the harbour-wall; but, both in and outside of the harbour, the waves look so sunny that it is difficult for a landsman to fancy that anything disastrous has happened. And nothing disastrous has happened. The wails cease; the women come back, looking half-disappointed. The men tumble back into their boats. "Fause alarm," says my skipper, as he crawls back into his. "They screechin' wummen! If the body had been droonin', we couldna hae got at him for 'em."

The seaweed-dangling hawsers splash in the lapping water, and are hauled on board. In another ten minutes there will not be a single herring-boat left in the little harbour, which, half-an-hour ago, was full of them. Our boat reaches the harbour mouth, and the long rough oars creak and bend on the iron tholes, as eight strong arms force her nose into the outside sea. A pile of black-red nets, corked with cracked black-brown bungs, weighted with stones, and buoyed with black leather, white-lettered bladders, that look like great footballs, affords the idler a lounging place astern. "Pull away my hearties," shouts the skipper, as he shoves the rough tiller hard a-starboard, and the Diadem rises on the swell. After some stiff pulling, the foremast is stepped, and the rusty-black foresail (branded, like the bows, with B F 1098, and another number which Board of Trade regulations have rendered obsolete) is sheeted home. The shorter so-called "mizzen," which is to be stepped amidships, is left for the present still resting on the crutch. Boat after boat hoists its canvas, until, wherever the eye turns, the sunny sea and sky, and the filmy hills on the other side of the Frith, are blotched with oblong rising and falling blots of rusty black.

"That's far eneuch, Sandie—grog, ho! noo," cries the skipper; and the crew come aft to loll, and smoke, and yarn, and sip a little whisky. It is the merest thimbleful that is taken by those who take any, and the skipper and the boy will not even take that. I make a feeble attempt to sketch the cluster of rough but manly, good-tempered, and not bad-looking fellows. "Pit your hair back, Peter," says one, with a grin, to the boy. "Sit up, Sandie, an' hae your portrait ta'en," says a second. "Ye'll let me hae just a sicht o' mysel'?" says a third. I explain that I am merely scratching down hints for a real artist to develop into a sketch. "He maun be a good artist that can mak' anythin' oot o' your marks," contemptuously observes the skipper, who has looked over my shoulder.

This is our ship's company. The shrewd little skipper, who has freighted two boats—worth, with sails, &c., about £120 each—for the two months' summer fishing, and who cures the takes of seven boats; an ex-ship's-carpenter, who has been in North and South America, China, and Japan; a brawny, smuggler-breeched and booted landsman, known as the Farmer; a pleasantly-smiling, gipsy-faced young fellow in a blue guernsey, famous as the Fiddler; a fustian-clad fisherman of twelve years' standing; and freckled, comfortered, merry, saltiest of the salt, Boy Peter, who is always scratching his head and grinning at somebody, and who is kind enough to look upon me as his especial charge. The men tell me that they hope to make from £15 to £18 a head by their two months' fishing. They are hired hands, but are paid according to the take, measured in crans. The cran may be roughly described as a barrel with both ends knocked out. A hundred of these crans yield, on an average, a hundred and ten barrels of cured herrings. When one of the crew is told that rumour reports Banffshire fishermen to be very pecunious personages, he answers, with a short laugh, "Rich! Ay. Plenty o' money when there's plenty o' fush; but for ane that's rich there's twa that's poor in Bookie." When another is asked whether night-work in undecked boats is not sometimes rather unpleasant, he answers, in the same laughing tone, "When there's heerin' in the nets, ye dinna feel the work. It's when ye toil a' nicht an' catch naething that it's wearifu'."

"Anything abune your neebours' tak' is coonted good fushin'," is the reply to an inquiry as to what is considered a satisfactory haul. "Saxty cran's an unco shot. We'll be well satisfied if we get thirty the nicht."

"But we dinna ca' oorsels Bookie fishermen," says the skipper, grinning at his grinning men. "A' oor best men are awa'. There's not half o' the Bookie boats in Bookie. It's a queer crew we hae. There's a farmer, an' there's a fiddler, an' there's a maichant o' GOOD WORDS. We'll be seein' oorsels in prent, I expec'. There's a good few readers o' GOOD WORDS in Bookie, an' if ye say aucht they dinna like, ye maun stan' by, for I'll get the credit o't, because I took ye oot."

One pipe is being handed from mouth to mouth like the tooth of the Grææ, but the Fiddler is puffing away at a metal-mounted, clouded bowl, which he maintains to be a genuine meerschaum. His comrades, in a good-tempered way, are very fond of chaffing the good-tempered Fiddler, and so they maintain that a better pipe can be bought in Aberdeen for a shilling, case and all. They next proceed to chaff him on his fiddle and his fiddling.

"It's a Cremona, I tell ye," he exclaims, when the price he puts upon his instrument is pooh-poohed; "an' I've seen fiddles in the papers priced at more than £50."

"I wadna gie ye fifty pence for 't," says the teasing Farmer.

"Ay, but, Jemmy," interposes the skipper, "ye wad gie fifty pence for a whup wi' a good thong to 't. Every man to his likin'. What do ye mak' by your fiddling, Fiddler-in-the-cottage-by-the-sea? Imposition's like to prosper."

"Ay, competeetion is the soul o' trade."

"Imposition I said, Fiddler. I didna say competeetion. Ye charge, an' ye canna play."

"Na, I never charge."

"That maks your ineequity a' the waur. Instead o' haein' a fair price, ye lay it on like the doctors whar ye think they'll bear 't."

"Weel, I hae got 10s. for a ball, an' Grant's son gets 30s. for three hoors o' play."

"Ay, man, but Grant's son gies ye music."

The imitative powers of the Buckie "dummy" are next discussed.

"A smart man needs nae teachin'," the skipper oracularly remarks. "His whole time's takken up in observation."

"It's just his hobby," one of the men adds as a rider. "There's nae head in it, ye see."

After this philosophical stricture—not very complimentary to the member of the crew who has come on board simply to observe—silence and somnolence come down upon the speakers. Following the example of the other boats, we partly lower our sail, let the wet tiller thump at its pleasure, with monotonous thuds, against the up-and-downing stern, and light our fire of coal and chips in a battered old iron pot. The Farmer lies down and snores in the stern. The skipper and the rest of the crew sleepily crouch around the fire. A grey ribbon of smoke curls up and out from every boat we pass, or are passed by. Tillers are unshipped in some: all are steering themselves. Down go their red sides and their black sails till they are buried almost to the mast-head. Up they dap again, showing their fore-feet like plump rope-dancers; and then down they plunge into the trough of the sea once more, with a fizzling rush of snowy foam about the “boos.” From one or two a sleepy song floats over the waves, but most of the crews, like our own, are napping. By-and-by the skipper hails me: “Come along, frien’, ye’ll be nane the waur o’ a cup o’ tea.” Seated on coils of rope, baskets, canvas, and the stone ballast of the boat, we drink our tea out of basins, and munch our bread and meat and oat-cake. The ex-car-penter prefers sop, and has a pannikin full of bobbing crusts simmering on the fire, which puffs its reek impartially into the faces of all who sit round it. After tea it grows chilly, and all the crew put on watch-coats, or clothe themselves in cap-a-pie suits of oilskin. Backwards and forwards we potter, hailing every boat we pass with, “Hae ye any idee hoo far the heerin’ is?” The reply is a monotonous “Na, na.” “It’s a chance shot the nicht. Wull we dodge or try, Sandy? Nae-body kens,” says the skipper. For some time after the sun goes down we have the stars, and a patch of yellow light, in the cold heavens; but clouds creep over the sky, the wind freshens, rain begins to fall. “Wull ye licht me anither o’ your fusees, frien’, that I may see my watch?” the skipper, who is steering again, anxiously inquires from time to time. “D’ye see any fire in the water yet?” he keeps on asking the men, who are looking over the side. “When the water burns, we’ve a better chance o’ seein’ the fush,” he explains parenthetically to his passenger. “Whales an’ fools” are anxiously looked out for also, but they are very shy of showing. One gull, however, nearly knocks my hat off. “Did ye see yon beast?” asks Peter, who is politely anxious that I should see everything that there is to be seen. The Lossiemouth revolving-light flowers into and fades out of the darkness, now ahead, and now astern; the fire throws up a ruddy glow on the dark sail—that, and the dots of light in the other dark luggers and cutters we dance in amongst, and sometimes almost run into, looking the only cosy things on the black waters. The wind is howling now, the rain pours down, the black waters plump on board in curls of seething white. Backwards and forwards we potter drearily, but still the fish refuse to rise. At half-past eleven, however, up they come. The whilom silent boat is instantly the scene of wild excitement. “Ye’d better crawl forward, frien’, there’ll be awfu’ confusion here,” says the skipper, as the men rush about to lower the mast and prepare to shoot the net. An oar knocks me on the head, a heavy foot comes down upon my arm, another crushes my toes, but all without the slightest malice. An idler is simply ignored on board a herring-boat when the fish rise. The skipper, as he scrambles past me, however, snatches time to say, “Ye’ll hae some idee o’ our confusion noo. Ye’d hae heard stronger language aboard some boats. Are they weel up, Peter?” he breaks off.

In the intense excitement of the crisis a look-out is no longer kept, and we almost run into a boat that is cantering across our bows. Over goes the net in reaches—the buoys making the water splash fire as they are pitched overboard. When the canvas is taken off her, the boat jolts up and down, far worse than a cart over a ploughed field; and, for the first time, I turn sick. But Peter will not allow me to curl myself up by the fire. “Crawl along,” he cries, “an’ I’ll show ye the fush swimmin’.” Over the bulwarks I see phosphorescent sparkles, and hear, or fancy I hear, a multitudinous rush, whose noise is distinguishable from the dash and splash and effervescence of the waves. Then I turn in and get a snooze; with my feet as near the fire, and my face as covered from the rain, as I can manage. The wind has gone down when Peter wakes me in the leaden-lighted morning. “Roose yoursel’ noo,” he says, as he gives me a polite kick. The net is being hauled in; “fools” flying about with disappointed cries, like the creaking of a sign-post in the wind, and “whales” ploughing through the waters with dorsal fins rising above their furrows. Two men on each quarter are hauling in the net, shaking out as many of the fish as they can before the dank reaches are repiled. A fifth looks after the buoys as they come in from the long line that sinuates astern like a black sea-serpent. Peter is scooping up fish with a pole-net; one flops into the fireplace, and grills and wriggles, "puir beastie," with oleaginous odoriferousness into rest. The boat's floor is paved thick with "caller herrin'," sliding over one another in a beautiful jumble of silver, sheeny green, glossy blue, gold, and pink. All over the boat, single herrings shimmer on dark boards and spars and nets and sails, like elongated dew-drops trembling on black brambles. They would be very beautiful objects to look at, did not my cheerful friends, alas, begin their curing with saliva. "Hech, I'm glad to see the note-book oot again," says the jocose skipper. "Ye were nae sae keen a while sin'." Ahead, astern, and on both bows and quarters, the boats that heave on the unfoaming waters are as busy as our own. Some are making for port with all sail up, deep in the water. "Hech, it's the best tak' o' the season," says the skipper. "They've a' had a good shot. Isna that John Vine's boat, Sandie?—He maun hae saxty cran," the skipper sighs. The skipper, however, comforts himself when he glances round upon the prime herring in his own boat, which, at 32s. 6d. the barrel, will bring him in, when cured for the Hamburg and other Continental markets, at least, some £50.

Both masts are stepped, and up go both our sails; Peter being summoned to officiate at the rough pump, which looks like a magnified popgun. Presently the sweeps are ordered out again—Peter and the Fiddler pull at one, and Peter, I think, does the harder work. The Farmer has an oar to himself, and he pulls it most vigorously, to shame the Fiddler; but the Farmer's time is as eccentric as the Harvard's time became at stages of the race they pulled with c'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre gallantry. Sails and sweeps notwithstanding, we get back to, or rather off, the port we left at three p.m. at ten a.m. We have lost the tide, and have to anchor with all the rest of the fleet, through which a schooner that has come for their cured cargoes tacks restlessly. The net is once more unfolded; the fish that have stuck in it, like silver spear-heads, being very roughly dragged out, if they refuse to come for shaking. Everybody on board is spangled with herring-scales like harlequins. "There's the coffin," the men say, as they point to the mark on the herring's head, which they fancy to be coffin-shaped. "The heerin may weel droon men wi' that on 'em."

A flat-bottomed cobbler, pulled by fishermannikins, in bronzed and freckled face, and oilskin and tarpaulin dress, as like to fishermen as crabkins are to crabs, comes alongside. "Gie us a hand, frien'," says the skipper, as he holds up his legs in turn for me to pull off his oilskin breeches. "We'll ging ashore." He fees our ferryboys (who familiarly inquire "Hoo many cran hae ye, Peter?") with a handful of silver—herring; and the youngsters pull us inside the almost waterless harbour.

When I have splashed ashore, and scrambled over the ankle-wrenching stones that litter the harbour's bottom, I hear a "Hech! I was lookin' oot for ye. They'll mak' ye win oot again wi' them the nicht, if ye dinna hae a care. They're a supersteetious race, the fushers, an' it's the first lucky nicht o' the fushin'."

Pleasanter fellows than those I went out with I do not wish to meet, but I cannot honestly say that I had any desire to spend a second night with them—so soon—upon the water. When I had taken mine ease in mine inn, however, I went down to the harbour to have a yarn with my messmates before they went out again. Early in the afternoon as it was, theirs was one of the black sails already blotching the outside waters. The last boat was pulling out as I reached the harbour.

IONA.

BY THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

THIRD PAPER.

FOR 200 years from the date of the great Abbot's death, it never fell to the lot of the brethren who frequented the Little Hill of Columba's Benediction to see approaching any other sails than those which came to pay the homage of the living, or the last tribute of the dead. But at the close of that period began the visitation—terrible indeed to all the coasts of Britain—which was due to the last overflow of the northern nations. Then indeed the friendly Sea, which hitherto had brought nothing to Iona but security and peace, became the bearer of unnumbered woes. That beautiful Sound of green and gleaming water was covered with ships,—not this time laden with worshippers or with mourners, but with the grim and heathen pirates who swarmed from Scandinavian ports. In the Irish annals there is preserved a short but distinct chronicle of events connected with the monastery of Hy, carried on from year to year. For the date of A.D. 794, there is this ominous entry: "Vastatio omnium insularum a gentilibus" (Devastation of all the islands by the heathen). From this time forward, during a period of no less than 300 years, Iona was frequently ravaged—its churches and monasteries burned, its brethren murdered by the savage Northmen. The bones of Columba were carried to safer places—to Kells in Ireland, and to Dunkeld in Scotland. It must have been towards the close of that period that the church was rebuilt by Margaret, the devout and devoted queen of Malcolm Canmore. And now, once more, the memory of St. Columba was to re-assert its ancient power even over the heathen spoilers. Iona was the only place spared by Magnus, King of Norway, in his great predatory expedition of A.D. 1098. And if St. Oran's chapel be indeed the building erected by Queen Margaret, it is not without interest to think that in that low, round archway, which still remains, we may see the door from which the fierce King Magnus is said to have recoiled with awe when he had attempted to enter the sacred building.

But already we have been carried down the course of centuries far—too far—from the time in which all the real interest of Iona lies. Or if it be indeed part of that interest to look on the ruins of St. Oran's Chapel, and to think that it may possibly be the very building erected by the wife of Malcolm Canmore, at least let us not forget that the long, long period of 500 years lay between that date, which now seems so old to us, and the date of Columba's ministry. The grey tower of the cathedral, standing "four square to all the winds that blow," ancient and venerable as it looks, is of still more modern date. The oldest portion of it may belong to the close of the twelfth century*—that is to say, more than 600 years nearer to us than Columba's day. All these buildings before us are the monuments, not of the fire, the freshness, and the comparative simplicity of the old Celtic Church, but of the dull and often the corrupt monotony of mediæval Romanism. After all, the real period of Iona's glory was not a long one. It is almost confined to the life of one man, and to the few generations which preserved the impress of his powerful character.

Let us then for a moment go back to his time, let us look on the Island, as it was before one stone of the churches now ruined had as yet been laid upon another, and let us fill in the background of the picture before us as it is and as it was. Across the narrow strait lies the low rounded but rocky hills of red granite which here constitute the Ross of Mull. These, broken up into innumerable rocks and islets, stretch from one entrance of the Sound in the N.E. to the other entrance in the S.W. Looking down the vista of the Sound in this last direction is the comparatively open sea,—with the blue mountains of Jura appearing in the far distance to the left over a depression in the hills of Ross. Towards the other, or north-eastern entrance of the Sound the horizon is entirely bounded by the coast of Mull, and of the smaller Islands of Ulva and Inch-Kenneth. But these coasts are receding and fore-shortened shores, reaching far up Loch-na-Kael, an arm of the sea which nearly divides the Island of Mull into two parts. Another similar arm of the sea called Loch Scriden branches off to the eastward, and although its line of coast is concealed from the Monastery of Iona by the low granites of the Ross, yet the mountains along its sides and at its farther end give additional variety to the sky lines as seen from Columba's cell. (See p. 616.) These two arms of the sea clasp round the base of Ben More, whose summit appears rising above a great precipitous headland called Bourg. The upper portion of this headland is a great mass of nearly horizontal terraces of trap rock, diminishing pyramidally to the top; half-way down, these terraces break into lofty precipices which run round the headland on every side, and are seen extending along the shores of Loch-na-Kael with little interruption for many miles, but with much variety of height. At the foot of this range of precipices there is a steep green slope (at the angle of rest) into the sea. After rains a rivulet breaks over the brow of this precipice at the point where it fronts Iona, and when strong winds are blowing from the westward, the water of this stream is blown off in a cloud of vapour. Grand shadows are thrown in fine weather along the range of cliffs, varying with the advancing hour, and with every passing cloud. This great headland, with all its varied and noble outlines, is the most conspicuous object in the view from all the old ecclesiastical sites upon Iona, and during the many years of Columba's ministry, they must have been the most familiar of all outlines to his eye. Far off, along the perspective of the receding shore, and close under the point round which the range of cliff passes out of sight, lies the little Island of Inch-Kenneth—where, in 1775, Dr. Johnson was so hospitably entertained. To the left lie the opposite shores of Loch-na-Kael—all hills of trap, disposed in lines, heathy, and receding towards the head of that arm of the sea. Above them, low down upon the sky, rises a portion of the far off Hills of Morven, lying on the other side of the Sound of Mull.

The slope of arable land upon Iona itself, which lies between its rocky pasture hills and the shore, rises towards the N.E., and from the Torr-Abb shuts out farther view in that direction. Let us therefore now come down from this point of observation, and follow the path towards the north-eastern end of Iona, along which Columba must have often walked. It brings us presently alongside of an elevated ridge of ground, which seems like an artificial terrace, and on ascending it this suspicion of its origin will be confirmed. Behind it lies an old hollow and morass—the only one on the Island—which marks the site of an old reservoir of water for the turning of a mill wheel. Passing along this old mound of dry and pleasant turf, the view to the northward opens considerably. The northern half of the Island of Mull still bounds the horizon with its long low hills of terraced trap covered with dark heathy pasture. But nearer, some six miles off, there is an Island of curious form, flat topped, with precipitous sides, sloping upwards towards the west, and then ending in a cliff singularly sharp in outline. If the sun be low and shining strongly, casting its glorious light on the precipices of Bourg, and the rocky shore of Gribune, it will be seen that this curious Island is marked with a strange band of columnar shadows, with two dark spots on the face towards Iona. This is Staffa, and one of these dark spots is its now celebrated cave. How strange that this great work of nature should have lain for so many ages so close to one of the most frequented and most celebrated Islands on the shores of Britain, and that not a whisper of its wonder and its sublimity should have been heard among men!

Pursuing our walk towards the northern end of the Island, we regain the road leading to the pastures which seem to have been specially devoted to the dairy cows, and along which Columba's brethren brought home to the Monastery their daily pails of milk. As we ascend the slopes which fall away from the foot of Dun-i—the highest hill on the island—we come upon a region of "Link land"—that is to say, of shelly sand, covered with close, soft, and springy grass. This extends in flats, and in swelling undulations, to the rocky shore, or to the point where stormy winds have broken in upon the sward and scattered the fine sand in wreaths almost as white as snow. From this pasture-land a wide view opens before us to the northward. The hills of Mull are seen terminating in a long promontory and a rocky headland. The intervening wide expanse of sea is dotted with Islands all of the same curious form and shape—precipitous in the side and perfectly flat in outline, except one Island, out of the middle of which rises a low conical hill, with a perfectly symmetrical outline on either side. This is now known under the name of the "Dutchman's Cap," and is, and must always have been, an invaluable landmark for boats navigating in stormy weather through such a dangerous archipelago of rocks. Far beyond these islands, and far also beyond the headlands of Mull, rises in a clear day a long ridge of sharp and peaky mountains, sinking in noble outlines into the ocean on the west. These are the islands of Egg and Rum. (See p. 712.) And beyond these, again, to the right, low down upon the horizon, may be seen, traced against the distant sky in the faintest but purest blue, a sharp serrated range of mountains. These are the Cuchulin Hills, in Skye. To the extreme left—that is, to the west—the horizon is occupied, across some twenty miles of sea, with a low hummocky outline, ending in detached spots of hill, which only appear at intervals above the waves. To the south-west is the open Ocean, with all its vastness, its freshness, and its power.

From this part of the Island also the view to the eastward is finer than from the old monastic sites, because Iona here overlaps the end of the Ross of Mull, and the eye ranges along its northern coast, thus commanding the mouth of Loch Scriden, as well as the receding shores of Loch-na-Kael. On a calm fine evening in autumn, when the atmosphere has that singular clearness which is then often to be seen in the Hebrides, I know no view in any part of Scotland more beautiful or varied than the view from the north end of Iona. (See p. 713.) The distance on the map from the Cuchulin Hills, in Skye, to the Paps of Jura, is 93 miles. Both are clearly visible, the one to the extreme north, the other to the extreme south. This is indeed a wide horizon, with such a wealth of Cloud and Sea and Mountain as belongs to very few spots in any country.

Returning to the Torr-Abb and the Reilaig Odhrain, there is another walk which is of much interest as connected with the detailed account left us by Adamnan of one of the last days of Columba's life.

This account is so characteristic in its combination of incidents, some of which are perfectly natural and others of which are highly imaginative, that it may be well to give a short abstract of it here.

One day, in the thirtieth year after Columba's landing on Iona, a sudden flush of colour and a joyful expression were seen by his attendants to overspread the Abbot's face. In a few moments the indications of joy were turned into looks of sadness. Two brethren who attended at the door of his cell inquired the cause. At first he refused to tell them. He loved them too well to wish to make them sad. But at last he told them how he had long prayed that at the close of this thirtieth year he might be relieved from his labours. And this was the cause of his sudden joy—that he saw angels sent to lead out his spirit from the flesh. But, again, suddenly he had seen those heavenly messengers arrested on the opposite shore; and there they were still standing on the rocks, unable to reach the Holy Isle, because his Lord, who had been willing to grant that for which he fervently prayed, had yielded to the more prevailing intercessions of many Churches. And so those angels were about to return to the throne above. It was this that had changed his joy.

But now he knew that yet four years longer he must remain; and then suddenly, and without previous suffering, he would join his Lord.

And so on that fourth year after this vision, which was A.D. 597, Easter day fell on the 14th April. On a certain day in the following month, the old Abbot was carried in a waggon to see his brethren, who were working in the fields on the plain called the Machar, at the western side of the Island. The road leading to this plain winds for some distance among rocky knolls, and then opens on the comparatively level ground, which, being composed of light soil, and much exposed to the sun, seems to have been then considered the best for tillage. It was now probably the seed-time of that early husbandry. On reaching the monks who were engaged in labour, he told them that with desire he had desired, during the late Paschal commemoration, to join Christ his Lord; but that the joy of their festival might not be converted into mourning, he had been willing that the day of his departure should yet a little longer be deferred. He then addressed to his saddened brethren some words of consolation, and, still sitting in the vehicle, he turned his face eastward to the holy sites, and pronounced a benediction on the Island and on all its inhabitants. He was then carried back to the monastery.

It was not many days after this that on Sunday, during the celebration of the mass, the Abbot's face was again seen to be suffused with sudden colour. The old vision had reappeared. An angel of the Lord, he explained to those about him, was evident to him—sent to seek for something which was beloved of God, but which still remained on earth. What that something was he did not say.

On the last day of that week, the Saturday, Columba went, with his special attendant, Diarmaid, to bless the Barn or storehouse of the Monastery. He found it so well supplied, that he told them he rejoiced to see that, although he was about to leave them, they would not suffer from lack of food. Then turning to Diarmaid, he said, "This Saturday (the old Sabbath) will be a Sabbath indeed to me; for it is to be the last of my laborious life, on which I shall rest from all its troubles. During this coming night, before the Sunday, I shall, according to the expression of the Scriptures, be gathered to my fathers. Even now my Lord Jesus Christ deigns to call me; to whom, this very night, and at his call, I shall go. So it has been revealed to me by the Lord."

Having so said, Columba moved from the Barn, and walked back towards the Monastery. In the middle of the way he sat down to rest, at a spot which, in Adamnan's time, was marked by a cross, and which is very likely indicated by M'Lean's Cross at the present day. At that point the old traditional path takes a turn, and begins a slight ascent. Whilst the Abbot was sitting here, the old white horse, which was wont to carry the milk-pails to the Monastery, is recorded to have come up to his old master, and, putting its head into his lap, really seemed to weep. It was after this rest by the wayside that Columba ascended the Torr-Abb, and uttered that prophecy on the future fame of Iona which has been already quoted. After this he returned to his cell, and was occupied for some time in his favourite work of transcribing the Holy Scriptures. He was engaged on the 34th Psalm, and had reached the 9th verse, and the words, "There is no want to them that fear Him." These brought him to the foot of the page. "Here," he said, "I must stop. Let Baithune write out the rest." He then repaired to the church, and attended the vesper services. Returning to his cell, he lay for some time on his bed with its stone pillow, which in Adamnan's time was preserved beside his tomb. Thence he dictated to his one attendant his last orders to his brethren. It was in substance the old message which men like Columba give when the storms of life are over, and when charity and peace are seen to be the great needs of earth.

After this, Columba lay for a while in silence, until, called by the matin-bell before the dawn on Sunday morning,—as it has been calculated, the 9th of June,—he rose, and running before all others, entered the church alone. The building, as the Brethren approached, seemed to be filled with an angelic light, which, however, had disappeared ere his attendant entered. "Where art thou, father?" said Diarmaid—for the Monks had not yet come with lights, and he had to grope his way in darkness. There was no reply. Columba was at last found lying before the altar. Then followed that last scene of all, which so many generations of men have been called to see—the lifted head, the voiceless movements, the sinking powers,—all the visible approach of death. A crowd of weeping Monks, holding up their lanterns, soon stood around the dying Abbot. Once more his eyes were opened, and visions of glory seemed to pass before his face. His limbs were now powerless; but his right arm was raised by Diarmaid.

With his hand, although speechless, Columba was still able to give the sign of Blessing. When this was given, he ceased to breathe.

Can anything be recalled of the aspect of that man who then lay dead, now twelve hundred and seventy-two years ago? Adamnan has preserved many particulars which assure us that Columba had all those physical characteristics which have a powerful influence among rude nations. He was of great stature. He had a splendid voice. It could be heard at extraordinary distances, rolling forth the Psalms of David, with every syllable distinctly uttered. We are told by his biographer that his singing, with a very few of his brethren, of the 45th Psalm, made a profound impression on a Pictish king, whose priests had attempted to arrest his worship. He had a grey eye, which could be soft, but which could also be something else.* He had brilliant gifts of speech. With ceaseless energy, he worked at all hours in Prayer, or in Reading, or in Writing, or in some other holy labour. He seemed to have almost superhuman strength. In vigils and in fasting he was equally indefatigable. And with all these exercises and labours his countenance shone with a holy joy—as if in his heart of hearts, he was gladdened by the abiding Spirit of his Lord.

Such is the noble picture left us by Adamnan of Columba's character and of his appearance. But the details of his life prove that his character had mellowed and ripened towards its close. Beyond all doubt, his natural disposition was fierce and passionate; and when he came across deeds of violence or injustice, his indignation was uttered in terrible denunciations. But he was also affectionate, grateful, compassionate—easily moved to tears. He is repeatedly described by Adamnan, as of angelic countenance. In all probability, it was a face, like the skies of the Hebrides, of various and intense expression.

Perhaps some of those who visit Iona may desire to know the place it occupies in that more ancient History which was a hidden manuscript in Columba's days. His voice must often, indeed, have sounded from before the altar the words of the 95th Psalm: "The Sea is His, and He made it: and His hands have prepared the dry Land." But it probably never entered into his mind to conceive that man could ever attain to any knowledge of the methods of creation, or of the steps by which, through unnumbered ages, the world we live in has been moulded into the forms we see. Yet this knowledge, in some measure at least, has been attained.

Iona is entirely composed of the oldest stratified, or sedimentary, rock yet known as existing in the world. That rock is the "Laurentian Gneiss"—so called from the great area it occupies in the Valley of the St. Lawrence. It was in this formation that, some years ago, was discovered in Canada a fossil called the Eozoon Canadense—a name indicating the belief of Palæontologists that in this fossil we have a Form belonging to the Dawn of Life upon our planet. The whole of the Outer Hebrides are composed of this gneiss, and it is the basement upon which are piled the mountain ranges of the north-west coast of Scotland. In Iona the formation consists of a great series of strata, which, from a position originally horizontal, have been tilted into a "dip," which is nearly vertical. The "strike" of the beds—that is to say, the direction of their upturned edges—is the direction of the longer axis of the Island, from north-east to south-west. The strata are of every variety of character—of slate, of quartz, of marble with serpentine, and of a mixture of felspar, quartz, and hornblende, which passes frequently into a composition closely resembling granite. Many of the beds are traversed and permeated by veins and streaks of a green siliceous mineral, which has been called Epidote. Strangers visiting Iona, who have time to do so, should take a boat from the landing-place to the Port-na-Churaich—the creek where Columba landed. In passing along this part of the shore, with its successive bays and creeks, a fine view is obtained of the contorted stratification; and the colouring of the rock near the Port itself, seen through the clear ocean water, is singularly beautiful. It is, perhaps, vain to speculate, and yet a geologist cannot fail to do so, as to the nature of those "metamorphic" agencies which have converted matter, once consisting of soft marine deposits, into rocks so intensely hard, and so highly mineralised. The beach of the Port-na-Churaich, which consists of fragments of these rocks rolled and polished by the surf, is almost like a beach of precious stones.

The mountains of Mull, seen from Iona, are almost entirely composed of volcanic rocks; yet not a vestige remains of the volcanic vents out of which those great masses of melted matter have been poured. In all probability the volcanic action has been prolonged at intervals through vast periods of time. Some of the trap mountains of Mull rest on beds of the Old Red sandstone; others of them are piled on strata of the Oolite and Lias; others, again, cover the débris of Chalk, and belong to a period more recent than the middle Tertiaries. In a line between Iona and the headland of Bourg there is a low basaltic promontory, called Ardtun, which has revealed to us the fact that once there existed on this area some great country covered with the magnificent vegetation of the warm climates of the Miocene Age. Nothing of that country or of its vegetation now remains except a few autumnal leaves sealed up under sheets of lava. The whole of it has "foundered amidst fanatic storms;" and even of the new surfaces which arose out of the volcanic outbursts only a few fragments remain, broken up into capes and headlands and caverned islets in the sea.

From that period there is a great gap in the geological record, which no man can fill. But at last, far, far down the stream of Time, one other distinct and legible page of manuscript has been left. It tells no longer of Fire, but of Ice. To the north of the cathedral, not far off, there lies half embedded in the soil of Iona a gigantic boulder of the granite which belongs to the opposite side of the Sound. It contains more than 200 tons of stone. There is but one agency in nature which can have transferred that boulder from the opposite coast and deposited it where it now lies. Two other blocks of nearly equal mass lie on the other shore, as if they had been arrested on their way, and as if the icy raft on which they took their passage had failed to carry them across the ferry. During the Glacial Epoch great masses of ice must have descended from the mountains of Mull, and pressing over the low promontory of the Ross, sent floating icebergs to Iona, and to the open sea.

From these few words of description, it will be seen that Iona itself, and the view from it, present to the eye or to the mind at once some of the surest results and some of the most difficult problems of geological science. There are proofs of the succession of Life through ages which are vast and indefinite, but which are not illimitable. There are, or there seem to be, "traces of a beginning." But, on the other hand, there is the question raised whether this apparent dawn is a real dawn, or whether the absence of higher organisms be not due to subsequent obliteration. There is the certainty of a definite order of events in the redistribution of Sea and Land, and of whole cycles of change in the climates and in the productions of the globe. But how those changes were brought about, and whether the agencies producing them were always slow and gradual, or frequently sudden and violent—all this is hidden in the thickest darkness. There is visible demonstration that even the most enduring forms of nature round us are of very recent date, and that it is only in comparison with the span-like shortness of human life that we can speak of the "everlasting Hills." But how those Hills were raised, and their shapes determined, and the valleys formed, and the broken remains of older lands scattered among the waves—these are questions on which we can only speculate, and speculate perhaps in vain.

The Magnitudes of Space and Time are too often felt as oppressive to the human spirit. Yet in the inspired utterances of the Old Testament they are regarded, not indeed without emotion, but without dismay. The Prophets of Israel seem to have felt all that we can feel of the vastness of Nature. It moved them to exclaim, "What is man?" but it did not shake the faith with which they added, "That Thou art mindful of him." And this triumphant faith is in harmony with reason and with science. The Mind which is able to conceive those Magnitudes of Space and Time, and which indeed is unable to conceive either any limit of Space or any end of Time, is itself the greatest Magnitude of all. We see and know that its appearance in the world has been the crown and consummation of creative ages. Every fact which concerns its history and its destinies is of a different and a higher order of interest than any other fact which concerns only the preparation of its abode. If the mere bigness, or the mere age of things, were the measure of interest attaching to them, then the arrival of the granite boulder on its floe of ice was a far more important event than the arrival of Columba in his boat of hides. The boulder still lies where it lay for thousands of years before his time. Columba's body has been resolved into indistinguishable dust. But what he did and said has acquired a permanent place in the history of that Being for whom the Sea has been made and the dry Land "prepared." The years cannot be counted which elapsed between the deposit of the Laurentian Gneiss and the close of the Glacial epoch. Certain it is that, compared with them, all the years of Man's history are few indeed. Yet half the years of a single human life have conferred upon Iona its imperishable fame; and once more standing on the Abbot's Mound, we may repeat with him the words of that prophecy which has been, and is being still, fulfilled: HUIC LOCO, QUAMLIBET ANGUSTO ET VILI, NON TANTUM SCOTORUM REGES, CUM POPULIS, SED ETIAM BARBARARUM ET EXTERARUM GENTIUM REGNATORES, CUM PLEBIBUS SIBI SUBJECTIS, GRANDEM ET NON MEDIOCREM CONFERENT HONOREM: A SANCTIS QUOQUE ETIAM ALIARUM ECCLESiarUM NON MEDIOCRIS VENERATIO CONFERETUR.

HEROES OF HEBREW HISTORY.

BY THE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

IX.—JOSHUA.

It was a fearful burden which the death of Moses laid upon the shoulders of Joshua. Surely he must have watched, as no other member of the great Jewish congregation could have done, the beginning of that solemn ascent of the mountain of Abarim by the aged lawgiver of Israel. For the finger of God had already pointed him out as designed for succession to the perilous office of the leader of the people. "Take thee Joshua," had been the word of the Lord to Moses, "a man in whom is the Spirit, and lay thine hand upon him, and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation, and give him a charge in their sight; and thou shalt put some of thine honour upon him, that all the congregation of Israel may be obedient."

time was come when the long-looked-for burden must fall upon him. The circumstances of his past life had made him able too certainly to presage the toils and sufferings involved in the discharge of that great trust; for, beyond all others, he had been admitted into the closest and most peculiar intimacy with Moses; and he had seen, therefore, in the unreserve of confidential intercourse, how the great leader's heart had almost broken under the waywardness of his people. He had gone up with his master into "the mount of God" when the tables of the law were to be given (Exod. xxiv. 13). He had seen the great prophet enter into the enshrouding cloud (ver. 15). He had met him when he came forth from the glory, bearing in his hands the two tables graven by the very finger of God. His younger ears had caught first the confused sounds which rolled up the mountain side from the tented plain below, and with the interpretation of the uncertain noise most natural to a soldier, he had at once said unto Moses, "There is a noise of war in the camp." He had marked the clouding over of that countenance on which the heavenly radiance glistened, as the sternness of a holy indignation settled on its features. He had seen the righteous anger of the great prophet cast out of his two hands those precious tables of the law, and break them before the eyes of the offending people. Before this he had stood beside the vexed leader when the people were "almost ready to stone him" (Exod. xvii. 4). He had watched the agony of his spirit when he fell down in intercession for them; he had seen even his natural temper roused and his faith fail beside the waters of strife. How could one who had known all this but tremble when the lot of God took him, and handed over to him the terrible charge of such a people? How could he hope to endure it? For he had not received the long and varied training which had fitted the great lawgiver to discharge so weighty an office. No knowledge of men gathered during a life's sojourning at Pharaoh's court; no deep training in Egyptian learning; no long, lonely meditative wanderings amidst the grand Sinaitic mountains had been his. He was born a slave at about that darkest time, when Moses fled into Midian. His training had been that of his brother serfs in the brick-kilns, and under the taskmasters of Egypt. How should such an one as he become, in Moses' stead, the leader of his brethren? Yet was there no escape for him. The mantle had fallen upon his shoulder, and where he was bidden there must he go. Through those thirty days of stillness, whilst the camp was full of weeping and mourning for Moses, he could revolve all these deep forebodings in his heart. But the days of inaction soon ran out their little span, and the Voice found him out in his tent, and spake to him the dreaded charge. "Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them." Though all natural misgivings made him shrink back from the charge, yet his high faith accepted it. Already, more than once, he had experienced God's power to aid him at his greatest need. First, when at the earliest battle in which Israel was engaged with the chosen warriors of victorious Amalek at Rephidim, to him had been given the command of the untried army of Israel. Again, a second time he had himself known God's power to succour, when he and Caleb alone of all who were sent out to search the land did not, on their return, discourage the hearts of their brethren. The distinctive features of all his after life and character come out with startling clearness in the grand utterance of this, his early council:—"The land which we passed through to search it is an exceeding good land; if the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and He will give it us, . . . only rebel not ye against the Lord, nor fear ye the people of the land, for they are bread for us: their defence is departed from them, and the Lord is with us: fear them not." But it was to an unwilling audience that these grand words of faith were uttered, and they did but provoke the unbelieving wrath of the clamouring people. More dangerous than all their searchings of Canaan was that undistinguishing fury of the passionate multitude. "All the congregation bade stone them with stones." But even then, when the furious uproar of the people had swelled to its highest and most threatening tide, God interfered for his faithful ones; and "the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation before all the children of Israel" (Num. xiv. 10).

On these past deliverances in that hour of dread his spirit rested and stirred up its energies for the new venture of a life. Moreover the voice of God spake with loving warning and fatherly encouragement to those natural misgivings: "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life; as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee; I will not fail thee nor forsake thee. . . . Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee. . . . This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein. . . . Have not I commanded thee? be strong and of good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest" (Josh. i. 5-9).

All the after life of Joshua is the carrying out with a remarkable simplicity of unquestioning faith this first charge of his God. His obedience is immediate. The days of waiting are passed. There is no more sign of doubt or of misgiving. At once he assumes in all its breadth the office so committed to his hands, and as God's vicegerent "commands the officers of the people" (Josh. i. 10).

The first command was one which showed his great faith, and tested strongly the obedience of the people. The river Jordan lay between the camp and the land of their promised inheritance, and it must be passed over by them at the very outset of their march. But how could this be accomplished? Even if it were possible, with difficulty and risk, to transport over it a chosen handful of warriors, how could he possibly carry over the mixed multitude—the women and the children, and the flocks and the herds? Even over the fords of Jordan, under the most favourable circumstances of the river, this would have been almost impossible; and at this season of the year, when, from the melting of the snow upon the highlands, Jordan was greatly flooded (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest), it was more than ever impossible (Josh. iii. 15). Yet, down to these threatening floods, on the hopeless errand of passing over them, all the people are ordered to march. Surely, it must have been a sore strain upon the simple faith of the young commander to issue such an order. But his faith was strong, and he commanded, and was obeyed. And then, as the first reward of such a holy confidence, the old promises on which his heart rested were made clearer and far more explicit than they had been before. “This day will I begin,” the Lord his God promises, “to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee” (Josh. iii. 7). Then followed the stupendous miracle: when the soles of the priests’ feet who bare the ark of God touched the water’s brim, the upper flow of the river was arrested and stood in a heap, leaving bare the river-bed. Into it the priests advanced until they reached its centre, and there they halted with the ark, which stood as a barrier to the descending waters, heaping them up as a liquid wall suddenly congealed in their fiercest sweep, leaving below a broad passage for the whole multitude to pass. From the river bed Joshua commanded one chosen man of every tribe to bear upon his shoulder a stone, to form on the bank a pillar of memorial; whilst he placed another, also of twelve stones, in the bed itself, where the priests’ feet had stood on the dry land.

The river past, he stood at last with all the people in the true land of promise; and his first act on taking actual possession of the long-pledged inheritance was to renew the covenant of Israel with the God of Abraham by circumcising all who, in the license of the desert’s wanderings, had grown up without passing through the appointed rite of initiation. Next they kept the passover: and then, as marking that the desert was indeed left for ever, the manna ceased, “and they did eat of the old corn of the land on the morrow after the passover” (Josh. v. 11). The next act was to invest Jericho, the great city of the valley of Jordan, and the key to all the passes which led up into the highlands of the land of promise. It was the greatest city of the Canaanitish race—beautiful in situation, girt on one side by a grand palm-tree forest; golden on another with the waving grain of “the barley harvest;” backed by the swelling hills which bounded it upon the west, and looking across the rich valley to the striking mountain range of Gilead. It was an emporium of the old world’s wealth, and rich in wedges of gold, in shekels of silver, and in Babylonish garments. Its walls and its colossal gates could easily resist any assaults which any instruments of war then known could make upon them. It was “high and fenced up to heaven.” It was too—as all great gatherings of the world’s pomp, and wealth, and luxury unpurged by the fear of God must ever be, perhaps beyond them all—mighty in wickedness—a great festering sore of heathen abomination. Against this city, Joshua, with his men of war, set themselves. But it was not to be taken by their might. For seven days the ark of God is borne in solemn procession round it, and on the seventh, at the mysterious summons of the blast of the priestly trumpets, the mighty walls crumble and fall flat; the Israelites march in upon the city in the first spasm of amazement and terror which smote its inhabitants, and possess it thoroughly. Then at God’s command, they destroy from off the face of the earth it and all that dwelt in it, except the household of Rahab.

These two marvels, both directly connected with the ark of Jehovah’s presence, which had taken, as the symbol and instrument of His power, the place of the rod of Moses, were, of course, designed at once to fill the heart of the Canaanites with that terror which is the forerunner of defeat, and to encourage the people of God to march on to all their after-dangers strong in their sense of His resistless strength. But there was yet another and, if possible, a still more difficult, lesson which this baring of the arm of God was meant to teach Joshua and them. The march of Israel was not to be a mere successful invasion. Joshua was not to be the general of a horde of earthly heroes who, to win for themselves a possession, were sweeping with fire and sword over the land of a weaker people. Unless every such imagination could be rooted out of their hearts, their very success would have been their utter ruin. With them, more even than with any other such invaders, this must have been the evil consequence of such a conquest. For that extermination of the Canaanites, of which they were to be the instruments, must have brutalised the executors of the sentence, unless they kept always clear before their eyes the reality of their terrible commission. Joshua could not have preserved that simplicity and gentleness which, side by side with a soldier's bolder daring, make up his character, unless all mere earthly feelings had been wholly overpowered by the sense that, as directly as the earthquake or the pestilence, he was God's simple instrument in sweeping from the earth a long-tried, long-endured, but incurably abominable race. These miraculous interferences were to teach him from the first that he was not as other "scourges of God" have been—the wielder of natural strength against natural weakness—the head of a race of men of larger stature, of braver natures, with habits unfeebled by luxury and vice—who burst in their might, like the hurricane amidst the decaying trees of the sheltered forest, upon the soft slumbers of a worn-out people. This was the master truth of all Joshua's victories. He did not come as the leader of the Gauls or the Goths fell upon the degenerate Romans, who, before they yielded, trembled at the vast size and Titanic limbs of their strange invaders. The Israelites were the race of smaller stature. They were but lately slaves in Egypt; they had to confront the great and mighty sons of Anak; they were the unwarlike tribe; the people whose borders they invaded were men used to war and delighting in it. Though the Canaanites of the plain might have become effeminate and feeble, the Amorites and the other mountaineers were brave, hardy, daring, as well as vast in giant stature. Joshua's conquest was the victory of the weak over the strong, of the unwarlike over warriors; of the desert wanderers over horses and horsemen and chariots of iron. This was the lesson Joshua had from the first to learn. This great truth, as a talisman for his own safety, sunk into his spirit as he gazed on those heaped-up streams of Jordan and stood unshaken amidst the dust and din and terror of the falling walls of Jericho. He moved amidst these scenes of blood as an avenging angel might hover over them—the doer of the Will of the Holy One, untainted by human passion, and full, even in his most unswerving zeal for God, of a terrible gentleness. We read all that in his fatherly sympathy with the offending Achan, even whilst he condemned to be burnt with fire the great transgressor, who had brought himself and his under the ban of God. We read it in his faithful keeping of his oath to the men of Gibeon, when, because he had not asked counsel of the Lord, he had been deceived by their fraud. This it is all important, in dwelling on the history of the book of Judges, to remember. For only in the spirit in which Joshua wrought them can we read aright his mighty deeds: and so read, they are rich in instruction which we most deeply need. We who live in these later days can see that the whole history of man hung upon the issue of those battles in the plain of Jericho and on the hills of Beth Horon. What other conflicts have ever decided so much for humanity? Joshua stood on those fields of blood the very world-hero, bearing with him all its destinies. If Israel had been subdued by the Canaanites, if the separated seed had been mingled with the heathen, if it had learned their ways, if the worship of Moab and Chemosh and Moloch and Astarte had superseded the worship of Jehovah, how had all the grand designs of redemption been frustrated in their development! The cry of Joshua after the flight at Ai would have been the despairing utterance of the race of men, "And what wilt Thou do unto Thy great name?" more almost in Joshua's history than anywhere besides, may the troubled soul,—perplexed and harassed by the sight, on this sin-defiled earth, of wars, battles, slaughters, pestilences, earthquakes, miseries, and treasons,—rest itself, though it be with the deep sob of a present broken-heartedness, in the conviction, that God has a plan for this world; that in the end it does prevail; that the Baalim of heathen power must fall before Him, and that His kingdom shall stand for ever and ever in its truth and righteousness and love.

But it was not only by these displays of God's might fighting their battles that the soul of Joshua was strengthened for his special work. This manifestation he shared with all the people who had eyes to read the dealings of Jehovah with them. But beyond others he had to bear the burden and heat of the day: he had to issue the fearful orders for extermination: he had to see them carried faithfully out to the utmost letter: on him pressed the whole brunt of temptation; and so to him were vouchsafed aids which others shared not. That same communication to his inmost spirit in the utter solitariness of his individual life which had been given to Abraham in his call, to Jacob in his desert wandering, to Moses in the Wilderness of Sinai, was granted also to Joshua in his need. It was when he was "by Jericho;" whilst his eye was measuring those walls which fenced it up to heaven, whilst, it may be in the slant beams of the setting sun, he gazed with admiration at the grand proportions of its royal towers as they rose high in the golden light above, of its long fringe of majestic palm trees, of its glory and its wealth; and thought with awe upon the sentence which it was his destiny to execute upon every living thing within it—then it was that "there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand." Soldier-like, the captain-general demanded of him, "Art thou for us or for our adversaries?" The challenge woke at once the voice of Majesty. "Nay," not as thou deemest am I: prepare thy soul for God's unlooked-for visitation: "As Captain of the Host of the Lord am I come:" not as mingling with these earthly hosts; but as thy fellow in a higher order; as the Mighty ONE in heavenly places of whom thou art here and now on earth the type and shadow: as Him whom all the angels worship, as the uncreated Angel of the Covenant, as the Captain of the heavenly host of God have I come to thee. The soul of Joshua owned at once the presence of his God; "he fell on his face to the earth and did worship," and cried, "What saith my Lord unto his servant?" And then came the answer which the minister of Moses would read so readily in all the wide extent of its mysterious significance, the "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place where thou standest is holy." That burning bush of which his great master had so often told him in their solemn communings, must have risen before his eyes; and there was renewed unto him, with all the added awe of such a personal appearance, the earlier promise, "As I was with Moses, so also I will be with THEE." Yes, and far even beyond this; in his soul, as in the souls of the mighty ones before him to whom it had been granted thus to commune with the unapproachable Lord, there lay ever after resting on his spirit the shadow of that mighty intercourse hushing all lower sounds into an awe-stricken silence.

So strengthened from on high, he passed through those scenes of blood which were appointed for him as the sun's ray streams untainted through polluted elements, until his mighty work of conquest was accomplished. Thus was he nerved for every battle. Under this influence he dared, when in the going down to Beth Horon the failing light seemed to threaten incompleteness to the decisive battle with the mighty Amorites, to raise his voice of high command above the eddies of the battle-field of Azekah, and in the name of the God of the armies of heaven to bid the sun stand still upon Gibeon and the moon in the valley of Ajalon. So he fought and so he conquered, until as the Eastern province had been before, so Western and Northern and Southern Canaan were all subdued by Israel and meted out by Joshua to its several tribes as the lot of God directed.

And now the ancient promise had been fulfilled: the solitary, childless patriarch who had listened to The Voice which spake at Ur of the Chaldees had grown by regular gradations into a family, a tribe, a horde, and now a nation. The inheritance of the heathen was theirs: wells they digged not, vineyards they planted not, cities they builded not—all these were theirs. Over the old strongholds of the mighty giant chieftains waved the banners of the House of Jacob. The brave single-hearted soldier had been enabled to finish thoroughly his mission. "And the Lord gave unto Israel all the land which He swore to give to their fathers, and they possessed it and dwelt therein . . . there failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the House of Israel; all came to pass" (Josh. xxi. 45).

Then, his work done, the great general retired to the lot which at the express command of God the grateful people had given him, and there he built on Mount Ephraim the city of Timnath Serah. There he dwelt in peace for some eighteen years of rest. We of this generation can understand perhaps more perfectly than most, how in those last years the grey hairs of the old conqueror and national deliverer were esteemed; how, long after his victories were all accomplished, his countrymen still felt safe in the enjoyment of their days of peace from the consciousness that the great chieftain yet lived amongst them; how they hung with admiring confidence on him who in his own person set ever before them the visible token of their God's past blessings to them. For to us, too, has it been given in the long years of peace which bitter war had bought, to look with ever-deepening admiration upon—

"The statesman warrior, moderate, resolute,
Whole in himself—a common good;

Great in council and great in war,
Foremost captain of his time.
Rich in saving common sense,

And as the greatest only are,
In his simplicity sublime.
O good gray head which all men knew,
O voice from which their omens all men drew,
O iron nerve to true occasion true.*

Yet the time came when Joshua too was to be gathered to his fathers. But before he passed away, one last solemn duty was yet to be discharged. He called together the heads of the people whom his arm had formed into a national life, left them his last charge, and bound them with his parting words to an everlasting covenant of faithfulness to the God who had done such great things for them. How grand a gathering it was! There stood the victor in an hundred battles, now "old and stricken in age;" for it was already "a long time after that the Lord had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies." Before him was gathered all Israel, "their elders, their heads, their judges, and their officers," and he opened that mouth from which such words of might, and trust, and prayer had issued in the days of their troubles, and he spake to them what all felt to be his last counsels and commandments.

The words were still, as the great soldier's words had always been, instinct with the brief, stern eloquence of truth and action. "Cleave unto the Lord your God." "The Lord your God is He that hath fought for you." "Be ye very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses: turn not aside therefrom to the right or to the left." "Put away the strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the Lord God of Israel." Take good heed unto yourselves that ye love the Lord your God." "Ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls that not one good thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord God spake concerning you: all are come to pass." And then the voice died out upon their ears with that which woke a sob from many a rough breast, and dimmed many an eye with unbidden tears: hard old soldiers who, in the fierceness of the Amorite battle, had looked at the spear-head which the then mighty arm had lifted and been strong, and heard that voice in its full volume and been nerved by it in the death struggle; who had seen the giant Anakim fall before him, and gained from his aspect courage themselves to play the man,—they sobbed at the sorrowful parting when the faltering voice of the old hero spake of his own departure from amongst them. "Behold this day I am going the way of all the earth."

Though his name is not written in the roll of the prophets, yet on him too rested the great Divine Indwelling. The mighty warrior, the true counsellor, the just divider, the strong and patient ruler; he too had partaken largely of the sevenfold gifts; he too left upon his people the mark of a great character and of more than earthly power. It is a grand record,—as of the trumpet's tongue when dirge-like it subdues its louder utterance only to witness more by its suppressed power,—“After these things Joshua, the servant of the Lord, died, being an hundred and ten years old, and they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath Serah: and Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and of the elders that overlived Joshua.”

As on the dark sky, when some flashing meteor has swept across it with a path of fire, there remains still after that glory has departed a lingering line of light, so was it with this mighty man, glorious in life, and leaving even after he was gone the record of his abundant faithfulness still to hold for a season heavenward the too wandering eyes of Israel.

One other aspect remains to be glanced at of this mighty general. In more various points and with a closer similarity of outline than belongs, perhaps, to any other figure in the Old Testament, is Joshua the type of Christ. His very name begins the great intimation. Changed by Moses—doubtless at the mouth of the Lord—from Oshea, "welfare," to Jehoshua, or Jesus, "God the Saviour;" it pointed him out as the figure in the earthly of the heavenly deliverer. Joshua is pre-eminently one of the people whom he delivers; he has worked with them in the brick-kilns of Egypt, he knows their hearts; in all their afflictions he has been afflicted; and so Jesus stooped to be made in all points like unto his brethren, that, having been Himself tried with all temptations, He might know how to succour them that are tempted.

When Joshua has entered on his leadership, prophetic acts, full of typical significance, begin with a wonderful minuteness to repeat themselves. He and not the great lawgiver is to bring the people into Canaan: Moses must depart to secure his every word of promise being fulfilled to Israel, as the law must pass away and be fulfilled before the spiritual Israel could enter on that kingdom. At the river Jordan Joshua is shown by God to Israel as their appointed leader; there God began to magnify him. As Jesus comes up from the river Jordan the heavens open, the Holy Ghost descends, and the voice of God declares, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." At Jordan's waters He too is declared to be given as a leader and a commander to the people. From Jordan's bed Joshua took twelve stones to be for evermore a witness to the people of their great deliverance; from his baptism in Jordan Jesus began to call his twelve apostles the foundation stones of that church which witnesses to every generation of the redemption of the sons of Abraham by Christ. Twelve stones Joshua buried under the returning waters of Jordan; and over the first twelve Jesus let the stream of death flow as over others; whilst they were repeated in their office of witnesses to Him by all the enduring succession of his earthly ministers with whom He is even unto the end of the world. As soon as the chosen people, soiled by their long travel in the wilderness, enter the land of promise, Joshua renews in their circumcision the covenant of Jehovah's peace; and Jesus grants to all who pass the Jordan with Him the true circumcision of the Spirit. The Captain of the Host, as God reveals himself to Joshua, is ever with the great earthly warrior of the people; and in the Man Christ Jesus dwells "the fulness of the Godhead bodily." The mighty walls of Jericho fall low as Joshua marches his appointed circuits around them, compassing them seven times with the ark of God's presence; and as Jesus accomplished his course the world citadel falls low; for unto the seven-fold gifts of the Holy Spirit yields the will of man, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ. Joshua leads the people of God into the promised land, but they must fight for their possession; and Jesus, though He brings his own into the spiritual Canaan of his church, has come not to bring peace, but a sword. Not one of his can sit down and dream his life away; each one has life's battle, earnest, hard, severe, to fight. As Joshua said of old to the children of Joseph, so to each one of His speaks our Captain, pointing to the hill of light and the everlasting inheritance, "Thou art a great people, and hast great power; thou shalt not have one lot only, for the mountain shall be thine." When his work was over Joshua mounted the hill of Ephraim and dwelt in his own possession, not falling to him as to others of his brethren by the lot, but as his own right yielded to him as the conqueror of all; and even so went up the Captain of our salvation to the heaven in which He was before, his own by right, his own by conquest. For "this Man, after he he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool" (Heb. x. 12, 13). Before Joshua departed, he called to him on that mountain of Timnath Serah which he was about to leave, all the heads of the tribes, and with the chant of a prophetic voice set before them all the grand future, which, if they clave steadfastly to God, should certainly be theirs; and so before He ascended into the heavens did the great Captain of God's spiritual army appoint to meet upon a mountain top in Galilee the heads of all the tribes into which His church should multiply, and there looking with them over the far outstretched dominions of the earth, utter to them, Joshua like, the words of wonder which rung for ever in their ears, "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth; go ye therefore and evangelize all nations" (Matt. xxviii. 18, 19).

Yea, and yet again after a higher sort than belongs to this present world was Joshua but the type of Jesus. For it is He who for each one who follows Him, the true High Priest, divides the cold waters of death, setting against their utmost flood even when that Jordan overfloweth his banks, as he doth all the harvest time, the ark of the body which He took of us, and in which God dwelleth evermore; so making a way for His ransomed to pass over. It is He who hath gone before to prepare amongst the many mansions of his Father's house the place which the golden lot marks out for us; it is He who hath trodden down all our enemies; it is He who hath built the golden city upon the "twelve foundation-stones, which bear the names of the twelve Apostles of the Lamb;" it is He at whose trumpet sound, when the seven days of the great week are accomplished, the walls of Babylon shall fall. It is He who goeth forth conquering and to conquer, until all his enemies are put under his feet; and so the last type of this life of wonders shall be fulfilled; and the true Joshua from the exceeding high mountain of his Timnath Serah look around him on the tribes of God and see them all at peace; the prayer-promise which was breathed in time fulfilled in eternity: "Father, I will that those whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory which I had with THEE before the world was."

“NOBLESSE OBLIGE.”

An English Story of To-day.

By THE AUTHOR OF “CITOYENNE JACQUELINE.”

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—A FAMILY CONFERENCE.

THE family were at Brockcotes again; but Phoebe did not like to realise the fact, and dreaded to meet Lady Dorothea. The Latimers, on their side, viewed the inevitable encounter with not a little concern. Some one had been so faithful as to communicate to Lord Exmoor the fact that Lord Wriothlesley had compromised himself by the constancy of his association with the Pastons—not forgetting to hint at the reports which were in circulation. But so hazardous was the communication, that nobody ever owned to having made it.

One morning, soon after the family's return, there was a consultation in the breakfast-room over the unfortunate affair. But Lord Wriothlesley had not been summoned to appear before this tribunal of his kindred to answer for his conduct. There had not even been so much as mention made of remonstrating with him.

“It is abominable trifling in Wriothlesley, this: I should not have expected it of him,” groaned the Earl, showing a large degree of fussiness, instead of the gentlemanlike restraint which was habitual to him. As he spoke he walked restlessly up and down the room, contriving to entangle his long legs in some of the numerous possessions with which Lady Dorothea had even before breakfast surrounded herself.

“It is an affrontingly absurd association,” continued the Earl; “yes, I call it an affront for Wriothlesley to get upon such terms with any of the Wellfield people as can be so distressingly misconstrued. I never heard before of such a blunder being caused by any piece of patronage on our part. Is your head bad this morning, my love? There, Dorothea, allow me to pick up your goods,—photograph case, paper weight, whatever they may be. If there were to be a dissolution of Parliament with a general election soon, and this foolish story, magnified and distorted, got abroad, I should not answer for the disastrous consequences to the boy. The thing is hard, doubly hard, happening at this time.”

“It is certainly hard for us, papa,” acquiesced Lady Dorothea heartily. “As for Wriothlesley, I do think that he ought to bear the penalty—and it is not likely to be beyond his deserts—when he has brought it upon himself. It may be a good lesson to him. His hankering after what is impracticable has always been his weak point. Perhaps he could not have come to grief and retained greater hope of recovery. But I am sorry on my poor Phoebe Paston's account. The wrong done to her is far more serious and irreparable, you know, papa, and Wriothlesley was very much to blame to provoke it.”

“Yes, yes! Paston's daughter, too!” fretted Lord Exmoor. “I don't censure Paston too severely; not to say that I for a moment believe he has any complicity in the affair. He is a gentlemanly fellow, Paston; as much so in his way as I am in mine. Yet he ought to have looked after his child—oughtn't he, Dolly? No good-natured sufferance of Wriothlesley, when he was low and ailing, should have blinded him to Miss Paston's interest. I rather suspect, Dorothea, that we were all imprudent in having the little girl so much here, and allowing her to grow up in intimate relations with you; but neither your good judgment nor your mother's experience foresaw any danger. A brown little thing like that—what can Wriothlesley see in her?” his Lordship wound up, with wistful perplexity.

“Irregular, out of the way beauty, is sometimes the most captivating; I suppose, because it is the most subtle,” observed the Countess with a sigh. “You know Wriothlesley always admired it; and Miss Paston may be brown, but I think she is a beauty.”

“Of course she is,” pronounced Lady Dorothea decisively; “and she is several inches taller than I am, if that is any recommendation. If she had been one of us, she would have beaten me and Chetwynd Dugdale hollow. Her advantages are natural and original. And nature and originality are such real and lasting charms to a man of Wriothesley's type. I rather wonder what Phoebe sees in Wriothesley to tempt her out of her proper sphere for no greater gain than wasted affections and a wasted life."

"Well, there may be something in that, Dorothea," said Lord Exmoor, stopping in his walk.

"But, papa, I cannot consent to your condemning, even in retrospect, my friendship with Phoebe, I have owed so much of my goodness I possess to it, so much happiness. It appears to me that it would be mean and base to be always suspecting and dreading dangerous complications in planning our intercourse with our neighbours. If it was in Wriothesley to look belowhim in rank, and run headlong into an unfortunate attachment, all that my private friendship for Phoebe Paston can have had to do with it must have been to prevent his throwing away so much of his life on an unworthy object. Don't you think so, mamma?"

"I think the intimacy cannot be helped now, at all events, Dora," replied the Countess, doubtfully.

"And it cannot be stopped for a moment," urged Lady Dorothea, with the convincing power of wise generosity. "Only fancy, what a hue and cry there would be, and how fatal it would be to Phoebe, to Wriothesley, and to all of us, if we drew back from the Pastons just now! How ready the world would be to say that there had been deceit and design on the part of the girl and her friends! If you will but let me, I shall go this very morning, and call publicly for Phoebe in Wooers' Alley. I can stand disappointment for myself, if it is to be; but I cannot stand it for so loyal and kind a friend as Phoebe Paston."

Supposing that Lord and Lady Exmoor had thought for a moment of any lower line of policy, the temptation was trampled under foot by Lady Dorothea's fairness and magnanimity. The Earl knocked under immediately, with an announcement that he would himself call on Paston, stand in the painter's studio, and look him in the face, and not betray the least consciousness that there was anything wrong.

The Countess issued a simple caution.

"My dear, you won't increase the intimacy, or bring it more prominently forward; because, although I believe Miss Paston is a good, sensible girl, that might serve only to mislead her and the public further."

CHAPTER XXXIX.—TRIALS ON THE WAY.

THAT very summer afternoon, Lady Dorothea left her horse and groom somewhat ostentatiously in the Wellfield High Street, and walked up Wooers' Alley, meaning to say, by every motion of her whip and wave of her skirt, "See, Brockcotes has not withdrawn its countenance from Wooers' Alley for a single day, and does not deign to be offended, in spite of all its Wellfield people's stupid misrepresentations."

Lady Dorothea just missed Phoebe, who had gone down with little Bess among the newly-mown hay of the town-meadows. It was a malapropos accident; for Lady Dorothea had an engagement next day which would prevent her seeking her friend then, or for several days to come; and she had much to talk over with her, though it would not be with regard to Lord Wriothesley and his philandering. So there was nothing for it but that Mahomet must come to the mountain. Phoebe must repair, as of old, to Brockcotes, and to Lady Dorothea's room, or to some one of her favourite haunts in the gardens or the park. A message was left, desiring her to come up, without fail, within a few hours, to Brockcotes.

Phoebe, when she returned, panted and quivered at hearing this, and pulled herself up sharply for her distress. What harm had she done? Why should she tremble to meet Lady Dorothea, because Lady Dorothea's brother, without enticement, and in the teeth of strong objections and strict reserve, had cast admiring eyes on her?

Phoebe had been cited to a five o'clock tea-drinking, as it was now the first week of real midsummer weather after a rainy season. Lady Dorothea had arranged that they should enjoy the splendour of the summer and the fragrance of the tea in her Ladyship's own root-house, where the couple had hundreds of times nursed dolls, rehearsed dinners, and read stories and poetry together, in what they were at present inclined to regard as their tender childhood and youth, before they knew what it was to live and contemplate reverses or awake to ambitions.

The great gardens of Brockcotes had as much of the transmuted living spirit of the past as had the historical halls, corridors, and closets of the house. The gardens had been planned and planted in succession by heads of the house of Exmoor during the course of generations. Lady Dorothea had the chart at her finger-ends,—wildernesses, pleasancess, Italian terraces, Dutch beds, and French bosquets. She liked better to walk without weariness or breaking down over their long miles on miles, doing their honours and explaining their tokens, than to supersede Mrs. Bald and her subordinate in the show parts of the house.

Lady Dorothea's early penchant for this root-house had been revived by its proximity to the field of one of her most recent achievements. The root-house stood on a little half waste ascent, connecting the last flower-garden and the first of the stretch of kitchen-gardens with their ranges of hot-houses. In her precocious practicality, Lady Dorothea had loved to hover on the brink of homely vegetables and fruit trees. In her present propensity for reforming and regulating, she had taken to improving the waste spot in the large tract of cultivation. In the end, with her command of the magnificent Brockcotes park, she was as proud of her hundred yards of scrubby woodland (which she called her New-found-land) as any child of its toy.

The maid Thorpie had been appointed to look out for Miss Paston, and to conduct her to Lady Dorothea's retreat. Thorpie, with her coquettish frizzed hair and fluttering ends of muslin and ribbon, was of the same age as Phœbe and Lady Dorothea, and had been about Brockcotes ever since she was a child.

Phœbe had a vague notion that Thorpie ought to be to her, by another step in the social grades, what she was to Lady Dorothea. But here the beggar-and-porter element might have come into play, for there was hardly a grain of sympathy between Phœbe and frivolous, calculating Thorpie, who was at once fantastic and full of sordidness.

To her surprise, she found, as they went along, that Thorpie was minded to be particularly gracious.

"Miss Paston, allow me to carry your waterproof," she said, officiously; for Phœbe had looked at a glorious mass of cumuli in the blue sky, and had come prepared for a thunder-shower. "Yes, the rain do fall plump for these few weeks, and very worrying it is. I do declare, I have several times thought we were to have another flood, with Noah's ark wanted, if it continued; but if it come this afternoon, I shall run up to Mrs. List at the coach-house, and get you one of the coach umbrellas, in no time."

"Oh, but it does not look any like rain now," said Phœbe; "though I am certainly obliged for your good intentions."

"La, and what can we do but oblige one another, Miss Paston? And I can tell you the rain's no joke here sometimes. You remember the spring in the park, and the mud all about always. Let me go first, and if my feet sink, pick your steps according."

"I should rather you wouldn't take so much trouble on my account," urged Phœbe.

"Oh! I shall think it an honour to show you the way. We didn't ought to have had tea in Lady Dorothea's house, though it were ever so sunshiny above; and goodness knows my eyes can tell it is a glare, with the ground that spongy below after the late wet; we oughtn't to have followed this out-of-the-way direction. If Lady Dorothea would drink tea il fresco, she might have had it in the Pagoddy or the Whim. We could have gone to either of these places by one of the main walks through the proper grounds, and then we might have met Mr. Finlay, or Mr. Lawson, or some of the younger gardeners or foresters, in case of a thunder-clap, which, if it do come, will make me screech like a peahen, and scud like a lapwing."

"Surely your nerves are not quite so weak as that," urged Phœbe.

"Oh, yes, I know I shall; for my nerves ain't fit to stand a shock. You must excuse me, Miss Paston, for I could not help myself, not though my Lord himself were looking on. Should you care for that passion-flower on the outer wall which you are looking at, Miss Paston? Let me pick it for you, and take the blame. Allow me, ma'am; your skirt is dragging the merest morsel; but none of the grass is dry in the shade of the trees. I shall hold it up for you, if you please—pray yes, Miss Paston; I shall think it a pleasure."

Phœbe could scarcely believe her ears. She looked inquiringly into Thorpie's foxey face.

Was this to be an earnest of Phœbe's harvest—that while, in the matter of friendship, she should be driven to cling to Mrs. Edgecumbe, she should, in the matter of service, be thankful to hire the duty of mercenaries like Thorpie?

Unsuspecting of the fresh offence that her behaviour was, Thorpie persisted in showing Phœbe every attention. As a part of her rôle, Thorpie sidled close to her, and without solicitation bestowed on her important unrequited confidences, taking away Phœbe's breath by a glimpse of the great news and the overwhelming anxiety which the Exmoors had brought down with them to Brockcotes.

"Yes, my lady—Miss Paston, I mean—it is quite true that there is a dreadful business about Lord Fairchester, and we are afraid the marriage will have to be broken off, after it has gone so far. Heaps of presents have been received, and some of them exhibited at Storr and Mortimer's. The household was all but arranged, and I was to have gone with her Ladyship of course. The whole trousseau, except the dresses and the millinery, was complete, and for elegance, if you will believe my word, Miss Paston, the Princesses could not have surpassed it."

"No doubt," said Phœbe; "but surely the marriage will not be put off now."

"Well, if the marriage do be given up, I understand, from what has dropped from Mr. Simmons, close as he is, that we will go abroad again for the autumn, and to Egypt and the East, where none of us ladies have been, for the winter. If the Countess's health would stand it, we might try a yacht voyage to Iceland and North America. But I for one can't say I'm sorry we won't attempt it. I have no notion of having my nose bitten off by the frost, or being worried by wolves when we were out sledge-driving; though I have heard the furs we should get might repay the excursion. If you would give me a commission, Miss Paston, I should go down on my knees to bring you a fine set; it should be nothing less than sable or hermine. Lord Fairchester made my young lady a present of his travelling-cloak to put her feet upon when we had to stand those German bare boards. I don't think it will be worth the returning, and yet it will be a kindness to take it out of her sight, don't you think, Miss Paston?"

"But I don't exactly see your meaning," objected Phœbe.

"Oh! I forget you know nothing to speak of about the hawful discovery. How things and persons do go up and down in this world, for all the earth like a see-saw! Lady Dorothea will tell you about it herself; for you two are such friends like you had been born sisters. Some ladies are fit for any place, and these are the sort, no doubt, that have the luck which sets the world and their children's children a-staring."

"Yes, I dare say Lady Dorothea will tell me of it," admitted Phœbe, in a kind of despair, hoping that Thorpie would drop the subject. But she went on—

"Lady Dorothea don't mind speaking of the great misfortune as is threatened, because it is no fault of my Lord Marquis's, unless he did wrong to go dabbling and meddling among his grandfather's letters in the family papers. I would have the haristocracy, when they were not hunting or shooting, or attending sales and breakfasts in town, to ride out and manage their works, and order the great doings of their folk, like Lord Wriothlesley does: he is a proper young nobleman. If they will rummage in charter-chests, and old drawers of cabinets and escritaires, I'd have them confine their reading to leases and grants, and let the private history of their grandfathers and great-grandfathers a-be. But here is my Lady come down the New-found-land to meet you. She do have her ways, Lady Dorothea, and such a spirit to keep them up; but she is easily got round, is Lady Dorothea, and her bark is always a deal worse than her bite. I shall run on before, and see if the kettle be boiling, and the cups set out."

The volunteered, vague, extraordinary communication from Thorpie confirmed rumours of evil which had been floating about Wellfield during the spring and summer. They had received no credit from the Pastons and other stanch friends of the family, so that they now pierced Phœbe's dismayed ears like a moral thunder-clap, and drove her own circumstances, strange and agitating as they were, out of her head.

CHAPTER XL.—A CONFIDENCE.

THORPIE was right. Lady Dorothea, with genuine animation, first challenged Phœbe to appreciate with her the little stream purling away plebeianly, mixing with the lingering half-subdued note of a homely thrush or finch, not too tired with its public morning concert to perform a little private song or two for the benefit of its mate and its newly-fledged brood, of which Lady Dorothea knew one late nest, and was very careful and elated in the knowledge.

"It is so nice and refreshing here," declared Lady Dorothea, "without any but wayside flowers and trees, without gardeners except twice a season, or cats, or the public hallooing after us. I could live in a cottage after all. Yet it shows how artificial I am that this makes me think of the garden of Eden, which was no more like it, I daresay, than it was like the tapestry representation in the Little Hall, with the orange serpent twisting itself into a rope round the blue tree. I fancy I am as artificial as the old getters-up of pastorals. Why, you are ready to cry," protested her Ladyship. "What should all you? Don't be a big baby, my dear Phœbe. You see I can bear up against it. Where would be the good or the use in breaking down; and I was always for good and for use, you know," Lady Dorothea ended in parenthesis, with something of a forlorn smile at herself.

It might have been imagination, or the trifle of Lady Dorothea's wearing a black gown in commemoration of the death of some noble cousin ; but Phœbe was at this moment painfully struck with her Ladyship's delicate transparency and slightness of colour and form, indicating a wornness and weariness, from the sense of which she struggled to escape. So she could only say with eager tremor—

"If I were not proud to see you bear your trial so well, Lady Dorothea, I should be filled with envy of you."

"He can bear up like a brave man who has done his duty and vindicated his nobility ever since he got the first glimpse of the truth," Lady Dorothea declared earnestly ; "and I am very proud of Fairchester, Phœbe. I never thought to be so proud of him, when, in my silly conceit, I distrusted his attaining the power of public speaking, or of aiding Wriothsley and the country in any way unless on committees."

The sedate satisfaction, irradiated by a lovely gleam of tenderness, with which Lady Dorothea announced that she had never thought to be so proud of Fairchester, did not, on the first blush, look as if it had reference to an insuperable obstacle to the marriage.

Neither was Lady Dorothea in any haste to enter on an explanation. She was self-restrained and orderly. Her friend had come to her apparently fatigued by her walk, and with nerves unbraced for the old familiar intercourse. She had to be soothed and coddled in the best rustic arm-chair, with the most charming view to be had in the root-house, while Lady Dorothea, with the assistance of Thorpie and Mrs. List's boy, presided over the fire on the hearth, the gipsy kettle and tea equipage, the one basket of roasted chestnuts, and the other of roasted potatoes.

It was not till the refreshment was over, and Thorpie and Mrs. List's boy dismissed with the utensils and the fragments of the feast, that Lady Dorothea leant her elbow on the wattle table, looked Phœbe wistfully in the face, and began with an abrupt prelude :—

"Well, and here it is, Phœbe ; I shall not, in all probability, be married now or ever to Fairchester. Coach-builders, jewellers, and milliners may tear their hair ; and even the lawyers may join in the lamentation, for they will have no great compensation for the loss of the settlements."

"But is there cause sufficient why the marriage should be finally put aside?" asked Phœbe, in stunned bewilderment.

"Oh, there has always been a whisper of a flaw somewhere in Fairchester's title to the estates."

"But where is there not a whisper of a flaw where the stake is great? I have noticed such about new claimants to titles and estates in the newspapers ; but I don't altogether understand these things."

"You could scarcely be expected to understand such matters, my dear Phœbe ; nor do I ; but I think I have heard of claimants in connexion with most of our great houses. I can remember, when I was quite a child, a man turning up on us, and calling himself a descendant of the prodigal Lord Thomas. I suppose when you heard of a flaw in Fairchester's right you set it down to some crazy or knavish claimant of this kind?"

"I only heard of it recently, and didn't know very well what to think," answered Phœbe.

"Well, the worst of it is the flaws are not all groundless, or the claims baseless. Unsuspected members of houses, and dispositions of estates hushed up and forgotten, have come to light sometimes. And this of Fairchester's is the worst possible case. You have some idea what Fairchester bore of Edmund Blount, and how, as head of the house, he strove to bring his cousin to better behaviour. The very first thing Fairchester did when he came of age was to pay Edmund Blount's debts, and he repeated the ceremony until this spring, when he saw it his duty to refuse to waste further assistance on his prodigal till he should consent to renounce his ruinous courses."

"And I should think Lord Fairchester only did his duty," asserted Phœbe.

"Yes, but what did Edmund Blount do but threaten to start, and did start in effect, a law-suit on the old slur on Fairchester's grandfather and Edmund Blount's grand-uncle? Even within the last six weeks there seemed no doubt of the result, in spite of the ugly scandals clinging to the old Marquis. Five weeks ago, in looking over some of his grandfather's correspondence, not in relation to the law-suit at all, but preparatory to putting the letters into the hands of one of your Mr. Hall's friends, who had begged a sight of them for literary and historical purposes, what was Lord Fairchester's horror and distress to discover a letter in which his grandfather distinctly affirmed a previous marriage to a Miss Palmer of Leicestershire, still living when he afterwards married Lady Maria Annesley, who divorced him, and was divorced herself, in the end, by her second husband, Sir Leonard Medlicot!"

"But that may be a forgery," cried out Phœbe.

"I am afraid not, my dear," contradicted Lady Dorothea, in sad sobriety. "They were a frightfully bad set, those old Fairchesters ; so atrociously bad that there is some doubt certainly whether the old Marquis did not invent and write so much of that letter to revenge himself on Lady Maria at the time of their separation. Whether or not a marriage with a Miss Palmer of Leicester (and it is known that such a person existed) really took place at the time the Marquis coolly declared it did, is not established; but if a ceremony passed between the couple, it is thought a register of it may still be found in the vestry-book of some church in the county. The lawyers who have been consulted are hunting for the necessary evidence. Fairchester must wait their report, and so must we. There is one comfort, it cannot be long delayed."

"Oh, dear Lady Dorothea, how sorry I am!" exclaimed Phoebe. "What an uncertainty for you! How you must suffer!"

"You may say so. It is taking the flesh off my bones, and I have not much to lose," acknowledged Lady Dorothea, looking at her slender wrist. "But if it is hard for me and papa and mamma and Wriothesley, think what it must be for Fairchester, a peer of long descent,—the independent owner of a rent-roll of fifty thousand to-day, and what men call a beggar and a bastard to-morrow."

"How good he has been!" interposed Phoebe, with bated breath. "We always heard he was good, but we little thought how his goodness was to be tested."

"He could not do otherwise. There was no choice left him as an honest man," declared Lady Dorothea, looking straight before her out of her shining eyes, and holding tightly between her fingers a white rose which she had taken from her dress. Think, Phoebe! these women, his sisters, dared to raise a clamour in his ears for not keeping the letter close; and the black sheep whom Fairchester had dragged out of the mire, and forgiven till seventy times seven, suggested through his lawyer, that Fairchester must have known something of the dreadful story all along. But Fairchester himself behaved beautifully. He told me first, because, he said, that, after himself, it concerned me most—that he sought my advice; his mind was made up from the day he read the letter. I do not say that there was no struggle. I think Fairchester would have been more than human if there had not been; but I am satisfied it was hopeless from the beginning."

"You supported and strengthened him, Lady Dorothea?" pressed Phoebe.

"I can't tell. I hung upon his neck, and kissed and cried over him, and told him that he was winning his spurs that day as much as ever his ancestors had won them. It was the first day I knew I loved him as well or better than his mother had done."

"But how can you give him up? What do you mean?" demanded Phoebe, bluntly.

"I cannot help myself," Lady Dorothea averred, with a kind of bitter sweetness. "If Lord Fairchester is reduced to John Blount, without even a right to that name, he will be no match for Dorothea Latimer. He will have nothing, and be nobody. A provision for his sisters is the utmost he will be brought to accept from Edmund Blount. I am certain Fairchester will take nothing for himself, even if it be offered him. Of course my father and many other friends will be ready and eager to serve him."

"And what will become of Lord Fairchester?" insisted Phoebe, in her dismay.

"How can I tell?" counter-questioned Lady Dorothea, a little impatiently. "There will be a great noise about him and his misfortunes for a time,—he will get out of reach of that as soon as possible, I should think; and then he will pass away, and be forgotten by all but his immediate friends, just as happens to all of us when we die. I should think he would go to one of the colonies, and try to start afresh among strangers ignorant in a measure of his antecedents. I was thinking of that up here in my New-found-land, and striving to cheer myself with the thought. Go where he may, I can assure myself that he will carry with him the peace of a righteous man."

"And he will lose you, too," Phoebe was not able to help remonstrating, pleading with hands clasped, and laid on Lady Dorothea's knees.

"I cannot prevent it," Lady Dorothea replied, with quivering lips, but shaking her head in unflinching ruefulness. "I am not a great loss in myself, and you did not use to be such a flatterer as to tell me so, friend Phoebe. I have been reared to do my part for the family, and for the good of the country. I cannot marry whom I would; I must make an alliance to serve Wriothesley. I must not fail papa in my turn."

Phoebe looked down heart-smitten.

"I have no opinion of mésalliances," Lady Dorothea continued, obstinately; "not even when people have been led innocently into them, and when they appear to promise a large amount of compensation. They are offences against rule and discipline, and being so, they don't answer their purpose. I trained and tutored myself to love Fairchester, and when my efforts are crowned with a great success, immediately my friend and true lover is taken from me, and I must tear up the love I planted and nourished so obediently, after it has taken root and struck so deep, that I am afraid the process will crack and crumble down the better part of the soil of this poor heart of mine."

"I believe it," granted Phoebe, fervently, in midst of her despondency.

"We Exmoors have always sacrificed our private feelings, and had nothing to do with mésalliances."

Phoebe looked up quickly. She was thinking of Charming Nancy, who had been no more than Reeves the bailiff's daughter.

The inadvertent motion did not escape Lady Dorothea, distrain though she was.

"Yes, there was one unequal marriage, I believe, under stress of circumstances, when England was turned upside down by civil war. But fortunately, our charming low-born Countess was a childless woman, so that the mésalliance, in its essence and habit, was not handed down. No doubt there have been mésalliances in other families," Lady Dorothea proceeded, "and they have not all been followed by signal judgments—oh! dear no. Some of them have flourished, or looked as if they flourished, amazingly. But mésalliances are unnatural knots and twists in our social constitution as it exists, and I cannot think that they are not uneasy experiences to poor souls in themselves. I don't venture on one, myself, so I may presume to offer my example as a lesson in temperance, shall I say? I don't think that you will call it rank worldliness, Phoebe, though I can gather from your expression that you do not altogether approve of it."

Phoebe did not demur to this statement, and her Ladyship ran on—

"Oh dear! oh dear! when are we to have the unqualified approval of ourselves and our neighbours in any resolution we take? Not on earth, but in heaven again. However, child, we are speaking like two Cassandras, and as if everything were already lost save honour. Now, although I fear that old Lord Fairchester was not an arrant liar instead of a bigamist, and that the lawyers have a suspicion of proofs, there may be no evidence, or there may be contrary evidence. I expect to hear confirmatory tidings from Fairchester one of these days."

"It must be a trial for you to wait for his letters just now, and a greater trial to receive them?" said Phoebe, half speaking to herself.

"Well, I don't go into hysterics when the post comes in, or ask some other body to read the letters; but I hear my heart beating

(I seem to be always hearing it now), and I see my lips white if I am within sight of a glass. These are great demonstrations, are they not, from me, who only felt a little milk-maidish, you remember, when Fairchester (poor fellow! how considerate he was!) came formally to pretend to my hand last autumn?"

Phoebe said she well remembered her impression when she first saw him on the course.

"There is one blessing," her Ladyship went on, "that he is coming down himself immediately afterwards, either that our marriage may go on directly and everything be as was proposed, or to say a long good-bye. I am afraid of missing anything. There may be a special messenger; and I question quietly whether I am able to stand more than I must bear. I think somehow there will be news to-morrow, and I shall be glad of you to congratulate or—no, I don't want any one, not even you, dear Phoebe, but only Fairchester to condole with me. I shan't break down with him, and throw a heavier load on his shoulders; and you see I am determined not to break down if I can."

Phoebe went away home as full of Lady Dorothea's strait, and the gallant front she presented to it, as if she had been her Ladyship's avowed sister.

CHAPTER XL.—"FOLLOWS HIM LIKE HIS SHADOW."

It was in the glory of a summer evening that Lady Dorothea was to go out and meet her promised bridegroom for the last time. It was about the end of the London season, when the gaiety of the great world grows fast and furious, so that memories of dinners and routs, which would have come naturally at this time, hung about the young people who passed by different ways through the massive foliage and the dignified seclusion of the park at Brockcotes.

A phalanx of puzzled, pitiful eyes gloated a little over a mistress in tribulation, as a group of the lower servants at Brockcotes, secretly assembled, watched Lady Dorothea setting out, before the family had risen from dinner, along the lower drive in her garden-hat and her great light shawl thrown over her evening-dress. The whole establishment knew that Lord Fairchester, or he who had been known as Lord Fairchester, was expected at the Cotes station by the train which was due at eight.

Phoebe Paston, too, sitting at one of the windows of the drawing-room in Woovers' Alley, meditating on the nobler woes of gentility, and the sacrifices which were called for from all the great ones of the earth, saw with her mind's eye, as plainly as any of the staring domestics of Brockcotes, her Ladyship starting on her errand. She could even follow her Ladyship till she encountered one of the Brockcotes carriages with Mr. Blount, midway in the drive, close to the Obelisk. Phœbe beheld the carriage pull up, and its occupant—the same big, somewhat clumsy young man she had seen on the Wellfield course—alight and exchange greetings with the watchful friend who had anticipated his arrival. And further, she saw the two who were plighted man and wife, but would never redeem their pledge, walk slowly back alone together towards the house.

Nay, more, Phœbe heard with her mind's ear, as no mental ear at Brookcotes except such as belonged to the immediate family circle, and was strained with morbid acuteness, was attuned to hear and distinguish, the gist of the conversation between the lovers.

Mr. Blount and Lady Dorothea were quite calm and schooled to this situation. If anything, he was the less composed of the two. They did not for a little while allude to the irretrievable disaster that had befallen them. She told him how many minutes the train must have been over due, showing how accurately she had expected him, while he remarked on the kind of journey he had had, the state of the weather, and the appearance of the country.

"How well everything looks here!" he went on to say.

"Yes, I am vain enough to think there are few places like the park, the big trees, the house itself, the whole thing at Brockcotes," she replied.

"You never saw Sans Pareil," he observed; "the great sweet chestnut there stretches its branches to an extent that covers one wing of the house; or Ford-in-the-Marsh, where there are a row of thorns older than those at Greenwich. I always think I see my mother sitting beneath them."

"No, I never saw either," she assented.

"I hope the Countess continues to benefit by her stay at Brunnen," he began again.

"Well, I think she does; but one cannot expect to see her to advantage just now."

"No; Louisa has been ill too."

"Has she? I am sorry to hear it."

"She was better when I left."

"You are not looking quite well yourself," she said, glancing up in his face.

"Am I not? I shall be the better of my three days down here; it was so hot and oppressive in town, though I did not go out except to my lawyer's. I suppose I am at liberty to return the charge, and say you are not looking well yourself, Dorothea,—I mean not so strong and—stout, shall I say?—as you looked in Germany."

He had been in the habit of calling her Dorothea before; but she had never called him John, as she did now, saying, simply, "No, John; I have done my best to keep up for all our sakes; but it has been trying."

It was as if it had taken all the spirit of dogmatism and self-assertion out of her.

Then he cried bitterly—"My love! to whom it was all to have been so equal, as far as the world goes," and he took her hands, and told her again what they both knew so well. "They say it is all up with me, Dorothea; it is all over between us."

"Never between our hearts, John Blount; you may carry that assurance, go where you will, and I am ready to seal it by any pledge you like to ask. A lie might have severed our two souls for ever while we were united in name, but how can a loss of worldly goods come between us in spirit?"

Phœbe heard the particulars of Mr. Blount's melancholy leave-taking from Lord Wriothsesley. She was eager to hear all about Lady Dorothea and Mr. Blount—how they fared, and if it was possible that they were to give each other up by mutual consent. Lord Wriothsesley was as willing to tell her what she wanted to know as if she had had a right to hear it, and while he was grieved for his sister, he was pleased by Phœbe's interest in his communications.

"I cannot make out you women," he said, as he sat looking at Phœbe as she worked by her mother's side. "Now, there is Dorothea, who was to make a family alliance. She would keep poor Fairchester in his proper place, and while decently civil, was imperative on both herself and him, taking things mighty coolly, as if the two had been staid elderly people like my father and mother. But no sooner is Blount utterly ruined, and the affair stopped finally at the last moment, than she goes and breaks the unlucky fellow's heart—all of it that is not broken already—with her passionate sweetness. She follows him like his shadow, and waits on him like his dog. Think of such treatment from a woman like Dorothea! It is an overcoming sight for a mere onlooker."

"But don't you admire the grand nobility of it, Lord Wriothsesley?" inquired Phœbe.

"Well, it has something heroic in it, I admit; but I feel for all our sakes that it is a mercy he is not to stay longer than three days. She would demoralise the manly fellow. John Blount is all that, though he is deprived of what was his prestige, and most things besides, and though he never was specially bright. I declare, for the moment, I do not know whether to be most sorry for him, or to be filled with a craze of envy of him."

"But must the marriage be stopped so late? Is there no remedy, and you Exmoors so mighty?" flashed up Phœbe reproachfully.

"Is there no hope of his Lordship, Lord Fairchester that was, getting back his own? or else, if it isn't his own, of the Queen's Majesty giving him another title and property from her own purse, or from the purses of other people who have died without children and their money has fallen to her?" suggested Mrs. Paston.

"No more hope of the one than of the other. If the property and the title had been divided, and that had been the question at issue, something might have been attempted. As it is, nothing public can be done, unless you would have Blount a public pauper."

Page 723.

"Well, what a reverse to be sure!" mused Mrs. Paston.

"Of course, my father and many other friends are bent upon affording him such assistance as he will take from them, all the more that he would not have anything forced upon him by the heartless bully and blackguard his cousin. But consider, Miss Paston, what suit he has to offer Dolly now, and whether he is the man to offer it or she the woman to accept it? It is a very sad calamity, I grant you; but any farther proposal of union between the couple is impossible."

It seemed that Lord Wriothsley could not advocate for his sister the views that he held for himself. He could judge discreetly where she was concerned, while a higher virtue than prudence had seized upon him and kept him fast.

Phœbe did not see Lady Dorothea again till Mr. Blount's short visit was past, and the two had taken farewell, or, as Lady Dorothea preferred to call it, had said good-bye. The establishment at Brockcotes was on the eve of being broken up for some time. Both Lord and Lady Exmoor claved to their chief home, the show and spacious magnificence of which had its retirement and comfort to them. But there was something more than a noble Darby and Joan's inclinations to be looked to now. It could not be a judicious arrangement to chain down Lady Dorothea in the scene of her early-planned marriage. She must be carried about, as Thorpie plainly phrased it, and put, at least, in the way of a new establishment.

It would be an outrage on paternal sense and devotion to say, that while Lord Exmoor could not bring himself to attack the potent son and heir on his detrimental and distressing fancy for Miss Paston, this son was to have the excuse of living several months on end within a stone's throw of the painter's daughter, who should continue the bosom friend and favourite companion of his sister.

It became incumbent on Lord and Lady Exmoor, however much they might groan and sigh over the necessity, to take to fitting from place to place in their declining years.

Phoebe felt as if she and Lady Dorothea were taking leave of all their youthful intimacy and attachment. Notwithstanding this, her Ladyship distinguished Phoebe particularly before the family went away, and came again to Woovers' Alley, as if to renew and intensify her assurance that no extravagance or insanity of Lord Wriothlesley's could make bad blood between her and Phoebe. And this was after Phoebe had taken leave of Lord Wriothlesley.

"We are going for the present," he had said, "but we will come back possibly sooner than you think. For myself, I must be down, once and again, on the Earl's business and my own, between the general going and coming. Only don't give any of us up, for the sake of faith and truth, Miss Paston."

Phoebe was convinced, with the pride that would accompany the conviction, that all precautions would be in vain where Lord Wriothlesley was the object. If he lived and she lived, it would go hard, if, for all the disparities, the coronet of the Exmoors was not laid at her feet. She held up her head, and would not show her little world the pain she felt in the separation from Lady Dorothea, and what it might easily have mistaken for another feeling.

Lady Dorothea, again, was calm, and even cheerful, in spite of the hollows in her cheeks exaggerating the clear brightness of her eyes. She herself spoke of her thinness, half-laughingly advising Phoebe to take care of her shoulder-blades, and to watch in time for silver threads appearing in her brushed back hair. She told Phoebe that Mr. Blount was likely to go to one of the colonies after his business with his cousin was wound up. There might be terrible claims for past rents, with interest, left to hang like a millstone round the disinherited man's neck; but for very shame, Edmund Lord Fairchester would make a compromise.

Lady Dorothea was to be allowed to correspond with Mr. Blount. And why not? The two could be trusted, and they were dear friends, as she daresayed their children would be after them.

"You see, Phoebe, everything is possible," insisted Lady Dorothea, "where there is a will to keep one's feelings under control, to be temperate in all personal wishes, and to make the sacrifices which are required of us."

When Lady Dorothea said this, Phoebe was aware that her Ladyship strongly implied that it was required of her to sacrifice Lord Wriothlesley's generous regard and the grand promotion which, in its very dimness and distance, loomed so splendidly before her eyes.

CHAPTER XLII.—DELICATE COMMISSIONS.

THE Exmoor family remained absent from Brockcotes for the greater part of two years. During all that time Barty Wooler did not show his face in Wellfield, save for such brief visits to his mother as enabled him to see her and no one else. His course seemed that of a rolling stone which could gather no moss.

Mr. Blount and his expulsion and exile in Canada were in the way of being forgotten like other expulsions and exiles.

There was no word of the marriages either of Lady Dorothea or of Lord Wriothlesley; but Miss Dugdale had accomplished an excellent match with great settlements.

Lord Wriothlesley had advanced from his clearing of the woods at Brockcotes and his bringing in of the water to Nannton, to the instituting of great dye-works on the estate of Swinley. He had discovered and demonstrated the presence of chemical qualities in the water in the neighbourhood, which adapted it peculiarly for dyeing processes. The works had already made such progress, and were likely to be so largely followed in the district, that they had caused some talk, and had even won notice for the young nobleman from the public organs of the industries of England. He had also made his solitary descents on Brockcotes and Wellfield as his father's envoy, and he had constantly, although not ostentatiously, repaired to the Pastons. The Earl at last thought it high time to broach the proscribed topic, and to utter a stringent remonstrance.

"Wriothlesley has been brought up to such sway, such influence, and has so much at his command," his father considered, nervously, as he was about to do his duty.

Lord Exmoor hesitated as he addressed his son in the smoking-room, which the family happened to occupy when the gentlemen were alone together at a confidential hour.

He prefaced his lecture with an expression of regret that he could no longer mistake his son's motive for avoiding every overture towards making an establishment for himself, and marrying.

"I can only say, that it is neither for your credit, nor for the happiness of the young lady whom it seems you have the misfortune to admire, that there should be an unmeaning yielding to her attractions, and a perpetual return within the sphere of her influence."

Lord Wriothlesley bent his brows, and smoothed them again, stood firm, and looking his father in the face, said in clear tones—

"You need not fear for my credit; but I have to thank you for the store you set on her happiness, although I cannot flatter myself that it is deeply imperilled by my intimacy with her father's household."

"But why put her happiness in peril at all? Can this continued, I may say exclusive, intimacy of a young man in your station with the family of an artist benefit either your reputation or theirs?"

"I appeal to you whether I have not kept the intimacy within bounds?" protested Lord Wriothlesley, turning suddenly upon his father.

"I do not say you have not. I have so much respect for that man Paston, that I think he would have prevented anything else if you had been so left to yourself, or so mad as to go so far. But what do you propose by such an intimacy?"

"You must see, Lord Exmoor, that I can propose nothing," asserted Lord Wriothlesley, with a touch of bitterness.

"But you can frustrate all our expectations," urged Lord Exmoor, rather vehemently for him; "you can waste your time hanging about what I cannot call anything else than a dead light; so sure it is to wreck you, my boy," the good Earl said, softening all at once, as he shambled up to his son, and put his hand on his shoulder. "I am not so dishonourable and depraved as to undervalue that freedom; but there is more to be thought of in a young fellow of your degree. The stake which you hold, the talents with which one of us has been endowed at least, entitle you——"

Lord Wriothlesley could bear it no longer, and was forced to interrupt the Earl.

"My dear father, you are everything that is kind to me, but surely you do not mean to end by saying, that I am no longer able to be of use to you or others, or that I have done anything to compromise my character? I don't boast of having no particular debts burdening me like many men, but I do maintain that I have not been guilty of anything to disqualify me for what future work I may be fit for, and that my family and the country may impose upon me."

"It is not what you have done, but what you are failing to do. You are holding aloof in a measure from the close society of your equals, you are giving no indication of settling steadily in your class," urged Lord Exmoor, driven to table his bill.

"I had hoped I had many friends. Would you have me establish false premises, and incur false responsibilities?"

"Why should they be false?"

"I need not answer you, sir."

"No, don't answer me, Wriothlesley, and cut me to the heart."

"I will not do it," the young man pledged himself. "I'll go into Parliament, or on any diplomatic mission to-morrow if you wish it. Indicate any step, appoint any post, and I'll try for it to please you, and my mother, and Dolly. I here deliberately promise to undertake no adventure, to enter on no engagement, without the knowledge and the concurrence which are your privilege. Will that not satisfy you?"

"I have no choice—it must," Lord Exmoor granted, with unusual ungraciousness, as he took his son's offered hand, but he dropped it again immediately as if the touch pained him.

The vexed outwitted nobleman, the moment his son's back was turned, sighed:—

"Oh, if Dorothea had but been the son!"

In these two years at Wellfield Phœbe was learning to forget the episode of Barty Wooler's domineering attachment, the surprised petulance which it had excited, as well as her remorse for her unsoftened rejection of his suit, and her dread lest she had worked the least harm to her father's old friend.

But she had another cause for real trouble on account of her father's failing health. It was manifestly failing now, and that rapidly, though he fought a hard fight to work as well as ever.

For a long time Mrs. Paston would not see the creeping ghastliness of what had always been Caleb Paston's delicate habit of body, and put down Phœbe's apprehension as a girl's moping. For a still longer time

Mr. Paston was indignant at all interference with him, or entreaties that he should stop painting, and try a change of life.

The doctor's opinion was delivered cautiously. Let the patient spare exertion, have as little as possible on his mind, adopt such and such a diet, and take the medicines prescribed. If Mr. Paston had any business arrangements in reference to his family to make, he did not think it need create alarm, supposing he suggested that it might contribute to Mr. Paston's ease of mind, and so to the swiftness and completeness of his recovery, if he made these arrangements as soon as possible.

Mr. Paston smiled faintly at the advice.

"It would be a case of spontaneous combustion if I went out of harness," he maintained, "but I shall certainly try the diet and the medicine, and if I do not get better in a short time, I shall think of such arrangements as are left me to make in order that my mind may be easy."

No improvement followed the decision. In the grey light of a Martinmas day, Mr. Paston called to Phœbe as she was passing his painting-room. She turned back and entered, and she could see that he was retouching his "Reconciliation of Jacob and Esau," which he had relinquished three years before. He said to her shortly—

"Phœbe, child, I should like you to take an opportunity of looking in on Mrs. Wooler; you call for the old woman sometimes, don't you?"

"Oh yes, papa, I have called on Mrs. Wooler," answered Phœbe, as cheerfully as she could.

"That's right. Well, I want you to ask her the whereabouts of her son at present, and if she would let him know that I have been ailing this autumn, and have a great desire to see him about my pictures. I don't doubt he would come; for he was always a kindly, confiding fellow. Will you do this for me, Phœbe?"

Phœbe was not simply taken aback by her father's unexpected request; it struck her with a keen sense of his apprehension of danger and a coming change. In that light, what did it signify how Mrs. Wooler and her son regarded her visit, or how the Wellfield people might talk if it proved successful? She would have agreed to execute her father's will had it been ten times more disagreeable and difficult.

CHAPTER XLIII.—A FRIEND IN NEED.

It was a "raw and surly" day when Phœbe went to Mrs. Wooler's. The labour-nums were but bare, crooked sticks. Barty's lush and cool ferns were rustling as sere and brown as ferns could rustle. But when she fulfilled her part of the mission, she found that much of its disagreeableness and difficulty vanished. Her heart was too full of her father to leave her any room for the entirely painful consciousness that she was sitting in the drab parlour, regarded curiously by Mrs. Wooler, as the girl who had first bewitched and then refused Barty, and who was so foolishly uplifted and arrogant as to be philandering with Lord Wriothlesley.

Mrs. Wooler had ceased to fear Phœbe in the field of her own life, and she was not dead to the softening effect of the circumstances under which Phœbe came.

"Oh, indeed!" she said; "and is your father so poorly, Miss Paston? I am sorry; yes, I am sorry to hear it, and I wish him well again, I do." Mrs. Wooler spoke earnestly, and not unsympathetically. "We are poor frail creatures, and when it comes to that, it lays our pride low, and stills our wrath. His strait to-day may be ours to-morrow—only all in our appointed time. Your father was wont to be one of your lads all pith and marrow, with a power of work in his slim body; but that kind don't last. And for Barty: he is not so far to seek. He is at no greater distance than Folksbridge, where my uncles, the Clays, have had him home for a month, to be a party in a new settlement of their affairs. They are always a settling of their affairs, these rich old men. Barty will do the bidding of the sick man who asks for his presence, so far as I can speak for my son; and I know of no reason that should keep him away."

Phœbe felt that Mrs. Wooler was more friendly than might have been expected.

Barty travelled straight to Wellfield on the first notice that he was wanted. But although he was there within a few days, Mr. Paston's old complaint had taken a start in a downward direction, and he was very much worse—suffering paroxysms of violent illness, and was so shaken and feeble between them, that when he had attempted to lift a brush that morning, his hand had fallen powerless by his side, and a mist had come between him and the canvas. But he was up and dressed as usual, tottering about the old familiar ground, or lying back in his sitting-chair, looking thoughtfully at his work, mostly at the first and the last of it,—the "Theft by the Bellini," and the "Reconciliation of Jacob and Esau."

Phœbe was hovering about her father, prepared to nurse him. She was the more set on it, because of her mother being more and more overcome by the evidences of the progress of her husband's illness.

It was when thus thrown together and holding on by each other that Barty Wooler came in upon the father and daughter. He and Phoebe exchanged grave, not unfriendly greetings.

Looking away to avoid catching his eye, Barty said to Mr. Paston—

"I am glad to find you on your feet, Paston; you will be all right again presently."

"I am on my feet still, Barty, but they have become very shaky feet in no time, somehow. I am so certain to be laid aside for a season," he added, with a quick glance at Phoebe, "that I am under a great obligation to you for complying with my request so promptly. I hope it has not put you too much about."

"Not in the least, and there is no obligation at all. What do you think I was about? you'll never guess—not only getting myself served heir to the Clays, but having their business made over to me."

"To dispose of speedily?"

"Not a bit of it. Silk-mercery is as good a trade as another; as good, at any rate, as daubing second-rate pictures. I cut the apprenticeship, all but the travelling line, an age ago; and now I have cut the shop itself, and taken to the Clays'. All I have had to do has been to let my name be put in gilt letters—(I should have liked to have had the painting of it, Caleb)—after the old names over the main front,—'Clay Brothers and Wooler.' Think of the weakness or the generosity of humanity! Why, the old men are as proud of the small concession as if I had brought a fresh fifty thousand into the concern. Now you must admit that I am the luckiest dog in creation, in some things."

"No. If you could not cut the concern when you like, I should be rather sorry to hear that you had contracted so much as the responsibility of a sleeping-partner in trade. For you will never sleep at a post, however ready-made and lucrative; it is not in you, whatever laziness you may choose to pretend to. You will be having your finger in the pie, even though it be against the grain. Business hours, ready money, long accounts, percentages, truck system; you will have a tilt at yourself and your neighbours in one and all of them. Without any experience, I should say you will make a mess of it. If your uncles the Clays had known you as well as I do, they would have thought twice before they admitted you into their business. You were always the queerest fellow, Barty, for taking short turns and doubling upon yourself."

"Perhaps, if you add, and for falling on my feet, in a way. But the thing is done."

"And with these new trade engagements, you are very much hors de combat for the service that I thought of seeking from you."

"I cannot see that, when my name is all my offering. But what would you have?"

Mr. Paston experienced some restraint in explaining himself before Phoebe. At the same time he would not suffer her to go. He was purposely detaining her that she might hear the trust he committed to Barty Wooler.

"Here are some pictures, Barty, which might be finished and sent up to the exhibition this year or next. There is that Jacob and Esau: I am fond of the thing—so fond of it that I have not cared to put my hand to it save when I was in the humour. But I have thrown in the principal group. And there is the 'Execution of Kilmarnock and Balmerino,' to be done on commission for a friend of Lord Exmoor,—one of the handsomest commissions I ever received; and I had managed most of the heads. I was going to ask you if you would not consent to work up these pictures, giving them as our joint production?"

Barty stared, and tugged at his beard. "My dear fellow," he broke out at last, "I should make a botch of your finest pictures. I am no more fit to lay on after you than an elephant is to draw a hair-stroke."

"Tuts, Barty, you are in a flighty mood; and remember the precedents: art-partnerships have not been uncommon."

"Yes, I know. Rubens did it, along with Sneyders and with Teniers, too, on occasion. But all I can say is, that the disparity between them was not so great. In this case the very ignorant world would cry shame on me for my impertinence."

"Allow me to judge. You are wrong, both in depreciating yourself, and in thinking that our ideas would not harmonize."

Barty looked at Mr. Paston and the pictures with undiminished perplexity.

"It would be no good, certainly no good, for your reputation and profit. I cannot make out what your object is, if it is not to sacrifice yourself in order to afford me another opportunity to redeem my lost ground. Confess that that is the grand dodge, Caleb," urged Barty, leaning his chin on his hand, and bending forward as if he had forgotten Phœbe's presence, and all about her.

"No, no! Don't you comprehend?—you, who disparage my brains, which were always the best of me. If I am laid aside for a length of time," he said, with an emphasis on the words, "I should not like these pictures to lie so much dead stock, or care to lose the heaviest price I was ever promised, supposing that I could have the half of it. I have done reasonably well. Painting is not so bad a profession as it is called. I have made my savings for a rainy day. But I should not like to lose the money-value of these pictures, with the rest that may be disposed of, when the occasion offers, in order to make a better provision for my wife and daughter."

"Well, I'll see about it, Paston," accorded Barty, thoughtfully.

"Which means that you agree. Thank you, man, from the bottom of my heart."

Mr. Paston was excited, and the excitement, to Barty's great dismay, brought on one of the sick man's paroxysms of cruel pain and gasping efforts at relief.

Barty might have done anything, everything, for his old friend and enemy; but he could not, without the utmost force put upon himself, look on at suffering where there was little to be done except to look. Phœbe, so much younger and weaker than he was, could do this in which he failed, not only at that moment, but in many attacks during the following week.

"I am here, papa," she would say, as if there was a talisman in her company, as if she would fight Death single-handed.

Mrs. Paston's well-meaning weakness grew pathetic. She ceased to wonder at Phœbe's stillness and strength, while she sobbed out her gratitude for her girl's duty and devotion, and pled with her as if Phœbe had been the parent and she the child.

"Let me see your father, Phœbe; I'll be good, I'll not rouse or worry him. If you will only tell him not to make a hoarse joke to me, like he tried to do this morning, and then looked wistfully in my face with his great eyes, and said, 'My dear, I think you and I have been happy together, after all;' as if I had ever minded the poor thing's sharp speeches. Oh, me! I'll not have him to fret with my silliness much longer."

It was a marvel to Barty Wooler to listen to Phœbe addressing him with composure, almost with content.

"You may go in and see papa now, Mr. Wooler. He will be glad—he is always glad —to see you. It will not vex you to see him to-day; this bad turn is nearly over, and he will be able to speak to you by-and-by. After the last, during the night, he rallied so quickly and talked for half an hour. (Do you think I should not have let him talk? But he had something he wished to tell me.)"

Barty Wooler scourged himself on Phœbe's account, and then he looked wistfully at his mother, but he neither spoke nor looked as if anything more than common humanity moved him.

Mrs. Wooler had more than a respect for death; it had a positive fascination for her. She would not only lend her aid in his last weakness to the man at whose gate she had sat in righteous indignation for a quarter of a century, but she would have a pitiful inclination to look on him in his death.

"If they would admit me, son Barty, I might be of some service," she proposed slowly. "I don't think he and I would choke on the bone in our throats at this time of day," she proceeded, in a kind of shamefaced way. "It is not that I don't think he snatched what was not his own, mind you; but what of that when he is called on to give up the whole world?"

"You could be of the greatest use, mother; I am sure you could," Barty gave eager confirmation. "There is not another such active, clear-headed old woman in the kingdom. Is it not heinous to leave a girl as good as alone in such trouble? Do try what you can do, mother. I think he would not dislike to see you," said Barty, eagerly catching at the suggestion.

Towards the close of Mr. Paston's illness he received the visits of his clergyman, and the last consolations of religion. Phœbe went for Barty Wooler, as, according to his custom, he kept his forlorn watch, near at hand and yet out of the way, in the deserted painting-room.

"Mr. Gilbert has arranged for papa's taking the sacrament as soon as a messenger can go and return from the vicarage. I am to join with papa, and so is mamma, if she can stand it. Don't you think she will like to look back on it? And papa is asking for you as if he wanted you to be one of us. Would it be wrong to wake up your mother after her sleepless night? You and she were such old friends of his, and you have been so much with him at the last!"

Phœbe broke down a little as she said the words, but she recovered herself in a moment, and as with a flush of consciousness that her work was not yet done.

Barty said it was a privilege of which he was not worthy, and so said his mother to herself, in very low accents, when he roused her—

“Lord! I hope I am not too unworthy. I have forgiven thy servant; I am contrite for the injury rankling in my heart since he was young and strong, and won the victory without stopping at the means. Deary me! deary me! that this should be the end.”

There might have been sadder ends than this too, with Mr. Gilbert standing there, ready to administer the highest bond of union human and divine, and the dying man opening his eyes and gazing dimly round, with a feeble failing throb of congratulation in the remark—

“Barty and his mother are here?”

But it was not quite the end. Mr. Paston lived days longer, passed through violent spasms of pain, through violent throbs of sorrow for the inevitable separation from his friends, and the natural revulsion from the mystery which rends the body and sets the spirit free. As in the case of many dying men, Mr. Paston’s mind turned back and dwelt on the past with its key to his character and his destiny.

“I have never ceased to be sorry, Barty,” he muttered. “I thought once to atone; I see now there is no atonement in that sense.”

“Don’t speak of it,” entreated Barty, by far the more cut up and abashed of the two. “What was it in the beginning and at the utmost? A trifle between a couple of boys. How you have thought of it and magnified it, Caleb! It was I who was by far the most to blame for not forgetting it an age ago.”

“It was not a trifle to you and me, Barty,” said Mr. Paston; and he called to the friend of his youth, “Kiss me, Barty.”

To Phœbe the whole scene was removed from what she had ever known, and was dream-like. But among the visions of her father’s death-bed, which Barty Wooler had spoken of as likely to haunt her to her dying day, the foremost was the strong man’s face, bent down and laid beside the grey shadow of a face on the pillow in a caress which they might not have exchanged when they were boys, although they had lived together like brothers.

“Where are you, Phœbe, and your mother?” And to these two was devoted the small remaining portion of the sick man’s time, broken by loving, disjointed epithets, and interjections and references to a better home, and to an undying Father and Brother,—the whole family in heaven and in earth. These are the common utterances when good men come to die, mixed with what is commoner still, the plaintive request to know the hour and the minute of time, when time itself is about to be no more.

CHAPTER XLIV.—“DUST TO DUST.”

WHEN Mr. Paston was dead, Barty Wooler’s supremacy reasserted itself. Phœbe yielded up every arrangement to him. She retired within herself to feel her loss, to dwell on her father’s memory. She recalled all that was great in him—his fervour and zeal in his art, the temptation which his very greatness might in this respect have been to him, and his fatherly, unselfish regard for her. She was so absorbed in her meditations that while she realised her loss, she did not realise that Barty Wooler was filling the gap for the present, and that without him it would have been desolate and dreary indeed for two lone women left without husband, father, or brother. Mr. Hall was all very well. He had written his formal sincere regret, and asked if, at an inopportune busy season, he could be spared till the funeral, which he would certainly attend, and discharge such functions as might be given him. Frank Hall was still abroad for his journalist’s vacation; but Frank, too, would be cousinly when he returned, if he did not hasten his return on account of his uncle’s death,—quite cousinly, and perhaps freer and more cordial in the expression of his friendliness.

Mrs. Paston was beginning to recover from her prostration, and to cry out querulously as to what she and Phœbe were to do without poor Paston. Her brother Hall might have been with her if he had chosen to exert himself, though she could not have endured the sight of him, with his loud step, and rustling of newspapers. But his mind was set on markets and money bags. As for a grand admirer of a nobleman, there was little comfort to be had from him at such a pinch. Even though he had come forward like a man, and been poor dear Paston’s titled son-in-law by this time, his private carriage turning up at the gate of the graveyard would have been about as much as they could have expected from him. Whereas he was a mere fine gentleman dangler, whom it was a shame to speak of at such a season.

With soft forbearance Phœbe came to be glad over her mother’s delusion. She even began to think that no veil was so like a shroud of freshly-fallen snow, dropped from the heavens themselves, as the veil which often descends between the living and the dead. Even then she was vaguely satisfied that it would muffle jarring echoes, warm the chilled heart, and soothe her mother.

Barty Wooler had relieved Phœbe and acted for her. He was careful of intruding upon her, or of making even his work for her a burden; but the day before the funeral he was forced to seek an interview.

"I am so sorry to bring you down," he said, in quick commiseration, as Phœbe entered the drawing-room, walking wearily in her heavy black gown. "I thought you had better know Lord Wriothlesley is come."

"It is very kind of him," Phœbe professed, still too spent with past emotion to realise the situation. "Must I see him?" she inquired, in her low, depressed tones.

"That is for you to say."

Phœbe looked up. He was not detaining her by making her sit down or by sitting down himself. He stood grasping the back of a chair and staring at her fixedly. Then it all came back upon her with painful distinctness—the claims of the Exmoor family, and the footing on which she had stood with Lord Wriothlesley. It had never grated on her with so unreal, so fanciful, and forced a character as it did at this moment, as she witnessed Barty Wooler's unconcealed surprise at her hesitation.

"I suppose I ought to see Lord Wriothlesley, since he has come down, I imagine, on purpose," she said, hurriedly. "Will you let him know that mamma and I shall receive him when he chooses to call?"

She had the notion that Barty observed that he was to see Lord Wriothlesley on her account, and she made an involuntary distinction between her reception of him and Lord Wriothlesley, whether he was to take it in the light of a compliment or not. And where was the use of undeceiving her, or indeed of keeping her longer there with him since Lord Wriothlesley was come? He was vindicating his right; and the rest that remained of what was strictly the last service for Caleb Paston, as well as the settlement of the affairs of the family, had better be left to Lord Wriothlesley, at least to Lord Wriothlesley in conjunction with Mr. Hall, who was so up to his ears in business, that he made his appearance at his brother-in-law's funeral with a distracted air. If Caleb Paston could have spoken from his coffin and appointed his chief mourner, it would have gone hard with his individual inclinations if the man he had loved and wronged had not been named to walk next his bier.

Phœbe listened with downcast eyes to Lord Wriothlesley's soft words. "I am so sorry; Dora is so concerned for you. We have all met with a heavy loss. I wish I could have come in time to see him. I am afraid he suffered much, but there is one comfort—his suffering is over."

Phœbe was powerless to interpose and prevent Barty Wooler's withdrawal. How could she when it was voluntary on Barty's part, and when he had anticipated Lord Wriothlesley's proposal to occupy the post which, he said, should have been Lord Exmoor's, if he had not been laid up with the gout away at a friend's place in Somersetshire.

Mr. Hall, stout and liberal though he was, thought it was a fine thing to have an Earl's son taking a prominent part in the melancholy ceremony. Nor did Mrs. Paston's grief make her indifferent to the honour. She rescinded all her latest opinions as to vaulting ambition bringing its own punishment, and of the reluctance with which Paston had given in his adherence to Lord Wriothlesley's barren homage. But Phœbe was not flattered, not even content. It seemed hard for her to be disturbed by these considerations at such a time; yet it should be Barty Wooler, who, having begun, should end the rôle. The Wellfield people would speak wildly of the arrangement. All at once Phœbe had become very much alive to the town's extravagant talk. Lord Wriothlesley might never become her husband, nothing was more remote and doubtful. She found herself worried into accusing him of self-complacency and self-confidence, in stepping to the front on this occasion. She would a thousand times rather have had Barty Wooler her own and her mother's representative (impossible as it had been for her to tell him so), when he drew back of his own accord on his first encounter with his Lordship. Neither could she accept the substitute whom every other person concerned deferred to, even when she summed up all that the Pastons owed to the Exmoors, and what had been the tacit relation between Lord Wriothlesley and her.

DEBENHAM'S VOW.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S HISTORY."

CHAPTER LIII.—HOW ARCHIE WALKED INTO IT.

SOME people fall in love ; others drift into it ; others walk into it. Most of us drift into it. It is the ordinary, everyday, commonplace way of this nineteenth century ; probably the safest way ; certainly, the least troublesome. As to falling in love—literally pitching headlong over the precipice at the first tones of a winsome voice, or the first shaft from a pair of bright eyes—that, in truth, is an accident that now rarely happens in real life. The era of impulse is almost gone by. The times grow daily more prosaic. As the earth's crust goes on cooling, our blood cools with it. We come into the world older than did our fathers and grandfathers before us, and each generation is soberer than the last. Hence we no longer "fall" in love. Hence the very phrase, "love at first sight," is well-nigh out of date.

But although most people drift into it and few tumble into it, yet there are many who walk into it ; and walking into love is a distinct phase of the disease. A man walks into love as he goes through an alley which he knows to be infected with fever—because it lies in his road ; because he is too lazy, or too careless, to take the longer way round ; because, perhaps, he even somewhat relishes the sense of danger.

Thus it was that Archie walked into love with Miss Alleyne. He did it deliberately ; with his eyes open ; conscious of his peril, yet making no effort to avoid it. The mischief was not yet done when he parted from her in the library that evening at Strathellan House ; but the train was laid, and it needed but the tiniest spark to explode it. Instead of keeping out of the way of that spark, however, he marched, as it were, straight into the fire.

Having asked and obtained leave to call at Campden Hill the following day, he went home to his lodgings in Great Ormond Street, and sat with his feet on the fender half the night, smoking innumerable pipes, and thinking of the old days at Chillingford. How bright Miss Alleyne was then—how arch, how gay, how happy ! He could see her now, in her light summer dress, flitting down the path by the river ; presiding over the tea ; trying to look grave at the whist-table. He could almost hear the soft music of her voice as she read aloud, sitting in the shade of the tent while Mr. Alleyne was painting. And then her smile—what a flood of sunshine broke from her lips when she smiled !

Archie used to be jealous of Miss Alleyne in those Chillingford days ; so that the magic of her smile and the music of her voice brought him little pleasure at the time. He remembered all this now. He even remembered that her gaiety used sometimes to jar upon him. Good heavens ! what an insensible brute he must have been ! Should he ever see her look so, and smile so, again ! He feared—never. And then, loyal as it was his nature to be, he accused his friend bitterly. This, he told himself, was De Benham's work. This was the sacrifice that De Benham had offered up to ambition. Thinking thus, Archie's heart was filled with pity, and sympathy, and indignation. He would fain have constituted himself Miss Alleyne's champion, even though it should be to defend her against his friend. But she would accept no champion. She could not be brought to admit that De Benham was in the wrong. She was even ready, despite the logic of facts, to take part against herself, and do battle for the man she loved. For that she still loved him as well as ever—perhaps better than ever—was only too certain.

"But then," said Archie, filling his pipe afresh, and addressing himself to the Turk's head which formed the bowl thereof, as if it were a familiar friend, "but then, you see, that's the way with women. They're so awfully faithful. It doesn't matter a bit to them whether a fellow's kind or unkind to them ; whether he's true, or whether he's false. They love him because he's himself—nothing but that. If he was ever so fond of them and he only happened to be somebody else, they wouldn't care a pin for him. No; not if he was a hero out of a novel!"

There was something so profound in this reflection, that it carried Archie completely out of his depth. The more he pondered and puzzled over it, the more intricate it seemed to become. At length the fire waxed low and the pipe was again smoked out; and then he looked at his watch, and finding that it was just three o'clock in the morning, went off to bed.

Now it is evident that any prudent man who found his thoughts running in such grooves as these, and yet was convinced that the lady of whom he was thinking had given away her heart for good and all to another, would have taken timely counsel with himself, and have withdrawn beyond the reach of temptation. He would not, for instance, have kept his appointment the next day at Kensington. But Archie was not a prudent man. He not only kept his appointment, but in order to keep it with especial éclat he plunged into all kinds of lavish expenses, such as new gloves, new boots, a new Paris hat, the bluest of blue cravats, and the horsiest of horse-shoe pins. Nor was this all. He went to a certain livery-stable near Great Ormond Street, and there hired a retired hunter—a somewhat gaunt, but tolerably decent animal; and thus mounted, rode soberly and circumspectly down to Kensington. Soberly and circumspectly, not because he was unsteady in his saddle, or uncertain of his reins, or afraid for any similar reasons to spur on his gallant steed; but because it had rained heavily the night before, and, the roads being deep with slush and mire, he was fain to present himself before Miss Alleyne with as few splashes as might be. For Archie, though a City man, rode creditably, and looked rather well on horseback.

He found Miss Alleyne alone, which was delightful; and she told him she had been expecting him, which was still more delightful. Then he took a chair at the opposite side of the hearth, and looked at her as she sat there in her dark winter dress with the flicker of the firelight on her cheek.

Presently Miss Alleyne led the conversation to the subject of the Stormy Petrel.

"I have been wishing that you would come some day and tell me about it," she said, "ever since I heard you were back in England."

"Have you really?" said Archie, in a flutter of gratification.

"And in last night's crowd, conversation was impossible."

"Quite impossible."

"You must have so much to tell that is interesting," said Miss Alleyne.

"What, about the recapture?"

"About the—the voyage, altogether."

Archie twirled his hat and looked infinitely perplexed.

"I'm a bad hand at describing," said he. "I'll send you last Saturday's Shooting Star, instead. There's a splendid account of the whole affair in it, written by Charley Bennett—a friend of mine."

"I had rather hear your own account, Mr. Blyth," said Miss Alleyne.

"Well, it is almost mine. I supplied the facts."

Miss Alleyne sighed. No newspaper narrative would tell her what she wanted to know.

"We had a terrible storm, you know, after we had got possession of the vessel," said Archie. "I never knew what a storm was till then. If you had only seen the waves! they were almost black, and they rose higher than our masts."

"Was it the next day?" asked Miss Alleyne.

"No; the fourth day. You would have thought the sea and sky were coming together to destroy us."

"And this was while he lay ill!" she said, shuddering.

Then a light broke in upon Archie's mind, and he understood why Miss Alleyne had wished to see him ever since his return.

"Ah," he said; "you would like me to tell you about his illness!"

She looked down. Her colour rose; her lip trembled.

"He might have died, you know," she said, half-apologetically.

"Well, yes; he might—and he very nearly did. But then, after all, you see, he didn't," replied Archie.

And then, very patiently and circumstantially, he went back over the oft-told tale. He told how De Benham, being wounded, went on day after day, taking his share of work and refusing to admit that he suffered; how he was found lying on the deck, insensible, the evening of that fourth day, when the storm was over; how, even after this, he rose and went about his duties the next morning, till at length his limbs would bear him up no longer; how, as each succeeding day passed by, he lay in his narrow bed, now burning, now shivering, sometimes feebly conscious, sometimes delirious, with no doctor save the captain, and no nurse but Archie; how, when they at length reached Fayal, and the Stormy Petrel, battered, disabled, trailing her wounded fin, struggled wearily into the port of Horta, they sent for medical aid, believing all the time that it was too late, and that his last hour was almost come; how, the vessel being now at anchor and all quiet on board, he fell that very night into a profound sleep, that lasted twelve hours; woke free from fever; was carried ashore in a litter; nursed by a sister from the convent; and given back to life, as it seemed, by a miracle—all this Archie told of De Benham; and if, as he said of himself, he was a bad hand at describing, he, at all events, made up in earnestness what he wanted in eloquence. He tried to remember and detail every little incident that he thought could interest her, even to the first day when his patient came down from his bed-room, and the first drive he was able to take in a sort of carriole, lent by the governor of the island.

"It was such a lovely place for an invalid to recover in," said Archie; "and such a climate! Never too hot; and fanned by the most delicious sea-breezes, morning and evening. The people are a sort of tropical Portuguese. They were gathering in the grapes while we were there; and there you saw the vineyards all reaching up the hill-sides; and groves of oranges, and lemons, and palms . . . and then, on the slopes inland, between the sea and the mountains, there were fields divided by hedgerows, just like the coast of Hampshire; and above these, on higher ground, miles and miles of chestnut wood; and then, highest of all, the great purple peaks that had once been volcanoes. I climbed one of those peaks one day, and went down into the empty crater. It was like a huge green basin lined with forest trees; and down at the bottom was a plain of rich pasture. And then, in the middle of the plain, there arose another little cone covered with trees and bushes."

"Did you go alone?" asked Miss Alleyne.

"No; I had a guide."

Then, suddenly apprehending her meaning, Archie added:—

"It was when De Benham was getting better, you know. I started at daybreak—hours before he was awake."

"He was not yet strong enough to go with you?"

"He was never strong enough to go anywhere, while we were in the island," said Archie. "He wouldn't wait to get strong. He was only just able to walk with the help of my arm, when we started for home again."

"And where you lodged, could you see those mountains and all that beautiful country from your windows?" asked Miss Alleyne.

"Yes; there was a sort of little vine-trellis running all round the house; and I used to wheel his couch out there every morning, so that he could lie in the shade and watch the sea, and the town, and the hills, all day long."

"And sometimes you used to read to him?"

"Yes, when I could get anything English to read. And then, too, I used to go down to the port and pick up little scraps of news from the sailors, to amuse him. He wasn't a bit dull, Miss Alleyne. Nobody could be dull in such a beautiful place as Fayal."

"Nor with so kind a friend always at hand. How good you have been to him, Mr. Blyth!"

But Archie would not hear his own praises.

"Oh, no!" he exclaimed. "There is no merit in doing anything for those one loves. De Benham is my best friend. Or rather," he added, sadly, "he was my best friend, before I knew he was a lord."

"Nay, I hope he will be your best friend, and you his, Mr. Blyth, all your lives long," said Miss Alleyne. "He will need you more than ever, now."

Archie shook his head.

"If he needs me, he will have me," replied he. "But he won't need me, Miss Alleyne. I shall drop out of his life now, I know. Besides . . ."

He was going to say, "Besides, he will be off again before long;" but he checked himself, not to give her pain.

"And besides what?" asked Miss Alleyne.

"I—I scarcely know—except, perhaps, that a man is happier when he chooses his friends from among his equals."

With this Archie rose to go; and Miss Alleyne told him that he must come again, when her father should be at home.

"And then," she said, "I shall expect to hear more about your travels, Mr. Blyth. You don't know how much your adventures have interested me. Besides," she added artfully, "you relate them so well."

Archie blushed and stammered something, he scarcely knew what.

"Good-bye, then. I shall tell my father that you are coming—very soon."

"Ah, I shall come only too soon!" said poor Archie, already on the high road to destruction.

Then Miss Alleyne gave him a smile that almost turned his head upon the spot; and away he went, with his ears tingling and his heart in his mouth.

Meanwhile, the retired hunter was marching majestically up and down outside the house, under the care and guidance of a small shoe-black in a scarlet blouse. Having dismissed this humble equerry, Archie sprang into the saddle; administered a sly dig with his off-spur, so causing his steed to prance and caper like a fiery Pegasus, in sight of Miss Alleyne's window; and then cantered off towards the Park.

Presently the canter subsided into a walk, and Archie fell into a brown study.

It had been a delightful visit while it lasted; and Miss Alleyne had been charming. She had made him talk; she had listened to him; praised him; invited him to go again; smiled upon him like an angel. He left her presence in a rapture of delight. But now the rapture had subsided, and he began to see of how much worth these pleasant nothings were. Would she, he asked himself, have cared to listen to him, if he had not talked to her of De Benham? Would she have asked him to come again, if it were not that she hoped to hear more about De Benham? What cared she for his visits, or his adventures, or even his existence, except in so far as he reflected one fact or phase of the existence of De Benham? For her, De Benham, clearly, was all in all. He might desert her, forget her, marry another—but she would love him in spite of every wrong, and go on loving him to the end. As for her pleasant ways and gracious speeches, what were they but the arts and wiles of her sex? Was she not a very woman through and through? Was she not such a very woman, that, though a man should stake his heart upon the glitter of her smile or the ring of her words, she would yet pay him back with counterfeits, and lavish her true coin upon the prodigal who cared only to scatter it to the four winds of heaven?

Absorbed in these reflections—or rather, absorbed in less definite reflections to this effect—Archie rode slowly homeward; and twice, as he went pondering, he shook his head; and twice he said to himself:—

“A fellow would be a fool to go often.”

But for all that, he went again the very next Saturday afternoon; and again in the course of the following week. And each time he talked to her about De Benham; each time she smiled upon him; each time he stayed longer than before. Soon he became an habitué of the house—an intimate—a privileged guest—free of the painting-room—free even of Mr. Alleyne's Sunday afternoons. And so he walked into love with his eyes open.

CHAPTER LIV.—A WAIF FROM THE FAR WEST.

DE BENHAM went down into Monmouthshire on the Tuesday night, having left his mother's card with the lodge-keeper at Strathellan House as he drove by. The next day, accordingly, found Lady De Benham oppressed by the conviction that Miss Hardwicke would return the civility by calling upon her. Why, she asked herself, should she be compelled to make this Miss Hardwicke's acquaintance, whether she desired it or not—nay, when she so distinctly did not desire it? And then she pictured this “City madam” rattling up to the house in a yellow carriage with two, perhaps three, men-servants in blue and scarlet liveries—rustling across the narrow slip of front garden in velvet and sables—filling the tiny parlour with her presence—tattling of her conservatories, her orchard-houses, and all the riches that were hers. Perhaps, mindful of her own splendour, she would carry herself towards Lady De Benham with infinite condescension; or over-mindful on the other hand of the difference in their rank, be fulsomely obsequious. And would not the one be as hateful as the other? What if she, Lady De Benham, were to go out, and remain out, the whole afternoon? The temptation to do this was great; but so also was the difficulty of doing it. In June, for instance, one might have taken a book, gone up to Hampstead, and spent the day under a tree in some quiet corner of the heath; but in December . . . no; to one who owned no friends or acquaintances in London, there was no resource save bazaars and picture-galleries; and sooner than undertake such an expedition alone Lady De Benham would have faced a whole legion of “City madams.” So, half-apprehensive, half-defiant, wholly reluctant, she stayed at home and awaited Miss Hardwicke's visit.

Thus the morning and afternoon wore on, and at every sound of wheels she looked up, dreading to see that yellow carriage at the door; for Lady De Benham had quite made up her mind that it must be a yellow carriage, and that the liveries and all connected with it must be of the showiest and gaudiest kind. Then it began to grow dusk, and still no Miss Hardwicke made her appearance.

And now, with all a woman's inconsistency, Lady De Benham began to be angry with her for not coming. Had not she, the elder lady, the married lady, the lady of title, accepted this Miss Hardwicke's present; sent her card in acknowledgment thereof; sent it, moreover, by the hands of her son; and was it not obviously Miss Hardwicke's place to call upon her the next day in person? That she did not do so proved, of course, that she was ignorant of the usages of society; but, after all, was not such ignorance to be expected from her?

Just, however, as the dusk was deepening and the lamplighter was coming round, a little, plain, dark blue brougham drew up quietly at the gate, and Miss Hardwicke, unattended by even a single footman, let herself out, and knocked softly at the door. It was not yet so dark outside but that Lady De Benham could see how plain and unpretending the little carriage was, and how equally plain and unpretending was the dress of the lady alighting from it. Was it possible that this should be the "City madam" of her imaginings?

Then, involuntarily holding her breath, she heard a low, grave voice asking for her by name; and then the parlour door opened, and Miss Hardwicke, announced by the lodging-house servant, came in.

The first greetings were gone through almost in silence. Lady De Benham, fluttered for the moment by this derangement of all her pre-conceived ideas, put out her hand somewhat hesitatingly, murmured an inaudible welcome, and motioned her visitor towards a chair beside the fire. Miss Hardwicke, courteous and self-possessed, with just the right shade of deference in her manner, took the proffered seat.

The ordinary commonplaces having been exchanged, the conversation turned upon the affair of the Stormy Petrel. Miss Hardwicke alluded to "the masterly stratagem by which Lord De Benham recovered possession of the vessel." Temple's mother spoke in praise of Archibald Blyth, and of the share he had borne in the dangers and hardships of the voyage.

"I feel that I have been guilty of some injustice towards Archie," said Miss Hardwicke. "Knowing that he was not clever, I gave him credit for nothing but a good temper and a light heart."

"I think we are all too apt to gauge people's hearts by their heads," replied Lady De Benham. "I underrated Mr. Blyth when first Temple became acquainted with him at that little church in the City. I am ashamed to remember it now. But for his devotion, my son might have died at the Azores."

"It is something to have a talent for friendship," said Miss Hardwicke.

"It is an uncommon talent."

"That is because it is a monopoly in the hands of the men."

"Nay, I hope not that."

"History would seem to show it. All the illustrious friendships of antiquity are men's friendships."

"Beginning with Cain and Abel," said Lady De Benham.

Miss Hardwicke smiled.

"We are told they were brothers," she said; "but not, I think, that they were friends. The rule of life seems to point the other way."

It was Lady De Benham's turn to smile now. She loved a spice of satire. In the old days, when heart and pocket were light together, her son's talk used to bubble over with epigram. But those days were past. Wealth had evaporated wit, and epigram died off the surface of his talk when Cotton was infused into his system. This, however, was according to the nature of things. Unto few men is it given to serve Mirth and Mammon; and, smite as one may, no flint that ever came out of a chalk-bed will strike sparks from gold. Lady De Benham (who, because her ways were secluded, loved to have amusement brought home to her in the form of entertaining conversation) missed the pungent sayings and flashes of merriment of those pleasant times. And so, finding that Miss Hardwicke could talk, and that her talk had in it just that coveted streak of satire, the elder lady smiled. The smile heralded a thaw.

"I have not yet thanked you, Miss Hardwicke," she said, "for these beautiful flowers. I look round the room and fancy it is summer."

"I hope you will let me perpetuate that illusion till May," said Miss Hardwicke.

Lady De Benham froze again, suddenly. She could accept a civility, and accept it graciously; but that it should be proposed to lay her under a long series of similar obligations . . . this, surely, was too much like a liberty!

Miss Hardwicke saw her error, and hastened to repair it.

"Or, rather, I would hope so," she added, with considerable self-possession, "if I were not a stranger. As a stranger, I am not, of course, entitled to usurp the privileges of Lady De Benham's friends."

To this emendation, a scarcely perceptible bow was the only reply. Lady De Benham thawed not as rapidly as she froze.

Then came some more commonplaces—this time about Zollenstrasse and life in Germany; and presently Miss Hardwicke rose to take her leave. All this time Lady De Benham remained frigid and dignified. She had smiled once; but she was not going to smile again. Miss Hardwicke, meanwhile, had her coup d'état in reserve.

"Lady De Benham," she said, when about halfway to the door, "I have brought something—something which I think will have an interest for you—a relic"

"A relic?"

"It is in the brougham. With your leave, I will bring"

Lady De Benham's hand was instantly on the bell.

"If there is anything you desire fetched from your carriage, Miss Hardwicke, the servant will go for it."

But Miss Hardwicke preferred to fetch it for herself.

And now Lady De Benham fumed inwardly. What could this thing be that her visitor had brought in the brougham? Not another present? If so, what bad taste! What presumption! To accept it, whatever it might be, would of course be out of the question. It must be declined; civilly, no doubt, but pointedly—and Miss Hardwicke must have her lesson.

Meanwhile, the servant, putting her own interpretation on the ring, brought the lamp; so that when Miss Hardwicke came back, she found the room lighted.

The two ladies now, for the first time, beheld each other clearly. Miss Hardwicke, laying a somewhat bulky parcel on the table, saw before her a pale, slender, dignified woman, with sharply cut features and dark hair streaked with grey; a woman who might have been as young as forty-five or as old as fifty, and whose eyes, like her son's, were deep and earnest. Lady De Benham, scanning her visitor with a curiosity not wholly friendly, saw and acknowledged that rare imperial beauty of which she had already heard so much.

Miss Hardwicke opened the parcel, and a large, soiled, shabby-looking bundle of some kind of scarlet twill emerged from the paper wrappings. This piece of scarlet twill measured about three yards in length, and six inches in width at the broadest part. It terminated in a point at one end; was ornamented at the other end by a little white cross upon a ground of dark blue; and was almost cut in two about halfway along by a great, ragged, semicircular rent, like a bite snapped out by a shark.

"It is the pennant of the Stormy Petrel," said Miss Hardwicke. "Here, you see, is where a cannon-shot went through it, just before the accident happened. I thought you might like to keep it, in memory of your son's adventure."

A flush of pleasure rose to Lady De Benham's pallid cheek. She spread the pennant out, and examined it eagerly.

"It is indeed a relic," she said, "and a very precious one! Miss Hardwicke, how am I to thank you enough?"

It was not a thaw now; it was a sudden breaking up of the ice. Had Miss Hardwicke been one whit less unapproachable (for even while she was making this great effort to lay aside her habitual haughtiness, she was still unapproachable), Lady De Benham would have taken her in her arms and kissed her.

"Pray do not thank me at all," said Miss Hardwicke. "My brother went down to see the vessel at Liverpool, when she first came into port; and he brought me home this pennant as a curiosity. I thought it would be something more than a curiosity to you, and that you had a better right to it than myself."

And then she took her leave. Lady De Benham went with her to the parlour door.

"I do not make visits, Miss Hardwicke," she said. "I go nowhere. But I hope you will come and see me again."

To this Miss Hardwicke replied, very gracefully, that such permission, coming from Lady De Benham, was a privilege; and, besides saying so, she looked as if she thought it—which pleased Lady De Benham so much that she pressed her guest's hand quite cordially at parting.

The next morning, when De Benham came home, the first thing he saw was the old red pennant suspended over the chimney-piece. His mother hastened to tell him what flag it was, whence it came, and all the story of her interview with Miss Hardwicke.

"And how do you like her, Mutter?" he asked, when the tale was told.

"My son," said Lady De Benham, "I think she is charming."

CHAPTER LV.—A MOMENTOUS QUESTION.

"If, my lord, you are determined to go"

"I am determined to go," said De Benham.

"At no matter what cost of health"

"At all costs."

"Then I am willing to fall in with your proposal. You can, if you desire it, become part proprietor of the Stormy Petrel, and equal partner with myself in the risks and profits of all future expeditions."

"That is well."

It was the evening of the day of De Benham's return from Hampton. He had, that very afternoon, been lying upon his bed in an almost fainting state for more than two hours; but, rallying by sheer force of will, had risen and dressed in time to keep his appointment at Strathellan House. He was now sitting face to face with Mr. Hardwicke, in a huge easy chair before the dining-room fire. They had dined; and Miss Hardwicke had withdrawn, leaving her brother and his guest to their business conference and their wine. The decanters stood within reach, and Mr. Hardwicke occasionally helped himself to a glass of port; but De Benham's glass stood by untasted.

"DEBENHAM'S VOW."

"How soon, my lord, shall you be prepared to go?" asked the merchant.

"How soon, positively, will the Stormy Petrel be ready to start?"

"My agent says in about a week—that letter was written on Monday, and to-day is Thursday. For 'about a week,' read ten days. To ten days add ten more for stowage. Say roundly, she will be ready to drop down the Mersey this day three weeks."

De Benham paused to consider.

"I should be unwilling to leave England," he said, "before these matters which I am negotiating in Monmouthshire are concluded."

"If they are not concluded by that time," said Mr. Hardwicke, "the vessel can wait a week longer."

"I should hope it will all be settled in three weeks," replied De Benham. And then he sighed, and lay back wearily in his chair.

Mr. Hardwicke looked at him.

"I think," he said, "a man should be in robust health to venture upon such arduous and exciting work."

De Benham sat up directly.

"That means that you think me looking ill," he said. "But I am not ill. I am naturally pale. I was never anything but pale. How strange it is that every one will have it I am ill!"

And by the very way that he changed his position; by the very way he answered; to say nothing of his wasted features and the purple hollows round his eyes, it was plainly to be seen how ill he was.

"You have been ill, my lord, and you look as if you had been ill," replied Mr. Hardwicke, gently; "and I am sure you would do better to wait for the spring. Better still, perhaps, to give up blockade-running altogether."

"Give up blockade-running altogether! Why should I do that?"

"Because you are too good for the work. A man of your lordship's abilities, if you will permit me to say so, is thrown away upon pursuits which would prosper as well in inferior hands."

"But I think I have already explained to you, Mr. Hardwicke, that I want money."

"True; but there are other paths—other resources . . ."

"Where should I find any path by following which I could make sixty thousand pounds in seven months? You told me yourself, Mr. Hardwicke, only the day before yesterday, that you knew of none."

"I think, my lord, I said there were 'few' occupations so immediately profitable—I should have been in error to say there were none. Larger sums than sixty thousand pounds have been made on the Stock Exchange in a single day."

"Ay, and in a single night at the Hom-burg tables. No, no, Mr. Hardwicke, blockade-runner though I be, I'm not a gambler in that sense."

"Well, there is yet another lottery," said Mr. Hardwicke, hesitatingly.

"And that is . . ."

"Marriage."

"Marriage!"

"Yes, my lord—marriage. You are young. You have talents, accomplishments, personal advantages, a title. What woman of fortune would refuse you?"

"What! sell myself to age and ugliness, like Hogarth's spendthrift!" exclaimed De Benham. "Many thanks."

Mr. Hardwicke glanced at his sister's bust—the famous bust by Costoli of Florence, which stood, it may be remembered, with its background of ruby velvet drapery, at the head of the dining-room in Strathellan House.

"Wealth is not necessarily inseparable from age and ugliness," he said. "I see no reason why you should not obtain youth and beauty into the bargain."

De Benham caught the glance—detected the faint inflection of emphasis in Mr. Hardwicke's voice. He almost started in his chair as their meaning broke upon him. Then, for several seconds, there was silence. Mr. Hardwicke looked into the fire; De Benham looked at Mr. Hardwicke.

"I fear," he said at length, speaking very slowly and, as it were, reluctantly, "I fear no lady who was young, and beautiful—and rich, would feel flattered by the proposals of one whose first motive was, obviously, to improve his own fortunes."

Mr. Hardwicke coughed dubiously.

"One would scarcely so represent the matter," he said, "in making such proposals."

"Pardon me. I should place the matter in that light, and no other," replied De Benham. "I should ask the lady—supposing such a lady to be found—whether she would be willing to unite with me in rebuilding the fortunes of an ancient house; in raising up a noble castle from its ruins; in buying back lands and lordships long since alienated into the hands of strangers. And I should ask her if to do these things, and to become the mother of a renewed line of English barons, would seem to her a fit and desirable end to which to devote her life.”

“It would be a noble mission,” said Mr. Hardwicke, thoughtfully, “and one that might well tempt a woman of lofty character.”

And again his eyes strayed—this time, perhaps, involuntarily—towards the bust.

“I could not undertake to talk of love to any woman—now,” De Benham said, gloomily. “I live for this one object, and I am absorbed by it. It is my ruling passion. I have no room in my heart for a second.”

Mr. Hardwicke murmured something to the effect that marriages of esteem were oftentimes the most lastingly happy; and then silence fell upon them again, till the merchant proposed that they should go up to the drawing-room.

The hour that followed passed slowly. De Benham, with the foregoing conversation still fresh upon his mind, felt as though he were tongue-tied. His host was fidgetty and ill at ease. Only Miss Hardwicke (unconscious of this new dream of ambition in which her brother had begun to indulge) remained unembarrassed and impassive as usual. She talked, however, a little; and being asked to sing, sang one song—a mournful, majestic melody adapted to that Lament of Shelley’s, which begins “Oh, world! oh, life! oh, time!”

Claudia Hardwicke sang well—so well that even De Benham’s trained taste was satisfied—and the song she sang suited her voice and, as it were, became her; for there is a becomingness even in the choice of a song, if singers did but know it. Miss Hardwicke knew it perfectly. She would no more have condescended to an arch canzonet like Bishop’s “Love hath eyes,” or to a fiery scena like Rossi’s “Ah, rendimi,” than she would have sung a parody out of a burlesque.

So she sang this solemn, passionless melody, and De Benham listened. As the last low, rich notes died away, he held his breath and thought he should like to hear her sing a certain song that he had written to some words of Goethe’s years ago, when he was a student at Zollenstrasse. He did not, however, ask her to sing again; but when she rose from the piano, took his leave and went away.

That night he could not sleep—the next day, and for many a day after, he could not rest—for thinking of all that Mr. Hardwicke had said to him. Surely the drift of those hints was obvious and unmistakable! He might mend his fortunes with a wealthy marriage—no woman with money would refuse him—youth, beauty, and riches were not an impossible combination . . . what could this mean, unless it meant that he would do well to offer his hand and title to Claudia Hardwicke?

And then he asked himself, could he, should he, dared he, do this thing?

It would be wealth—wealth, immense and immediate. It would be the instant realisation of his dreams. It would be rest from labour. It would be to gladden his mother’s heart by never leaving her; by incurring no more perilous adventures; by cleansing himself at once and for ever from the contamination of trade. It might be even more than this. It might be, if not the saving of his life, the saving of his fine constitution.

For, steel himself as he might against the unwelcome truth, he knew, and could not help knowing, that his strength did not come back to him. Having recovered up to a certain point, he seemed unable to get beyond that point. He had even begun to suspect of late that he was growing weaker. What if he went out again with the Stormy Petrel and fell ill by the way? What if he remained an invalid for life? What if he were to die before his task was completed?

And then he reminded himself that he had vowed to complete that task at all costs. Aye, at all costs. He had already given up the woman and the art that he loved. He had already crushed back into his heart all the dearest hopes and loftiest aspirations of which that heart was capable. Why, then, should he hesitate now? Why falter before this final test? It was not, surely, more difficult to marry a woman whom he did not love, than to give up the woman whom he did love. The question was one of mere self-sacrifice, and, so far as he could see, involved no kind of injustice towards any one but himself. In such a marriage there could, at all events, be nothing dishonourable. If Miss Hardwicke was willing to marry for rank, he undoubtedly would be justified in marrying for money. It would be a fair bargain, and nothing more:—a bargain from which such words as Love and Happiness must of necessity be excluded, but in which the balance of advantages on both sides would be strictly equal.

There were days and hours when De Benham argued the subject over with himself after this fashion; but again there were times when he saw it from quite an opposite point of view; when he told himself that he had no right to make such use of his ancient name and title—that to do so would be a mere ignoble bartering of noble things—that no end, however important in itself, would justify the employment of such means.

Better, a thousand times better, that he should work on, no matter how long or how hard, and earn his riches for himself.

But then, should he ever again be strong enough to work hard? And should he be able to earn enough for his purpose? Supposing the American Civil War to come suddenly to an end, there would be an end also to blockade-running, and to profits at the rate of twelve hundred per cent. And then, again, all this money, if he indeed succeeded in earning it, would have to be made in trade; and to devote himself to trade for life would surely be as bad, if not worse, than to sell himself to a City heiress for her money.

Sometimes he asked himself if he could by any means bring himself to love Claudia Hardwicke; but his heart answered that question only too promptly. Claudia Hardwicke, with all her splendid beauty, was haughty, unloveable, unsympathetic. Her nature, he felt certain, had in it none of the tenderness of woman. She was cold through and through. He could admire her in a certain critical, dispassionate way, as he might admire a fine statue. He could live with her on terms of mutual respect and courtesy. But he could never love her.

Love, love, love! Ah, folly! What had he now to do with love? Had he not dreamt that dream, and waked from it, long since? Had he not, like Paul Fleming, "laid the golden goblet gently down, knowing that he should behold it no more?" The question now was how best to keep his vow; how to restore in his own person and the persons of his descendants, the ancient glories of his house; how to become, in anything like the full sense of the phrase, De Benham of Benhampton.

For a whole week he kept aloof from Prior's Walk, from the Hardwicks, from Archie, from every one; for a whole week he pondered thus, now arguing upon the one side and now upon the other, till his thoughts were weary of travelling round and round the one perplexing topic. Yet at the close of the week he was still asking himself what he should do, and was still vainly trying to arrive at some conclusion.

On the morning of the eighth day, however, while he was yet in this painful state of indecision, he received two letters, one of which was from a certain Mr. Morley Durrant, an architect, whom he had sent down to Benhampton to look over the ruins a day or two before; and the other from his solicitors, Messrs. Balfour and Black, of Bedford Row, Bloomsbury. De Benham read the lawyers' letter first. It ran thus:—

“Thursday, Feb. —, 1862.

“MY LORD,—Our junior partner, Mr. E. Black, has this day returned from Monmouth, having made a careful examination of the papers contained in the ancient chest mentioned by your lordship; and more especially of those deeds and charters which concern such portion of the Benhampton estates as passed, in 1856, into the hands of the late Mr. Matthew Bowstead.

“It appears, as one result of Mr. E. Black's investigations, that the landed property of the De Benham family could not, at one time, have extended over less than 60,000 statute acres. In other words, they must have owned nearly one-sixth part of the whole county of Monmouth, besides certain minor outlying fiefs and demesnes in the adjoining counties of Brecknockshire and Herefordshire. Of these lands, some now form integral portions of various private estates, and some have devolved to the Crown. Some also lie within the boundaries of the Forest of Dean.

“That part of the estate which was purchased from Colonel Smithson by the late Mr. Matthew Bowstead in 1856, consists of only 720 acres, 400 of which would seem to have been originally park-land, but which have been brought into cultivation within the last seventeen or eighteen years. For these 720 acres the trustees and executors of the said Matthew Bowstead require £50 per acre; in all, £36,000 sterling. Having compared this demand with the average value of land in that part of the country, we are of opinion that the price is excessive. The soil is, for the most part, light, poor, and hilly; whereas a tract of comparatively rich and fertile soil in the adjacent valley was, as we are credibly informed, sold not long since at £33 per acre. Knowing, however, that your lordship is influenced by a special interest in the choice of this locality, the trustees of the late Matthew Bowstead, acting in the interests of their wards and under the advice of their solicitors, seem disposed to exact an outside price, and will not, we fear, be induced to abate their demand. That is to say, they would probably not refuse £35,000, should you authorise us to offer that sum; but even this appears to be doubtful.

“Awaiting your lordship's further instructions, we remain

“Your lordship's obedient servants,

The second letter may also be given in full.

“Thursday, Feb. —, 1862,
Victoria St., Westminster.

“MY LORD,—I have, in accordance with your wish, visited the ruins of Benhampton Castle. I spent the greater part of two days upon the spot; but it would require weeks of such study to construct anything like an accurate plan of the edifice as it may have appeared a hundred and fifty, or two hundred years ago.

“For the work of the restorer, my lord, is a work of time and of infinite patience. He must disinter buried fragments, search among weeds, scrape away moss, and make the most of every scrap of cornice or moulding that lichen may have preserved or ivy held together. These trifles, indeed, are often his only guides in the reproduction of important details.

“Still, by means of even this cursory glance, I have learned sufficient to be able to answer some of your lordship's questions, and to offer a few practical suggestions.

“1. In reply to your inquiry as to the probable cost of restoring Benhampton Castle in its integrity, I have to say that no building of that extent and style could possibly be restored throughout for less than £130,000 or £150,000.

“2. It is by no means necessary to restore the whole edifice. Your lordship might restore only such portions of it as would be suitable for the purposes of a modern residence.

“3. It is for yourself to limit the expense of restoration. If you will specify the sum you are disposed to devote to this work, it will then be in my power to lay before you an estimate of what may be done for that sum.

“4. I am of opinion that for an outlay of about £25,000 your lordship might repair the keep and restore three sides of the first quadrangle, including the banqueting hall; and that such restorations might with great propriety be carried out in that more richly developed style of the period of Edward the Third which is known as the Decorated, or Early Perpendicular.

“5. That to leave the remaining quadrangles, the kitchen, outer walls, &c., &c., in their present condition would, I conceive, be no disfigurement to the place as a residence, but would, on the contrary, contribute largely to the beauty and picturesqueness of the whole.

“I have the honour to be, my lord,

“Yours respectfully,

“H. MORLEY DURRANT.”

These letters were delivered to De Benham as he sat at breakfast on the morning of that eighth day. He read them both twice—the first time very quickly, the second time very slowly; then folded them in silence and put them carefully into his pocket-book. His mother, observing his grave and troubled look, watched him anxiously, but said nothing. Presently he pushed his cup aside, and, muttering something about business in the City, snatched up his hat and went out.

But he did not go to the City. He turned his face westward, and, walking doggedly on and on for the greater part of an hour, never stopped till he came to the Regent's Park.

Here, finding an unoccupied bench in a quiet corner somewhat away from the frequented paths, he sat down, leaned his elbows on his knees and his face upon his hands, and fell into a gloomy reverie.

It was a brilliant morning towards the latter half of February, when the sunshine had already some warmth in it, and the air, though fresh, was not positively cold. And there was a pleasant look of spring about the grass and the budding trees, and even about the children and the nursemaids. But De Benham saw none of this. He scarcely felt the warmth of the sunshine. He scarcely heard the babble of the children on the broad walk a little distance off. His thoughts were dark and solitary, and all else seemed of the same complexion.

For these letters had hit him hard—especially that letter from his solicitors. He was almost bewildered by it, just at first. It upset all his calculations; it disarranged all his plans; it disappointed him bitterly. He had long since framed his own estimate of what this purchase would cost him. He knew the ordinary price of land in and about Benhampton; and he knew that this particular soil was poor and profitless—that parts of it, in fact, were so stony and barren as to be little better than waste. In short, he had made up his mind that Farmer Bowstead's property might be bought in for about twenty-five pounds per acre. Fifteen thousand pounds—eighteen thousand—even twenty thousand, if need be, he was prepared to spend for it; but thirty-six thousand . . .

It was more than half of all that he had earned. It was more than, in the present state of his affairs, he could as yet actually lay his hand upon and call his own. It was an immense sum. And for this immense sum what should he get? A ruin, a stone-quarry, a few miserable cottages, and seven hundred and twenty acres of the worst land in the county.

A mere remnant, after all, of the Benhampton estates; yet, remnant as it was, he must buy it. Even on these exorbitant terms, he must buy it. The old place was too precious, his vow was too sacred, to leave him any alternative. The opportunity would never come back again—never—never. He must buy it, cost what it might.

Then came other considerations. That he should be content to stop at this point was impossible. He might close with Matthew Bowstead's executors; he might partially restore the castle; but when all this was done, should he be content? Other waifs and strays of the old domains would doubtless fall vacant from time to time. How should he feel if, when they did so fall vacant, he found himself without means to purchase them?

And yet, unless his health and strength came back to him, unless he could again amass money, and go on amassing money, he must be utterly without those means. Nay, more—he must be without means, or income, or resources of any kind. He must be just a farmer, as Matthew Bowstead was a farmer, existing on the produce of this one poor farm. He must live a miserable, anomalous, contracted life—such a life as no man in his senses could seriously contemplate for a moment.

Well, there was yet another way. He might give up that cherished dream of restoration; build a modest residence in a corner of the ruins; invest the rest of his capital; and live the life of a quiet country gentleman. But of all the paths open to him, that was precisely the one path he disliked the most. Merely to possess the place would be nothing, if he could not rebuild it. How should he endure to watch the work of ruin going on from year to year? Or how should he bear to patch, and prop, and trim, unable to do more than arrest the progress of decay?

Thus he pondered. Thus he questioned himself. Thus an hour—two hours—two hours and a half went by. And all this time, far down below the shifting current of his thoughts, there ran a conscious undercurrent of other thoughts, other questionings, other misgivings—an undercurrent swift, and silent, and steady, which was gradually carrying all before it.

"There is no other way," he said at last, having read his letters through again, for the fourth or fifth time. "There is no other way. It is my fate."

When Temple De Benham said these words (and whether he actually spoke them aloud, or only uttered them in the silence of his own soul, matters nothing), he had made up his mind that he would marry Claudia Hardwicke.

CHAPTER LVI.—MISS HARDWICKE'S OFFERS.

MISS HARDWICKE'S matrimonial chances had been neither few nor far between. She could not have counted them, indeed, upon the fingers of both hands. But then, she was not only very rich and very handsome, but she had reigned in her brother's house ever since her education was finished, and so, necessarily, had seen much society. If ever woman was certain to be bored with offers, that woman was Claudia Hardwicke. It had been going on now for seven years. She left Madame de Fleury's pension in the Faubourg St. Germain at eighteen, and that was just seven years ago. The curious in such matters may hence compute what was Miss Hardwicke's age in this year of grace, 1862.

During these seven years, then, her opportunities of marriage had been frequent; but those opportunities were not to her taste, and she had embraced none of them. A German banker, a fashionable physician lately knighted, a Q.C., a wealthy ship-builder, a younger son of a baronet, a City rector, a Scotch M.P., a Taxing Master in Chancery, and some three or four substantial merchants, had all striven for the prize in turn, and been rejected. Rumour began at last to whisper that Miss Hardwicke was too fastidious, and that she would die an old maid.

The lady, however, was fond of her own way; fond also, in her own way, of her brother Josiah; fond, above all else, of her liberty. From this last she was resolved never to part, unless . . . well, unless in exchange for something still more precious. Possibly for love; still more probably for position.

For with all her pride and all her coldness, Claudia Hardwicke had sometimes dreamed of love. The world believed her to be as inaccessible as her own marble portrait; but she was not of the world's opinion. She believed, on the contrary, that it was in her to love very profoundly; but then the man whom she could so love must be one whom she should be able to recognise for her master. He need be neither rich, nor handsome, nor even amiable; but he must be of high birth and high courage, resolute, ambitious, a thorough man, and a thorough gentleman. Were such an one to invite her to become his wife, Miss Hardwicke told herself that she could love him with a very deep and enduring love; but then she also told herself that no such man would ever cross her path.

Putting love out of the question, however, Miss Hardwicke was accessible on the side of position. Great rank would at any time have been a sore temptation to her; but great rank had not fallen in her way. With all her offers, she had never yet had the chance of a title, save in the one instance of the fashionable physician, whose knight-hood was, in her eyes, simply contemptible.

Hence it was all the more curious that the opportunity should at last present itself under a twofold aspect. In a word, that Claudia Hardwicke should, in the course of one and the same day, have two coronets at her feet.

De Benham, as we have seen, sat and pondered long before he came to his resolve; but having come to that resolve, he rose and went his way; for it was his nature to decide and do—to pass at once from meditation to action. "If 'twere well 'twere done," he was fond of quoting, "then 'twere well it were done quickly." And to-day, having told himself it should be done, he determined that it should, indeed, be done quickly. So he hurried home, dressed (not without some scorn of his own solicitude in the matter of gloves and cravat), and presented himself at Strathellan House at about three o'clock in the afternoon.

He found Miss Hardwicke at home and alone, in her hat and habit, having just come in from a late ride.

As soon as the first commonplaces had been exchanged, the conversation began to flag.

"Have you seen my brother this morning?" asked Miss Hardwicke, after a pause.

To which De Benham replied that he had not been down to Prior's Walk for more than a week. And then there was silence again.

Miss Hardwicke took off her gloves, laid her hat aside, trifled with her whip, and began to wonder when her visitor would go away.

Presently De Benham spoke again.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Hardwicke," he said, "for being so dull."

The lady smiled.

"I thought your silence quite brilliant," she replied.

"A man is silent either because he has nothing to say, or because he has too much. The latter is my case. I have a great deal to say, and I do not know where to begin."

Miss Hardwicke looked up with the very faintest gleam of surprise upon her face, but said nothing. De Benham, leaning forward, and looking into his hat as if the words were written there and he was reading them, went on in a grave, deliberative voice.

"My object in coming here to-day," he said, "may be stated in very few words. I come to tell you precisely what my position is—what my prospects are . . . and to ask if you will be my wife."

He paused; not as if for a reply, but as if weighing every word that he had yet to say. As for Miss Hardwicke, she sat unmoved; absorbed apparently in the setting of her whip-handle. Perhaps a slight tinge of colour may have come into her cheeks for one moment; but if so, it was gone again directly.

"I am painfully sensible," De Benham continued, "of my own presumption. I know full well for how much I am asking; and I know how little I have to offer in return. These two things only—an honourable name and a handful of barren acres. No more, and no less. As for love, Miss Hardwicke, I have no right to name the word to you upon so short an acquaintance. I think you would be offended with me—and justly—if I did. Besides, although I am still quite young, adversity and anxiety have done much to age me. So much, that I doubt if I could now be what the world calls 'in love.' But—but I admire you; if I may be forgiven for saying what others have said to you so often. I admire you very much. I should be proud to call you my wife. And I think I should make you a good husband."

Having got thus far, he paused again.

"This is a compliment, Lord De Benham, for which I was not prepared," said Miss Hardwicke, feeling that she must at last say something.

"It is no compliment—at least, not in that sense. Whether it is any compliment to suppose, as I have supposed, that a woman who is young, beautiful, and wealthy, may be willing to sacrifice herself for an idea, is another matter."

"To sacrifice herself for an idea!" repeated Miss Hardwicke. "I do not understand you."

"I am anxious that you should understand me very exactly. Have you patience to listen to a long story?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Then I will inflict my family history upon you."

And with this, De Benham proceeded to sketch, in as few words as he could, the rise and progress of his people from Geoffry the Crusader to himself. He told how for long centuries the De Benhams had gone on heaping up riches and accumulating land; then how those riches had been squandered and those lands alienated; how his own father, heir to little more than a pile of ancestral mortgages, was finally ruined at college by an unprincipled associate; how he, Temple, brought up in ignorance of these facts, had struggled on through a youth of extreme poverty, obeying the natural bent of his genius, and dreaming only of music; how, since he came to know the truth, he had given up his whole soul to the one great end; how, in pursuit of that end, he had perilled, and was ready again to peril, life and limb, health, home, and all that made life other than mere "labour and sorrow."

"And it is this toil, Miss Hardwicke," he said, "that I ask you to share. Most men could offer you a happier lot—would protest more—promise more—tell you (and I am sure, truly) that your riches did not weigh with them by the balance of a feather. I, on the contrary, begin by avowing that money is essential to my purpose; that it would be impossible for me to marry without money—and I ask you, quite honestly and plainly, whether you can make my ambition your ambition, my task your task. Whether, in a word, you can be content to devote yourself to this unattractive work of raising up an ancient house from, as it were, the very dust of time—of rescuing an honourable name from perhaps total extinction, and of transmitting it to play its part for good or ill in the future history of the world."

"I do not think it an unattractive work," said Miss Hardwicke, somewhat slowly.

"I feared it must be unattractive to every one but myself."

"I do not see why."

"Well, because the motive, in the first place, is intensely personal. In the second place, because the world does not readily sympathise with the sterner passions—with pride, ambition, jealousy, revenge. Now it seems to me that of all the forms that either pride or ambition may take, family pride and family ambition are just those which provoke the promptest antagonism."

"It is true that we sympathise more heartily with misfortune."

"Ay; with the patient Ulysses, rather than the proud Achilles. But the all-important point now is, not whether I may command the world's sympathy, but if I may hope for yours."

Miss Hardwicke looked troubled.

"Lord De Benham," she said, "I scarcely know how to answer you. You must give me ten minutes for consideration."

"Ten days, Miss Hardwicke, if you please."

"No. If I considered any matter for ten days, I should never arrive at any conclusion. Ten minutes will be enough."

"Shall I go down into the library for that time?"

"If you will."

"And not come back till you send for me."

"I will not send for you. I will go round the flower garden, past the library windows, and you can join me."

De Benham rose, bowed, and turned away. At the door he hesitated and looked back. He felt as if he ought to say something more—something becoming in a suitor whose fate yet trembled in the balance. But, somehow, the words did not come easily.

"I hope," he said, "that you will try to—to think favourably of my proposal."

And with this he left the room. As he crossed the hall, he saw, through the inner glass doors, a gentleman alighting from his horse. The gentleman flung his reins to a gardener, and De Benham recognised Lord Stockbridge. Glad to escape unseen, he then shut himself into the library and, with most unloverlike composure, took a book from the shelves and a seat by the fire. The ten minutes, he knew, would now be expanded most probably into thirty; but he could wait. He could wait with perfect patience; and he could read; and he could enjoy what he read. While his own mind yet wavered, he was restless enough; but now that he had placed his fate in Miss Hardwicke's hands he was agitated by no apprehensions, fluttered by no hopes. He should know her decision soon enough in any case, and, whatever it might be, he would make the best of it.

So he sat by the library fire, and read. The book was the second volume of Clough's "Plutarch," and the life at which he opened it, was the life of Cato the Elder.

In the meanwhile Miss Hardwicke, instead of considering whether or not she should become Lady De Benham, found herself called upon to receive Lord Stockbridge—Lord Stockbridge miraculously gloved, booted, and cravated, with a camellia in his button hole; somewhat red in the face, however, from much tightening about the waist. He had, as usual, plenty to say, chatting glibly about the weather, the foreign news, the winter opera, last night's debates, and the like. Miss Hardwicke answered in monosyllables, waiting till he should rise and take his leave.

He did rise presently—not to take his leave, but to change his seat. And the seat for which he changed it was the one that De Benham had just been occupying.

Miss Hardwicke knew directly what was coming. Perhaps she guessed it because that particular chair stood nearer the sofa on which she was sitting; perhaps the coincidence of place suggested the coincidence of purpose; but, at all events, she felt at once that Lord Stockbridge was then and there about to say the thing which she had known to be impending for a long time past.

And at the same instant she felt that she must, if possible, prevent him from carrying his design into effect.

"I am sorry to seem discourteous, Lord Stockbridge," she said, looking at her watch, "but I have an appointment; and, at this moment, a person waiting to see me."

"Let the person wait a few moments longer, my dear lady," he replied, with emprossement. "I have half-a-dozen words to say to you which—which, egad! I've been screwing up my courage to say for so long, that if I don't do it now . . ."

"I think, as a rule, that things which need so much effort are best left unsaid," interposed Miss Hardwicke.

"Sometimes. Not always. Not in this instance. The truth is—I've had it on my mind ever since that Sunday when I brought Lady Chetwynd's card; and that—let me see—that is seven or eight months ago . . ."

"I am quite sure it is best left unsaid, Lord Stockbridge, whatever it may be," repeated Miss Hardwicke, with great earnestness.

"You do not, surely, forbid me to speak!"

"No; I entreat."

"But, egad! . . ."

"Nay, I know that it would be kind, and friendly, and—flattering. I am quite sure of that."

Lord Stockbridge looked down, frowning; and a dark flush came into his face.

"You do not give me credit, I presume, for—for loving you," he said, presently.

"I desire to retain your friendship, as I hope you will not reject mine."

"Friendship!" he repeated, very bitterly. "Pshaw! I ask for bread, and you give me a stone."

"But friendship is a precious stone—a diamond of purest water."

Lord Stockbridge got up with an air of impatience, and went over to the window.

"That's a mere façon de parler," he said, almost angrily. "I want you—you, Claudia—yourself. Not your friendship. You have been told, I suppose, that I'm a spendthrift . . . Well, I am. You have been told that I am nearly double your age . . . Well, perhaps I am. But what of this or of that? I have been a poor man all my life—forced to live upon the future—had the education and tastes of a gentleman . . . what could I do, egad! but get into debt? But do you suppose that I got into debt because I liked it? Do you think I would have hampered myself with those confounded Jews, if I could have helped it? No, no, Miss Hardwicke—not I. Then as to age . . . why, good heavens! I'm in my prime—as bold a seat in the saddle, as steady a hand on a cue or a trigger as you'll find between this and St. Petersburg!"

"Indeed, Lord Stockbridge . . ."

"No, no—pray let me speak. A man has a right to be heard, no matter how slender his chance may be. Unless, indeed, the lady is already promised to another; and that, I think, is not the case."

"No—I am still free."

"Then how can I help hoping? You are free, and I love you. Miss Hardwicke, I have no words to tell you how much I love you! There isn't a man living who'd do more to please you, if he had the chance. I'd go round the world for you. And as for money—well, I know, of course, that you have money; and you know that I have debts. But I don't know the extent of your fortune—neither, egad! do I know the extent of my debts! But I should wish to do all that was honourable, and—and liberal. Upon my soul, Miss Hardwicke, I can't believe that you mean to be obdurate."

"Obdurate is not the word, Lord Stockbridge. I do not love you, and I do not feel that I ever should love you. That is not obduracy. It is the simple truth—which, believe me, I would fain have avoided to put before you."

Lord Stockbridge bit his lip—took a turn across the room—came back to the charge.

"But there is another side to this question," he said. "Love is not the only consideration. Position is something. Rank is something. The Earldom of Stockbridge . . ."

Miss Hardwicke rose from her seat.

"No more, my lord," she said, with great dignity. "No more, I entreat. It becomes neither you to urge, nor me to listen. I cannot accept your hand. It is impossible; but I thank you for the compliment you pay me, and I beg you to let all be as if this conversation had never taken place. I undertake to forget it, if you will do the same."

He shook his head.

"No," he said, gloomily. "I can't forget it—because I can't forget you."

And then he took up his hat.

"Perhaps, if I were to wait—to persevere . . ."

"No—it would be useless."

"Your decision is final?"

"My decision is final."

Lord Stockbridge stood for a moment, looking half angry, half mortified, as if uncertain upon what terms to part from her.

Then, as if conquering himself, he said, with an effort:—"Miss Hardwicke, you have my best wishes for your future happiness;"—bowed low over her extended hand—touched it lightly with his lips—and left the room.

Miss Hardwicke went to the window, and, hidden by the curtain, watched her rejected suitor mount and ride away.

Marry him! She felt she could not have married him if he had been a royal duke. And yet . . . and yet, strange to say, there was a time, not long since, when she would have hesitated to refuse him. Nay, when she almost surely would not have refused him. But to-day . . . how was it that she had never observed that bloated, dissipated look—the lines about his eyes and mouth? Miss Hardwicke shuddered to think that if he had asked her a week or two before, she would most likely have accepted him. And then she put on her hat, gathered up the skirt of her habit, and went quickly down into the garden.

De Benham, about half-way through the "Life of Cato the Elder," saw her pass the window, restored the volume to its place, and went out.

"I am ashamed," she said, "to have left you alone so long. My visitor would not go."

"I was ready, and am still ready, to wait as long as you please," replied De Benham.

And having said this, he paused. He scarcely knew what to say next. It was like having to make his offer over again.

"I am almost afraid," he said presently, "to ask my fate."

A something—an indefinable something which was neither tenderness, nor enthusiasm, but a sort of momentary elevation of expression—came into Miss Hardwicke's face.

"We will restore the glories of Benhampton," she said, looking at him.

De Benham took her hand, as Lord Stockbridge had taken it, and bowed over it, as Lord Stockbridge had bowed over it; but he bowed over it without kissing it.

After this, they walked for some time to and fro among the wintry paths and flowerless parterres, talking, not as lovers talk who have just plighted their faith to each other, but of the castle and lands, of the proposed restorations, of Messrs. Balfour and Black, and of Mr. Morley Durrant.

When they parted, however, the diamond that had once been Senator Shirley's sparkled on the third finger of Miss Hardwicke's left hand. Did De Benham, as he placed it there, remember that other ring, to procure which he and Archie had walked into Monmouth one summer morning, not yet two years ago—the loving promises that went with that simple gift—the modest hopes of which it was the pledge—the sunny hours—the sweet idyllic time—the poetry and passion of first love?

CHAPTER LVII.—THE SOONER THE BETTER.

THE next few days went by in such a whirl of business, of visiting, of hand-shaking, congratulating, and letter-writing, that De Benham found no leisure to think of either the life he had left behind him, or the future that lay before him. But he had no desire now to think at all. He told himself that the time for reflection was past, and that the time for action was come. So, his road once chosen and lying straight before him, he pushed on with an eager and feverish haste that would have been natural enough in most men, but was all unlike that steady resolution with which he was wont to pursue his purposes. He hurried his lawyers in their negotiations about Benhampton; he pressed the architect for his plans and estimates; he set on foot such proceedings as were needful to establish his claim to the peerage and enable him to take his seat in the House. Irritable, impatient, restless, he seemed to grudge every day, to be jealous of every hour, that stood between him and the fulfilment of his projects. It was as the conduct of a man who measures his strength against Time, and fears that Time will beat him.

One important point, however, was soon gained. He became master of Benhampton as soon as he made up his mind to pay the price required. He had heard much of the procrastination of the law; but in this instance there was no procrastination. He was surprised, indeed, to find how rapidly it was possible for an estate to change hands, and with how little formality Benhampton became his. Messrs. Balfour and Black tendered £35,000 on behalf of their client. Messrs. Clint and Wall, of Monmouth, accepted the same on behalf of the trustees, executors, and heirs of the late Matthew Bowstead. Mr. E. Black, Junior, went down to Monmouth with the money, and came back with the title-deeds; and the affair was concluded. It seemed to De Benham that he bought the old place as easily as he might have gone into a shop and bought a pair of gloves.

In the meanwhile, it was no small relief to find that the two persons most nearly connected with Miss Hardwicke and himself were favourable to the marriage. His mother had been agreeably surprised in the lady at their first interview; was not altogether insensible to the advantages of wealth; and so, on the whole, approved De Benham's choice. In a beautiful and dignified woman with £250,000 for her fortune, some inferiority of birth, she admitted, might be tolerated. Above all, her son would now run no more blockades, go hither and thither upon no man's errands, accept no man's pay. That De Benham should wash his hands clean of the contamination of trade, and live at home in health and ease, was more now to his mother than any other consideration upon earth. As for Mr. Hardwicke—conscious of his own share in the transaction, and secretly bubbling over with self-satisfaction—he was in the seventh heaven of gratified ambition.

"Claudia has been more to me than a sister," he said, when De Benham called upon him the next morning at Prior's Walk. "She has been a friend—a friend of whose abilities I have the highest opinion; for whose character I have the utmost respect. I am fully sensible of the honour of this alliance—proud, indeed, to be in my own person connected with so ancient and noble a house; but my sister is no ordinary woman, and if your lordship were Emperor of all the Russias, I should not deem Claudia Hardwicke unworthy of your hand."

"If I were Emperor of all the Russias, Mr. Hardwicke," replied De Benham, "I should consider myself singularly fortunate—as I do now."

Mr. Hardwicke bowed.

"I should never covet rank for myself," he said. "To know that my signature is respected from Prior's Walk to the remotest dependency of the British Empire, contents my ambition. But I confess I should have been disappointed if my sister had married a commoner."

"Nature ordained Miss Hardwicke to adorn a coronet," De Benham replied, with a somewhat forced politeness.

"Just so. And yours, my lord, is not the only coronet that might have been hers."

"Indeed! Then I am so much the more favoured."

Mr. Hardwicke bowed again. He would fain have told De Benham that that other coronet was an earl's; but he magnanimously forebore.

"I hope Miss Hardwicke will consent to name an early day," said De Benham.

"I am no friend to long engagements," replied the merchant.

"We shall not differ, I think, in the matter of settlements," pursued De Benham. "The estate, of course, must be entailed; but I should gladly see a large proportion of your sister's fortune tied up for her own benefit and that of her younger children. At the same time, I am anxious to add as much as possible to the estate itself, which consists at present of little more than enough for a good-sized park."

"You would wish to invest the greater part of Claudia's money in land, to be inherited by her eldest son?"

"That is my meaning."

"Nothing could be more just, my lord; or more judicious."

"I only hope," said De Benham, "that Miss Hardwicke will consent to make my term of probation as short as possible."

"Still, you want some little time to become better acquainted."

"I do not think so. People never really know each other before marriage. Both Miss Hardwicke and myself are somewhat reserved in our dispositions, and I believe should be no better acquainted at the end of three years than at the end of three weeks."

Mr. Hardwicke smiled, but said nothing.

"I want you to intercede for me," said De Benham.

"Ah, no! That is a matter in which I dare not meddle. However, my lord, you must not be too impatient."

"I cannot help being impatient," replied De Benham gloomily.

"But ladies do not like to be hurried into matrimony. And, indeed, they are entitled to their fair share of courtship, for it is the pleasantest phase of a woman's life."

De Benham looked down, and gnawed his moustache in silence.

"Let me be frank with you, Mr. Hardwicke," he said. "It is not in me to write sonnets to my mistress's eyebrow. I am a prosaic suitor, and I don't feel that I shall make much way in Miss Hardwicke's affections until our lives and interests are one. Believe me, the sooner we marry the better and happier it will be for both. Besides I—I am not very strong. I am over-worked, and I suppose I am over-anxious. If your sister would take compassion upon me, and put me out of suspense . . ."

"She has done that, I conceive, in accepting you," interposed Mr. Hardwicke.

"To some extent. But, in truth, I want change of air—of scene—of ideas."

"It seems to me that you have never given yourself time to get over that fever," said

Mr. Hardwicke. "And then, besides the fever, you were wounded."

"Oh, the wound was nothing! But, as you say, I have been too busy to take care of myself."

"Yet, the other day you would not admit that you were ill."

"I am not ill; I am only weak and exhausted. If, however, I could prevail upon Miss Hardwicke to put up with me at once, we might go abroad for the whole spring and summer, leaving the workpeople in possession of Benhampton. It would be a good deed, Mr. Hardwicke; for I shall never get better while I stay in London."

"Represent your case to my sister in that light, my lord, and you can scarcely fail of success."

With this they shook hands, and parted.

That afternoon, Lady De Benham did a thing she had not done since the early years of her married life. She paid a visit. She dressed herself in her best black, sent to the nearest livery-stables for a brougham, and called upon Miss Hardwicke. Miss Hardwicke, surprised and touched by this unexpected courtesy on the part of one who, as she well knew, rarely crossed the threshold of her own house, went through the interview very gracefully; so that Lady De Benham, having kissed her on the brow and bade God bless her with some solemnity at parting, went home more than ever impressed in her favour.

"We must return the visit to-morrow, Claudia," said Mr. Hardwicke, when he came back, an hour or two later, from the City. "I will leave the office early, on purpose. And we must invite her to dinner on Friday or Saturday."

"She will not come," replied Miss Hardwicke.

"Not if we beg her to fix her own day, and offer to send the carriage for her?"

"We can beg her to fix her own day, but I am sure we must not offer to send the carriage."

"You mean it would look like a liberty."

"I mean that Lady De Benham is—Lady De Benham. You will understand the full force of that definition when you have seen her."

"Is he at all like her?"

"A little, perhaps; but not much."

"I asked him up to dine to-night, but he had an appointment with his architect at eight, and could not come. He is not one of those who let the grass grow under their feet, Claudia."

"I have yet to discover Lord De Benham's faults of character," said Miss Hardwicke, faintly smiling; "but I suppose want of energy is not one of them."

"He looks ill," observed her brother, after a pause. "I have told him so again and again, and he has always denied that he felt ill till to-day. He admits now that he wants rest and change of air."

Miss Hardwicke looked up, but said nothing.

"He wants you to marry him at once," continued the merchant.

"Indeed!" said Miss Hardwicke, coldly.

"He says, if you would consent to take him now, and go abroad for the spring and summer, he should get well. He can never gain strength in London."

And then, forgetting all about his determination not to meddle, Mr. Hardwicke set to work to plead De Benham's cause far more roundly and energetically than De Benham would have ventured to plead it for himself.

"He has instructed you to say all this, I presume?" said she, presently.

"He—he begged me to intercede for him," Mr. Hardwicke admitted.

The lady smiled, somewhat disdainfully.

"You are an excellent advocate, Josiah," she said; "but you have forgotten to urge the strongest reason of all."

"What is that?"

"Money. Lord De Benham, you observe, dares not embark in any great outlay until he has command of my fortune. Nay, it is so, indeed. He told me himself that it was so. He has dealt with me candidly."

"Then, shall you consent?"

Miss Hardwicke paused before replying.

"I have accepted Lord De Benham," she said at length, speaking very slowly, "intending to make his aims my aims, and his interests my interests. Whatever I know to be essential to those aims and interests, I will do."

"Magnanimously said, my dear Claudia!"

"But he must speak for himself."

"Oh, undoubtedly!"

And then Mr. Hardwicke, with his pompous, old-fashioned air, but with much real feeling also, took his sister's hand, and said:—

"I believe from my heart that he is worthy of you, Claudia. Business, you know, is not a bad test; and in the way of business I have tested this young man thoroughly. He is upright, punctual, scrupulously just, the very soul of honour."

"In one word—a gentleman."

"Just that. I do think, my dear sister, that he will make you happy."

Miss Hardwicke looked at him affectionately, but somewhat sadly.

"For how many years you have made my happiness your first care, Josiah!" she said. "But there is the dressing bell—we must get ready for dinner."

CHAPTER LVIII.—DE BENHAM MAKES HIS WILL.

It was done, now—done, and past recall. For the first day or two after his engagement to Miss Hardwicke, De Benham felt as if he were walking in his sleep. In a few minutes, with a few words, he had achieved the purpose of his life. He had desired riches; and great riches were now to be his. He had vowed to buy back Benhampton; and Benhampton was already his. All that he had willed, he had done. All that he had touched had turned to gold. He was as a traveller who, before he dreams that half his work is done, finds himself on a sudden at the mountain-top with the landscape at his feet. He stands breathless. He can scarcely believe that there is not another height to scale. He is almost sorry that the peak is gained so soon, and the excitement already over.

So De Benham found himself all at once at the summit of his ambition—asked himself if it were not all a dream—sighed to think that the heat of the battle was over, and the victory won after so brief a struggle.

In the meanwhile, society pronounced him to be the happiest and most fortunate of men, and took every opportunity of telling him so. Of all those, however, upon whom the duty of congratulation devolved, there was not one, perhaps, who fulfilled that duty more heartily than Archibald Blyth. He was even more delighted than Mr. Hardwicke; but then he had his own most exquisite reasons for being so. He was charmed that his cousin should enrich his friend. He was equally charmed that his friend should ennoble his cousin. And he was well pleased that De Benham and he should become connections through this marriage. But above all, he rejoiced in the fact of the marriage itself—in that which it would go to prove—in that which might result from it, when proved.

If De Benham, he argued, had indeed dismissed from his heart all that love which he once professed for Juliet Alleyne, was it not well that she should know it beyond doubt? Was it not well that the evidence should be as decisive as possible? That she still loved him, and lived upon the memory of that love, was only too certain; but would she permit herself so to think of him, and so to dwell upon the past, if he were married to another? Would she not then feel that it was her duty to forget him? Would she not then set herself to root up those memories, and cast them out, no matter at what cost of tears and sorrow? And when she had done this—but not one hour sooner—might there not . . . (it was an anxious question, and one that Archie asked himself very often in these days) . . . might there not possibly come some faint dawning of hope for himself?

Waiting, and wondering, and hoping thus, it was no marvel that he hailed the news of De Benham's engagement with delight, and longed to hear the music of his marriage bells.

"It was the very match I made for you in my own mind, years ago," said he. "I used to think you'd be a celebrated composer, with perhaps a scrap of red ribbon in your button-hole; and that Claudia would fall in love with your fame, and you with her beauty. I remember telling you so, one day—but you didn't take kindly to the notion."

It was the afternoon of the first Sunday following the engagement, and De Benham had gone to tell the news to Archie in his lodgings in Great Ormond Street. De Benham, who complained of being tired, was lying on the sofa, making a very small cigarette last as long as possible—pretending to smoke, in fact. Archie, in dressing-gown and slippers, was sitting in front of the fire, puffing away vigorously at the Turk's head pipe.

"You said you'd as soon marry Lady Macbeth or the Minerva Medici," he added, finding that De Benham made no reply.

"Then I hope you rebuked me as I deserved for speaking so of a lady who is your cousin."

"Ah—I suppose I had no business to remind you of it, now that she is to be your wife. But, you see, I don't quite realise it yet—it's all so new and wonderful. However, I ought to be getting used to surprises by this time."

"I hope your surprises have been pleasant ones," said De Benham.

"Why, yes—for the most part. It was an uncommonly pleasant surprise the other day, when old Josiah handed me that cheque for five hundred pounds; just after he had raised my salary, too. And as for your news just now, it is pleasanter still. I can't tell you how glad I am. But your turning out to be a lord was the greatest surprise of all. I've not got over that yet."

"But there is nothing for you to get over, Archie," said De Benham, smiling. "I shall never be a lord to you."

Archie shook his head.

"You can't help it," he replied.

"I can help it, if you can. We are friends, comrades, brothers. We have shared too many perils and too many pleasures to let a mere word stand between us now. What difference can it make to you whether I am a lord or a commoner?"

Again Archie shook his head.

"It makes a great difference to you," he said, "and therefore it cannot but make a difference to me. Here are you, a nobleman—soon a very rich nobleman—living in a big castle—keeping lots of servants—visiting heaps of fine people—as much a petty sovereign as that Grand Duke of yours over in Germany. Here am I—a clerk in a merchant's office—a frequenter of omnibus roofs, river-steamers, and half-price plays—a fellow who never had twenty pounds to spare in his life till a few days ago, and is now rich with five hundred. How can you and I be equal any longer?"

De Benham threw away his cigarette, and sat up.

"That is all quite true, for the world in general," he said. "But it must not be true for you and me. You are my only friend, and I don't mean to let you go. Besides, are you not to be my cousin?"

"That fact won't go far towards the leveling of social distinctions," said Archie, comically. "The deuce a bit of equality have I ever got out of my cousinship with the Hardwickses."

"I should like to see you married and happy, Archie," said De Benham, suddenly.

"Married?"

"Ay—if you could find a girl to your liking. But I have never known you fancy any one, except Janet Ashby."

Archie felt very guilty and embarrassed.

"Janet Ashby's as nice as possible," he said; "but I've never thought of her since. Besides, I don't mean to marry till I can afford a good home. Love in lodgings, with the quarter's allowance always running short, and a bone of cold mutton in the cupboard, is not the sort of thing I prefer."

"You must be better off, no doubt; and have some little capital to start with. What are you going to do with your five hundred pounds?"

"Put it in the bank, of course."

"Will you lend it to me instead?"

Archie jumped up; unlocked an old-fashioned bureau in which he kept all sorts of treasures, letters, pipes, tobacco, stationery, bills, and so forth, and brought out a little bundle of crisp, clean, Bank of England notes.

"There!" he said, smoothing them out upon the table. "There they are—ten fifties. I haven't touched a penny of them."

De Benham put them in his pocket-book.

"I shall invest this money for you in my share of the Stormy Petrel," he said; "and, I hope, double it twice over."

"I hoped you wanted it for yourself—for the work at Benhampton!" exclaimed Archie reproachfully.

"It amounts to the same thing. I shall have five hundred more for Benhampton if I have five hundred less for speculation."

"But suppose the Stormy Petrel comes to grief again?"

"You shall not be a loser. I made certain you would let me have the money, and that I should be able to quadruple it; so I brought this receipt, ready filled in, for two thousand—thus ensuring you against loss if anything happens to the ship or to me."

"I can't take it," said Archie, flushing crimson. "You're as generous as a prince, Lord De Benham; but, indeed, I cannot take it."

"For heaven's sake, old friend, don't call me by that name, or I shall think I have offended you."

Archie protested that he was not offended; that he was, on the contrary, obliged and grateful; but that he would by no means accept an acknowledgment for fifteen hundred pounds in excess of the sum lawfully his own.

De Benham looked pained.

"Ah, well!" he said wearily, "then I must find some other way."

And he rose to go.

"When is the wedding to come off?" asked Archie, following De Benham down the stairs.

"Very soon, I hope. Perhaps, some time next month. You will be my best man, old fellow?"

"Of course, if you wish it," replied Archie.

And so they shook hands, and parted, and the door closed between them.

Then De Benham stood still for a moment, and sighed, and pressed his hand to his side, as if in pain. He had seen Archie very seldom of late—not oftener than once or twice since the dinner party at Strathellan House—and if there was any difference in his friend's manner towards himself on those occasions, he had been too much occupied to observe it. But to-day he saw the difference, and felt it keenly. He felt that an invisible barrier had risen up between Archie and himself. He felt that they shook hands, as it were, across a gulf; and that the old, pleasant freedom of their intercourse was gone. But why should it be gone? And whence this sense of restraint? He was not conscious of having done, or said, anything to estrange his friend. He knew of nothing but the inequality of their rank which could in any way account for the change.

And then he told himself, very bitterly, that this friendship which he had so prized, which he had thought to hold fast by, and take comfort in, all his life, must go with the rest. It was a part of the price he had to pay. And what a heavy price it was! First his art, then his love, then his freedom, now his friend. What more had he to resign—except his life?

Thinking thus and walking very slowly, De Benham found himself at the corner of Queen Square, face to face with the captain of the Stormy Petrel, then on his way to bid Archie good-bye, and on the point of starting next day for Liverpool.

"I was intending to call upon you, my lord, to-morrow morning," he said. And then, like the rest, he began to offer his congratulations.

But De Benham was in no mood to be congratulated.

"I would fain have taken another trip with you first," he said. "I would fain once more have felt my foot on the deck and the spray in my face, as the Stormy Petrel dashed over Charleston Bar."

The Cornishman smiled.

"You'll be better off, I'm thinking," he replied, "in your seat in the House of Lords."

"I shall often remember you, Captain Hay, wherever I may be."

"Remember us, my lord, when your wedding bells are ringing; and fancy that maybe we are running away at that very moment, with the Yankees at our heels. Good-bye. I wish you joy—you and your beautiful bride."

"And I wish you all prosperity and good fortune."

So they parted—never, as it happened, to meet again. Captain Frank Hay dropped down the Mersey next day with the Stormy Petrel, accompanied by a new supercargo in the person of Onesiphorus Knott, a nephew of the trusty Timothy. From Liverpool they steamed straight for the Bahamas, taking Nassau, as before, for their point of departure. The blockade of Charleston harbour had now, however, become so stringent that, having achieved one successful run, the captain of the Stormy Petrel found it expedient to shift his head-quarters to St. George's, Bermuda, and make Wilmington the scene of his subsequent operations. This he continued to do for a period of sixteen months, during which he carried his little vessel nine times triumphantly in and out of Wilmington; so running the blockade of that port no less than eighteen times. On the tenth occasion, however, his good luck deserted him. He left St. George's on the 24th of July, 1863, and having made all the way from the Bermudas to the mouth of Cape Fear River in safety, was at the last moment caught sight of and hotly pursued by two Federal steamers. In this strait, the pilot in charge of the Stormy Petrel made a desperate dash for a certain channel between two of the sand islets scattered about this part of the coast, shaved the shore too closely, and ran the boat aground. The American commanders then took possession, and the Stormy Petrel became once again a prize. But this time no recapture was possible. The Northerners remembered the famous story too well for that, and took care to keep what they had caught. Carried into New York harbour, the Stormy Petrel was there confiscated, refitted, mounted with a couple of heavy guns, converted into a blockader, and sent to join the squadron off Charleston. Being continued in this service at various points along the coast till the close of the war, the little craft was then sold off, together with a number of other government vessels, and became the property of a Boston firm. She was then re-converted into a trader, despatched to the coast of California for the sale of an assorted cargo and the purchase of hides, and is at this present time (1869) cruising, under the name of the Pottawatomy, between Santa Barbara and San Francisco.

As for Captain Frank Hay and his crew, they underwent the semblance of a trial at New York, and obtained their liberty within a few days. The men, confident of high wages and immediate service, went straight to Nassau, which post continued to the last to be the main rendezvous for blockade-runners. But their captain had saved money, and was tired of the work. He resolved to give himself a few months' holiday ashore, and started upon a tour of the Northern States. In the course of this tour he caught a severe cold, and died quite suddenly from inflammation of the lungs at a little village within hearing of the Falls of Niagara. So ended a brave man and a skilful sailor. It is due to his memory to add that the Stormy Petrel, while in his hands, proved a gold mine to her owners. De Benham, a partner now in the speculation, staked several thousands, and in the course of those sixteen months doubled his venture ten times over. Archie's modest peculium being slipped in with the rest, increased and multiplied according to the same ratio. As for Mr. Hardwicke's gains, they were whispered of in Prior's Walk as having amounted to something fabulous; but upon this point the merchant chose to keep his own counsel; and for once, not even Mr. Timothy Knott was allowed to be wiser than his fellows.

The strict sequence of events has been departed from in the narration of these facts; but, being narrated, they are now dismissed, and these pages will know the Stormy Petrel no more.

In the meanwhile De Benham went home, thinking of Archie and trying, as he had said he would, to find "some other way." He dined that day with his mother; spent an hour of the evening at Strathellan House; and afterwards sat late into the night, drawing up a rough draft of his will. Till now, he had never thought to make a will. He had been content that Lady De Benham should inherit all he had to leave, in case he died unmarried. But his thoughts had been gloomy of late, and there was a strange yearning at his heart to be helpful towards Archie, and to show remembrance to some two or three whom he had known and liked in the old college days at Zollenstrasse.

There were Franz Kielmann and his maiden—simple, kindly pair; passing rich with a Kapellmeistership of some thirty pounds a year. There was one Reichardt, a wild, fiery lad—a student of painting—whose passionate dream was Italy, and whom De Benham remembered as a free scholar, poorer even than himself. Above all, there was Archie—Archie who had borne with him in all his moods; nursed him in sickness; rejoiced with him in health. And then there was Juliet Alleyne A pang of remorse wrung his heart when he thought of her. For the first time, he asked himself if she had suffered—if she had forgiven him—if she was happy? And then, remembering how unlikely it was that Mr. Alleyne should deny himself any indulgence for her sake, De Benham added her name to the list, and told himself that it was at least his duty to protect her against poverty. Ay, against poverty. That was all he could now do for the woman he had once so dearly loved.

Once! Was it indeed but once? Was that love really dead, and buried, and gone for ever? Or was it dead and buried only as the grain found in Egyptian pyramids, which, being restored to the sweet influences of the living earth, germinates, and blossoms, and bears fruit after three thousand years of sepulture?

This was a terrible question. A terrible question to rise up before him like a ghost, now that his hand and honour were pledged, and his life given away! De Benham, sitting alone in the silence of night, with one small reading-lamp casting a circle of vivid light on the papers before him, and the fire burning low, and all the room in shadow, saw before his mind's eye a sudden picture of his life as it might have been—peaceful, contented, obscure, “full of love, and the happy faces of children.” But he saw it too late—too late!

And then there came upon him a heavy sense of loss and desolation—a strange spasm of self-mistrust—a feeling as if that which he had achieved at the cost of so much sacrifice, was all in vain

He moaned aloud. He covered his face with his hands. For the first time in many years, he wept. One by one, the bitter tears trickled out between his fingers and blotted the page on which her name was written. But presently the strong will re-asserted itself. He sat up, brushed his hand across his eyes, and went on writing.

While he was doing these things, however,—thinking of and for others with that strange, impersonal kind of tenderness that belongs to the act of giving for the last time—there was one anxious heart whose only thought was for him; one loving ear waiting for his footstep on the stairs, counting the quarters and half-hours as they dragged by. How could his mother rest, if he were not resting also?

Still De Benham wrote on, little dreaming of the shadow that crept down more than once to crouch against his door and listen to the rapid travelling of his pen—little dreaming of the wakeful, faithful love that was about him “in the dead waste and middle of the night.”

VI.—THE NORTHAMPTON SHOEMAKER.

PARLIAMENT never meets now on the banks of the Nene; the University of Northampton long ago lived out its little day; but Northampton was famous for its leather manufactures hundreds of years ago, and it is famous for them still. Throughout the good town, indeed, there is a piquant blending of the present and the past. Two railways minister to its wants, and yet a good many of its streets—roadway and footpath alike—are paved with ankle-wrenching round pebbles, and in some places the grass grows green between the stones. (This old-fashioned style of pavement, I am inclined to think, from its effect on my own boot-soles, is kept up to foster the local demand for the town's staple manufacture.)

Northampton has modern meeting-houses, but it also holds the one in which Dr. Doddridge used to preach. It has a splendid new Town Hall, with polished granite pillars, and sharply cut shields, statues, cornices; and it has also remains of the old Norman castle, which the Conqueror's baronial blacksmith built, cropping out of the ground like brown iron-ore. Modern red-brick shoe-factories stud the town; pleasant red and white brick little private residences, with tiny, trim lawns, dazzlingly spangled with parterres of pœcil bedding-out plants, fringe the town; and it contains as well quaint old St. Peter's Church, and picturesquely mellowed and mottled brown St. Sepulchre's—one of the four Templar churches still extant in England. In spite of later spire and aisles which have grown on to it, the round model of the Holy Sepulchre still bulges out, plainly perceptible above the green-mounded graveyard with almost every weather-stained stone askew.

The soldier who is walking in the tree-shaded churchyard, as meditatively as Hervey (who was educated at the Northampton Grammar School), has 22 upon his cap; others of the same regiment are lounging in their shirt-sleeves at the open barrack-windows, or strolling into the town in jauntily adjusted white belts and freshly-brushed red shell-jackets. A detachment of the 17th Lancers, billeted in the town en route for Edinburgh, are clanking their spurs upon its pavement, superciliously brushing past their shorter infantry brethren; lolling at tavern-doors; pipe-claying their gauntlets, covering their trencher-topped helmets with newspaper, grooming their horses, and shoeing the Queen's steeds—if Simon de St. Liz, who built the castle, were still alive, he would have to get that done for them—in old-fashioned tavern-yards. These modern warriors, no doubt, are every bit as brave as fighters of the olden time (did not the 17th devour the ground in the front of the madly magnificent Balaklava charge?); but, seeing them at Northampton, one cannot help letting one's thoughts wander back to the thousands of old-world Englishmen slain hard by in the wars of the Roses.

In Billing Road there is a white Infirmary, founded in 1747; and in St. John's Lane there is a dusky, time-gnawn Hospital of that ilk, founded in 1170. Sheep Street, Cow Lane, are racy names that tell of times when Northampton, like the American Boston, was laid out by cattle. Bearward Street, too, has an old smack about it—thereabouts Bruin used to be baited. Narrow Toe Lane is a title that “talks shop” in a town of shoemakers, and Quart Pot Lane tells of proclivities which the present race of Northampton leather-workers have, doubtless, inherited from their far-off ancestors who made the town famous for its leather-bottles.

The Northampton Mercury was started by Diceys one hundred and fifty years ago, and it is owned by Diceys still.* The town-crier in red plush waistcoat and breeches, drab gaiters, and gilt-banded hat, who intones with painful conscientiousness like an old-fashioned rector nagged into Ritualism by a domineering curate of advanced views, is not exactly an antique; but he reminds one somehow, when he rings his bell in the diamond-paved “Drapery,” of the Northampton parish clerk who got Cowper to write verses for his bills of mortality—those obsolescent authorities for Life Assurance.

There is an old-fashioned town fool, also, who is abominably tormented by the youthful snobidæ; the cruel young scamps varying their amusement by supplying him with ammunition, when they have worked him into a towering rage, to pelt their fellows with.

The dress of the Northampton charity-boys is another thing that strikes a stranger as telling of the past. Here come a couple: one with a waistcoat far redder than a robin's breast blazing out of his blue coat; the other in knee-breeches, blue swallow-tail, with strawberry-ice-coloured cuffs, and muffin-cap and stockings of the same hue. Charity costumes everywhere seem droll to those not used to them, but this particoloured youngster has a specially comical aspect as he dances along, quite unconscious of the effect which his light-hosed spindle-shanks are producing.

Altogether, St. Crispin's favourite shrine in England is a quaintly piquant place to wander about in. Its old churches and houses of mottled brown and cream-coloured Kingston stone are so oddly blended with two- and three- and four-floored new brick shoe-factories, with trim villakins, and new streets running, bramble-blocked, into corn-fields, or up to the scarped banks of meadows. Pallid men, stubbly-chinned, and smudged as to the cheeks and apron like a lodging-house slavey blackleading a grate, are loafing about at every corner. Ditto men and boys, and untidy women and girls, are “going to shop,” with bagfuls and faggots of boots and shoes, and soleless “uppers.” The women-folk seem to toil along under the heaviest loads. The Northampton shoemaker, I am told, too often makes his wife his beast of burden. Sometimes he has the good excuse that he can go on working whilst she is carrying his work “to shop;” but he does not always go on working, and the Northampton cord-waineress does not possess the power of the purse, like the far-heavier-load-carrying Scotch fish-wife.

Besides those indicated, there are not at first, to a stranger's apprehension, any outward and visible signs of the town's specialty; but he soon gets to understand the meaning of the ubiquitous undertaker-like tap-tapping that he hears almost constantly as he passes along a good many of the streets; he sees shoemakers and shoemakeresses at work in dingy ground-floor rooms and at open upper windows; he notices “Riveters' Entrance,” &c., painted on the finger-rubbed doors of the many-windowed factories which might be taken for little cotton mills.

Let us apply for permission (sure to be given, very courteously, together with pilotage) to go over one of the largest of these concerns—such, say, as Messrs. Turner Brothers, or Mr. Manfield's, in Campbell Square. The first impression produced is one of the queer contrasts that there are in the cord-wainer's trade. The cobbler, cramped in his cupboard-like stall, belongs to it, and so does this firm, which employs four hundred hands on, and four times as many off, the premises. In one long room, five rows of clickers, with pale faces and dirty aprons, with a pent-house or brief upper skirt of leather at the waist, are cutting out on wooden slabs, and blocks like butchers', all kinds of women's materials; in another tougher men's materials are being manipulated. When cut, the uppers are rolled up, placed in ticketed baskets, and sent up to operatives in other parts of the premises, or away to outside hands. A boot or shoe often goes out in this way twice before it is finished, and stacked in the drying-room heated by steam-pipes. Down below there is the puff of steam; wheels whirl, bands run round and round, machinery clanks. Soles and heels and "split-lifts" are being punched out by iron frames that come down upon the leather with a thud, and when punched, slide down shoots into the bin-like receptacles beneath. These lads are pricking holes for the riveters by the aid of a machine; that old man is passing leather, to harden it, between steam-turned rollers. It is curious to note the difference between hand-work and machine-work. Close by a sole-cutting machine a young man or two are cutting up odds and ends of leather into soles by hand. Although they have the aid of machinery to press the leather on the shape, it is almost ludicrous to remark how few they make in comparison with the machine. Up and down, in and out, we wander, stumbling over great sheets and rolls of leather. Soles and heels are garnered in great pigeon-holes. Shaped leather of all sorts is arranged on shelves in ticketed baskets—looking like wine waiting for delivery. Cistern-like tin-lined cases, inner-lined with brown paper, are gaping for their loads. Here is a pile of boots done up in pairs in white and green tissue-paper; there a pyramid of bright pink boxes, each holding a dozen pairs. Yonder there is a heap of dark-green paper knapsacks, banded with red tape, each full of the omnipresent boots and shoes. It wearies one to look at them, packed, stacked everywhere, and drooping in groves of thousands. One feels compelled to walk in fancy the miles that they will traverse with feet in them when scattered all over the world. Here the patent-leather tops of boots for South American gallopers over the Pampas are being eyeleted; there the same style of boot is being polished on trees that bulge out or collapse at the touch of a treadle. Specially gay and graceful are the women's boots intended for Spanish-American countries; sky-blue, with a golden star on the instep; mauve; golden-bronze, like a butterfly's wing; green, with a sheen like a drake's neck; pink, yellow, and black, with coquettish little ankle-tassels. Close by are shoes for New Zealand servant-girls—that look as if their wearers would never need a second pair; and not far off, as substantial-seeming sea-boots for Newfoundland cod-fishers. In an adjoining room there is an "infinite variety"—a dazzling variety—of many-coloured babies' shoes, varying in price from 5*d.* up to 3*s.* Shoe-leather seems a queer thing to get sentimental about; but, surrounded by shoes that are waiting for wearers in all quarters of the globe—for hundreds of dimpled, rosy little feet that have not yet begun to make "mad capers on the mother's lap"—one cannot help feeling a shoe-warehouse to be as solemn, and even sadder, than a churchyard: in the churchyard the trouble of this life, at any rate, is over; in the warehouse one thinks of it as still carking, and to come.

"And what is the value of Northampton's export of shoes?"

"A million sterling per annum would be a low estimate," is the answer.

"And what are the average wages of the hands?"

"Oh, it is almost impossible to strike an average. Some of mine—a very few—make £3 a week; more make £2; but I dare say a good many do not make more than 12*s.* It depends entirely on the man himself."

What I may call a middleman manufacturer—one who takes work from the large manufacturers and employs boys and girls to do it—is good enough to say that, if I like to come, I can look over his place. Although he employs some seventy hands, the middleman wears an apron, and carries work backwards and forwards in a basket on his shoulder. "No," he chuckles, when I ask him whether there have been any strikes lately in Northampton. "We've done striking, I think. The strike against the machines gave us a lesson, I fancy—drove the trade to Leicester and Stafford, and half ruined Northampton. But we're going again now—p'raps trade's a bit slack just at present—but we've got the trade back, and there'll be no more strikes, I reckon." The strike referred to was an epoch in Northampton's history. Waggon's were converted into platforms on which indignant orators consigned the machines, verbally, to perdition; those who worked them were hooted through the streets as "scabs;" but machinery triumphed, and shoemaking still employs the bulk of the labouring population of Northampton.

The middleman's factory is a three-floored brick building, window-lighted on both sides. On the ground-floor the paste-boys work, earning from 3s. to 4s. a week. The two upper floors are given up to the girls. In each room there is a row of about a dozen "machinists"—young women from seventeen to twenty odd, some of them with chignons like small pumpkins—working "uppers" on Howe and Singer sewing-machines, and earning from 9s. to 18s. a week. The little girls who sit on the floor in the middle of the room, with baskets beside them, are "knot-tiers." They earn from 1s. 6d. to 3s. by picking out and knotting the ends of the machinists' threads. At a long dresser-like counter on the other side of the room stand a row of "fitters," girls of an age intermediate between the machinists and the knot-tiers, and earning the intermediate wages of from 7s. to 12s. a week. The ceaseless ticking of the sewing machines, the pummeling the fitters give the uppers they are fitting to the lasts, and what I must be ungallant enough to call the "clatter" which is an almost necessary consequence of feminine foregrounding, combine to make those upper rooms remind one of the parrot-house in Regent's Park. The working hours are from seven to twelve a.m.; and from one to six p.m. Such of the children as come under the Factory Act are sent to school in batches. Here, as well as I believe at the larger factories, work ceases at two on Saturday afternoons—a boon which the Northampton operatives highly and jealously prize, and the holidays given amount to about four clear days in the year.

In one of the new streets ending abruptly in a little precipice of scarped meadow, the Northampton Industrial Boot and Shoe Manufacturing Society (Limited) has recently built itself a commodious factory. Wandering about in it, I find the manager in red shirt and apron, and with hands that show he does his full share of the factory's work. He leads the way into a little board-room, furnished with a common table and hard wooden-bottomed chairs. The Association plainly means business, and squanders no money on luxuries for directors. It counts one hundred members, sixty of whom work for the factory—ten on the premises. When asked as to the society's success, the manager replies, with a quiet smile, "Our last balance-sheet will be the best answer to that," and produces the document. It shows that goods to the value of about £4,370 have been sold during the half-year (material costing £2,260), and that nearly £1,500 have been paid in wages to members and non-members.

"The nett profits for the half-year amount to £246 2s. 9½d., which the committee of management recommend to be apportioned in the following manner, viz.:—an addition of ten per cent. to the reserve fund, and a bonus of 1s. 9d. in the £1 on both capital and wages, after providing for one bad debt, amounting to £27, leaving a balance of £13 2s. 8½d. to be carried forward to the next account."

The co-operative principle has also been applied to distribution in Northampton, and the stores which have been opened for the sale of groceries, &c., are said to do a very fair business.

A word or two, in conclusion, on the general out-of-business character of the Northampton shoemaker. When thousands of people are concerned, it is almost impossible to draw a typical portrait of the class without giving just offence to hundreds of its members whom the sketch does not merely not flatter, but positively maligns. I will, therefore, not attempt to draw such a portrait. There is many an intelligent, temperate, industrious, frugal, generally moral Northampton shoemaker; but I am afraid there are many more shoemakers in Northampton to whom such attributes could only be ascribed in most satirical irony. Those who make a profession of religion are about equally divided between the Church and Nonconformity. There is a large sprinkling of "Free-thinkers" amongst the shoemakers: some of them sensible, earnest men, whose scepticism is preferable to a good many men's so-called "belief,"—sceptics who doubt because they love the Truth, instead of professing to believe because they are too lazy to trouble themselves as to what they say they believe. But others, unfairly slumped in the same class with those just described, are shallow-pated, blatant coxcombs, who love the sound of their own voice, more especially when it is saying something which they think will wound the feelings of those who are generally considered more reputable members of society than themselves. These empty parroters of exploded sneers at religion sometimes get put down amusingly by orthodox members of their own order when elocutionising al fresco. Northampton has what may be called two public parks, looking out upon the green grassland, golden cornfields, dusky wood, and winding water, with which the slope of the red, yellow, brown, white town, here and there bristled with tall chimney-stalks, is begirt. These are the rough race-course, sacred to the Pytchley Hunt performances in race-time; during the rest of the year given up to cows, kite-fliers, cricketers, and strollers; and the Cow Meadow, bordered on one side by the locked cut which renders the Nene navigable there for its long, low, slow, man-poled, woman-steered barges, and on the other two sides of the irregular triangle, by a most pleasant Alameda of over-arching trees, known as the New Walk, or Victoria Promenade. In both these recreation-grounds there are benches, and on these the aforesaid blatant bodies are fond of perching themselves on Sundays, and spouting out their second-hand, seventieth-hand, "scepticism," until extinguished by the aforesaid orthodox.

My previous protest against type-founding being borne in mind, I must, however, say that if I were cornered, and compelled to state my candid opinion as to the "religion" of a very large section of the Northampton shoemakers, I should be forced to follow the example of the English tourist, who put down under that head in a continental travellers' book (with honestly veridicent personal reference) "Beer." A large proportion of the Northampton shoemakers struck me, during my recent visit to them, as being decided members of the Alcoholic Persuasion. I met them mooning about, unshorn, unkempt—a condition in which too many of them remain on the day on which they need not work—with filmy eyes, which showed that they had gone, in their own more expressive than elegant or euphonious phrase, upon "the fuddle." I met them staggering, "looking as wise as owls." I met them capering far more idiotically than the town-idiot. I saw them sparring—one with his apron down, and the other with his apron hastily rolled up around his waist—and then suddenly knocking off knocking each other, and amicably nodding their heads together, as if they had quite forgotten that they had been trying to blacken each other's eyes, and give each other a bloody nose, two seconds before. I saw them embracing a lamp-post with one arm, holding a beer-mug in the other hand, and gazing into futurity and the opposite gutter, with faces utterly discharged of all expression except blankly blasé indifference, at rare intervals varied by a sluggish streak—like a flash of forked lightning modelled in dough or putty—of deep depression. It is, I am informed, "the thing" with the Northampton shoemaker to take what he calls a "Sunday-Monday:" id est, he works on Sunday, that he may have the more to "lush on" on Monday.

Bearward Street, already mentioned; Harding Street; Spring Lane, with stagnant duck-weeded water at its foot; Compton Street, the very unaristocratic namesake of the local earl; Scarletwell Street, so called because its well used to be supposed to supply water peculiarly adapted for scarlet-dyeing (never touching the local lymph, a good many of the residents in the neighbourhood manage to dye their faces scarlet); and Crispin Street, are the most fashionable quarters of the cordwainers' colony, a part of the town which is almost solely peopled by shoemakers and their purveyors. Neatly built, but yet squalid, unfragrant, two-floored cottages; roadways splashed with slops, and littered with garbage; dirty children quarrelling, grubbing in the dirt, racing, squealing, squatting on the kerbstone in rows like roosting, draggle-tailed fowls; vixenish women and beery men, in and outside of low "publics," are the salient features of Snobopolis.

In one of its streets I saw a fierce young mother box her own child's ears savagely for dabbling in the mire, and then pursue and savagely drub the neighbour's child who had tempted her offspring to dabble. The neighbour's child stretched out his little legs as if he wanted to split himself when he saw his chubby playmate stuffing his dirty fists into his smeared eye-sockets; the neighbour's child had a dolefully prescient look as he did his poor little best to escape from the offended Fury, and he soon blubbered in sympathy with his playmate beneath the Fury's breath-expelling smacks.

"There, you" (something or other) "little snob," exclaimed the snob's wife—just as negroes call one another condemned niggers—when she was out of breath herself, "you come an' take my Bill down into the muck agin, will yer?"

In Scarletwell Street "St. Crispin's Arms" draw in a nearly unintermittent throng of St. Crispinites, and just opposite stands the equally patronised "Gate," with this inscription on its sign :—

"This gate hangs well, and hinders none, Refresh, and pay, and travel on."

A Mercurial Northamptonian suggests that the second line of the couplet ought to be parodied into

"Be fresh, and pay, and still stop on."

The morality of the Northampton youngsters is, I fear, only what might be expected from the ethical status of a good many of their parents. I poke about in the lowest parts of London, and, therefore, however saddened, I am not surprised when I hear anything but "praise" proceeding from the "mouths of babes and sucklings;" but in the lowest parts of London I never heard such a general superfluity of obscene naughtiness issuing from youthful lips as I heard during my stay in Northampton. After nightfall, too, on week days its noble Market Square is disgraced by scenes of juvenile depravity quite as shameless as those which ever and anon, when police supervision has grown slack, may be witnessed after church-time on Sunday evenings in the Westminster Road and Upper Street, Islington.

HOUSE-HUNTING.

IN primitive times our ancestors certainly escaped many of the disadvantages attendant upon civilisation. If Fitz-Hardaxe in former days required a house, he would either summon his vassals and build him one, or, calling all his friends together, summarily oust some less-powerful, and to him obnoxious, individual from his habitation, at the same time recompensing himself for any little trouble undergone by taking all the fixtures. Now suppose Smith wants a habitation in these degenerate days. What can he do? Were he to make a raid upon the villa of Jones, who perhaps has married the object of his affections, or in some way injured him, it is more than probable that such a proceeding would be looked upon unfavourably by the law, and though it is said possession is nine points of the law, his right of tenure would, I am afraid, prove shaky. So what does Smith do? A cold shudder comes over me as I say it—he "puts himself in the hands of a House Agent." Any of my readers who have been unfortunate enough to require to change their residence, either as young married people or middle-aged parents, will understand the dreadful significance of this phrase.

The trials and troubles that beset the wretched house-hunter then commence. His life resembles that of the Wandering Jew. He goes hither and thither; sometimes sent by the agent, sometimes tempted by a glowing advertisement, and sometimes on a false scent given him by a friend. Having been through all these stages myself, I propose giving my readers the benefit of my personal sufferings.

If inexperienced, one sets forth house-hunting in a very hopeful frame of mind, chiefly arrived at by seeing what an enormous number of houses there are in the market, and by thinking what a choice one will have. In fact, one's imagination is at this period clouded by ideal and visionary castles in the air, which one continually expects to find set down upon the earth, and compared with which the commonplace habitation one eventually is only too glad to settle down in, because in some few particulars it suits, is a very strong evidence of the downfall and futility of one's aspirations. House-hunting also leads one to distrust one's fellow-creatures. One becomes very suspicious. Everybody in any way connected with a house, or the letting of a house, appears to be in a league to deceive one. Householders, house agents, the "party in charge," old servants, and cast-off labourers, all seem combined together to afford one insufficient and contradictory information.

Again, in house-hunting you probably have to comply with the wishes and whims of a large family ; and it not unfrequently happens that through it the seed of dissension and discord is sown in the bosom of your family, each and every member having a totally diverse and distinct idea as to the kind of house "we" should like. For instance, the eldest daughter perhaps is at a romantic age, and would prefer a calm and peaceful abode apart from the busy haunts of men, not quite compatible with the grovelling but necessary calls of the tradesmen. The sons probably will prefer being near town. The mother's one idea is the suitability of furniture,—her notion being to adapt a house to the furniture,—or else depending upon the facilities for the education of her daughters, or perhaps the society of the neighbourhood. The father of the family is chiefly concerned as to whether he can get up and down to town easily, unless he has some pet hobby in the shape of choice of soil or water. Some people are very unreasonable, demanding things quite incompatible with one another. For instance, I know a man whose idea of a perfect house consists in vast woods at the back of the house, and a good pavement and a cab-stand in front.

Of course, the first thing to do before looking for your house, is to clearly make up your mind as to the sort of house you want, and to lay down certain conditions, as rules to go by in your search. This, on the face of it, appears easy ; but it is needless to say one never adheres to these rules, as in many of the houses one sees, there is sure to be some good point, which, for the time, eclipses and overbalances the bad points, and justifies any derelictions from the rules one has laid down. It is also, as I have before remarked, difficult sometimes to accommodate all the pet views of the respective members of your family, who at this period feed you with every form of Advertisement, generally meeting you with the exclamation, "Oh, do go and see this ! it's just the sort of house we want."

As one of the fundamental rules in house-hunting, I should say, Stick to your Catalogues. There is a certain proportion of deception in them which you soon master, and allow for, whereas in Advertisements there are depths of deceitful plausibility which you never fathom. Weed out all the houses in your Catalogues that appear suitable, and see them all. This, I am convinced, is the best thing to do, unless you have time to take quiet and promiscuous prowls through the districts in which you have determined to settle. Secondly, never be led away by Advertisements. Once you stray from the paths of virtue—that is, from your Catalogues—then indeed your troubles begin. I admit that Advertisements are very tempting, and that human nature is weak ; but if you only calmly reflect on the vast field of probable vexation and disappointment that you are opening up for yourself if once you relapse into poring over the Advertisements of every paper that falls into your hands, I think you will admit the justice of my maxim.

Deluded at first by the fervid and glowing descriptions you read in the papers, you begin to wish that you had not wasted so much time over your Catalogues ; but after following up a few of these El Dorados, and wasting much time and money, you find they seldom or never come up to their promise, and you fall back again upon your Catalogues. The subject of Advertisements recalls to my memory a humorous story—told me as a fact—of a man who had put his own house in agents' hands, and was looking out for another, reading an Advertisement of a house which appeared to be exactly the sort of thing he wanted. This, upon his making inquiries, turned out to be his own. Again, a literary friend of mine told me of his being much taken with a house which was advertised as having a very fine library. Now this room was the very thing he wanted, and he was more astonished than pleased on finding it to be quite detached from the house ; in fact it had been a gymnasium, and to get at it, you had to walk across the garden.

I think I ought also to warn the house-hunter against the friend who knows "just the sort of house to suit you." This invariably turns out to be either about £100 a year more than you intend giving, or about a dozen miles from a station, or else it is just let.

There are also two or three species of the genus landlord against whom I would warn my friends. There is the specious and crafty landlord, who is working a large building estate, and who has cunningly run up houses at odd corners of the estate, which the unwary house-hunter is sometimes entrapped into taking, thinking that he will not be much invaded by buildings. This kind of landlord will do almost anything to get you in as a tenant ; but before you have been there very long, you will find houses springing up like mushrooms all round you. Then, again, there is the eccentric old landlord, who has a tumble-down house to let, and who will do nothing in the shape of repairs, and who would rather see his house empty for a year than spend ten pounds upon it. Lastly, there is the tenant landlord, who has a year or two of his lease to expire, and who, having taken a house, wants to let you the remainder of his lease with a heavy premium, and a price on his fixtures sufficient to cover all expenses of his moving, &c.

I think I have now pointed out a few of the difficulties one has to meet with; to depict them all would be impossible. I will now give a few instances of the difficulties and delusions I myself experienced.

I was looking for a house within twenty miles of London; and though I have a holy horror of the class of house styled as villa, yet it was many times my lot to be so blinded by Advertisements as to be entrapped into inspecting several, under the impression that I was going to see an old house. I can recal one at the present moment, in the neighbourhood of Epsom Downs. This was described as having good gardens and shrubberies at the back and front of the house, within two miles of a station, and with fine views of Epsom Downs. Being very guileless at this period, as soon as I had digested my breakfast I rushed off to see it, dreading lest any one else should be before me with it. In fact, I remember regarding with suspicion several of my fellow-travellers, thinking they must be on the same errand as myself. When I got off the line and inquired the way to this abode, my eyes were slightly opened by being told by the man of whom I asked the way, that I must mean the "noo willa" which So-and-so had just run up. This rather staggered me, and the distance from the station also turned out a good three miles. By the way, I have invariably found that agents are not prone to exaggerate distances; that I can honestly say for them. Upon reaching my destination, I discovered the usual "villa residence." The gardens and shrubberies, back and front, consisted of two little sterile yards, with painfully straight and narrow walks and a few emaciated shrubs. The view was certainly obtainable out of one of the bedroom windows by straining one's eyes round the corner; to any one possessed of obliquity of vision it might have been easy. The Downs were also near at hand; but the house was on much lower ground. These Downs, too, I suspect, would not always be available to a resident, as I found, on crossing them to reach the station, that they were literally alive with what I thought at a distance were a gigantic species of ant, but which, on closer inspection, proved to be several hundreds of children, there being a very large asylum of some sort in the immediate neighbourhood. This, by the way, was also not mentioned in the advertisement.

There are a few forms which one has to repeat again and again in house-hunting,—such as the making inquiries as to damp, drainage, soil, poking into all sorts of holes and corners, tasting water, &c., and lastly, the saying you will "write and let them know your intentions." This last business, by the way, is not the least unpleasant. It often happens that your mind is made up from the first moment you see the house, and yet somehow or other (though all the time you are but too conscious of the deceit you are practising), you find yourself, if of the male persuasion, lacking moral courage to say plainly that you don't like the house, and that you are sure it will not suit you. It closely resembles, in fact, going into a shop and not purchasing—a meanness no man is capable of. I have been told that there is a class of house-hunters—old maids chiefly, I believe—who go about not with the slightest intention of taking a house, but merely from a morbid desire to pry into the internal economy of other people. This ghoulish sort of propensity has not possessed me yet, my leanings at present being quite the other way, and having rather a tendency to a positive dread of the inspecting of an inhabited house.

I will next endeavour to describe another delusive Advertisement which took my fancy much at the time. The house was described as an "old-fashioned brick residence, with large gardens and orchard, noble trees, a piece of water-meadow, good stabling, &c." Now I appeal to my readers who have any sentiment in their composition: Was not this enough to conjure up all sorts of rural castles in the air, and to cause delightful visions of picturesque old houses to flit across one's imagination? I went, of course, to see it, and this is the realisation: I found a crazy little, low, square, whitewashed building, in a very low position, with a dark, gloomy little garden in front, shut in by a straggling and consumptive yew hedge. At the back there was a sort of desert, terminating in a slimy little pool, to contemplate which, if bilious, and conscious of a bad balance at one's bankers, might induce suicidal intentions. There were a few weird-looking old trees; and dotted about, here and there, vestiges of what had been summer-houses and out-houses. The orchard was considerably mixed up with the garden; in fact, the description "gardens and orchard" was very apt, and the agent had been quite equal to the occasion, as one did not see where the garden began or the orchard ended. The stable was interesting, looked at as a ruin, but would have been certain death to any adventurous animal giving vent to his feelings in the shape of a good kick, as the whole affair would probably have come down about his ears. The house itself impressed one with the idea that its former tenants had not been much given to the use of soap and water, and had spent a large portion of their time in rubbing themselves against the walls, and kicking and scraping their boots on the skirting-boards, diversified by casual nail-driving in the walls, and hanging about on the door-handles. The walls upon being touched yielded a not grateful moisture; and walking on the floor gave one quite the sensation of being at sea, for they were so uneven that at one point you could almost touch the ceiling, and at another the rooms seemed a decent height. I was shown over the house by a garrulous old woman, who talked me down, insisted on my seeing everything, and, of course, told me about the inevitable "lady and gentleman who had just been, and were so pleased with everything." It is a curious coincidence, but this lady and gentleman seem to dog one's footsteps wherever one goes. I suppose they supply the place of the ambiguous "party," who is always "about the house," and whom agents hold in terrorem over the undecided house-hunter as a sort of bogey to hurry him into taking the house. I have also noticed as a peculiarity of this "party," that he is always very stern and uncompromising in demanding an answer by a certain day. The two instances I have given are, I think, fair samples of the sort of disappointment one is subject to in pursuit of a house, though in the examples I have taken the whole has been unsuitable; in many cases, there are generally two or three redeeming points which, at all events, require consideration.

There are one or two things which strike one very forcibly in exploring the suburbs of London. First, the immense amount of building there is within a radius of nearly seven miles round London; and, secondly, the fact which literally stares you in the face, that people do not mind being close to the rail, even though their position may be wanting in what one would suppose was the principal motive for their locating themselves there, viz.—contiguity to a station. It is difficult to understand how people can reconcile themselves to the noise, want of privacy, and absence of anything like retirement consequent upon being within a stone's throw of a railway. But it is done; and, moreover, you see large houses and gardens subject to the gaze of the road on one side, of the rail on another, and overlooked on the third by a battery of villa windows. Strange to say though, this does not affect the spirits of suburbandom, as one would imagine, for croquet holds its own, even on the most overlooked of croquet lawns. No doubt, what is wanting in privacy is fully atoned for in the eyes of the fair croquet-players, by the gratification afforded to their sense of propriety, which doubtless rejoices in that stern censor the public having them always under its eye, and thus checking any of those little attentions on the part of the young man of the suburb which a more secluded spot might engender.

The viewing of inhabited houses is a subject I have not touched upon. In seeing these it often happens that you have to deal with the lady of the house, who knows nothing really about the terms of letting, &c., but who insists upon pointing out to you its manifold beauties and advantages. A lady is very difficult to deal with under these circumstances. You cannot put her aside as you could a servant; and if you are a man, you feel too shamefaced to ask any really necessary questions; indeed it is well for you if you succeed in getting yourself safely landed outside the hall-door without having pledged or compromised yourself in some way or another. You will also meet with inhabited houses where the mistress will quite resent your coming, and treat you as if you had come after the spoons; refusing sometimes to hold any converse with you, and perhaps audibly telling the maid to "see that the person wipes his shoes on the mat before going up-stairs."

In conclusion, I am now going to air a notion of mine, which I think is worth a good deal to agents, but which, as a public benefactor, I do not mind imparting to them here. It is this. Were I a House Agent, I would take up an entirely novel line, and aim at furnishing my clients with really faithful and trustworthy particulars. I would classify my houses according to incomes and professions, so that, supposing for instance a professional man is in want of a house at a certain rent, and within easy access of town by rail, he should not waste time and money in seeing houses which, had he really had an accurate description of, he would never have dreamt of going to see; but, by the supervision of his agent, be put in grooves where he may reasonably look forward to an approximate realisation of his hopes. It appears to me that the simplest plan would be to have tabulated forms for each class of house, giving under such heads—as Rent, Distance from station, Water, Fixtures, Premium, &c.—really truthful and unvarnished statements.

This would save an immensity of trouble to all persons concerned, and, I am convinced, would prove a most profitable undertaking to any agent who adopted it. It is also the only method for restraining the romantic and fertile imagination of the agent whose flowery and picturesque vein soars above anything so commonplace as fact. Apropos of this, there is a story told of the late Mr. Robins, that, in advertising a certain house, he mentioned, as the only drawbacks, the noise made by the nightingales, and the litter caused by the roses shedding their leaves. I should imagine this has hardly been surpassed even in this literary age.

ALONE with Christ in this sequester'd place,
Thy sweet soul learn'd its quietude of grace.
—On sufferers waiting in this vale of ours,
Thy gifted touch was train'd to finer powers.

Therefore, when death, O Agnes ! came to thee,
Not in the cool breath of our silver sea,
But in the city hospital's hot ward,
—A gentle worker for the gentle Lord—
Proudly as men heroic ashes claim,
We ask'd to have thy fever-stricken frame,
And lay it in our grass, beside our foam,
Till Christ the Healer call His healers home.

PAMPHLETS FOR THE PEOPLE.

BY THE DEAN OF CANTERBURY.

VI.—THINGS WHICH NEED TO BE REFORMED.

IN a certain assembly, which has among Englishmen a worse name, perhaps, than it deserves, members have the right of presenting schedules of gravamina et reformanda: i.e., of grievances which they conceive ought to be redressed, and practices which they wish to see reformed.

Such a schedule this article will present to the readers of GOOD WORDS: treating of grievances which ought to be redressed, and practices which one wishes to see reformed. Both these will be rather of a miscellaneous kind: separate gravamina, hardly hanging on one to another, except perhaps by the prevalence of a general spirit of grumble, inseparable from the character of the subject.

There seems to be in our age a sad disposition to sharp practice. The plague has increased, and is increasing. Probably mere men of the world always took advantage of one another as far as public opinion would allow: but our complaint is that public opinion itself has receded many a pace, since we can remember; and that acts which would have been thought hard measure some years ago are not thought so now. We find this complaint very general. Commit a slip in word—do, or omit, some act, the presence or the absence of which gives an adversary an advantage, and in 1869, the adversary takes the advantage, enjoys its fruit to the full, smacks his lips over it, and is praised by all the world: whereas in 1839, he very likely took the advantage all the same, but the praise was silent, or very cautiously whispered. The morale of those who set the morale, has somehow gone back. How is this? Who are they that set the morale? Surely, preachers, Churchmen, the religion of the day, as expressed in uttered or printed words. Do we ask how it is that these have gone backward? Shall we not rather ask, how it is that they have not gone further back than they have? Who preaches honesty, who preaches generosity, now? Where is the testimony of ten thousand as one, to the virtues of common life? Shall we not rather say that our spoken religion has all become categorical and dog-matical, and has left life and life's feelings and spirit, to shift for themselves? And how about our printed religion? Has the character of our religious journals no connexion with this decadence in public morale? There are noble exceptions—all honour to them. But they are few and timid, because people won't read them—because people like the spice of hard dealing, and lying, and slandering,—and buy and circulate the paper, which sticks to this policy, be it on which side it may.

We hear such things as this spoken of by men of commerce. A covenant of compromise is made between two competing lines of railway. Their trains at a certain station are to be so arranged, as to overlap one another, and give time for passengers to proceed with comfort. But one of the companies so times its trains, as that it shall be impossible for the driver to arrive with punctuality, and thus manages to frustrate the covenant. Now, mark, this piece of dishonesty is perpetrated by men who probably walk to church with their wives and families: and they hold it to be lawful. There is my gravamen.

Again if there be a day fixed after which a certain advantage cannot be taken of us, one's man of business says to one, "You know, ten to one, he will let the day pass, and then we shall be all right: of course it isn't our business to tell him of that." Perhaps not. But if the same policy is to be driven on all fours, where's Christianity? From a thousand quarters we hear that its doctrine is in danger. I own it seems to me, that very much of such fear would vanish, if we looked a little better to its practice.

I will mention another instance of the matter of my gravamen, because it came under my own eye a short time ago. A "Church" paper was sent to me, containing an article on "Our Cathedrals," in which occurred the following paragraph: "We should suggest . . . that all living Deans, except perhaps Dr. Goulburn himself and Dr. Hook, should be obliged to burn everything they have written on theology. The Church would be no loser by a holocaust of the works of Stanley, Close, McNeile, Alford, and Boyd, and they themselves would show something of the same spirit as that which prompted the sorcerers of Ephesus when converted, to burn their mischievous jargon, at the cost of fifty thousand pieces of silver."

Now, I have not the slightest notion who edits, or who writes in, the paper: I never saw a copy of it before, to my knowledge.

Nor do I presume to pronounce on the affirmation which the sentence contains. It may be very true. But what I do maintain is, that here is a sample of the kind of rough dealing which unhappily now prevails. The sentence, as it stands, is simply a piece of gratuitous incivility towards men who at all events have been trying to do good, and the anonymous transmission of it is a futile attempt to give a stab in the dark.

It is this ill-conditioned behaviour of man to man which is really a serious grievance in our day. It has lowered the whole standard of relative duty. Nowadays, whenever simple justice is done by some God-fearing man, it passes for an act of extraordinary generosity: nay, it is well if the stigma of contempt be not set upon the doer as too simple for the ways of the world and the Church.

And how about this same preaching to which we have alluded? Is there any "gravamen" here?

One is really sorry to be discontented: but, Is there not a cause? We will first put it in this way. Live your Saturday in the world. Breakfast with your family: go by train to your place of business with your ordinary fellow-passengers, or with strangers: read your daily paper, take your daily cab, pass the day in your moil and toil of world's work: return; dine in company or with your family: after dinner talk, or listen to music, or play your rubber, and so to bed. Now when you look back on such a day from the top of the hill whose forward view is the possible change to another life,—the top of the hill where God's sleep will come down on you,—you see many things which need to be set right, and which might be set right: you see just the kind of things which a little good advice might serve to adjust, a few gentle words might smooth, a delicate touch of loving counsel might get into gear for good.

Well, you go into your church on Sunday morning. In the Prayers, and the Lessons, and the Litany, there is many a word pointing the right way. But somehow these don't go home, because they are matters of course. Then comes the sermon. Can it be, that we are still in this little orb with one satellite, third from the sun in our system? Or have we not somehow suddenly been transplanted into one of the sister planets? For of all the half hour's words, not five, it seems to you, have any the remotest concern with your yesterday's yearnings for improvement. The talk of men, the business of men, the recreations of men, with their falsenesses, their selfishnesses, their roughnesses, these all stand aloof from the Parson, and the Parson from them. He is altogether in another world, using another language: pounding away not unfrequently at things which not ten of his congregation attach any meaning to: things whereof the kind of significance for which he is contending passed away thirty ages ago, and the significance of which for our age, important as it is, has never occurred to him at all.

One sometimes wishes our pulpits were all levelled. When you look a man straight in the eyes, face to face, there is a sort of obligation to talk common sense to him: but from our pulpits we look down on the tops of men's heads, which we never see in common life, and the advice to preachers, "Come down from your stilts," is forgotten, while we appear so much taller than our neighbours. If they look up at us, they seem to be all attention, drinking in our words, to our great satisfaction: if they look down, they seem to be bowing to our dicta in all humility. That is a shrewd story, of the two augurs in old Rome, who passed and smiled at one another. "You know, and I know, what fudge it is!" Now mind, I am not thus speaking of any one of the great verities, which I would that we all preached and practised tenfold more than we do. But I mean to say this,—that there is many a thing said in many a sermon, that, shut the preacher into a room with an intelligent parishioner eye to eye, he daren't stick to. "You know, and I know," &c. Very well then: if you do know this; don't forget when you stand on your tower as God's watchman, that you will have to answer for the knowledge.

I wrote, "you play your rubber." It was not by accident. For here is another gravamen: and it is, concerning amusements. There is something terribly out of joint in the whole matter of our estimate of men's recreations. It is a delicate subject, but it ought to be touched, because it is one in our estimate of which justice and fairness are very much concerned. It is one, too, on which more fallacies are allowed to be used and to have weight, than perhaps on any other.

There are amusements whereon a certain ban or "taboo" has been set from which other amusements are exempted. And this sometimes altogether without reason. There is many a house where the chess-board is duly set out and honoured, but where the proposal to play a rubber at whist would be received with the utmost dismay. Mind, every family has its own habits, and has a right to reply, "We don't do this or that: it isn't the habit here." With this, no fault can be found. To this, my "gravamen" does not apply. No man is obliged to keep cards in his house: no man is debarred from a dislike to see four people setting up for themselves of an evening in an angle of his drawing-room. Nay, more; no man need be called in question for having a certain horror even of the look of those painted tablets over which so much mischief may be perpetrated, and thus having a prejudice against any game with cards at all. But all these, though I may count the last weak and unreasonable, are far removed from that of which I complain. The chess-player passes scot free: the whist-player has a mark set on him: has a hard name conferred on him: is supposed to do something derogatory from, and inconsistent with, more serious pursuits. Is this fair?

One of the stock-fallacies on this subject is to put in hideous juxtaposition the moment of relaxation, and any possible sudden and solemn check to it. To be "summoned from the card-table to the presence of a man's Maker" is supposed to designate something supremely horrible. But let none use this argument without being aware how far it will go. If those who urge it are prepared to substitute in such a sentence the words, "chess-board," "croquet-ground," "steam-boat," "railway train," "Alpine track," in a word, to use the same argument against all recreation whatsoever, well and good: we shall at least know on what ground to meet them. But if they are not prepared to do this, they have no right to the argument at all, unless they can substantiate some distinctive reason which makes it applicable to this case and not to the rest. And such a reason, I submit, does not exist.

Now I mention this example not for its own sake, but as guiding us to the general unfairness practised in the matter: the unfairness of refusing to judge according to the merits of each case; of attaching an arbitrary stigma to certain recreations, while others enjoy an equally arbitrary immunity.

But some reader says, "How about recreations for the public?" Ah, how about them indeed? for this is a matter of almost hopeless difficulty. How if on this point we apply to our excellent friend Mathew Arnold? for I do think that here he is in the right track. Culture—to issue in light and sweetness,—this I feel must come first,—and it is high time it did come,—to prepare us for anything like a solution of the all-baffling question. Perhaps he, sitting under his halo of light and in an atmosphere of sweetness, cultivating his best possible "self" among the river-side parterres, will step down, and lend a help to one whom he conceives to be swimming with the stream, but who is in reality, in this matter, beating his way through a mass of encumbering weeds. You cannot transplant recreations. You cannot revise brutalised tastes. Very delicious are those few peaches, the sole produce of your well-tended garden this unfavourable year: stored up for a Sunday dessert to the no small pride of your gardener. Put them before Charlie, as he sits up begging, like a yellow doormat set on end. Watch the afraid-to-offend would-if-I-could kind of look with which he half averts his eyes from them, and half turns them up to you. Did you ever notice a party of rustics at a school-fête or birthday-rejoicing, where decorum is the order of the day? Then you have seen the real English of Charlie's dogge-English. Change the scene—look at Charlie as he gnaws his bone in the stable yard: watch your rustics, if you can get behind a bush, in the tap of the "Do drop in." There you have the moral and the misery of the whole matter. The moral—which is the old story—

"Turn Nature out with hue and cry—She's back upon you by and by."

The misery—which is this: that though a dog is a dog, though Charlie, with his old love for his dirty bone, will keep your house, cheer your walks, "live respected and die lamented,"—on the other hand, a sot is not a man: something has made him a sot, and has been for ages about its dirty work; and something must unmake him, and make a man of him again; and how may that be done, and how many ages will that be about?

That something is culture—there can be no doubt about it. And I should like to make my excellent friend, who is the great master of culture, immortal for this purpose, and give him the necessary ages, to leaven with culture all this decomposing mass of humanity. For it is as clear to us as it is to him, that no machinery of any kind will do it: not freedom, nor increased population, nor wealth, no, nor yet religious organizations; no, nor yet education, which is only the machinery of culture, not the precious thing itself.

Perhaps we are on the way to the great end: but if so, it is God's way, not ours, and a mist rests upon it.

Somewhat akin to the difficulty of Charlie and the rustics, is that respecting mental food for the people: to be solved, also, I suspect, by nothing short of our friend's great nostrum of culture. But meantime, some deplorable mistakes are being made, and with the best possible intentions. Do we really suppose that the "masses" will buy what is offered to them as "pure literature?" Some of us remember a movement set on foot to extract all alcohol from bread, that certain worthy people might eat it without offence. The affair is understood to have gone on more or less successfully, till a knowing baker started a cart painted in large letters "Bread with the gin in it." From that time the movement was doomed. Now by all means let us provide pure literature, and the more the better: but why hang out a sign, the reading on which means for those whom it is to attract, "No fun to be had here?" Depend on it they very well know where to get "reading with the fun in it," and they will get it. If we believe that we can underwork those who retail this kind of fun, there is nothing to prevent our trying: but don't let us blow the trumpet when we do so.

However, as we begun by saying, the real remedy lies deeper, and will take much longer working.

Perhaps the dearest of all literature is the three volume novel. Let us reform the dearest, and then we may begin to re-act on the cheapest. What purity can there be in the cheapest literature, so long as the— of the dearest are so many? The shilling shelf of the railway bookstall is just the "auslese" of the one-eleven-six copies at Mudie's and Smith's: just those stories which have proved piquant enough to be issued in a cheaper form. And as the guinea and half to the shilling, so the shilling copy to the penny journal which republishes in the lowest degree. Here is another "auslese"—the cream of the cream. It would be too much to say that thus the cheapest see nothing but the worst: but it is quite true to say, that thus they are sure to see the worst. So that it is we, after all, who minister to the worthlessness of the cheapest literature: for of course they who purvey for it in its turn, naturally take pattern by that which has come down from above; and it will be strange if they, knowing better the coarsenesses and low tastes of their customers, do not improve on the pattern.

We have been speaking about intellectual food. Let us say something about that which is physical and material. For here too there is a gravamen, and a very serious one.

We all were thankful for the labours of the Lancet commission, some years ago, and we thought that they would have some beneficial effect. Has this been so? Is food, in our ordinary shops, purer than it was? Is integrity any nearer to being the characteristic of our providers or retailers of food?

If quality be matter of question, how about quantity? Look at recent accounts of the metropolitan convictions for unlawful and insufficient weights and measures. To any general estimate of dishonesty derivable from these returns, a considerable set-off must be made, owing to the vast districts of St. Pancras and St. Marylebone being virtually without inspection. The result of this is curious enough. While the convictions in these districts for the quarter ending with Midsummer in last year, amounted to only one in 43,236 inhabitants, those in Newington, which has an efficient system of inspection, were after the rate of one in 3,278 inhabitants: that is, upwards of fourteen times as many. There is some even more curious evidence as to what the St. Pancras authorities considered allowable deviations from a shopkeeper's duty to his neighbour. Three instances are given: "1. A greengrocer, coal scale 'defective,' having a 4 lb. weight attached (!). 2. A pork-butcher, scale $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. defective. 3. Greengrocer, coal scale $1\frac{1}{2}$ lb. defective." In these cases the offences "were not considered to necessitate the seizure of any weight or scale."

"Judging," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "by the Newington list of convictions, we should fancy that the main body of these brigands of the retail counter is made up of publicans, beer-sellers, chandlers, greengrocers, and coal-dealers, though other branches of trade are very liberally represented. Here, for example, is a case that is quite a gem in its way. The culprit was a 'general merchant,' and in his shop the following weights were found:—

Too HEAVY.	Too LIGHT.
A 56 lb., by $3\frac{1}{2}$ oz.	A 28 lb., by 6 oz. (!)
Four of 56 lb., by 2 oz. each.	A 28 lb., by $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz.
A 56 lb., by $4\frac{1}{2}$ oz.	Two of 14 lb., by 1 oz. each.
Four of 56 lb., by $2\frac{1}{2}$ oz. each.	A 7 lb., by 1 oz.
A 56 lb., by 3 oz.	A 4 lb., by $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz.
Three of 56 lb., by $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz. each.	A 2 lb., by $\frac{1}{2}$ oz.
	A 1 lb., by 2 drachms.
	A 7 lb., by 2 oz.
	A 4 lb., by $\frac{1}{2}$ oz."

The hypothesis being, that he "bought by weights too heavy and sold by weights too light."

What nauseating details are these! What rottenness do they not disclose, not only in the practice of the districts which are inspected, but in the case of other districts, that there shall be no inspection, and in the estimate of a puerile governor of what is allowable cheater, not to be visited with penalty ! One is almost tempted to break out with the indignant question so often repeated by the prophet of old (Jer. v. 9, 29 ; ix. 9).

"Publicans"—"beersellers." This leads us on to another "gravamen." These Public Houses. On what imaginable principle is it, that we keep up so many direct incentives to vice, and instruments of the brutalization of our people ? Is it (I am afraid it is) the old story of Demetrius and his craftsmen ? and are they too powerful for all the rest of us ? Every —th house in a certain portion of a certain town, is a beer-shop. How can anybody justify this ? There is an admirable simplicity about some of their names. I notice one called "The Brewers' Delight." And no doubt this is the key to the puzzle of their existence. But, was there ever a greater reformandum ? Then as to the inside of these same "Brewers' delights." What sort of stuff is drawn out there to the customers ? And at what price ? Is it possible that the report can be true which reaches us, that the beer in some of them is little better than poison, inducing rapid intoxication by reason of the liquor itself being largely "in-toxicated ?" And, moreover, that there is no inspection—no punishment for brewers who manufacture beer "unfit for human consumption ?" Truly there seems to be some "culture" needed here, not only in the direction of "sweetness and light," but in that of pruning, and as we say, improving off the face of the earth.

From want of honesty to want of sympathy is but a short step : nay they are very commonly united. The doors of a man's heart have a way of all slamming together. Look at our coal-pit accidents, and say whether there be not here matter for another "gravamen." "Why so ?" rejoins our general reader : "is it not notorious that these are mainly owing to the recklessness of the men themselves ? And how then can you set them down to either want of honesty or want of sympathy ?"

Well, my answer shall be furnished out of the materials of the recent Haydock colliery accident—terribly like, it is true, to the materials of all the rest. In this mine, ventilation was incomplete : a large quantity of gunpowder had been allowed to be taken down ; and in consequence of these two oversights, fifty-nine men lost their lives.

Now taking for granted the carelessness of the men themselves, as I fear we must, as an unavoidable and constant element in these deplorable occurrences, ought we not on that account to redouble anxious and earnest watchfulness on the part of those who are liable to no such infirmity of insensibility to danger ? Can we hear of insufficient precautions to clear the pit of gas, and, concurrently, of an accumulation of gunpowder being permitted,—and acquit those responsible of disregard of that responsibility ? Was there not in this case, a want of honesty,—in stinting the proper outlay on ventilating the mine in order to increase the dividend,—and was there not also a want of sympathy, in not keeping watch for the safety of a class by whom the owners' bread was earned, and who are notoriously incapable of protecting themselves ?

The Times very properly pressed the gravamen : "There could be nothing less 'accidental' than the catastrophe by which sixty men lost their lives three weeks ago. The way was prepared for it by the systematic neglect of precautions well known to be essential to safety. It is not for us to apportion the blame which seems, indeed, to lie at the door of more parties than one in the affair. But we are bound to say that, assuming the facts asserted in the verdict, serious blame has been at least morally incurred."

And the same paper does not fail to lay down the reformandum also : "We fear the public, who have so long failed to put a due pressure on managers and labourers, must share the charge and its attendant blame. No case could be clearer, and another session of parliament ought not to pass without some stringent regulations for better management being enforced by the Legislature."

Another of my gravamina, or rather perhaps another group of them, gathers about railway travelling. And here I am checked in the outset by a widely prevalent fallacy : "We have got so much," people say, "in the way of speed and comfort, that we ought to be contented, and put up with a few inconveniences." Very fairly argued, provided only those inconveniences are unavoidable. But how will the argument stand against such a letter as appeared in the Times during this last summer ? Two ladies went up to town from Brighton by an evening train. Their carriage had none but ladies in it, when, at "Three Bridges" station (as it proved, happily for them), one gentleman got in, thereby filling the carriage. As the train was moving off, the station-master opened the door, and thrust in, in spite of their protests that the carriage was full, two drunken men. He perfectly knew the state of the men at the time. The rest of the narrative may be supplied, and, seeing that it followed as a matter of course, I need not quote it. I only mention the circumstance at all, as an example of that which is continually happening, under the sanction and, under the rose, by the order of the governing bodies of our railways. This station-master, instead of being instantly dismissed on the fact being proved, was upheld by his employers: some story was trumped up in a letter written in the papers by an official, and the sufferers, to avoid annoyance and publicity, let the thing pass. In this case, the usual official letter stated with exquisite naïveté, "that the result of our enquiries so far has not enabled us to trace the offending passengers who are said to have joined the train at Three Bridges, nor to identify the official of this company, who is said to have placed such disorderly characters in the company of ladies and children." Also, that "our officers and servants are particularly instructed," &c., &c. Exactly what one expected. This is our usual way of managing these matters in England.

Now I say that whatever we may have gained in speed and convenience, we ought not to let such things pass without complaint. Nay, more. Let us make all allowance for error in judgment, a mistake from nervousness, on the part of the drivers and railway police and signalmen; but in every case where the officials who ought to watch infringement of rules have not done so, in every case where, as has been several times shewn of late, the printed regulations of a company were systematically set at nought, and accidents have thereby happened, the offence ought to be tracked to the proper person, and punishment ought to be prompt and severe.

Again, look at such a bit of intelligence as we had not long since from Carlisle. The Judge of assize, besides being kept awake all night by the intolerable whistling of engines close to his lodgings, is unable to hear the witnesses in court, and the jury are unable to hear his Lordship's charge, from the same cause. The barbarism of this seems incredible. And it is even increased in preposterousness, when we hear that for years the Dean of the Cathedral has been endeavouring to get the nuisance abated, as seriously interrupting the Cathedral service, but in vain. Now, what is the scream of an engine? Simply a device to save the cost of look-out. If sufficient look-out were kept, no engine need, as matter of regulation, whistle at all. The only exception would arise in cases where look-out was accidentally deficient, such as that of labourers on the line. On some of our better regulated railways, the nuisance is reduced to a minimum.

The present spirit in high quarters seems to be, to allow our railway companies simply to rough-ride the public at their pleasure, and to sacrifice life with absolute impunity. If a complete time-table of some of our more crowded lines could be published, stating all the trains of every kind, goods, passenger, and excursion, on the line through a whole day, the result would be to deter any one who could comprehend the mass of figures, from travelling at all by that railway. To this fact of over-crowding is due by far the greater part of accidents accompanied by loss of life. And yet nothing whatever is done, and nothing whatever will be done, to limit the cupidity of the companies so as to give reasonable security to human life.

My schedule of gravamina is far from being exhausted. But probably the same cannot be said of the patience of my readers. The remaining matters of which I had wished to treat must be despatched "short," like the measures at the end of a session.

Something was to have been said about our domestic servants: how unsatisfactory is the system and practice at present, viewed from below and from above: how we seem to be parted from them in sympathy, in interest, in affection: what a lot, for body and for mind, is offered in the usual course of domestic service: how utterly hopeless it seems to find a remedy.

Something, also, on the great gravamen, notwithstanding all modern improvements, of the moral condition of our soldiers and sailors: the quiet acquiescence, which pervades society, in their taking a very low moral rank indeed.

Something, again, on the avoidable imperfections in our emigration system: the want of efficient organization and superintendence: the utter unworthiness of our practice in this matter when compared with our position in the world and our capacities.

And I had a desire (which perhaps was as well thwarted), begotten of certain revelations of late in bankruptcy, and in assault and battery, to suggest some organization for the amelioration of the upper classes.

Let my readers attribute what has been said, and the specifying of what was meant to be said, not to the love of complaining, but to the earnest wish to do good.

PEEPS AT THE FAR EAST.

BY THE EDITOR.

X.—CALCUTTA.

I NEED hardly inform my readers that Calcutta is at once the capital of the Bengal Presidency and of India. It may, however, be necessary to inform them as to the district to which the term "Bengal" is applied. So many political changes have taken place during these latter years, that the old names no more describe our present territorial divisions than the "Kingdom of Great Britain"—meaning by that England, Ireland, and Scotland—describes the British Empire. Thus "Bengal" may be used as designating the district only in which the Bengalee language is spoken; or as indicating the "Bengal" of the old Mahommedan Viceroyalty, which consisted of the three great districts of Bengal, part of Orissa, and Behar; or, if by "Bengal" is meant our so-called "Presidency," then it includes not only all the provinces grouped under the old Mahommedan Viceroyalty, but likewise Assam and Cuttack; and, again, "Bengal" is applied to the vast plain stretching from the sea to the Northern limits of the Empire, because the Bengal civil service and the Bengal army are here officially located. But it must be remembered that there are in "Bengal," as that term is used in this latter sense, large "governments," such as "the North-west Provinces," Oudh, &c., quite as independent of the Viceroy or the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal as are those of Madras or Bombay; while, again, the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, although residing in Calcutta, is also equally free from the central imperial government administered by the Viceroy.

Let us consider a few of the characteristic features of this "Bengal Presidency."

As I have already observed, it consists of several great provinces, which, as a whole, are of greater extent than either France or England, and has a population by some millions larger than either. One of its provinces, Assam, is as large as England and Wales; and another, Behar is as large as England. A direct line connecting its most distant points, would measure upwards of 800 miles. This vast territory is as varied in its external features as one can well imagine, and it is not less so in the character, culture, religion, and history of its various tribes and races. It has the richest plains (stretching like an ocean for hundreds of miles), watered by noble streams, and teeming with inhabitants. On the South it is washed by the ocean, and to the North is bounded and overlooked by the highest mountain range in the world—the stupendous Kauchinjunga—high as Mont Blanc with the Jungfrau added to its summit, or as six Benlomonds piled upon each other! The inhabitants of this Presidency include men of every degree of culture, from the most learned men in Calcutta to the wildest savages. There are millions of aborigines, some of whom live like brutes, and are broken up into various tribes, scattered among wildernesses of hill and jungle which have never been penetrated by a European foot. They speak different languages; in one small district near Assam, no fewer than thirty! Many of these tribes are as ignorant of each other's existence as we are. There are followers of almost every religion, from demon worshippers, offerers of human sacrifices, Buddhists, Brahmins, Mahommedans and Parsees, up to the worshippers of Christ. If there are wilds unknown to civilised men, there are numerous towns and villages that never saw a missionary. What a field does this open up for discovery, for commercial enterprise, education, and Christian civilisation!

When thinking of all this one is overwhelmed in contemplating the agencies which would be required to Christianize the Bengal Presidency alone, for it ought surely to be a much easier thing, and to demand far less labour, and fewer clergy, to keep alive the Church in Christianized Britain, than to found, and then build up, a Christian Church in Bengal! Bengal alone could present a population equal to that of Great Britain, and could thus absorb all our 35,000 clergy, and yet leave fourteen millions in this one Presidency unprovided for, and one hundred and fifty millions in India in the same condition! I notice this fact in passing, merely to suggest the position in which India stands as regards missions. It may also throw some light on the assertion often made, that having so much to do at home, we discharge our Christian duty very generously to India, when we give her about one per cent. of our clergy, and possibly also about one per cent. of the money we spend for religious purposes! Another thought suggested by such a fact is, that if India is ever to be Christianized, it must be by means of her own people.

But I must return from this digression. When a traveller reaches Calcutta, the great terminus in which all the leading lines of Indian and European thought meet, he very naturally tries to "make up his book," and, if possible, to generalise all the facts which he has gathered—to weigh and decide upon all the various opinions he has heard discussed in steamers, railways, newspapers, books, or private parties. But how presumptuous does it seem to attempt this! I for one am quite alive to the danger of generalising from a few data; and when tempted to generalise at all, more especially on Indian questions, I should wish to remember a story—true or manufactured I know not—which was told me in New York by an American. A certain St. Louis man visited Liverpool, and, returning by the next steamer, gave it as his unbiassed opinion, formed on the strong evidence of personal observation, that there was no difference between England and America, or, if there was, it was unquestionably in favour of the latter! Other facts warn me to be careful. For instance: within a walk of a few minutes from where I now write a physician poisoned his wife and mother-in-law—crimes for which he was tried and executed;—a lady was tried for poisoning her paramour, and escaped by a verdict of "Not proven;"—a photographer, who preached a rousing sermon to the mob round the scaffold of the first poisoner, soon afterwards deserted his wife, fled to America with the wife of another man, committing various forgeries;—and, lastly, a very shocking murder was committed by a woman on a servant, her companion, for which she was found guilty—the sentence of death being commuted into imprisonment for life, owing to local excitement! These are facts from "the West-End" of Glasgow which have occurred within the last few years. But am I warranted in concluding that these cases represent the normal state of morals in Scotland and Glasgow! And if not, then I dare not apply a different rule to Bengal and Calcutta in dealing with their morals and manners; and am therefore compelled to be silent. Were I, for example, to venture an opinion regarding the Bengalees, from my very brief intercourse with them, I would say that I had never met more pleasing, intelligent, and agreeable men. But in saying this I hear the traditional European laugh and joke at my simplicity and ignorance in having been taken in by all this "humbug;" and the unhesitating statement made by not a few that the Bengalee, as a rule, is one of the most oily, crouching creatures in the world, full of vanity and lies, supple as an eel, and without any back-bone or real strength in him. Others, again, will admit what is said about his deceit, but would account for it by the gentleness and timidity of his nature, which, owing to long tyranny, has forced him to make use of deception as a weapon of defence, and would attribute his vanity to his ignorance, and interpret his very failings as a mute cry for justice, and for such training as may make him respect himself and be a "man for a' that." But every one knows what has been said and written against the moral character of the Bengalees by those who have long resided among them. I am not entitled to give any opinion on so grave a matter from personal observation. Only I may mention one fact:—Dr. Watson, and a friend of his who has been in India for a quarter of a century, lost their way in seeking a certain place beyond Hooghly. They at last met a respectably-dressed native, who put himself to great trouble to procure a boat and have them conveyed across the river. He turned out to be a native policeman. Grateful for his kindness, they cordially thanked him and presented him with handsome backsheesh. He gracefully accepted their thanks, but as gracefully refused their money, and disappeared in the darkness. This is a fact, but I would not like to add that it is characteristic of Bengal.

Whatever defects, real or alleged, there may be in the Bengalee character, it is to me very remarkable, and even touching, to see the enthusiasm with which these natives have availed themselves of the many gifts offered to them by us. As coming from aliens in religion, as well as from strangers and conquerors, we might have expected them to reject these. But the Bengalee has, to the utmost of his ability, accepted of European culture. He has made our language and literature his own, and has adopted as far as possible our manners. He sends his children to Christian schools, and yields up his old convictions as to the religion of his fathers and his people. His vanity and boasting, at which we smile, are nevertheless flattering to ourselves, as arising from his possession of what we have given him. In these respects the Bengalee presents a striking contrast to his former conquerors and our present subjects, the Mahomedans, who have not yet forgiven us, and who sullenly determine to be under as few obligations to us as possible. It surely becomes a generous people to deal generously with the Bengalee graft in the old English oak, even although the branches may boast against the root.

As to the intellectual powers of the Bengalee, I have neither observed nor heard any very convincing proofs of the superiority which has sometimes been claimed for them. He reaches his mental growth rapidly, and is a very sharp lad; but he soon becomes stunted and subsides into a very ordinary man. He appears to be receptive, but not creative; to be more disposed to play hide and seek in the dark with abstract questions than to grapple with facts in the daylight and master them. As far as I have heard, the Bengalees have not produced any great original works worth preserving, since the days of Moses or Abraham, when the Vedas are said to have been composed. Young Bengal, who forms a singularly high estimate of himself, has but reflected the religion, the philosophy, the infidelity of Europe. He may return thanks for what he has received from us, but he must not be angry if from ignorance we are unable as yet to reciprocate his gratitude for what we have received from him.

But I must pass on to speak of some of the questions which press themselves upon every man who desires to know anything of those changes which in India, and specially in Bengal, "ring out the old, ring in the new." The foremost of these in its results—some of which have themselves in their turn become the germs of great social and political changes—is one which I have already noticed in some of its leading features, viz., Education, and that, too, in the English language. Dr. Duff, together with Macaulay, Trevelyan, and others, under the auspices of Lord William Bentinck, in 1835, aided most effectually in realising this. But I cannot now go into details regarding its eventful history since the day when the battle over mere orientalism was first fought and gained in Calcutta.

Now this knowledge of English, acquired by the most influential men in every part of India, is destined ultimately, I think, to effect great political and social changes. For the first time in the history of India it furnishes the gift of a common tongue—a medium of communication between all its various peoples and races. This enables them to become acquainted with each other, and with the history and opinions of foreign nations; and acting along with a free press, penny postage, and the telegraph, is destined to put the Rajpoot or Mahratta, the Mahommedan and Brahmin, as fully en rapport with the debates in the House of Commons as are the citizens of London. And all this must tend more and more to form a public opinion which has not hitherto existed in India. It will give unity, force, and direction to the fragments of political plans and purposes everywhere scattered abroad. As education extends, opinions so formed must soon permeate downwards from native sources through the vernacular languages and vernacular papers, and by a thousand channels reach and mould the minds of the millions. It must also force itself to be heard in England, expressed as it will be in England's language, and with England's culture, and as the opinion, too, not of this or of that newspaper, nor of some hired and paid agent only of this rajah or of that, but as the public opinion of native India.

The English-speaking natives, who have become everywhere the leaders of political movements, will have a great advantage over us in more than one respect. Masters of their own language, as well as of ours, they can thus at once get easy access to the mind of the natives and of Europeans. Then again, owing to the necessity of the constant flux in European Indian society, there cannot be, on our part, that united and persevering effort by which great measures are carried out ultimately, because carried on steadily from year to year. Whether the natives are capable of this higher education of wise thoughts, sound judgment, perseverance, union, and love of country, which is so necessary for great statesmen, remains to be seen. But if these capacities are in them, the English language will be their most powerful ally in giving coherence to their plans and purposes. The fact, too, that the non-caste aborigines and others are being taught English, and are thereby taking their places among the influential classes in India, will also have its own important social results.

There is no reason to think that all this must end in turning India into a series of confederated states, far less of its becoming an independent empire, at least in our day. That the whole tendency of education, of railway communication, and such like, is to give a greater unity and compactness to India is obvious. But no sign has yet appeared in the distant horizon auguring the coming of a class of natives who would be able to keep India together, to preserve its peace, and secure its progress even for one month. The strong arm and governing hand of the North is still needed. The best proof of this is the fact, that we have conquered India, and are able to maintain our position there; for it is a law that there can be no civilisation without government, and no government without power; so that in a true sense, and for such an end, might is right. But when education takes root in India, and its vile idolatries become a thing of the past, then such an intellectual and moral power will be created as will necessitate, for the good of the commonwealth, a fair share at least of government being given to or taken by the natives. I see no reason why Britain and India should not be for ever united, alike for their own good and the good of the world; each being rich in peculiar gifts bestowed by Him who divideth severally as He will for the good of the whole.

As to the literature of India, I do not anticipate that, however brilliant it may become, it will assume an English form. But the English culture of the Hindoos will tell more and more through the medium of their own language. Hence the importance of at once cultivating a thorough knowledge of English and of the vernacular and the classical languages of India. There are seventy-one printing presses in Calcutta for vernacular literature alone, and I believe these send out about 600 separate publications every year. What an elevating and purifying influence may not English education exercise, through such channels, and when thousands more are opened up! For we must look forward to the time—may it be near at hand!—when the government will, at any possible sacrifice of money, direct its energies to vernacular education, for the benefit of the many millions in rural Bengal, who are now sunk in that ignorance which is the teacher of crime, the nurse of superstition, the leader of rebellion, the robber of wealth, and the destroyer of independence. And it is only when the capacity for receiving instruction by means of the press, and the due appreciation of the social advantages which education brings, have been once awakened in the breasts of the millions in Bengal, that the blessings now conferred by English culture on the upper ten thousand only, will also tell upon them by means of an improved vernacular literature.

The destructive power of English education with reference to idolatry, and possibly also with reference to all positive beliefs, may be inevitable before the constructive process can begin. But by what means can this construction of a new temple amidst the ruins of the old be accomplished? Not certainly by Government schools, for while I think this country should see to it that the Bible should at least be read in every school, and that no teacher should be appointed to any school while notoriously professing to disbelieve in Christ and Revelation, and glorying only in Comte and his philosophy; yet, in my opinion, it would be very unwise in the present state of things, and with no security for the teachers' faith, to entrust to them the teaching of Christianity in Government schools. It was and is to supply this want, in addition to other things, that the mission school system was established in Calcutta, and has been carried on with so much success and vigour. One great object of this system, I need hardly repeat, and one which if abandoned would destroy the distinctive feature of the Christian Mission school, is the instructing of the young in the knowledge of the Bible, with special reference to Christianity. What has been accomplished by this and other mission agencies in building up the young generation in a positive religion, I shall not pause to inquire or determine; but as the Brahmo Somaj asserts itself to be at once the product of English education, and the grand means of saving the educated native from destruction, by making him a member of the "Church of the Future," I must now give some account of this society which links itself to the school and the Church, and which, apart from all other considerations, is a fact of great interest in the history of religious thought in India, and especially in Calcutta.

The word "Brahmo" is the neuter impersonal name for the Supreme, and "Somaj" means assembly. The originator of the movement was that learned scholar and illustrious man, Rajah Rammohun Roy.* Early in the century he began to seek earnestly what was truth, and although he began with the Vedas, he soon went beyond them. In 1818 he published selections from the Gospels in Sanscrit, Bengali, and English, under the title of "The Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness." Of his creed during his later years Miss Carpenter says, "that his value for Christianity continually increased—that he distinctly declared his belief in the Divine mission of Christ, in the Miracles and the Resurrection, and, although he never was baptized, he was in the habit of attending public worship, and was regarded at the time as being in full sympathy with the Christian religion." The testimony of the late Bishop Liscombe of Paris is even stronger regarding his faith in Christ as a Divine person.

The Rajah built a church in Calcutta for monotheistic worship. The Brahmos still worship in the same building once a week. Miss Carpenter was much disappointed by all she saw and heard. She says, "Instead of that candid search after truth which was so characteristic of Rammohun Roy—that devoted study of the Holy Scriptures—I found among the Brahmos an extreme prejudice against Christianity, combined with ignorance of the contents of the New Testament, which they were unwilling to study, having fortified their minds by a perusal of deistical books of the antecedent impossibility of revelation or miracles." This, it must be remembered, describes the old Brahmo party, from which Mr. Keshub Chunder Sen has seceded, along with others who form a new party, which professes to be the advanced religious society of Young India, and the germ, if not the model, of the Indian church of the future.

The number belonging to this party is estimated at about 10,000. These I have since learned are made up almost entirely of pupils from Government schools, comparatively few being from the missionary schools. They have built a church for worship in Calcutta. Their outward forms of worship are the same as those in any simple Christian church—singing of hymns, extempore prayer, and lecture. The women have a separate prayer-meeting for themselves. The society has no professed creed, no fixed ministry—each person who pleases may address the meeting. Mr. Keshub Chunder Sen is recognised as leader simply because of his superior powers and eloquence. A fundamental principle of the Brahmos hitherto has been the rejection of all objective revelation as being of no authority. They rest upon intuition, and seek light from every source. What the eyes of their inner spirit can see, that they accept of. If truth, as light, comes to them from the Vedas, or Koran, or the Bible, it is received as light, irrespective of its source.

Such a one-sided theory as this is specially congenial to the Hindoo mind, in which the historical faculty seems paralyzed. Investigations as to the alleged facts of historical Christianity do not interest a Bengalee, if indeed he is capable of making them. This want of an objective basis, or, as it is foolishly phrased, a book revelation of authentic facts, which, at the same time, are doctrines, is what must ever prevent the Brahmo Somaj from cohering as a body, or making any real progress. It must be ever changing, ever breaking up, and its fragments gathering round some new centre or phase of subjective thought. It is anchored on a shifting and treacherous quicksand, or rather it has a cable without an anchor, and cannot find rest.

* A memoir of him was written by Miss Mary Carpenter, who has dedicated to the Rajah's memory her recent volumes on India, in the first of which is an interesting notice of him. He died and was buried in England in 1833.

But, nevertheless, I fondly hope and believe that in proportion as earnest members of it seek truth,—such truth as will also commend itself from its own light to the spiritual eye,—they will see more and more that Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life. Judging from the lectures of Chunder Sen which I have read, as well as from the one I heard him deliver, and from the impression he himself made upon me, I feel persuaded that but for “the book revelation,” he, like greater men, such as Plato and Socrates, would never have learned a fraction of the truth he professes;—that he owes more to it than he himself is aware of; and that, but for Christ, and the Book about Him, he would never have discovered even the Fatherhood of God. I believe, also, that if “he follows on to know the Lord” as revealed in Christ, he will know Him; but if not, and if he is resolved, at all hazards, to be a mere Brahmo and not a Christian, then that which he has will be taken away, and the light that is in him, without objective truth to sustain it, will die out into subjective darkness.

On the evening of the day in which the new “church” of the Brahmo Somaj was opened, Chunder Sen delivered an address in the old place of meeting. I arrived too late to obtain a seat, and had, therefore, together with Sir Richard Temple, Dr. Murray Mitchell, and others, to stand on a table in the crowded verandah. We were near enough, however, to see and hear the speaker in the hall within. The hall was crowded with a remarkable audience, almost all natives of the better classes;—the Viceroy, Commander-in-chief, and the leading civic functionaries and celebrities of Calcutta being also present. Mr. Sen, dressed in a simple native costume, spoke in English, and without any notes whatever. His language was perfect, his manner calm, with little action, but very impressive. His countenance is singularly interesting, and he was listened to by all of us with rapt attention.

It is impossible to read Chunder Sen's lectures—especially when one has had the pleasure of making his personal acquaintance, as I did—without feeling a deep interest in him. I should be grieved to do him injustice; but he does not profess to believe in Christianity as taught by Christ and his Apostles. When he does, then, but not till then, he may have the high honour of establishing in India a church of the future which will last till the world ends, because built on the only true and enduring foundation of apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief corner stone.

Let me here premise that the missionaries in Calcutta are well able to defend their own holy cause, and also to advance it, alike by the press, the pulpit, and the platform. The manner in which men must go to the very roots of all questions, is characteristic of India. There is hardly a debate on general policy, revenue settlements, or social reforms, that does not involve a discussion of first principles. This holds equally true of religion; and men wishing to know the real battle between every form of error and Christianity will hear more about it, and learn more of its real nature, in missionary periodicals abroad, than in all our Church Magazines and popular religious periodicals at home.

We had in Calcutta, as in Madras, what was called a Pan-missionary meeting, at which Bishop Milman presided. With true catholic feeling, he offered to do so himself. The meeting was a very crowded one, and all classes, native and European, were represented, from the Viceroy downwards. It was a fine sight, and made one wonder why it could not be seen at home, and thus help at least to strengthen and express that unity of spirit, and that love to God and man, which Christ Himself prayed for, as being the grand evidence for the fact of facts that God had sent Him. One object of this meeting, as of the one at Madras, was to make known the facts regarding the condition of Christian missions, and to challenge on the spot any denial of them. The various branches of the different missions were ably represented. Mr. Lewis spoke for the Baptists, and told us how they had laboured in India for seventy-five years; how their brethren, Carey, Marshman, and Ward, had so long found protection under the Danish flag at Serampore, near Calcutta, until 1812; and Swartz and his fellow-labourers under the same flag at Tranquebar. He told us what these noble men of our then forlorn hope had accomplished, and how their Church had now thirty European missionaries in India, labouring in nearly twenty chief States of Bengal alone; how they had given to Bengal the only translation of the Bible it possessed, of which they themselves had published eight editions, with twenty-six editions of the New Testament in the same language. He contrasted the low condition of society, both native and European, at the time when their missions began with what it is now, as evidence of what all the various Churches had done; and although statistics never could express the success of missions, still they could, in connection with their Church alone, think of 2,200 members, representing a nominal Christian community of 7,000, with colleges having 600 pupils, and vernacular schools with 2,000 children.

Dr. Murray Mitchell gave an account of the Free Church Mission Schools, referring to Dr. Duff's noble efforts. Dr. Duff was a link between the labours of Carey—who visited his school—and the present day. On that occasion, Dr. Carey said, "What hath God wrought! When I began my missionary labours I could not have got one of these youths to wait upon my teaching if I had bribed him with all Bengal!"

The Rev. Mr. Payne reported for the London Missionary Society. He said that besides six central stations in North India, they had in the Calcutta district seven Christian churches, five of which were native, with 1,193 boys and 185 girls under Christian instruction in Anglo-vernacular schools. Educated natives had been ordained as ministers, and three had been appointed as evangelists since 1860.

The Rev. Mr. Stewart reported at considerable length for the Church Missionary and Propagation Societies, which had, he said, 16,000 converts and children of converts within the Calcutta diocese. These were but the germ of a future Church. A few months before this he had urged a convert of great intellectual attainment, who occupied a government situation, to become ordained, but he said:—"No; the time has not yet come for me to give up my present position of influence, but when I see my way clear to be a missionary to my countrymen, and to seek ordination from the bishop, I will go forth as a native evangelist supported by the Native Church!" He told Mr. Stewart that he had spoken to some of his Christian brethren on the subject. His plan had met with hearty sympathy, and he had no doubt that what was lacking they would supply.

The Rev. Professor Banargea—a native Episcopal clergyman of excellent talent—spoke gratefully of Dr. Duff, by means of whose lectures he had, as a Hindoo, been brought at first to the knowledge of the truth.

Dr. Watson and I spoke, but it is unnecessary here to reprint our speeches. I will only say that we felt profoundly grateful for the Christian reception given us, and the cheering words addressed to us. I may, however, be pardoned for quoting what I said regarding my ideal of the future Church of India. For many reasons, I do not wish to be misunderstood, as I have been, on this point. I said:—

"By a native Church I do not certainly mean—what, in present circumstances, we thankfully accept—native churches in ecclesiastical connection with the different European and American missions. It surely cannot be desired by any intelligent Christian—I might use stronger language, and assert that it ought not to be tolerated by any reasonable man, unless proved to be unavoidable—that our several churches should reproduce, in order to perpetuate in the new world of a Christianized India, those forms or symbols which in the old world have become marks, not of our union as Christians, but of our disunion as sects. We may not, indeed, be responsible for these divisions in the Church which have come down to us from the past. We did not make them, nor can we now, perhaps, unmake them. We find ourselves born into some one division, and so we accept it and make the most of it as the best we can in the circumstances in which we are placed. But must we perpetuate these divisions in India? Is each part to be made to represent the whole? Is the grand army to remain broken up into separate companies, each to recruit to its own standard, and to invite the Hindoos to adopt the various uniforms, accept the different shibboleths, learn and repeat the respective war-cries, and even make caste-marks of the wounds and scars which to us are but the sad mementos of old battles? Or, to drop all metaphor, must Christian converts in India be necessarily grouped and stereotyped into Episcopal Churches, Presbyterian Churches, Lutheran Churches, Methodist Churches, Baptist Churches, or Independent Churches, and adopt as their respective creeds the Confession of Faith, the Thirty-nine Articles, or other formulas approved of by our forefathers, and remaining as the separating sign of some British or American sect? Whether any Church seriously entertains this design I know not, though I more than suspect it of some; but I feel assured that this condition of things will be perpetuated unless every opportunity be watched and taken advantage of to propagate a different idea, and to rear up an independent and all-inclusive native Indian Church. By such a Church I mean one which shall be organized and governed by the natives themselves, and as far as possible, be independent of us. We could of course claim, as Christians and fellow-subjects, to be recognised as brethren, and to be received among its members, or, if it should so please both parties, to serve among its ministers, and rejoice always to be its friends and supporters. In all this we would only have them to do to us as we should feel bound to do to them. Such a Church might, as taught by experience, mould its outward form of government and worship according to its inner wants and outward circumstances, guided by history and by the teaching and spirit of Christianity. Its creed—for no Christian society can exist without some known and professed beliefs—would include those truths which had been confessed by the catholic Church of Christ since the first; and, as necessary to its very existence as a Church, it would recognise the supreme authority of Jesus Christ and his Apostles. It would also have, like the whole Church, its Lord's day for public worship, and its sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Thus might a new temple be reared on the plains of India unlike perhaps any to be seen in our western lands, yet with all our goodly stones built up in its fabric, and with all our spiritual worship of the one living and true God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. A Church like this would, from its very nationality, attract many a man who does not wish to be ranked among the adherents of mere mission churches. It would dispose, also, of many difficulties inseparable from our position, whether regarding baptism or the selection and support of a native ministry. And, finally, it would give ample scope, for many a year to come, for all the aid and efforts which our home Churches and missionaries could afford by schools and colleges, personal labour, and money contributions, to establish, strengthen, and extend it.

"Moreover, it seems to me that India affords varied and remarkable elements for contributing many gifts and talents to such a Church as this. The simple peasant and scholarly pundit, the speculative mystic and self-torturing devotee, the peaceful South-man and the manly North-man; the weak Hindoo who clings to others of his caste for strength, and the strong aborigines who love their individuality and independence;—one and all possess a power which could find its place of rest and blessing in the faith of Christ and in fellowship with one another through Him, The incarnate but unseen Christ, the divine yet human brother, would dethrone every idol; God's Word would take the place of the Puranas; Christian brotherhood, of caste; and the peace of God, instead of the weary rites and empty ceremonies, would satisfy the heart. Such is my ideal which I hope and believe shall one day become real in India. The day indeed seems to be very far off when the 'Church of India,' worthy of the country, shall occupy its place within what may then be the Christendom of the world. A period of chaos may intervene ere it is founded; and after that, how many 'days' full of change and of strange revolutions, with their 'evenings' and 'mornings,' may succeed ere it enjoys a Sabbath 'day' of holiness, rest, and peace! But yet that Church must be, if India is ever to become one, or a nation in any true sense of the word. For union, strength, and real progress, can never henceforth in this world's history either result from or coalesce with Mahommedanism or Hindooism, far less with the cold and heartless abstractions of an atheistic philosophy."

But I must delay what more I have to say about Calcutta until next month.

HOLYHEAD BREAKWATER.

BETWEEN a dark height and a pale storm at sea:

There stood a man thinking.

The wind cried up to him dismally,

Like a poor soul sinking.

The wild sea-voice swept over the height;

Grim were the words it said!

"I roar and I hunger by day and night,

Till I can bury my dead.

"Since out of my heart the slow world crept,

Crept, and climbed, and grew,

Men and women have wakened and slept;

But I have watched all through;

"I lift my voice and I stretch my hand,

And the labour of years is vain;

For the life and breath of the helpless land

Come down to me again.

"Sail on, sail on, yon gentle ship,

As the moon sails in the sky!

But if I let my storm-hounds slip,

To-morrow, where will you lie?

"Your sails shall crack like an empty boast,

Your great masts shall go down,

And the scorn of this tremendous coast

Shall flout you while you drown!

"For I, the unanswerable sea,

Do hedge the world with death;

And the purple mountains shall stoop to me

Before I bate my breath!"

That man stood up in the lonely light

And spread his arms and swore,

"I will bring down this purple height,

And the sea shall rule no more!

"The noise of this despair shall cease.

And the tumult of these graves,

When the mountain makes a wall of peace

Across the furious waves."

A quiet army came at his call

With mattock, axe, and spade;

They sieged and scaled that mountain wall,—

You may see the breach they made.

They hewed its calm old heart in twain

And carried away its strength

With a granite thread to bind the main

A mile and a half in length.

In crypts of darkness under the wet

The stones were sown broadcast,

Then the divers dived, and the blocks were set,

Till the strong edge showed at last.

It grew a line, it grew a wall,

It was growing by night and day,

Till the sea stood up and laughed at them all

As it tossed their toils away.

"D'ye think to match my living rocks,

Ye puny souls and pale?

Come curb me again with your careful blocks,

And I'll scatter them all like hail!"

He wore his shame like a victory

When he saw his good work go.

"Man's heart is stronger than the sea,"

He said, "and the sea shall know!"

So the divers dived, and the rampart grew,

And the great blocks settled again,

Cut as sharply, and set as true

As the links of a lady's chain.

Through battering wave and tearing blast,

The work was steadily done;

In every gap of calm they cast

A welded yard of stone.

Seven times the sea destroyed it all;

Seven times it rose anew;

It grew a line, it grew a wall,

A level floor it grew.

Out from those melancholy coasts
It marches, foot by foot,
The waves, like some uneasy ghosts,
Do mourn about its root.

The slow weeds shift, and float, and sink
About its placid sides,
Where gardens of the gay sea-pink
Confront the ceaseless tides.

Still on the mountain's patient face
You can see the mighty scar,
Still all along the shore you trace
Signs of the quiet war.

That field no bristling forts environ,
No blood defiles that sod,
But grim defeatures of black iron,
Dead wheel, and silent road.

Now, when broad evening spreads her balm,
And water-slopes grow red,
The line which severs storm from calm
Lies like a silken thread.
Within, the ships ride safe and free,
Without, for ever in vain
That unconvinced revengeful sea
Writhes in its slender chain,

Flings its fierce tears across, and says
To the old cliffs far away,
This trifle of the latter days
Shall never stand as they.
But still IT STANDS. And we, in pain
For lost ships sinking,
May thank God for the hurricane
Which set a man thinking.

HEROES OF HEBREW HISTORY.

BY THE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

X.—SAMSON THE JUDGE.

THE last words of the great captain upon the slopes of Timnath Seres die out dirge-like in a tone of solemn sadness. The clarion note of his exulting praise ends in that uttermost foreboding, "lest ye deny your God." It was the shadow of the future which lay dark and heavy on that prophetic heart. For when "the generation which had seen the great works of the Lord had been gathered unto their fathers, another generation arose after them which knew not the Lord, and did evil in his sight. They forsook Jehovah, and served Baal and Ashtaroth."

Then were the days of gloom and darkness. Enemies rose against them on every side. The old mountain fastnesses of the giant brood frowned again like gathering thunder-clouds upon the habitations of Israel. The dark hosts of Philistia from their sea-coast dwellings, swarmed up even to the mountain slopes of Judah, and spoiled all the labours of the sons of Jacob. The strength of the separated race seemed to have spent itself in the act of invasion, and to have left them weak before the children of those whom they had subdued and dispossessed. And so in one sense it was; but not as the fruit of the natural wearing out of their energy. It was but the fulfilment of the voice of Joshua's departing warning. It was that "the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and He delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them."

Their peculiar sin was a direct and emphatic contradiction of the very purpose for which they were severed from the nations round them. Abraham had been called, Isaac blessed, Jacob guarded, Israel multiplied, that there might be one man, one family, one tribe, one people—to bear witness amidst the ever-multiplying polytheism to the indivisible unity of the Godhead. For the bearing of this witness it was above all things needful, not only that they should worship Jehovah, but that they should worship none other with Him. This was the sin of polytheism: it for ever multiplied its altars. From the deep of his own inner self-consciousness, from the play of his own imagination, from the shadows cast by outward things upon his spirit, fallen man developed his gods, until, not only every high hill and every dark forest, but every desire of his heart and every appetite of his senses was embodied in some deity, who repeated in gigantic proportions the sins which were his own defilement. Against this vast system of abominable idolatry, Abraham's solitary wanderings and his altars to Jehovah, Jacob's sufferings and visions, Joseph's captivity and advancement, the forty years of Moses amidst the mountain-chain of Midian, the thunders of Sinai, and the sword of Joshua, had all borne alike their various witness. To maintain this witness and to hand it on, Israel had been planted in the goodly land which, to make room for them, had vomited forth its old inhabitants. The adoption, therefore, by them of the Baalim and the Ashtaroth into their system of worship was a breach of their God-given charter—a yielding up of their title-deed to the land of their inheritance. Every mountain and valley, every rock and river lifted up to heaven their voices against this new pollution, and cried to Jehovah for deliverance from it. The cry was answered by the avenging bands of the Ammonite from his sloping hill-side, of the Amorite from his mountain fortress, and of the Philistine from his sea-girt plain. As the hands of Israel dropped Jehovah's banner their strength departed from them, and they became weak before their enemies. Internal disorganization, too, enfeebled them. Under their theocracy the heads and elders of the several tribes administered the earthly kingdom: they judged between man and man as the high priest judged between them and God, and so the separate families were held in unity, and the divided tribes felt flowing through them the blood of a common life. But justice and rule soon withered and died out beneath the sensual worship of the Baalim, and the disunited people fainted with the feebleness of internal estrangedness and ever multiplying isolation. Then came the heathen forth as the bees of the forest from their hiding-places, and chased at will each lonely and defenceless wanderer. Then, at last, in their low estate they turned again to their God and wept before Him, and cast aside their idols and their Baalim. And their fathers' God hearkened to their cry and turned to them again.

But as the utterly relaxed sinews of their national existence were insufficient for the strain involved in rousing them again to make head against their enemies, the baring of God's arm called forth some unusual instrument through whom its power could act. Some one must be raised up with a might which rose above the withered strength of their ordinary institutions—who could breathe into their fainting hearts a new resolution, and gather into unity some at least of their disunited tribes. This was the judge's office. The choice of God marked him out. The hand of God separated him. The might of God strengthened him. He was raised up to do a special work, and he did it. He and his work must never be separated in our view, or we shall be sorely perplexed as we gaze upon him, and perhaps test and try to class him as though he were living and moving amongst ourselves. We shall never understand him by such a process; for God's witnesses and special instruments are never exempted from the influence of the circumstances which surround them. Through these circumstances God fashions and trains them. If it were not so they would be exceptional cases outside our sympathies, and could not be examples or instructors for us. The necessary effect of these circumstances is to imprint upon each one of them a specific and distinctive character. Whilst a strong common form of life thrown around men is a protection to the weak, it tends to diminish the strength of the strong. In the deep dark forest there is an almost unbroken uniformity in height and shape amidst its countless multitudes of trees. All are drawn up to the average size. But the mighty giants of the earth are found apart from their brethren; striking their own deep roots where they will, and flinging freely their vast branches to wrestle with every storm, and be nourished by every breeze.

Such were the judges of Israel; and we should therefore expect to find in them a certain eccentricity of act and character; the fruit of their largely developed individuality. So, in fact, they stand out before us; figures grand and majestic, but not of what we rightly consider a Christian aspect. There is upon every one of them, inasmuch as he was "a saviour" of his brethren, a shadowy outline of the one true Saviour of his people, but these lines which are so clear and true in him are broken, involved, indeterminate, confused, in them. As we trace them on the shifting misty medium on which we see the true image cast to be distorted, even as it is repeated, they oftentimes perplex and turn us giddy as we gaze, unless we continually correct their strange and imperfect proportions by looking off from them to Him, the true type, whose perfectness redresses for us their manifold imperfections.

We, from the clear sunlight of Christendom, look back upon these judges, as men may look from a sunny bank over an intermediate valley on some ranges of distant mountains, amidst which, under their cloud canopy storms are breaking and sunlight is playing: whilst the separate hill masses seem like mighty giants at their sports or in their rest, on whom in their vastness we gaze with eager interest and rapt amazement.

In no one of the whole catalogue of the judges are all these distinguishing features marked with such startling clearness as in the Nazarite son of Manoah. Dark beyond all former precedent were the days in which he was born. East of the Jordan, the Ammonite had mightily oppressed Israel, until, in the time of Samson's youth, the Spirit of the Lord had fallen upon Jephthah, and raised him up for the deliverance of his people. In the west a yet heavier yoke had yet longer bowed the people of Jehovah. For forty years they had groaned under the oppression of the Philistines, and the only fruit of attempted resistance had been to make the rod of the oppressor heavier, and the chains wherewith he bound them more galling. In their despair they took the ark of God into the battlefield, and took it there in vain. The battle was lost; the sons of the High Priest fell amongst the slain; the old man himself watching eagerly for the return of his Levite offspring, and still more of Jehovah's ark, fell helpless from his seat at the announcement of the overthrow, and broke his neck. The curse had eaten out that evil progeny, and seemed through them to prophecy from the holy place a like destruction to the rebellious people round them. The infidel host carried off in triumph the captive ark, the great symbol of the covenant, the great instrument of worship. And still there was no voice, nor any that answered to their cry. It seemed as if, wearied out with their often-repeated iniquities, Jehovah had turned away for ever from his people. Not till the ark was placed as in triumphant subjection to the idol Dagon did the old power even begin to stir. Then the idol fell maimed and helpless on his temple's floor before the mysterious symbol of Jehovah's presence. Then upon the great cities of Philistia, wherever the ark rested, there were plagues, until the terrified heathen sent it back to their oppressed serfs. And now the same power began to stir in another quarter.

The portents which preceded Samson's birth pointed to him as a coming deliverer. We can picture to ourselves his wild and wayward youth. As self-consciousness dawned upon him, he found himself a Nazarite. Even before he was born the bond was upon his coming life. The angel messenger from God who had promised his birth to the barren household, had, in the might of a divine command, ordered that it should be so. As reason opened on that wilful soul, the story of his strange life was told him. With its earliest stirring was bound up the keeping of the mysterious vow. The growth of his unshorn locks, the abstinence from the familiar grape, the massive strength of his young frame, all severed him from others of his age—all stamped upon him a separated character. How must the father and the mother of the God-given, impulsive, solitary boy have gazed with something of an awe-struck wonder upon his moody youth! how must they have trembled at the dark violence of his passion, stirred often almost to madness, like the waves of the deep rock-bound lake, when the roar of the whirlwind lashes suddenly its surges into storm!

Was this the promised blessing? Could this be he who should deliver Israel? Yet at times that youth would be woke up to what seemed a promise for the future. He kept his Nazarite vow. With all that moody wilfulness, to that one bond he bowed. And when the rising fame of Jephthah's exploits found its way into Manoah's household, that dark spirit would stir as though the like influence were waking up it too to reach forward to do like acts of valour for his people; and they would look on, and wonder, and hope; for then "the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol" (Judges xiii. 25).

All along this history we can trace the broken outline of his typical character, as the image of The True Man is forecast upon this uncertain mist-blurred mirror. There was the angelic heralding to the childless parents of the coming birth of Israel's deliverer; there was the mystery which lay broad upon his youth, as "the child grew and the Lord blessed him;" there was the consciousness in that mother's heart of her guardianship of such a chosen life; there were those movings of the Spirit, which broke, with promises "she kept within her heart," the ordinary appearance of his up-growth.

The years rolled on. The boyhood and youth of Samson, with their strange fantastic promises and disappointments, had passed, and he was a man. "Surely now at last," the longing parents would say one to another, "surely now at last we shall see some fulfilment of the words of Him 'whose name is secret' (Judges xiii. 18), as to the Nazarite boy; surely now at last he will 'begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines.'" The mother's brooding nature would instinctively move her to deal with Samson as a greater than Manoah's wife dealt with her greater Son, when, with longings which well-nigh swelled into reproach, she said unto Him, "They have no wine." But his hour was not yet come. What a strange mockery of their hopes must the first act of his manhood have seemed to them!—"He went down to Timnath, and saw a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines; and he came up and told his father and his mother; and said, I have seen a woman in Timnath, of the daughters of the Philistines, now therefore get her for me to wife" (Judges xiv. 1, 2). Used as they were to his wilfulness, this was beyond all the precedents of his youth. With eager entreaty they besought him to give up the misplaced alliance—"Is there never a woman amongst the daughters of thy brethren, or among all the people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?" But they spake in vain. His only answer was, "Get her for me, for she pleaseth me well."

Yet the strange choice was really the providential over-ruling of what in itself was faulty for the fulfilment of God's secret purposes. Samson's vocation was altogether peculiar. He was not to be the commander of an army. The depression of years had so utterly degraded Israel that her sons were not fit for such an enrolment. Neither was he to break the yoke of Philistia. His wild, wayward, sensual nature forbade that honour being his. He was but "to begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines." He was to show by supernatural strength and individual daring that the power of God, if it were but called out, would suffice abundantly to overcome the Philistines; and yet that the might which at one time enabled him single-handed to scatter the hosts of the uncircumcised ebbed utterly away so soon as he departed from his God. This was the lesson Israel needed, and only thus could it be taught them. If the alternations of wonderful success and bitter casting down which marked his single course had befallen the armies of Israel, there could have been no recovery of their spirit of self-reliance, or of confidence in their God. But in Samson the great scene with its most tragic conclusion could be acted out before their eyes; and whilst his success elevated their hopes and roused their confidence, his casting down taught them its most needed lesson of warning, and yet left their rising spirit unshattered. He was as it were the embodiment of the chosen people; they could see themselves in him. His Nazarite condition represented faithfully their covenant state; his clinging amidst all his aberrations to that vow; his under voice of confidence in God; his perception that he had a vocation; a mission from Jehovah; his unshrinking daring in carrying it out by the matchless might with which the Most High had strengthened him; his well-nigh incredible success so long as he claved to this;—all this was to teach them that if they would cast off their Baalim and return unto their God, and cleave to Him, they would break in Jehovah's might the yoke of Philistia. His yielding to the voice of sensual appetite, with all the misery it brought upon him, was to show them in an example acted before their eyes that if they yielded to the sensuality, which was the great inducement to their idol worship, and joined themselves to the sins of the nations round, they too, like their hero in the arms of Delilah, would be snared, and blinded, and destroyed.

This then was to be Samson's service; thus was he to begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines. He was not to break their yoke, but he was to show the trembling people that before the faithful man their strength withered and faded; and thus he was to keep alive in fainting hearts the hope of Israel. They were to see in him the tide of prophetic power ebb and flow as he claimed or denied his true relation to Jehovah. But to make this possible it was essential that he should have such relations with the oppressing heathen as would lead to their perfidy, and cruelty, and contempt, venting themselves upon him personally so as to embroil him with them, and thus make it natural for him in maintaining his own personal rights to avenge the oppression of Israel. For no single man could make war upon a nation. In this sense only Samson's wild choice of a daughter of Philistia for a wife, because she pleased him well, was "of the Lord." The act was a forbidden one. The motives which led Samson on to it were wilful and sensual; but his fault was to be overruled for the carrying out of the purposes of God. His father and his mother saw but the evil of the heathen marriage, and so resisted it whilst they could, and then, according to their wont, yielded to the stronger will of their imperious son. They go down to Timnath with him to get for him the Philistine damsel to wife. By the vineyards of the city a young lion springs upon him with that roar which shakes the forest; but alone, single-handed, and unarmed, he seizes it and tears it asunder, as if it were a kid, and does not even tell his parents of the feat.

Here again how strangely does the typical character of all his acts of greatness float before us! His first recorded work of superhuman strength, yet wrought as man, alone and unarmed, as he goes down to begin his life-long fray with the Philistines, is this overcoming of the lion. And He, too, the One True Man, as man, immediately before the opening of his ministry, is driven of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil; to meet as man, alone—left for the time even by the bands of angels who, when the conflict was over, returned to minister to Him—the roaring lion who seeketh whom he may devour; to meet him and to overcome him in the might of the indwelling Spirit.

When Samson and his parents come to Timnath the damsel is formally demanded and betrothed to him as his wife; in due time he goes down again to claim his bride. The marriage festival is celebrated with great preparation and display, thirty Philistine children of the bride-chamber attending to do honour to their friend.

Again the strange similitude looks out upon us from the marriage banquet. For as it was at a marriage in Cana of Galilee, where first the power of the Son of Mary was miraculously manifested, so from the Timnath marriage feast came first the display of Samson's might against Philistia. Amongst the entertainments of the festival, according to the common usage of Eastern and even of Grecian feasting, Samson puts forth a riddle to the assembled guests. Philistian guile extracts dishonestly the answer by threatening to burn with fire the household of the bride unless she entices for them his secret from her betrothed. That hero heart of his, so strong against man's violence, so weak before woman's art, melts under her tears, and she gains and betrays his secret. Then there fell on him, as when the lion roared against him by the vineyard of Timnath, the burst of a divine wrath. He saw the perfidy, the darkness, the godless injustice with which Philistia was oppressing Israel, and he goes down to Askelon and slays thirty of its chosen men, and brings their spoils to pay the wager which had been so basely won.

This Philistian perfidy had brought the marriage festival to an untimely end, and Samson returns in wrath without his betrothed wife into the land of Dan. By degrees, however, his anger cools, and he goes down again to Timnath to claim his wife. He is met by a new instance of Philistian faithlessness. For he finds his wife given to his companion, whom he hath used as his friend. This new insult he avenged by turning three hundred of the jackals, who even to this day infest in numbers the neighbourhood of Gaza, tied tail to tail, with a lighted firebrand between each, into the standing corn of the Philistines, who, when they had ascertained the cause of their loss, came up with savage violence and burned with fire the house and family of Samson's bride. The language of the authorized version would suggest that Samson considered even that an insufficient punishment for his Timnite father-in-law's treachery. But the original language implies the very opposite. It suggests that his soul revolted from this abominable barbarity; and that he resolved to punish wholesale: "If ye do such things I will not cease until I have been revenged on you," would be the truer rendering. Then he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter.

It was after this act of heroism that he appears to have openly assumed the judge's office. He went down and dwelt in the cleft of the rock Etam, and there the people of Judah came to him for judgment. Yet his hold on his countrymen was as yet small. His acts of vengeance on the Philistine people stirred up, as he doubtless expected they would, their bitter anger. They gathered their troops together and invaded the territory of Judah to seize the person of the terrible Danite. The conduct of the men of Judah exhibits in the strongest light their utter national degradation. Instead of gathering around their judge, and even if their unarmed and undisciplined multitude could not stand in battle against the hosts of Philistia, yet seeking to strengthen his heroic heart by their sympathy, whilst they watched for what their God would do for them by his hands, they resolved to purchase an ignominious peace by the base surrender of their champion.

Again there breaks out upon us, the recurring prophecy of act. For so it was generations after, in their children's days, when the Mighty One came unto his own and his own received him not; when the evil murmur was whispered, "If we let him thus alone . . . the Romans shall come and take away both our place and nation" (John xii. 48). "Knowest thou not," said the three thousand men of Judah to Samson, when they came to him at the rock of Etam, "that the Philistines rule over us? Wherefore hast thou done this? We have come down to bind thee, and deliver thee into the hands of the Philistines." Out of the ages comes forth as the accursed echo of that voice of faithless fear: "We have no king but Cæsar." And like acts followed in each case: "When they had bound Jesus, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor." Even so did the men of Judah bind at Etam their Nazarite champion with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock. Both of the betrayed suffered themselves to be bound, because in those bonds they read the present will of God and the road to a future and more complete victory; and the bonds of each were indeed the loosing of the prisoner's chains. So it was in the spirit world with the Captain of our salvation. So it was amidst the dark hosts of Philistia with the Hero judge of Israel. "For when the Philistines" in triumph "shouted against" their captive enemy, "the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and the cords that were upon his arms became as flax which was burnt with fire, and his bands loosed from off his hands; and he found a new jaw-bone of an ass, and put forth his hand and took it, and slew a thousand men therewith" (Judges xv. 15).

Then in the moment of his triumph came to him to teach him his weakness without his God the sore thirst under which his mighty strength fainted. It was the time of wheat harvest, and as single-handed he fought the battle and destroyed the army of the alien, the sun of Judea poured down its scorching midday rays upon him until it seemed that he whom the Philistine hosts could not subdue would perish in the agony of drought. He cried unto the Lord in a prayer which witnesses in its every word to his deep sense of his being in these acts no mere pursuer of personal vengeance, but in very deed an instrument in the hand of Jehovah for the rescuing of his people. "Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant, and now shall I die for thirst and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised?" He did not cry in vain, for in the rock at Lehi He who bringeth water out of the great deeps opened its fresh springs, and when the thirst-bound hero had drunk, his spirit came again and he revived; and in grateful remembrance he named the spring, which for years afterwards distilled its freshness from the rock of Lehi, "the spring of him that cried." As we read of this extremity, this prayer, and this deliverance, can we forget an agony in the dark strife of the Captain of our salvation far more terrible, a prayer far more mysterious, and a succour yet more wonderful, when "there appeared an Angel from Heaven strengthening him?" So over and over again, as we look deeper into the record, does the Nazarite judge prefigure the true King of Israel.

Great at this time was the glory of Manoah's son. Terrified by the utter failure of their last attempt, the Philistines withdrew themselves into their own borders. Samson judged his people, and though the heathen yoke yet dishonoured Judah, it was little more than an empty token of subjection whilst Samson was at hand to avenge upon their trembling hosts any act of aggression or of wrong. For twenty years it seems that this long pause lasted, and then the last and greatest of the judges falls before the temptations of the flesh, and ends in shame and ruin his life of bright but fitful splendour. It is a dark and miserable history, to be told in a few mournful words, to be stored up by all for closest self-application in their heart of hearts. The mighty man "who had burst the fetters of his foes could not break the cords of his own lusts" (St. Ambrose). He yields himself up to the enticements of the evil and treacherous Delilah. The lords of Philistia seized greedily on the hope which this weakness of their great enemy suggested to them. They promised the woman large rewards if she could win from Samson the hidden abode of his great strength, which, according to popular belief, they supposed to rest in the possession of some amulet or charm, of which if they could rob him, they might afterwards securely bind and oppress him who had been their scourge and was still their terror. With the perfidy of her class, she uses all her harlot wiles to draw from him the coveted secret. At three different visits he deceives her with fabled inventions. Once the sleeping giant is bound by her with undried thongs; once with new cords; once the Nazarite locks are woven together by her into one; and each time he is startled from slumber by the sudden cry, "Philistines upon thee, Samson!" Each time the awakening man manifests in a moment his unabated might, and his enemies, whom the cruel traitress kept hidden by her in the dark ambush of her chamber, dared not show their unsuspected presence. Then the attempt would be treated as an idle jest, such as frequent those chambers of iniquity. For evermore has existed the deadly conjunction which our own Milton's words of matchless strength have in almost a syllable so abundantly depicted—and so his suspicions would be lulled to sleep, and it would seem to be but a woman's curiosity in one of its unmeaning sports with her victim.

"Lust hard by hate,"

But his last revelation, though it concealed the truth, had come dangerously near to its sacred secrecy. He had dared to sport with those seven mysterious locks upon his head, which were the outward sign, the mysterious sacrament, of his strength. This free and dangerous handling of the veil drawn over the hidden secret on which depended the indwelling of the power of Jehovah foreboded all that followed; and it needed but another wearisome solicitation, another passionate entreaty, another sportive guile, to draw from him all the truth, and place him helpless in the cruel hands of the deceiver. This time she saw that he had told her all his heart, and she sent with triumphant expectation for the lords of her evil people. Then, as Samson slumbered in the sleep of sin, the razor passed upon his head. The Nazarite locks were shorn, the birth vow was broken, his separated state was ended, the special presence of Jehovah had departed from him, he had become as another man. Then again the cry rang through the chamber of sin, "Philistines upon thee, Samson," and he rose with his dishonoured head, saying to himself, "I will go away, as time upon time." He had come from long familiarity with its accesses to deem of the strength vouchsafed to him as if it belonged to himself. But he knew not that Jehovah was departed from him. Then from their secret hiding-place rose up the ambush of his enemies; the dark forms cast themselves upon him, to be received at first with his accustomed scorn. Then came the fierce death-like struggle: the mighty man accustomed to his strength could not believe that it was gone, and yet it was in very deed departed, and he is overmastered, bound with fetters of brass, his eyes put out—that last terrible security taken against any return of his might—and he is led away a captive to Gaza. There he is cast into the dungeon and forced to do the hardest work of the meanest drudges, to grind corn in the mill.

What must have been the thoughts of that great self-willed heart; what the agony of that mighty spirit; what the pangs of that rebellious body! How must the caged eagle have beaten its mighty wings against the cruel bars of its narrow cage! how must Israel's deliverer have groaned under the insults of the Philistines! how must Jehovah's champion have abhorred the triumphs of the infidels!

Doubtless in that prison the work of God which he had so often counteracted was wrought indeed with him. Doubtless, in those lonely hours of darkness, with no familiar voice to cheer their blackness, with no sound of kindness to mingle with their gloom, conscience would arouse itself in all its power; doubtless he who needed so severe a discipline of love for his perfecting, had grace given him to yield himself to all its cleansing, purifying power; for his name, by the hand of God the Holy Ghost, has been engraven in the golden catalogue of the faithful; doubtless he, beyond all others, now that his earthly strength had departed from him, was, in the higher sense of the great words, "out of weakness made strong."

The days, the weeks, the months, perhaps the years, passed on—passed in the slowly achieved conquest of his will to the Will of God—and down in the dark hold of the heathen dungeon, in his blindness and his squalidness, angels visited the lonely man, nay, the God who had made his Nazarite strength so strong was with him in the prison.

At last the day of his deliverance dawned. The great feast of Dagon, the chiefest of the idols of Philistia, was come. He was the god of natural power—of all the life-giving forces, of which water is the instrument; his fish-like body, with the head and arms of man, embodied this idea of his rule. Sacrifices were this day to be offered to him; and amongst the chiefest of his honours, the great judge of Israel—the warrior who had been filled with all Jehovah's strength—was to be led forth to do the idol honour and exalt by his feats the delight of assembled Philistia in their hideous, mis-shapen god. The vast hall is full from end to end of Philistia's nobles; the flat roof crowded by the swarming multitude. Amidst the taunts and triumphs of a brutalized heathendom, the eyeless captive is led in. He is guided to the central columns, that all may the better gaze upon this living trophy of their triumphant god.

Amidst all that thronging garrulous crowd he is alone with his God. Blindness, sorrow, captivity, and loneliness have done their work upon the solitary man. All his great soul is turned inward. He scarcely hears or sees anything around him. His thoughts are with the past; with the days of his Nazarite youth; with his early associations; with his witness for his God; with his wanderings from Him. What is there yet that he can do, what is there that he can suffer, for that Lord? There is but one last offering he can make; it is the offering of himself: he is again in outward form a dedicated Nazarite. Has the God in whom, he now has learned, was all his early strength—has He come to him again? Will Jehovah accept even from one stained as he has been the offering of his all? He puts forth out of his deep heart the cry for one more gift of strength whereby the cruel sacrifice of his own eyesight may be avenged, whereby the enemies of Israel may be humbled, wherewith Jehovah may yet triumph over Dagon. He prays his last prayer; offers to his God his life; grasps with those arms of iron the massive central columns which support the wide-spanned roof, and bows himself with all his might. There is a shaking of the pillars; a cry of terror upon this side and on that—a wild rush beginning, and on it all settles down, with one loud crash mingling like the deep thunder with the cries of the dying, the vast proportions of the crumbling building. At last Jehovah has triumphed. Dagon has fallen before the God of Israel. The Hebrew judge has indeed wrought the destruction of the Philistines; the eyeless captive has done more than Samson in his might. "The dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life."

Once again, for the last time, from amongst the dark shadows of his fall and ruin, which seemed for ever to shut out the glory of his prophetic character, the typical similitude is seen to re-awaken, and the hero judge bowing willingly his soul to death that Jehovah may be magnified and Israel delivered, foreshadows to us the offering of himself by the Great Judge of all unto the pains of death, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage; and as the body of the Lord was not left in the grave of the wicked, so is it expressly written for us, that the body of the Nazarite judge remained not with the uncircumcised amongst whom he fell, but that profiting, no doubt, by the first terror of that great overthrow in the temple of Dagon, "his brethren and all the house of his father came down and took him and brought him up and buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol, in the burying place of Manoah his father" (Judges xvi. 31).

As we look back upon this history with its intensely dramatic character, its wild lights, its strange incidents, its glories and its shame, gathering themselves round the hero chief, who evermore fills the foreground of the picture, we can scarcely resist the conclusion that the Hercules of Pagan story was but the Samson of the inspired record distorted and robbed, by the thick vapours of the heathendom, of the moral teaching which breathes everywhere from the history of Manoah's son. There is the same exaltation of personal strength to an heroic nobleness, there is the same slaughter of the lion, the same single-handed scattering of his enemies, the same subjection of the hero's strength to the weakness of his own lusts, the same bowing down of his might before the witchery of woman's wiles, the same deceived end and premature death at the hands of the enchantress. But in Hercules man's appetites are deified, in Samson they show in undisguised harshness all the cruelty of their murderous outlines as the mighty man in his moral weakness allows himself to be cast down upon their rugged pinnacles.

This lesson, which lies upon the surface of this wonderful history, none can fail to read. The Nazarite separated to do the Will of God, strong against every foe so long as his vow, talisman-like, endures with him unrenounced; but falling through the weakness of the flesh; then led on deliberately to tamper with the very condition of his separation; then, partly by half consent, and partly by the fraud of the enemy, stripped of the very sign of his relationship to God; finding, too late, that God has departed from him, and with God the strength which, in his self-confidence, he supposed would still be with him as at other times; then bound by the enemies with whom he had tampered, cast into their dungeon a blinded, manacled slave, or led forth to be the sport of their bitter and triumphant hatred—all this is the story of each Christian castaway, seen through so transparent a veil that we cannot fail to mark in it the typical outline of a baptism into Christ, with all its separating power, with all its spiritual might sacrificed for the lusts of the flesh, abandoned at last even in profession, and leaving one of the mighty ones in the prison house of darkness, blinded, manacled, and utterly enslaved, the sport and mock of those evil enemies who crowd around their accursed chief in the dungeons of the lost.

But this is not the only lesson of this startling chapter in the book of inspiration. The ever self-repeating action of humanity and the many-sidedness of God's Word—every facet of the mighty whole darting forth its own separate gleam of light upon the mystery of being,—make it read to us perhaps a deeper moral still. We may see in it how those who for the highest purposes have been endowed with the highest gifts, on whose intellectual powers that mighty spirit of God's strength has rested, that they may work some deliverance for his people, may idly throw away, first, their noble trust, and then, at last, themselves. Samson's gifts of bodily strength, which were the consequence in him of the Spirit of God exalting the ordinary powers of man's muscles and sinews into the heroic might of the Nazarite deliverer, are a type of the quickening of the higher gifts of intellectual power by the informing Spirit into a grander reach of exertions than the merely natural mind could have attained. The employment of these at the mere bidding of the selfish will, for sport, for gain, for the gratification of a vain daring, for the pleasure of unbridled speculation, is the fulfilment in a higher sphere of the casting away of the sensual, wayward judge of the tribe of Dan. His end is a type of the yet greater fall of these worse abusers of higher gifts. They, too, when they have sold their Nazarite locks at the bidding of the enchantress, when they have trifled with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which were theirs in the Church of the redeemed, hear from the lips of that goddess of unsanctified reason, on whose lap they are dreaming, the startling cry of "Philistines are upon thee, Samson!" and in that crisis such men find, as he did, their strength departed. They are bound with the cords of doubts, plunged, often blindfold, into the dungeon of despair, to grind out for the world all her baser problems, to feed her godless company of scoffers. Happy were it for such if even by the sacrifice of a life they could pull down the temples of unbelieving thought upon the crowd of blasphemous imaginations which cling to and throng around them.

CHAPTER XLV.—A CHANGE OF SCENE.

LORD WRIO-THESLEY, instead of going away, remained in the neighbourhood till Phoebe herself removed from
it. For it proved to be a provision of Mr.
Paston's
Will that Phoebe and her mother should settle in Folks-bridge, with the sufficient competence which was secured to them. Mrs. Paston did not merely consent to the removal. Impatient of the oppressive sense of their loss, and restless in the anticipation of a change, she listened readily to her brother's suggestion. Mr. Hall, falling in with this, represented that he could not be continually going and coming between Folksbridge and Wellfield to manage their affairs, and that the easiest and most comfortable plan, subject, of course, to the approval of their noble patron, would be to repair within a few weeks to Folksbridge. It would be the very sort of change they needed. The furniture in the house in Wooers' Alley could be packed up and stored in a wareroom, and the mother and daughter could go into lodgings, and at their leisure look out for a house, and settle themselves thoroughly to their minds.

Phoebe, on the other hand, did not much care for a speedy change; she did not want to quit Wellfield at all. To give up Wooers' Alley, and the house where she had been born and bred, and where she had dreamt her grand youthful dreams, was like another sentence of death to her, and she writhed and turned faint under it. She almost wondered her father could have thought of it. So she crept about in her first essays at fresh exertion, and tried to take a prolonged farewell of all the familiar places and objects around her, which she had held in such loving estimation, and to which she had come back and clung so kindly after her little flights. She tried to realise that she was breaking with them and resigning them for ever. In these last weeks she saw very little of Barty Wooler, less even than of Lord Wriothsesley, though he too was mindful of her weariness and the exaction of her sorrow. But Barty Wooler had not sought to present himself in Wooers' Alley more than was absolutely necessary from the moment that Lord Wriothsesley had appeared upon the scene; and, in retiring, he had taken his mother with him. After recording his acceptance of Mr. Paston's trust of his pictures, he had made what sounded the perfectly reasonable announcement, that nothing could be done in it without time and deliberation.

Phoebe knew that Barty had a defiant temper, together with something of a radical spirit; but after all that had passed between him and her father, and the pledges which had been given and taken, she did think that he might have foregone some of his feeling to keep her from being thrown upon Lord Wriothsesley. Not that she arrogated any title to the man's care. He had been forbearing, forgiving, and oh! so generous already, that it could not but make one sigh for his imperfections. Phoebe did more than sigh: she submitted, with an ache and a smart indeed, but she secretly resented his allowing himself to be put aside by Lord Wriothsesley, thus getting the whole three of them clamoured over, until even Miss Rowe became hoarse.

It was Phoebe's fate to depart from Wellfield under a full blare of trumpets. The old story of Barty Wooler's enslavement, by which Miss Rowe had always stood, notwithstanding of Milly Medlar's insinuated doubts, had been revived in full force when Barty turned up and waited on his former friend's death-bed. Now Lord Wriothsesley eclipsed Barty; and in place of the potent rivals fighting it out over Phoebe's hand, Barty simply stood aloof, leaving the field free to his enemy.

"Was there ever such a girl, Mrs. Medlar?" exclaimed Miss Rowe, in exasperation; "she will be the death of me. I never heard of such another. I believe she has both of the men—the ci-devant artist and millionaire—mercenary Barty Wooler, and our young peer—as two strings to her bow.”

“But,” good-natured Mrs. Medlar hinted darkly, in panting desperation, “do you call it a respectable act for a whipper-snapper of a girl like that to take all the great catches in England to her own share, and play fast and loose with them? She ought to be ashamed of herself, the jilty, flirting thing, and the turf on her father’s grave not green yet, when older, more solid girls, for the want of a decent offer, are sit-fasts by the score.”

“By the forty, Mrs. Medlar,” answered Miss Rowe, with a smile of acquiescence that skilfully hid the real tartness of the intent; “but there is that old farmer’s daughter, Judith Clay, has taken to countenancing the young lady, who, if our good Earl would but consent to die in time, is prepared to throw the stuck artist over her shoulder by a coup-d’état worthy of Louis Napoleon. If women like Judith Clay, set on by personal spite, are not fit to nose disrespectability, pray, madam, what are they fit for?”

Knowing that such fungi-growths of scandal were springing up around her, Phœbe became unjust alike to Barty Wooler and Lord Wriothesley. She said to herself that it was their persistence that had provoked the gossip, doubly painful at this time. She would not see that this was but an instalment of the price of the noble setting which she had coveted for her life. She allowed herself to be offended by what she called Lord Wriothesley’s complacency and self-confidence, when all the time he was as scrupulous as Barty Wooler of trespassing upon her retirement. Lord Wriothesley’s great aim in remaining at Brockcotes was to be near her, and to do for her what her friends, rightly judging, stood aside and suffered him to do for her. He was even cautious of interfering in the slightest degree with her change of residence, and her going to dwell among her Folksbridge relations. He must have felt that if he interposed or entered the smallest reason against the Pastons’ removal, it would be scrupulously prevented by Mr. Hall and Mrs. Paston. But so long as Lord Wriothesley could not offer Phœbe a house, and declare his desire that she should accept the establishment with which, as with a seat in Parliament, his father had proposed to supply him, how could he dictate anything relating to the Pastons’ movements? While the years dragged on during which he would be in the world, occupied in the performance of his appointed task, was he to deprive her of the solace of her kindred? If he was anything more than a gentleman in name, Lord Wriothesley did not see how he could cross poor Paston’s natural and sensible proposal for his wife’s sojourn in her widowhood. Very likely it was a precaution against the world’s saying that Phœbe lived on at the Brockcotes gates as a patient petitioner for Brockcotes’ grace. Phœbe made no appeal to Lord Wriothesley that could tempt him to interpose with opposite advice. She knew as well as he did that the lifting of his finger could have kept her from going away, yet she did not say a word to him, any more than to Barty Wooler, of the compulsion under which she went.

CHAPTER XLVI.—UNDER HER CROSS.

THE St. Martin’s summer of good eight weeks was not over, although these weeks had rounded one of those crises in life which make a woman feel as much older as if her hair had grown grey in the interval.

Wellfield still lay under those wonderful sunsets—glorious in amber, crimson, purple, sea-green, and royal blue—and those twilight never seen save over leafless woods and bare corn-fields, when it is as if all the rich hues of autumn had fled to the sky, and been detained there a little while to throw a reflection of heavenly glory over a stripped and ashen-grey and brown-tinted earth.

Phœbe had not to cross the threshold except to go to church, and to make one call—yes, one call; for she must repeat her thanks and bid good-bye to Mrs. Wooler.

In church, while she had a haunting consciousness of whose dust lay in the graveyard outside, and while she was seeking to support her mother’s faltering steps and to receive comfort from the service, she could not escape seeing Lord Wriothesley sitting solitary in his mourning in the great Exmoor pew, nor refrain from sending a glance to ascertain whether Barty Wooler also wore mourning for his friend, as he sat by his mother in their old corner.

Phœbe found Mrs. Wooler at home, and during the few moments that she sat beside her with a full heart, she met with charitable, nay, friendly, treatment. Mrs. Wooler gave her an almost hearty good-bye. “Miss Paston, God bless you, small or great.”

It looked as if it were a proclamation of peace between them, to the extent of a permission from Mrs. Wooler to go and become the great lady she aspired to be, since she had shown herself a good daughter, and a capable young woman in a house of sickness and death; and Phœbe went with a heart choking in its thankfulness.

The Pastons' immediate departure had one advantage. There could be no general leave-taking. Phœbe would come back and pay off her arrears of good-will and civility. As for Lady Dorothea, she had received a letter from her as full of warm-hearted, womanly sympathy and interest as if her Ladyship had never known a trial, and did not have a brother in the way of whose preferment Phœbe stood an innocent but immovable obstacle. That seemed a sufficient proof of friendship.

Without going out of the house, soon to be her home no longer, Phœbe could take her last lingering looks at the scenes which would most dwell in her memory—at the tower of St. Basil's; her withered winter garden, now so much in keeping with her feelings; the ladder-like ascent of Woovers' Alley; the pile of Brockcotes on the height, all crested by the rainbow horizons of those solemnly magnificent St. Martin's sunsets. She had a joy amidst her sorrow at leaving those scenes. She would carry their memories with this peculiar, utmost beauty shed upon them.

Thus she could sometimes look up under her cross of sorrow and perplexity. It was at this time that she began to pray, in her simplicity and extremity, the prayer of faith and longing, which she prayed so often afterwards. "Lord Jesus, wilt Thou not come to set the wrong right, and bring back the lost, as Thou wert wont? Forgive our unworthiness and unwillingness, and make us less unworthy and more willing."

Every day she went and came several times to and from the painting-room, in face of her mother's prohibitions and remonstrances, although she could do nothing but stand and look around her and recall the days which were no more. The last day and the last visit to the old painting-room in Woovers' Alley arrived too soon for her. She could scarcely believe that she was not to enter the precincts again, unless as a stranger in a strange house. The rest of the building was more or less dismantled, but this room remained the same.

There were all the objects which she knew so well, the places where her father had been accustomed to stand and to sit, and the places which had been set apart for her since she played as a child, messed herself rubbing down colours or clearing them away, or served as a model, and later, was suffered to bring her work or her book, and be at hand with the mother-wit of her criticism on her father's painting.

There were the casts of deathless groups, with the deathlessness of their majesty and pathos shining like a token of immortality out of the common crumbling clay: the Del Sarto, with the last longing of despair in the evil eyes of its Virgin; the lonely, half-rustic Bassani; Mr. Paston's own Bellini, Jacob and Esau, and Kilmarnock and Balmerino, in which Phœbe was to have sat for Balmerino's wife, Peggy. But it was none of these, dearly as Phœbe prized them, which it broke her heart to part from. The stamp of genius on them would win care and regard for them wherever they went. It was the humble and ordinary things—the worn brushes, the cracked palette, the rickety Saul, which the child Phœbe had dressed up as a giant doll, and which now stood presiding over the scene like a gaunt and grisly skeleton. These cast-aside tools of his trade had been part of her dead father's life, which nobody would mind now but her; and she was going away and leaving them to be tossed aside as worthless wrecks.

Phœbe broke into violent weeping, and it was thus that Barty Wooler, opening the door and entering to see after his trust, found her. He would have retreated if he could; for how did he know that Lord Wriothsley, whom he had seen in the town that day, would not follow her to give her his support in turning her back on her father's sanctuary? But he could not leave a woman, and, above all, Phœbe Paston, in such distress—besides, she was calling to him:

"Do not go, Mr. Wooler, please; I want to ask, will you have these poor things and keep them for his sake?"

Here was something which she could ask from him, and which he could do for her, something which was not within Lord Wriothsley's province.

"Yes, I will, for him and from you, Phœbe. But you must not stay here any longer. This is too severe an ordeal for you to protract. You must allow me to take you away. Hush!"

Barty Wooler spoke with stammering lips, but he was a brotherly man. He led out Phœbe as gently as if he had been Lord Wriothsley.

CHAPTER XLVII.—IN FOLKSBRIDGE.

THE murky atmosphere, the ugly buildings, the pushing crowds of Folksbridge, were a new scene for Phœbe, though she had known Folksbridge well in the girlish days when she was finishing her education there and had come out in such society as it afforded. But she was sensible that she was coming to a new Folksbridge when she put her foot in the dull, half-garish, half-faded lodgings of which the Halls approved highly, because they were in the genteel reserve of a by-street in the suburb of a thoroughfare, and were kept by a decayed gentlewoman, who had no other lodgers and followed no other trade.

In the faint stirrings of life, just recovering from what partakes of the nature of a trance, Phœbe could have wished that she had left behind her some of the belongings of her old life which she had carried hither. She could have wished to live over again and alter entirely some of the most significant passages in her past history. Whether she lived to marry Lord Wriothesley or not, she might live to have it proved that she had done both herself and him grievous injury.

Tidings of the prestige which was thus crushing Phœbe were in Folksbridge before her. Stunned and rendered supercilious as the Halls had been by the first faint report of Phœbe's conquest of Lord Exmoor's son, they had not failed to spread the report widely, both in Phœbe's interest and their own. Already, in its most distant ramifications, the Halls' set were looking out for Phœbe, with the intention of being profoundly struck by one who could flesh her maiden sword by the arrest of a confirmed rover like Barty Wooler, and not content with this, could achieve the enslavement of the son and heir of one of the greatest peers in the country.

Accordingly, there was a lively curiosity to see Phœbe now, and eager solicitations or introductions to her from the luxurious daughters and foppish sons of the rich Folksbridge merchants. She excused herself on the plea of her mourning—a plea very valid to her, but quite invalid to the circle she disappointed. The world went fast at Folksbridge, where a certain precariousness hung about many of the fortunes and establishments. Exuberance of display, and activity in the pursuit of pleasure, combined with deficiency of reticence, and incapacity for independent existence, were conspicuous in the inhabitants. Their mourning was at once the deepest in point of crape, and the curtest in point of time, that wealth and decency would permit. The mourners in their very weeds rushed into company to drive away regret, in a style which, to Phœbe's mind, was more like heathen callousness than Christian resignation.

To this excitement which Phœbe was unwillingly creating in Folksbridge, Lord Wriothesley gave but a modest encouragement in the way of demonstration of his love. There was a pretty little country-house situated within eight miles of the town. It was no better than a cottage-ornee; but it was half sneered at, half envied, because it was somehow unattainable by the villa architects of Folksbridge. It was named Phantasy, and was a fanciful appendage of that Essex branch of the Exmoor family from the stem of which Mrs. Edgecumbe was a worse-of-the-wear wild shoot. It was occasionally occupied by those Latimers, or such of their friends as had a liking for a little Trianon. Lord Wriothesley came down to Phantasy this autumn for coursing, and duly paid his respects at Higham, in No. 9, Stephenson Street. The member of an affable, noble family, in the case of the recent widowhood of an old retainer, might have gone this far had there been no "beautiful Miss Paston" in existence. But it was scarcely to have been expected that Lord Wriothesley, when no general election was pending, should, on the second day, have taken the trouble to hunt up Mr. Hall, and allow himself to be carried by him all over Folksbridge 'Change, through Mr. Hall's warehouses and berths in the docks, finishing the performance by dining in a friendly, off-hand fashion at Garnet Lodge, to the great glorification of the family. Phœbe was not at that dinner, but the Folksbridge gossips were satisfied, as Miss Rowe would have been, that there was something in the story of Lord Wriothesley and Miss Paston; and they liberally plumed themselves on the tribute to their growing importance in the prospect of one of the premier peeresses of England being drafted from Folksbridge circles.

Frank Hall and Mrs. Edgecumbe in succession announced their belief in this result.

"Give me warning in time, Phœbe, when I am to keep my distance," said Frank, throwing his pug nose in the air, and charging her half in jest, half in earnest, when she could not escape from him as he escorted her down the spruce avenue of Garnet Lodge. "Of course it is a great thing for all of us; and it is you, and not I, who may be the making of the family. But equally, of course, I am not going to use liberties with a pledged countess, though she be my cousin, and though his Lordship was hand-and-glove with me when we were in the same boat off the Isle of Serpents. What are we coming to, Phœbe, when we burst the chrysalis?—a most noble countess, a leader of fashion, a dispenser of the hospitalities of another Cambridge House? Perhaps we shall dabble in politics on our own account; and it will be the Countess of Exmoor crossing over to France on a diplomatic mission, or going down to the country on canvassing business.”

“I wonder you can talk so absurdly, Frank. You know you are alluding to something as unlikely as the bankruptcy of the Bank of England, or the Queen’s taking up her residence in Folksbridge. Neither does the Lady Exmoor I know go on diplomatic missions.”

“Ah! but it will be a Countess of Exmoor with a difference. The next Earl is Young England, and has got brains; he will not be a selfish dog, and keep them all to himself. His Countess will have her share,—not a bad quality of brains for a woman; not so aggressive and aggravating as Olive’s, but possibly more discriminating and better balanced. No bad adjunct, these quick brains, to the headpiece of a junior lord of the treasury. His Lordship may be cousinly and friendly after all on account of my introduction—or non-introduction, eh! Phœbe?—of the high contracting parties. He may put a poor sinner of a press-man into one of his spare seats: I think we are on the same side of the House as yet. But I give you notice, Phœbe, Lord Wriothsley is viewy for me, awfully viewy for a young ruler who is unsound on the property-tax and the Irish question. Still we should not cry out against him for that—should we? because, without intending the smallest piece of impudence, minus that eccentricity he would not have suited your book.”

Phœbe could only silence Frank Hall by the directest asseverations that the subject was painful to her.

Another day Phœbe suddenly encountered Mrs. Edgecumbe, not driving a mail Phaeton, as she had done when she picked up Phœbe in Wellfield High Street. The old lady was in her own carriage, accompanied by Mr. Edgecumbe, on her way from Appleton, which was within the circle of Phantasy, to a house several miles further off, where they were to dine. As the couple stared at the shops, the manufactories, and the throng of business men, one or other of them caught sight of Phœbe in her mourning. Mrs. Edgecumbe pulled the check-string, and made the squire, with an oath, scramble out on the slippery pavement. After handing out his lady in her hood and fur-cloak, and taking off his crush-hat to Phœbe, he withdrew, growling, to his fastness, till his services should be required again. In the mean time, Mrs. Edgecumbe, by no means disturbed by the attention which her costume drew alike from masters and “hands,” plucked her crow with Phœbe.

“My dear, I had just been thinking of you, though I confess I had forgotten that you had come to this smoky, clattering hole.”

“Well, Folksbridge isn’t like Wellfield; but the folks here are honest and cordial; and I have every reason to speak well of them,” answered Phœbe, quietly.

“Oh yes! I dare say they are a very good sort of public-spirited people, with all the domestic virtues—a thousand times worthier than my kind; only you see I have known my class these thousand years, and the other is not at all in my way; so I am not coming to call on you here, though you are a favourite of mine. In fact, I don’t see what good I should do you by the move, and it would be inconvenient for me. I daresay you see it all, for you are a bright creature, with a temper. I always like a man or a woman with a temper. The Squire is something terrific now when he is ruffled and his head is confused; a trooper is a mild comparison for him.”

“Surely an extreme comparison, Mrs. Edgecumbe.”

“Not a bit. As for myself, I am a heartless, selfish, old woman of the world; and I required to hear of Wriothsley’s having been down after you to recall you to my mind. I have stepped out at this moment to tell you to have done with the affair one way or another. You have not been reading ‘Clarissa Harlowe?’”

“No, Mrs. Edgecumbe.”

“Ah, no, poor soul! you have been otherwise occupied, I know. But it stands to reason, Phœbe, that you must go off with him. If the boy was not so well born and bred, and used to being crack-man, he would be the least thing in the world priggishly perfect, like Sir Charles Grandison or King Arthur, you know, when Guenevere and Lancelot could not keep from being desperately wicked, and betraying the fathomless royal sweetness and generosity. Supposing you do not go off with him, Phœbe, thus pulling him down from his pedestal, you must give up the great marriage of the day, poor child. If you do not venture the one or the other, trust me, something dreadful will happen to settle your difficulty.”

Phœbe felt so oppressed under the old lady's advice that she could not bear it longer, and broke out—

"You are a good comforter, Mrs. Edgecumbe; it is lucky I met you."

"Well, truth is better than comfort, and there's no rarer virtue; and I must say I never approved of long delays and hope deferred. They form an utterly unnatural state of the moral and social atmosphere, like brooding sultriness to be followed by cracks of doom. That last simile was suggested by Neddy Andrew's antics with his whip, Phoebe."

"I am afraid he is to drive off," said Phoebe, with some concern.

"No, no; the Squire will not drive off without me; but the horses may start forward, and some of that mass of folk (cannot they keep back for a minute?) may be knocked down and killed: the Squire certainly will, for he will throw himself out head foremost, and break his neck before anybody else is hurt, the rash old man. Good-bye, child, and mind what I have said to you."

CHAPTER XLVIII.—GLIMPSES OF REST.

No doubt Barty Wooler shared the general persuasion as to Phoebe's exceptional lot. He had been one of the first to foresee an entanglement of the kind. But Phoebe had small opportunity to judge of his persuasion; for although Barty's wanderings were over for the present, and he was detained at home both by the late Mr. Paston's business and his own, he did not make more than occasional brief visits to the Pastons. He had no right to ask Phoebe to give him a timely warning when he was to stand at a distance from her father's daughter. And, indeed, he had no need of such a warning. A little more brusqueness where he had always been brusque, and a little involuntary hardness in his tone, were the only indications of what was in his mind.

Phoebe was satisfied that Barty was cured of what she called his old fancy for her. She thought that he had perhaps grown to despise himself for the fleeting folly. But seeing had been believing; and Phoebe believed in the past. In remembering vividly, with mingled pride and shame, his former manner to her, and his pleading with her, she could not doubt his cure.

She did not wonder that Barty had shaken off his thralldom. He could have thought of her only as a weak, vain girl, caught by the mere elegance and state of a bridegroom far above her in rank. She did not think she had afforded him any indications of a worthier and loftier ambition. She had been a spoiled, petted girl to him, showing herself quite incapable of appreciating the generous devotion of a heart like that of her father's friend.

It did not yet enter into her head, fond as she was of Lord Wriothlesley, and penitent to him for the impatience with which his kindness was apt to fill her, that there could be any other comparison between the two—any preference for Lord Wriothlesley over Barty Wooler, except what belonged to Lord Wriothlesley's rank and its great profession.

The months wore on, till there was a spring feeling in the murky air. Little Bess gave up her dormouse sleep, and whimpered and pulled at Phoebe's gown to be taken out. Lads and lasses, on holidays, returned from long tramps to the country with green boughs in their hands, and hawthorn blossoms in their breasts. The sunshine, for many hours each day, poured down on the masts in the river, thick as the tree stems in a forest on its oily waters, reaching down, it might be, through the brown, slimy depths, and warming the hearts of the great company of steel-blue mussels at anchor in its rocky bed.

Phoebe, from the narrow view across the monotonous street, now became familiar with every pot of balsams and stocks, every box of sweet-peas and mignonette, down to a seedling nettle in a crevice of one of the sills of her opposite neighbour. They set her wondering what the flowering shrubs which could be cultivated in the balconies and conservatories of Piccadilly and Park Lane were like in their May and June bloom to those who looked into them every morning, as Lady Dorothea did. She began to long for what she herself knew of the greenery of the great park of Brockcotes—the grand chorus of its singers, with hoarse caws of rooks, and mellow coos of ringdoves, the purple flush of its American garden, merging into the English shrubbery, heavy with fragrance, and all passing into the far stretch of waving green. These were outside charms. In the vastness of the chase there were bosky nooks, only to be found by the diligent seeker, where were to be gathered, in their seasons, wealth of March and April daffodils and violets, May lily of the valley, June dog-roses, July and August wild honeysuckle, September and October foxgloves, November and December crabs and holly-berries half buried in the snow, and mistletoe hanging with icicles. Again, as early as January and February, there were pale stars of primroses, to be followed by the misty blue of hyacinths, till the whole sweet calendar of the year was completed. All these treasures were to be had for the taking, not only by the fallow-deer, and the Scotch cattle, but by the humblest labourer's child who trotted with the pitcher containing daddy's coffee or broth up the Wellfield avenue, or strayed into the adjoining nooks; while Phœbe, whom the world gave out as the future mistress of Brockcotes, pined in her Folksbridge lodgings for the sight and the smell of the most insignificant bud of them all.

The sympathy with the living world of nature, which made animals and plants such a pleasure to Phœbe, aroused her at last to look about with real interest and eagerness for the house which her mother and she were to occupy as a permanent home. It was difficult to find what would meet the requirements of both the women. Mrs. Paston wanted to be on a small scale as stylish as Garnet Lodge, and, above all things, to be situated in a cheerful and good-visiting neighbourhood. Phœbe, again, desired the humblest pretence at a country view, though it were but that of a nursery-garden, or the hedge-rows, and the furze, and gorse bushes of a washing-green, such as had flourished in Wooers' Alley; and, above all, with a bit of garden wholly to themselves. She would prefer the house to be an old house, and near one of the older churches, built when Folksbridge was a little nest of mariners, and not a huge hive of merchants. But the Halls insisted that the house should be near them, and that confined the Pastons to one suburb in their house-hunting.

At last something like the model house was alighted on. It was in a sunshiny lane, which was yet sufficiently cheery. It stood in a tiny plot of lawn and flower-border, which Phœbe might well-nigh mow and cultivate by her own unaided exertions, and where Little Bess could disport herself, and be chased away twenty times a day from committing trespasses. Lastly, No. 3, Dean Lane, was within ten minutes' walk of the pine-apple crowned pillars at the avenue gate of Garnet Lodge. The only thing wanting was an old battlemented church-militant, to remind Phœbe of St. Basil's, and of Lord Wriothresley's comparison of St. Basil's to Albrecht Dürer's "Knight defying Death and the Devil." But Phœbe, like a wise woman, decided that everything could not be obtained, either for her or any other person's money, and was content with what she had got.

CHAPTER XLIX.—FORESHADOWINGS.

IT surprised Phœbe a little that the Halls—and particularly Olive—had not taken a more active part in the search for the house. They had retired a good deal within themselves, leaving the Pastons, after one stipulation, to make their own choice. She was not aware that the Halls were offended and huffy, as they were rather given to be, when the Pastons acted against their opinion, or, indeed, had so much as an opinion of their own on any occasion. They had appeared pre-occupied, too, when Phœbe visited them lately. She would have thought they were engrossed, preparing for their own sea-side trip, had not Olive let fall a word which indicated that they were not going to the sea-side at all this summer. Their remaining at home must be on Jane's behalf; but Mrs. Connel had recovered very well, if she would only believe it, and her baby was healthy and thriving. It might be for Frank's sake. He had been down for two days during the last month, and was so busy that he had not found his way to Stephenson Street, Higham, to inquire for his aunt and cousin, though Phœbe had not as yet given him any warning to drop cousinly terms. But Frank was not likely to get into any difficulty, and his marriage, if he were going to be married, would not detain the Halls at Garnet Lodge for the summer. It might be Olive's marriage, or Kate's; but with regard to such an engagement, Phœbe felt certain that the Halls would have confided it to her, unless it were a very poor marriage; and Phœbe was convinced that no other of the Halls would make a poor marriage after Jane's experience. But no; Phœbe did not think Kate or Olive was going to be married at all. On the contrary, she had a suspicion that some prospects of an advantageous marriage for Kate had gone off without fulfilment, although it had been proudly hinted at in Phœbe's presence, that they might not seem altogether behind the future Countess of Exmoor.

Two ladies living in retirement were as little likely as cloistered nuns to hear much of importance that was passing around them. Phœbe's walks were not in the direction of the noisy quays. She was so superficially acquainted with them, that even if she had gone where casks, boxes, and bales, porters, sailors, merchants' clerks, and supercargos stopped the way, she would have been no wiser. She would have failed to remark the number of vessels lying idle in the docks, and what was worse, the number of men who had mouths to be fed, and the filling of many more helpless mouths depending on their work, hanging about, pinched, haggard, and unemployed. She read with no more than passing attention the cautiously-worded announcements of bad trade that began to appear in the Folksbridge Gazette. Yet she reproached herself, with some reason, for having been selfishly unobservant, and engrossed with her own sorrow, when she learned at length that a season of commercial difficulty and sore distress was passing over the bowed heads of the crowd around her. Many a brain was racked with anxiety; many a heart was aching with disappointment. Humble households were enduring the extremity of privation. Fortunes won by the enterprise and the industry of long years were scattered in a day. Among other fortunes, that of Mr. Hall, who had been a bold as well as a fortunate speculator, was sacrificed.

It was her mother's loud lamentations which aroused her to the fact that they were involved in Mr. Hall's partial ruin. Mr. Hall himself had come over to Stephenson Street, and broken the unwelcome news to the Pastons. Phoebe had been filled with a mixture of admiration and pity for the brave face which the merchant put upon adversity, while he could not altogether keep down the careworn and crestfallen misery that had taken the place of the old confidence and self-satisfaction. She did not want her uncle's excited assurances that all would be well, and the murmured earnestness of his promises that the Pastons' substance should be made good while a penny of his own remained to him.

But if, in Mr. Hall's presence, poor Mrs. Paston was loud and sharp in her exclaima-tions and wearisome questions, the moment he went away she broke out piteously. She lamented the waste of Mr. Paston's hard-earned savings; she reproached her brother's abuse of the trust put in his business knowledge, which would reduce her and her child to dependence and destitution. Paston (who would not have let a breath of wind blow on her that he could have warded off, poor soul!) would not be able to rest in his grave.

Phoebe had never seen her mother so agitated. All the strength as well as all the weakness of the woman was up in arms. All her pride in the genteel station to which her husband had brought her, all the lately-found faith in his devotion to her, and in the power which had backed his will to shelter her, all her care for her child, made common cause with her constitutional shrinking from exertion and deprivation of every kind. To Phoebe it sounded as if her mother immensely exaggerated the danger.

It was not long till a letter arrived for Mrs. Paston from Frank Hall in London. It was much to the same effect as his father's communication,—a manly, kinsman-like letter, expressing sympathy with his father, and calmly confronting, for himself and for his mother and sisters, the change which the last six weeks had wrought in their fortunes, and proposing to refund the Pastons' capital in time.

That same day Barty Wooler appeared in Stephenson Street with liberal cheques for Mr. Paston's two best pictures, which he had disposed of, and with a proposal that he should set about completing the unfinished picture of the execution of the rebel lords, getting a spare room from the Pastons' landlady, and using it as a temporary painting-room until he could have from Phoebe the sittings for Lord Balmerino's Peggy, according to her father's design.

Within the week Phoebe received a letter from Lady Dorothea, soliciting that her mind might be set at rest with regard to her position as to the trade calamities in Folksbridge. The Exmoors had heard of them in London (as they heard of everything at Brockcotes), and were exceedingly sorry to find that Mr. Hall, among other merchants, had been a sufferer. The letter ended with a delicately frank protest lest Phoebe should think it strange that Lady Dorothea's father wished to settle on the widow and the daughter of Lord Exmoor's old and esteemed friend one of the annuities constantly and fitly charged on the Exmoor estates.

Phoebe's eyes were opened to her having part and lot in the disastrous year at Folksbridge. The first thing she saw clearly was that her mother and she must for the present give up any thought of a pleasant house and servants of their own in Dean Lane. They must continue in the dull, confined lodgings in Stephenson Street, and must also look about in case worse should befall them, in being forced to become pensioners on Lord Exmoor's or Barty Wooler's bounty, till they were burnt up by the coals of fire heaped on their heads.

This was a bitter enough draught to swallow at the first gulp, and Phoebe's gorge rose against it. She did not say a wrong had been done, or an injustice committed. But it depressed her to think of being condemned to Stephenson Street for summers and winters, for years and years, after she had found heart to search for and to discover something like a home. How nice and quiet and fresh the middle-aged house in the garden, among other houses in gardens and shrubberies, looked to her now, as it was seen in retrospect, compared with the new and thickly-peopled locality of Stephenson Street!

But Phoebe thought better of it, and made herself regard with commiseration the faces around her,—of those compared with whose sufferings hers were light. She remembered, on the last occasion when she was at Garnet Lodge, the additional wrinkles on her uncle's face, and her aunt's complaint of so severe a headache as might account for dim eyes.

As Phoebe's eyes opened to these realities, Mrs. Paston's closed. The perturbation of her mind sank as quickly as it had risen. She received Frank Hall's consolation, Barty Wooler's payment, and Lady Dorothea's suggestion, as being so many gospels, each proclaiming a way of escape, and a provision for the future. It required all Phoebe's arguments to prevent her mother insisting on going on with the taking of the house.

"Mamma, Frank Hall means what he writes," said Phoebe; "and he may be able to keep his word by the time he is fifty. But the Halls know as little what self-denial is as most people know. Do you think it can be easy to learn it at thirty, though one is a clever journalist? Twenty years are not too long a time; until then I am sure poor Frank will want his bones for his own dogs. Of course starving is a pleasant fiction to a man who has been accustomed to soup à la Julienne and iced-coffee, a high seat perched on wheels, a hunter when he fancied one, and a betting-book within modest limits. Then he has had his choice little library, his literary clubs, his runs over the Continent; and no blame to Frank for being used to these things, since he did not abuse them, and they were quite within his means and expectations till this summer."

"Well, if Frank is not as good as his word—though I do not see why you should distrust him—there is Barty Wooler, Phœbe, who has brought us seventeen hundred pounds this week for the sale of two pictures. One thousand seven hundred pounds for two pictures!"

"Yes, mamma; but there are only a very few more pictures, and the stock will be exhausted at last."

"Child, one would think you make troubles. Is there not the annuity which Lord Exmoor is going to settle on me?—and a handsome income it will be, for the Exmoors always do things handsome. And well they may here," continued Mrs. Paston, drawing herself up and smirking. "It is not lost that a friend gets. It is like providing for their own, when a certain wooing, which has been mighty long a-doing indeed—more's the pity—comes off."

"Mamma," pled Phœbe, "do you not see how unlikely, how impossible such a thing is? How could we be at once Lord Exmoor's pensioners, and the obstacle between Lord Wriothesley and his father's wishes for him?"

"If you intend me to think that the Exmoor annuity would be to buy us up, and prevent you ever listening to Lord Wriothesley's addresses," protested Mrs. Paston, "why, I can't and won't think anything so base of the Brockcotes family, which we have always found so kind; and Lady Dorothea as good as an own sister to you, you ungrateful girl. If it is pride and jealousy which won't let you be obliged to the Earl and the Countess, I can only say, Miss Paston, pride comes before a fall, and yours, as well as others', is not far distant."

"Perhaps I have had my fall already," declared Phœbe, softly and sadly. "There is one thing I am absolutely certain of, mamma; it is not for fear of risking my dignity that I would not take assistance from Lord Exmoor, or any other person till I had need of it, and so rob needier claimants. I believe I should not mind throwing my dignity, as you call it, to the winds," added Phœbe wistfully, "if that were all. I might even receive Lord Exmoor's wages to-morrow, supposing everybody would immediately acknowledge that they would disqualify me from rising to the height of him and his, and if I should be for ever freed from this irksome persecution," said Phœbe, passionately.

"I do not know what to make of you, Phœbe," asserted Mrs. Paston, at the crying point, and with her widow's cap very much awry; "unless you are speaking for speaking's sake, or on purpose to vex me. It is very unnatural and unkind of you; but you seem to enjoy raking up disagreeable ideas. Are we to be no better of all these helps, which I was so happy to lay hold of?"

"Much better, mamma," amended Phœbe, cheerfully, "especially of the money which Mr. Wooler has brought. These helps are so many stays to fall back upon, and for that reason we should not waste them, but lay them up for a rainy day. Don't you think so, dear?"

"I am sure I don't know what to think," protested Mrs. Paston, disconsolately. "Things are so contradictory. One day you are to be my lady, and I am to be the countess's mother, and the next we are to be two beggars. I don't seem to know anything, since I have no longer my poor faithful Paston to mind me. He never let on, he was so quiet, and he made a feint of mocking me,—it was his clever way,—but he was faithful, and he always minded, didn't he, Phœbe? I must say, though your uncle Hall is my brother, that if we are to reap no present advantage from Frank Hall, or any of the Halls, it is a regular swindle the manner in which they have gone on with your father's money, while they were living like gentry with their Garnet Lodges, and their carriages, and all their orders. As for that Jane, with her outcry at her husband's income, and her allowance out of other people's pockets besides her father's, she may be glad now to live on her husband's salary, if he can get one."

"I daresay. But the Halls were perfectly entitled to Garnet Lodge while Uncle Hall had a great business, and was accumulating a large private fortune. It is a question whether they will give up Garnet Lodge yet, the cost of the household there is so insignificant an item in the expenditure of the great mercantile concern. And remember, mamma, the House is still standing, and may last, and flourish again more than ever. Indeed, the Halls were never extravagant for their means; Aunt Hall was too proud a woman to care for flashy show without substance. She was always looking forward to her husband's rising above the rest of the Folksbridge merchants; I should not wonder though she were looking forward to it still, and I can fancy she will be a dauntless woman in adversity. And, mamma, I don't think any one can justly say, or that papa would have said, that Uncle Hall betrayed the least trust with respect to our means—little compared to his own, along with which they were risked,” urged Phœbe, respectfully firm. “Papa freely offered his money to Uncle Hall to invest in his trade, that it might bring in a good rate of interest, such as it has brought in for years. We must take that into consideration, too. When papa resolved on the step, he must have been quite aware that he and we must run some risk, and he must have been willing to encounter such a risk. Dear, I would not make things worse by accusations which are surely not only ungenerous, but unjust. They will but serve to warp our judgments, and embitter our tempers, mamma; when if we wait (and we may be thankful we have enough to practise economy and become farmers’ housekeepers with for the present), our money may all come back to us.”

“Well, Phœbe, you are the queerest girl; you would try the patience of Job. First, you won’t let me comfort myself and make the most of our resources and friends; and the next moment you proceed to make the most of your Uncle Hall’s carelessness and bad luck, when a good shout in his ears till they rung again, or a good shaking like I gave you when you were a naughty child, would serve him right.”

“I’ll consent to your administering the shaking, mamma, if you can. It is just on the books that the poor man might have looked out better for us than for himself, and not let our hundreds go with his thousands, yet I think I should have felt rather ashamed of that piece of kindred foresight. Who ought to lose with poor Uncle Hall, if not his own friends?”

“Everybody who knows anything of business, which I don’t pretend to do, Phœbe, will say you are a goose for your pains, after the expensive education you’ve had, too.”

“Very likely. But I am glad you are not a business woman, mamma. I hope I’m not profane to think of it, but you know the Apostle Paul was called mad, and I’ve a notion that he would have been regarded as particularly mad in money matters. It is true, Uncle Hall might have saved us without shame to him and us, but how could he be reasonably expected to remember and provide for our safety, when he was paying away his whole fortune, and his very credit was hanging in the balance? Not one man in a thousand would have been capable of it.”

But even while Phœbe spoke she thought she knew one man who would have been capable of it, who, in all his losses and failures, had shown a decided, though it might be a little gruff and growling, tendency to shield others from “the scathe and the scorn,” to which, merited or unmerited, he had very little hesitation in exposing himself.

Phœbe wrote to Frank Hall—

“DEAR FRANK,—We thank you heartily for your intentions, but are confident there will be no call for their passing into actions, and that your father will die a rich man yet. We are not the less obliged to you.”

Then she wrote to Lady Dorothea—

“DEAR LADY DOROTHEA,—I feel as if I should not mind taking anything from you and Lord Exmoor if we needed it, but we don’t need it, at least not now, and I hope we never shall. My Uncle Hall’s house has been brought to the verge of stopping payment, that is all. If trade improve—as for the good of the country it is to be trusted it will—my uncle will not only recover money which is locked up now, but will start on fresh ventures with honour, which, I am proud for my uncle to say, is unimpeached. We can depend thus on receiving the small matter of interest which is due to us, and we shall have all the security we ever had for the principal. Why should we live in fear and trembling, or plague my poor harassed uncle? May not revolutions occur again, and the great territories of the Latimers be in peril of passing into other hands as they did at the Conquest? And is it not the boast of the Exmoors that they have once and again, at such seasons, jeopardied lands and life for king and country? May not we follow at a distance and hazard in our turn our small private fortunes for the credit of our friends and our class? Is there no Noblesse oblige in the middle rank and the mercantile world also? Forgive me for likening myself to you, Lady Dorothea, but I wish you could see my uncle now. He sets himself to breast the blast and begin life anew, with my aunt standing by and fairly forgetting that she used to take a great deal out of him, and demand special consideration from him for being a Wingfield, of Batty and Wingfield (a Norman mercantile house in these parts, Lady Dorothea), now more eagerly deferential to him than I could have imagined a woman, a little hard and exacting in her better days, could under any circumstances become. For my cousins, they have not had a single serious trouble till now, though they would indignantly deny the statement, as you will observe healthy careless people always are indignant at such a statement,—the healthier and more care-free the more indignant. It is a fact, nevertheless; so what can one expect of my cousins yet?

"Mamma and I are still getting payment—gratifyingly high payment—for papa's remaining pictures. From all these particulars you may rest content on our account, dear friend, that we lack nothing. If our affairs, which are quite hopeful at present, take a turn for the worse, I will apply to you for some old embroidery work with which the Countess and her friends might be able to furnish me, and for which they would be willing to pay at a reasonable rate. I have always had an idea, when I watched Lady Exmoor working at the Countess's hangings, that I could manage something of the kind, become an adept in the old slow stitches, and acquit myself with greater distinction there than you could. Of course it is dreadfully vain of me to say this, but I think the grouping and the shading might come naturally to me as papa's daughter. You know I could sit by mamma, and attend to her while I did the embroidery, and cheated myself with the notion that I was independent. If our purse were really drained, do you believe I could compass so very easy a mode of replenishing it? Tell me frankly, Lady Dorothea."

Phoebe had some pleasure in waiting thus plainly to Lady Dorothea, and proposing for herself work which Thorpie would almost scorn—more pleasure (though it was of a stern kind, which women do not often feel, and feel keenly, if at all) than in putting Barty Wooler on his guard, and receiving his retort in return, as she did when he called that same evening. "Our receipts are all given in good faith," Phoebe put it shyly to the most formidable of her allies and defenders. "Poverty has not come into the house yet, Mr. Wooler. You are not acting in anticipation of the unwelcome visitor?"

"You need not be under the slightest apprehension of my taking such a liberty, Miss Paston. I have done nothing save as your agent. I hope you are not going to insist on my accepting a commission on the sale." It was so grim a jest, that Phoebe withdrew quickly from the altercation.

It was a little indemnification to Phoebe to read something of Barty Wooler in another letter from Lady Dorothea. The something was not in the first paragraph.

"I am so glad that Mr. Wooler is conducting the sale of your father's pictures" (as a matter of course that also had come to Lady Dorothea's ears). "He is the proper person in every respect." ("I know what she means by that phrase," Phoebe told herself, bitterly, as she read the letter. "I wonder what he would think now, if he heard her! She is very provoking, Lady Dorothea, although she is good.") "If you knew it, I have grown from having a cool respect to having an immense opinion of Mr. Wooler. I can tell you a charming story in illustration of his superiority. I am not aware (perhaps you can tell me) whether the Messrs. Clay, of Clay Brothers, have made over Mr. Wooler's inheritance to him during their lives, or whether he has merely great influence in the disposal of their wealth. Be that as it may, when the report that Mr. Blount was going out to settle in Canada reached Folksbridge, Mr. Wooler wrote straightway to him, expressing his faith in the resources of Canada, and proposing to invest capital in land, which he should hold, as a business speculation. Papa and other friends were prepared to come forward with almost any amount of loan which Mr. Blount would accept; but naturally he preferred the accommodation offered by Mr. Wooler, which could be treated entirely as a matter of business, and would leave the debtor under less obligation.

"All things considered, I think the act was a very noble and generous one, and I, for one, am Mr. Wooler's very humble servant for it. The story deserves a place in some family's annals. Who knows but that Mr. Wooler, if he make another hundred thousand in trade, will found a family? I am sure I should be happy and proud, if I survived a generation or two, to know it.

"Until then, as a small return, please tell me, between ourselves, Phoebe, if there is no way in which Wriothesley or Lord Exmoor can back Mr. Hall? Don't think me egotistical and conceited; our class, by its representatives in parliament, once backed the Bank of England."

Lady Dorothea knew now that Noblesse oblige was not a mere aristocratic badge, confined to a narrow section of mankind, but was the motto of all true men and women. Phoebe rejoiced in the knowledge, though she could not claim any personal interest in it. If Lady Dorothea chose to be as dogmatic as of old in imagining that she could, her imagination went wide of the mark. Phoebe's joy was a dumb and gagged joy.

CHAPTER L.—CHANGE UPON CHANGE.

OF the younger women of the Halls, Olive was likeliest her mother, and best stood the test of a sudden reverse of fortune. She was of some use to her family, and evinced resolution and energy in their service. But a great deal of her strength was expended on her anxiety that they should retain Garnet Lodge, and by innumerable sacrifices, preserve as much of the style of living in which they had been reared as was at all consistent with the means of an impoverished merchant. They must sink the carriage; but they would not descend to any public vehicle lower than a fly. Two of the six servants must go, but they must not attempt the establishment at Garnet Lodge without four servants; and the smart housemaid, though she was otherwise an idle, good-for-nothing girl, must be retained for showing in and announcing visitors.

It was not that Olive had the faintest notion of deceiving the public, or of continuing to contract expenses which Mr. Hall could no longer afford. All she sought was to throw a becoming veil over their losses, and to preserve the essentials for remaining in the first society of Folksbridge, only a few of the members of which had not been brought so near insolvency as Mr. Hall. It would be a severe struggle, with all their keeping up of appearances, to maintain their position and not fall out of their orbit. Olive made the admission with some sarcasm to Phœbe.

"There is so much of give-and-take in Folksbridge society—I cannot call it hospitality. Then there is such a pressure from the classes below ours; and the lines of demarcation are so fine and delicate, that no lady in our set can very well relax her rules, or drop her privileges. It is lucky that we have not put off our slight mourning—I beg your pardon, Phœbe, though I need not, for I did not mean to hurt your feelings; but what with lace and tulle, jet ornaments, feathers and flowers, one can have so many nominal changes in black, for a comparative trifle. It is a kind of sham, but still it serves the purpose. In the course of a year or two I hope papa will have recovered some of his bad debts and retrieved his dead losses. He is bent on doing it, dear old man."

"And that is a most honourable object to strive for when others are concerned. I have no doubt he will succeed," said Phœbe.

"Well, I hope so, Phœbe; but do you notice how old he is looking? Though, thank God he is hale and hearty still. But his aim is confined to preserving and restoring the firm. In the meantime, if we do not go out and have people here occasionally, we shall dwindle into nobodies, and it won't signify how much money we may have scraped together again after we are grey-headed. Not a person who does not keep up a little visiting is remembered in Folksbridge above six months. I should have dinned this into your ears, Phœbe, but you seemed inclined to take a flight above us. We cannot follow your example; none of us can hope to have an earl's son for a string to her bow."

Kate was very much prostrated by the change which had come about. It had cost Kate "a true, true love," in addition to a great many indulgences which she had highly prized. She was not capable of the self-restraint and the disinterested regard for others which would have prevented her going about woe-begone and discontented, or lying back in her chair listless and peevish, unless she was drawn out of herself and excited by the prospect of a little subdued gaiety and amusement.

Jane, now that she could levy no more contributions, and reap no more advantages, from the paternal home, drew off from the trouble at Garnet Lodge, and entrenched herself in her separate family circle, and her individual responsibilities and duties. She had enough trouble of her own—she had Walter Connel's well-being to see to—and who would see to it if not his own wife? Of course he must have his usual salary. Her own papa would not be so cruel and unnatural as to hold in there, when he knew she and her little one must live. Jane could tell Olive and Kate that it took every farthing, with changed days, too, to suffice for her, and Walter, and baby, cook, housemaid, and nurse. In place of the monstrosity and the meanness of talking of their doing on less, and removing into a smaller house, Jane wondered Olive and Kate did not give up their pocket-money. She was convinced they had no need of it. It was a different thing with her. She had her husband's wishes and advantages to look to. If Olive and Kate had either means or time to spare, they might think of assisting her, with her poor health, and her darling Wally, whom they had made such a fuss about, and Walter, to whom papa's losses were such a miserable disappointment. Walter had thought of having a share in the business. It was a mercy he had not got one. But if his salary were to be meddled with, really Walter must make up his mind, and transfer his services elsewhere. It would be a trial to leave her father; but Walter owed his first duty to his wife and child, and nobody could say that he failed in his duty."

"It is Jane all over," Olive commented scornfully. "Who ever heard of Walter Connel being of so much consequence as to be consulted and deferred to, till her family had no more loaves and fishes at their disposal? People write of the selfishness of single men and women, but I think it can never match the barefaced selfishness of married couples. To think how Jane grasped and grasped, and Walter Connel did not restrain her, but shared the spoil. I need not tell you, Phoebe, that our servants and our carriage were as much hers as our own. Now, she will not lend mamma her housemaid on washing-days, or come and sit an hour and chat with Kate, when I have to be out, as much incognito as I can keep myself, making the markets, and doing the shopping, which Prain used to spare us."

With all sympathy and forbearance, Phoebe found visits to Garnet Lodge, at the rate of three a week (fewer the Halls would deem neglect), somewhat of a pull on her kinswomanly goodwill, when she was allowed to see her aunt engrossed, Olive worried, and Kate nervous. It was something that it was summer, and that last season's prize-roses—great globes of every shade, from creamy-white to purple-black—blossomed as sweetly and thrived as luxuriantly as if the Halls had not committed them to the care of a jobbing-gardener. In Stephenson Street, on the contrary, the old nymphs of the seasons had become fast young ladies, and were already run to seed in straggling nasturtiums and woody geraniums, brought to premature ripeness in an oven of stone and lime. Notwithstanding, she was always glad to get back to the dull lodgings which were her home, and to the mother who was looking out and wearying for her. And she had other reasons for hurrying back. She had to give sittings to Barty Wooler—appointments in which it would have ill-become her to fail.

These sittings had become the great events of Phoebe's quiet life. They were to her a mingled torment and joy.

CHAPTER LI.—A FEATHER IN BARTY'S CAP.

It was not in Mrs. Paston's nature to see Barty Wooler in Stephenson Street without a revival in her mind of her first destination of Phoebe. There was a violent relapse into all her old vacillation with regard to Lord Wriothesley's long-protracted courtship. The doubts even went to the extent of a temporary abjuring of the young peer's cause. Phoebe had to listen once more to a confused medley of regrets and reproaches, and a multitude of oracular deliverances, to the effect that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, together with almost jaunty assurances that there was life in the old love till the clergyman shook himself into his surplice, and received the ring from the new bridegroom. Then followed a repetition of Mrs. Paston's simple schemes and arts, which she had ample time to play off on Barty Wooler; for she chose, as she said, with a little nod of her ill-balanced head, to chaperon her daughter in the spare room in the lodgings, where Barty Wooler had for the time set up his easel.

Mrs. Paston installed herself as duenna at a respectful distance, so that, while she preserved propriety, she would not be in the way if something did happen.

Phoebe had to shut her eyes to these manœuvres, and struggle to believe that Barty Wooler's eyes were shut to them likewise, while she had to be constantly on the watch to out-manœuvre her mother. In midst of her suffering she remembered clearly and sorrowfully all her former sufferings from the same cause, and the impatient resentment and rancour which they had produced in her. As for Barty, he was always formally apologizing for the number of sittings he had to ask, though there was not one more than was absolutely necessary, as if she must be heartily tired of the task. He was for ever railing at the obligations of a sitting—the long-continued pose, the compulsory yielding to be looked at, the disorder of the veritable workshop. He persisted in taking it for granted that all these were odious to Phoebe.

If he had only known how her heart warmed at realising the least of them again. They were far more than native air and the scenes of her childhood to her. They were dear with all sacred, tender dearness. She sat in the very primrose dress which she had worn as Molly Lepel, feeling it garish and gaudy after her mourning. She was looking down, holding with a drooping hand the handkerchief Barty had given her to hold, as "Peggy, Wife of Lord Balmerino," whom the stout old lord permitted to come and have a last look at him on his way to execution. Phoebe was a world too refined for the homely, somewhat coarse, sensational heroine of the '45; but her air was not out of keeping with the subject of the picture.

a pair of chums when the stooping was on Barty's side. I should say that it was merely a question of time Barty's not having cut out Lord Wriothlesley. If he had come home and settled down sooner, or if Lord Wriothlesley had gone immediately into Parliament, why Barty might have been in the peer's place, and Lord Exmoor delivered from the infliction of a plebeian daughter-in-law."

In the meantime, the Messrs. Clay hobbled up the stairs to the warerooms, among which Barty had contrived to settle himself on his own account, in order to point out to Phœbe the details which she knew a thousand times better than the Messrs. Clay.

The Balmerino was in one of the great warerooms, which presented rows and tiers of huge pack-sheeted bales, and an ample centre space, with one of its side avenues leading to Barty's sitting-room and bedroom.

Barty had already begun to paint Phœbe's figure into the quaint, dismal tragedy. But it did not require more skill and observation than Mrs. Paston possessed to detect at a glance that he was not making an accurate transfer of the likeness. By a few deliberate changes in height and complexion, and a hundred touches imperceptible to the uninitiated, he was breaking up and obscuring the portrait, so that, although it might be a great deal nearer to the buxom afflicted Peggy of Lord Balmerino, it could no longer, save with difficulty, be identified as Phœbe Paston.

"But, but, Mr. Wooler!" stammered Mrs. Paston, "I've not the smallest doubt you are doing the picture every justice, and that this figure is very fine, indeed a deal more strapping than the original, and I could believe to lift the knot from her breast; still it is surely not so good a portrait of Phœbe as the small picture is, and you are not making the two the same. I declare, though I have no doubt it is very stupid of me, I should not know my own child in the group here unless some one had told me previous."

Phœbe did not ask for an explanation, but she looked out of a cloud of perplexity at the two versions of herself.

"I did not want you to know her, Mrs. Paston—at least, I thought the world had better not make the discovery," Barty answered. "On second thoughts, I did not think Paston would have liked to give an exact portrait of his daughter in a picture which was to be offered for sale. And others might not have liked it," he added shortly. "I shall return the copy to you so soon as I have done with it," he took pains to explain to Phœbe, who could find no other mode for the acceptance of a valuable present which was so stiffly made to her than by a quiet acquiescence.

"Barty did not consult us," announced Mr. Jonathan, taking snuff out of an elegantly chased snuff-box, just as Lord Balmerino's compeers might have done; "but I must express my opinion that he has acted with commendable discretion, both in disguising the likeness in the picture, and in proposing to return the sketch," Mr. Jonathan concluded, looking as if he were in the full confidence of all the parties concerned.

"I agree with my brother," chimed in Mr. David, giving still greater indications of having heard the rumour of Lord Wriothlesley's attachment. "Discretion is always called for on a young lady's behalf, and there are cases when its absence would be unpardonable."

"You see we painters have not the same scruple with regard to men's likenesses," Barty interrupted his uncle somewhat impatiently. "My old friend Caleb had certainly me in his eye when he sketched the rough old Trojan Balmerino. I daresay if I had attained full-blown truculence (if I am not already full-blown in that respect and every other), and if I had got the chance to be executed at the Tower when I was a good deal past my prime, I should have chaffed the officials and the headsman, and compared the spectators to 'rotten oranges' in a very similar strain."

In mischief or in malice, Barty had treated the subject of the bluff rebel so that he had brought out a slight resemblance to himself.

"There is no more correspondence than there might have been between Friar Tuck and Martin Luther," protested Phœbe, hotly and angrily; and then she checked herself, for why should she resent Barty Wooler's doing himself dishonour? Was he not biting his moustache, and looking as if the intrusion of the absurd idea of himself in the character of Balmerino were the active motive in the altered rendering of her?

DEBENHAM'S VOW.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S HISTORY."

CHAPTER LIX.—SOMETHING MYSTERIOUS.

THE Morning Post (unapproachable for the nice discretion of its prophetic paragraphs) began with vague hints, ventured by degrees upon more definite auguries, and ended by announcing in due stereotyped phrase that "the marriage of Lord De Benham with Miss Hardwicke, youngest and only surviving daughter of the late Nehemiah Hardwicke, Esq., of Hardwicke Hall, Kent, and Strathellan House, Regent's Park, and niece of the late Alderman Sir Thomas Hardwicke, Knight, of Beechfield House, Hertfordshire, and Bucklersbury, London, was arranged to take place at St. Marylebone parish church on the 25th of next month"—next month being the month of April, 1862, and the paragraph making its appearance in the columns of the Morning Post about the end of the third week in March. Most of the daily papers copied the announcement, and all the weeklies; some with allusion to the affair of the Stormy Petrel; others with an account, more or less detailed, of the noble and ancient family of the De Benhams; nearly all with some kind of reference to the beauty and wealth of the bride.

For several days after this, Archie stayed away from Kensington, dreading lest he should be questioned as to the truth of the announcement; dreading, above all, the look that he feared he should see in Miss Alleyne's eyes. When at length he could endure to absent himself no longer, he went up late one afternoon; knocked at the door just as it was beginning to get dusk; and, contrary to custom, but greatly to his relief for the moment, was ushered into the painting room. Here he found Mr. and Miss Alleyne and two fashionable-looking men, evidently strangers—Mr. Alleyne talking; the strangers listening; Miss Alleyne standing by, arranging the drawings in a portfolio.

Archie saw at the first glance that there was an unusual look about the room. There were no colour-tubes lying about; no bits of smeared rag; no cigar ends; none of the ordinary mess and litter of the studio. And there was no smell of turpentine. But there were three easels standing in the best light, side by side, and on each easel there was a picture.

Miss Alleyne looked up as Archie came in, gave him her hand, and said:—

"You are just in time, Mr. Blyth. The pictures go to-morrow."

But Archie had heard nothing about the pictures.

"Where are they going?" he asked. "What pictures are they?"

"Oh, didn't you know?—three pictures that papa has just finished for the Marquis of Sandilands. They are to be exhibited, and must be sent in to-morrow."

And Miss Alleyne, when she had said this, went on sorting the sketches in the portfolio. From the way in which she spoke, and looked, and bent over the drawings—from the very way in which she averted her eyes before she had done speaking to him—Archie felt sure that she knew it. In the meanwhile, Mr. Alleyne recognised him by a nod and went on discoursing.

"Only an artist," he was saying, "can appreciate the difficulty of treating these subjects. I could not make even Lord Sandilands understand why Kameshill, which is one of the most picturesque old houses in England, should need so much management. He would have had me take it full front, with all those windows and terraces, and that immense line of ornamented parapet showing against the sky. 'There, Mr. Alleyne,' he said, 'the house is a picture. You have only to paint it as you see it.' I replied that I must treat the subject in my own way. 'I have heard, my lord,' I said, 'of an artist who painted a profile portrait of a Polynesian chief, and was hung for treasonably depicting royalty with only half a face. Now, although I apprehend no such summary vengeance at your lordship's hands, I prefer to tell you beforehand that I must take Kameshill at an angle, and throw those endless parallels into perspective—or not take it at all.”

“By Jove, now, that wasn’t bad!” said one of the strangers; a tall, gentlemanly-looking man, with mustachios some nine inches in length. “I should like to have seen Sandilands’ face when you compared him to the South Sea islander.”

“But I thought he knew so much about pictures, and statues, and all those things,” remarked the other—a red-headed young man with a glass in his eye. “The house in Park Lane is full of them.”

“It is one thing, Sir Reginald, to judge of a picture when it is painted, and another to tell beforehand how it ought to be painted,” said Mr. Alleyne.

“Ah, no doubt. For instance, I know whether a coat fits or don’t fit—no one better; but I’ll be hanged if I could tell you how to cut it out.”

“That great and good man, George the Fourth, would have beaten you there, then, my dear fellow,” said the gentleman who had spoken first; “for he used to cut out his own august coats with his own royal hands. He was a great friend of the late marquis, Mr. Alleyne. I remember they used to show a suite of rooms at Kameshill, called the Prince Regent’s apartments.”

“They are called so still,” replied Mr. Alleyne. “And there is a delightful room overlooking the Italian Garden that used to be Sheridan’s room. I had it all the time I was down there last autumn.”

Then turning to Archie, he said:—

“So I hear, Mr. Blyth, that your friend Lord De Benham is to marry Miss Hardwicke.”

It had come now, with a vengeance. Archie coloured crimson.

“Ah, you saw that in the Morning Post,” he said, confusedly.

“And in a dozen other papers. I suppose it is true?”

“Well—yes; I suppose so.”

His ears tingled as he spoke. He did not dare to look at Miss Alleyne. In the meanwhile, the two strangers, hearing him addressed as a friend of De Benham, were observing him with some curiosity; and this added to his confusion.

“I am glad of it,” said Mr. Alleyne. “He ought to be a very happy man. He gets both beauty and fortune. Miss Hardwicke, I think, is your cousin, Mr. Blyth?”

“A sort of cousin,” said Archie, hesitatingly, “once or twice removed.”

He would have been glad just at that moment to deny the relationship altogether, if with truth he could have done so.

“I certainly never saw so handsome a woman,” continued Mr. Alleyne. “If I were twenty years younger, I should inevitably break my heart for her.”

And now the visitors went away, conducted by Mr. Alleyne, who took them into the dining-room en passant to see a genuine Constable that he had just picked up in some obscure part of the town. For Mr. Alleyne loved to buy a good picture now and then, and had some of which he was justly proud—an undoubted Sir Joshua, and a Roman bit by Wilson, among the rest.

“We have had people coming and going in this way all yesterday and to-day,” said Miss Alleyne, when they had left the room. “And they are all so stupid, and they all say the same things. It is weary work!”

“So I should think,” said Archie. And there he stopped. He could not have started a fresh topic to save his life; yet he would have given anything to be able to go on talking.

Miss Alleyne closed the folio abruptly, and went and stood by the stove; for the studio was warmed by a German stove up in the darkest corner—a square, white-tiled stove, with a long black chimney going out through the wall. Miss Alleyne, as she bent over the fire, stood with her back to Archie and to the pictures.

“Mr. Blyth,” she said presently, and the voice in which she spoke was very low—as low as a whisper—but quite clear and steady; “why did you not tell me?”

“How could I?” said Archie. “How could I give you that pain?”

“Pain!” she repeated quickly. “But when there is pain to be borne, is it not better that one should bear it at once, and get it over?”

To this, Archie, not feeling sure that the pain would have been so readily got over, said nothing.

“How long have you known it?” she said next.

“Not many weeks.”

“How many weeks? Three—four—six?”

“About five or six.”

“And they are to be married in a month—in less than a month. How strange it seems!”

Again Archie was silent; partly because he perceived that she was speaking more to herself than to him; partly, also, from a vague consciousness that the less he said the better it might be.

When she next spoke, it was again to ask a question; and this time her voice wavered a little.

"Do you think she will make him—happy?"

"I—upon my word, I can't tell," said Archie. "I shouldn't think so. She would not make me happy, I know."

"But if she loves him"

Archie shrugged his shoulders.

"And if he loves her"

"I don't believe he cares for her one bit," said Archie, bluntly; "nor she for him."

Miss Alleyne turned suddenly, with a look almost of terror in her face. "Oh no, Mr. Blyth," she exclaimed, "you do not mean that! It is impossible."

"I do mean it. It is just a marriage of convenience—he buys money, and she buys rank. So far as I can see, there is not even a pretence of love on either side."

Miss Alleyne sat down, and covered her face with her hands.

"How horrible!" she said, shuddering.

"People do it every day."

"But what people? Not such as—as"

Archie bit his lip, not to say the bitter thing that came first.

"Not people who are true and faithful," he replied. "Not such as yourself, Miss Alleyne."

"True and faithful!" she repeated, with a heavy sigh. "It seems to me that I shall never believe in truth or fidelity again."

"Don't say that, Miss Alleyne—pray, don't say that! There is one at least who would be true—for ever—no matter what happened—who loves you a thousand times better than De Benham ever loved you There! I know I ought not to have said it. I know it's of no use I've gone and made an ass of myself, and now you'll tell me not to come to the house any more, and I shall be the most miserable dog in London."

"Oh, Mr. Blyth! I am so sorry."

It was all she said; but in her face there was surprise and compassion, and in her voice, infinite sweetness.

"Are you sorry? Then don't send me away."

At this moment Mr. Alleyne came back, pleased and smiling.

"Two very agreeable, gentlemanly fellows, those," he said; "Colonel Bamfylde and Sir Reginald Galbraith—acquaintances of Lord Sandilands. They have invited me to dine with them to-morrow evening at the Erec-theum. That Sir Reginald is a young man of fine position and still finer prospects—a baronet; owner of large estates up in the north; and heir presumptive to his cousin, the Earl of Invercairn. His mother, if I remember rightly, was a Carnegie. He has the Carnegie eyes and hair. I have no other engagement for to-morrow—have I, Juliet? None, certainly, of any importance, or I should have remembered it."

"You had asked Mr. Prosser and his brother for the evening," replied Miss Alleyne.

"Mr. Prosser and his brother? Ah, well—you can write a line to put them off. By the way, I promised to lend that young Prosser my Prout's 'Light and Shadow.' You can send it round with the note. And now, my love, as I presume we have done with visitors for to-day, I hope you are going to give us some tea."

But Archie grasped his hat, and declared that he must go.

"What, so soon? Well, I fear the tea has been in the drawing-room since four, and is no longer worth pressing upon you. Will you dine with us on Sunday, jeune homme?"

Poor Archie! it was the first time Mr. Alleyne had ever invited him to dinner; and the invitation, as he well knew, indicated a high degree of favour. He would have given his ears to accept it. He hesitated. He stole a furtive glance at Miss Alleyne, who had gone back to the folio, and was tying it up, busily. Then, sorely tempted though he was, he declined.

"I—I'm afraid I mustn't next Sunday," he said. "I am very sorry. I should like it above everything."

And again he glanced at Miss Alleyne. The least look or smile of welcome would have been enough; but neither look nor smile were forthcoming. So he went away disconsolate.

"I wish you were not in such haste," said Mr. Alleyne, accompanying him to the door. "I wanted you to tell me all about this wedding—is it true that the lady has two hundred thousand pounds?"

"Oh, more—ever so much more," replied Archie, half-way down the steps.

"Que diable! What a matrimonial prize—a woman who is as rich as if she was ugly, and as beautiful as if she was poor!"

But Archie was already out of hearing; so Mr. Alleyne, who hated his good things to be lost, went back and repeated the epigram for his daughter's benefit.

Ah, me! how hard it is sometimes to listen, and smile, and stay the wandering thoughts! Mr. Alleyne little guessed with how heavy a heart his pretty Juliet praised that sorry jest.

In the meanwhile, Archie turned away from the house, cursing his unlucky stars, and despairing over the folly he had committed. What demon prompted him to speak at such a moment? Never, surely, since he had gone backwards and forwards to the house, could he have fallen upon a more evil hour for his declaration. Had he not been telling himself all along that his only chance—if indeed he had any chance at all—must be far, far distant, when De Benham's marriage was over, and things had fallen back into their accustomed grooves? Had he not resolved within himself to wait and serve in silence, earning her friendship, deserving her trust, surrounding her with small observances, and betraying himself by no word or look till the time came when he felt that he might speak out the love that was in him? And now—fool that he was!—had he not thrown his chance away, perhaps for ever?

He would have patronised the roof of an omnibus most nights, and gone back to town sub Jove, blissfully smoking his cigar; but he was in no mood just now for those cheap metropolitan joys. So he set off walking fast and furiously, not without a strong inclination to knock his head against every wall he came to; and chewed the bitter cud of his reflections by the way.

Striding eastward and, like a born Londoner, instinctively taking the most direct road, he went through Kensington Gardens, struck across the Park to Grosvenor Gate and followed the line of Grosvenor Street, intending to enter Regent Street by Maddox Street, and so steer his way home through Oxford Street, Great Russell Street, and Southampton Row. By the time he had crossed the Park and got to Grosvenor Gate, the lamplighters were going their rounds and it was getting rapidly dusk. In Grosvenor Street he slackened his pace a little, having walked off some of his impatience; and as he crossed Bond Street into Lower Maddox Street, going up towards St. George's Hanover Square, there came upon him agreeable reminiscences of a certain smoking mixture which he remembered to have bought once upon a time over the counter of a gloomy little tobacconist's shop in an equally gloomy little side street called Mill Street, which runs down at an angle at the back of the church and opens into Conduit Street just against that corner shop where dwelt whilome one Rodwell, beloved of book-fanciers. Following the bent of his reminiscence, Archie then turned aside, sought and found the shop, and requested the Israelitish damsel in attendance to provide him with half a pound of the mixture aforesaid. This transaction effected, he purchased also a cigar, and lit it by the aid of a little gas-jet in a glass shade placed especially for that purpose at the door of the shop.

Now it happened that the shop was ill-lighted and the street at this point narrow and dark, so that the daylight having quite faded from above, this little gas-jet cast quite a friendly gleam across the pavement. Standing beside the gleam, though not in the path of it, Archie, having lit his cigar and put his half-pound of mixture in his pocket, then waited for a few moments at the door, looking out absently, and thinking still of the unlucky thing that he had done.

Presently a Hansom cab came rattling at full speed round by the church, and drew up at the entrance of Mill Street, about eight houses from the tobacconist's. From this cab a gentleman alighted somewhat slowly and feebly, examined the contents of his purse under the street-lamp at the corner, and paid the driver. It was now so dark and his thoughts were so busy elsewhere, that until his attention was arrested by something familiar in the gentleman's appearance and something odd in his manner of proceeding, Archie saw, but saw without observing, this commonest of street incidents.

The gentleman, it has been said, alighted and dismissed his cab. He then, however, stood still for some seconds, looking anxiously back in the direction by which he had come, and up Maddox Street towards Regent Street to the left, and down Mill Street towards Conduit Street straight ahead—like a man anxious to escape observation, and to make certain that he is not being followed. This done, he came down Mill Street, stooping somewhat in his gait, and passed the tobacconist's door so closely that if Archie had not involuntarily drawn back their coats would have almost brushed together as he went by.

At that moment the light of the gas jet fell full upon him, and Archie recognised De Benham.

First surprise, then blank wonder, kept Archie for the moment from darting out upon his friend and hailing him, as at any other time he would have done. He waited—looked after him—watched him to the corner of Conduit Street, and there saw him pause again, and again look cautiously round in every direction as before. Then, having satisfied himself, apparently, that he was not being tracked, he crossed over, following the continuation of Mill Street on the other side of the road. But before he was halfway across Conduit Street, Archie was at his heels.

CHAPTER LX.—AN INVALID'S WHIM.

THE continuation of Mill Street after crossing Conduit Street inclines a little to the right, narrows presently into an alley for foot-passengers, and ends in a covered way opening upon the north end of Saville Row. It is just one of those odd, grimy little nooks and corners which are the delight of curiosity-hunters and lovers of bookstall literature, no less than of business men, telegraphic messengers, and the rest of that hurried class which is always in search of a short cut. It was down this alley and through this covered passage that Archie followed Temple De Benham into Saville Row.

Where could he be going at this hour, in the dark, with so much precaution? Why all this care not to be seen? Why all this mystery? It is to be feared that Archie, when he started in pursuit of his friend's footsteps, never stopped to ask himself whether, if mystery there were, he had any right to attempt to search out the heart of it.

Meanwhile De Benham crossed the turning to New Burlington Street and went down the east side of Saville Row. Archie followed, on the opposite pavement. About half-way down, De Benham suddenly stopped and looked round. Archie, on the watch for some such movement, fell back into the shelter of a doorway, and waited as if to be let in. Then De Benham quickened his pace; hurried on a few yards farther; knocked at the door of a house that seemed rather larger than most of its neighbours; and was immediately admitted.

It was a gloomy-looking house, showing no gleam of light from any of its numerous windows. Archie crossed over and examined it. There was a brass plate upon the door, and a brass number. He could just distinguish the number; but there was no street-lamp near, and the night was now so dark that he found it impossible to make out the name upon the plate. He even took off his glove and tried to feel out the letters, but in vain. Just then, a policeman came by and looked at him suspiciously. At the same moment he heard a sound of footsteps and voices within; so he darted down the steps with as much alacrity as if he had been contemplating a burglary. He then went as far as the entrance to the Albany, and there waited for a quarter of an hour or more, watching the house, and wondering how soon De Benham would come out. Soon it began to rain heavily; whereupon Archie abandoned his post, turned off into Vigo Street, and took refuge in a decent-looking little coffee-shop, where he called for half a pint of coffee and the Post-office London Directory.

He soon found what he sought—the street, the number, and the name. And the name was familiar to him, for it was that of a famous surgeon, a baronet, an author, a man of European reputation; one of the shining lights of the scientific world—Sir Bartholomew Baxter.

So now the mystery was explained, and Archie, as he sipped his coffee, wondered that he had not guessed it from the first. Was not Saville Row peopled with healers of men? and was not De Benham, despite his asseverations to the contrary, not only in bad health, but, as it should seem, in just that stage of bad health when, without apparently having anything definite the matter with him, a man seems daily to take less and less hold upon life? That he should visit his doctor by stealth was of one piece, after all, with his obstinacy in refusing to admit that he was ailing. The incomprehensible thing, however, was that any sensible man should feel ashamed of being ill. For if he was not ashamed of it, what other motive could he have in denying it? Was he unwilling to alarm his mother? If so, he might be quite sure that his looks had already alarmed that tender heart quite sufficiently. Or was it that, being on the eve of marriage, he feared lest any confession of illness on his part might give cause for delay?

Well, be all this as it might, it was some satisfaction to know that De Benham was taking care of himself at last, and that he had placed himself in such good hands as those of Sir Bartholomew Baxter.

Having settled these questions with himself, Archie dismissed the subject from his mind; and but for something that happened about a week later, would almost have forgotten it.

Now, all the world knows that the renowned Mr. Poole who lights up so beautifully on the evening of every ninth of November, and who is justly proud of the privilege of making coats and other garments for a certain High and Puissant and deservedly popular Personage, hath his shop—or, more politely, his place of business—in Saville Row. Those who do not know this fact—who are not penetrated, so to speak, with the fame and praise of Poole and his "so-potent art"—are simply barbarians, anthropophagi, dwellers in Cimmerian darkness. Not so Archibald Blyth. He had long since worshipped from afar off. He had long since cherished a fond but hopeless ambition. That ambition he now resolved for once to gratify.

He would have a suit from Poole, to wear at De Benham's wedding.

The occasion justified the deed. Never again, most surely, would it be Archie's destiny to act as best man to a lord.

So he repaired again to Saville Row about a week after the date of his evening adventure; and this time he went very early in the morning, between eight and nine o'clock, going all that distance out of his way before business-hours in the City. Mr. Poole's aristocratic employés were themselves only just arriving, and doubtless took it somewhat ill that any customer should intrude upon them at that unwonted season. Archie, however, gave his order; was measured; and came forth rejoicing; and lo! as he emerged once more upon the street, he found himself face to face with Temple De Benham.

"What!—Archie?" said De Benham, evidently disconcerted. "Who would have dreamed of meeting you here—and at this hour of the morning!"

"Is that so wonderful? Well now, the last time I met you here, it was in the evening; and you were going into Sir Bartholomew Baxter's."

De Benham changed colour.

"What do you mean?" he said, angrily. "What business . . ."

And having got so far, he checked himself in some confusion.

But Archie, remembering that he had to do with a sick man, already regretted the retort.

"What business is it of mine?" he said, gently. "Well, it is so far my business that I am thankful to know you are at last doing the right thing. What does Sir Bartholomew say to you?"

"You are gratuitously assuming that I went to him as a patient," said De Benham, looking more and more annoyed.

"Of course, I assume it. But there!—keep your own counsel, if you prefer it."

They were strolling slowly up the street as they talked; and now, having reached the top, turned as by tacit agreement, and strolled slowly back again. Not till they had so turned, did De Benham speak again.

"If I do keep my own counsel, Archie," he said at length, "it is from no want of regard, or gratitude, towards yourself. I do not forget how you nursed me day and night when I was sick, and helpless, and almost dying. I can never forget that, dear old fellow." (And here he put his hand affectionately through Archie's arm.) "But—but it may be that I am more nervous about myself than I need be—and without sufficient cause—and that, having made up my mind to say nothing to any one . . . I'm sure, however, you understand what I mean."

"I don't know what you wish me to understand," said Archie, bluntly; "but what I do understand is, that you believe yourself to be in a bad way, and wish to keep it secret from every one but the doctor."

De Benham almost stamped with impatience.

"No—no—no," he said, irritably. "You wholly misapprehend me. I do not believe that I am in a bad way. I don't doubt that I even fancy myself worse than I am. And I know that I have no kind of organic disease—none whatever. Sir Bartholomew Baxter assures me of it."

"Then I can't see why . . ."

"That is precisely it. You can't see why I should be reserved about it; and I can't make you see why—except that it is just an invalid's whim. Still, an invalid's whim, I should suppose, is reason enough."

"Oh, certainly."

"You'll oblige me by saying nothing about it?"

"About what?" said Archie.

"Well—about our present conversation."

"All right. I won't mention it."

"Nor—nor yet about Sir Bartholomew Baxter."

Archie gave the required promises; but added that he wished he could know for certain that De Benham was less ill than he looked.

"It doesn't matter how I look," De Benham replied, "so long as there is nothing organically wrong. Change of air and scene are all I need. Before I have been a month away, I shall be stronger than ever."

And then he looked at his watch, and declared that he had not another moment to spare.

"I have an appointment," he said, "at a quarter before nine; and it is that already."

"You're just at the door, however," replied Archie, taking his destination for granted.

Again De Benham reddened, and looked vexed.

"Very true," he said, hastily. "Very true. By the way, Sir Bartholomew doesn't know who I am, or anything about me—so be sure you never come inquiring if I am here, or anything of that sort.”

“No, no—not I.”

“And you will keep your promises faithfully, I know.”

To which Archie once more responded, “All right;” and then, being arrived at Sir Bartholomew’s house, they shook hands and parted.

CHAPTER LXI.—ANTE-NUPTIAL.

THE month that elapsed between the date of the announcement in the Morning Post and the eventful twenty-fifth of April, went by as such intervals are wont to go by; that is to say busily, and therefore quickly. Miss Hardwicke was absorbed for the most part in the ordering of her trousseau, and De Benham in the study of estimates, architectural drawings, and so forth; for he was now fast setting the works on foot at Benhampton, and arranging how they should be carried forward in his absence. His mother, too, for whose use a special suite of rooms was to be prepared in the new building, had decided to settle meanwhile in a furnished house that happened just then to be vacant about halfway between Monmouth and Benhampton; and he was anxious to establish her in her new home before he left England. It was a pretty little house enough, with a garden, a paddock, and accommodation for a pony and chaise; but it wanted many comforts, to supply which took up no small share of the young man’s time and thoughts. And then, besides all this, there were settlements to be drawn up, and a world of subsidiary matters to be attended to on all hands.

It so happened, therefore, that the engaged people did not see very much of each other in these days. De Benham was continually going down into Monmouthshire; and by-and-by Miss Hardwicke also left town, having elected to spend the last fortnight of her maiden life at her brother’s seat in Kent—an old, rambling, gabled, turreted, red-brick mansion of the Elizabethan period, purchased by her father some forty years before.

De Benham, however, ran over twice to Hardwicke Hall in the course of that last fortnight; arriving the first time about an hour before dinner and leaving early the next morning, and remaining the second time from Saturday to Monday. But there was even then so much business to be discussed, that his visits had in them as little of the character of a lover’s visits as can well be imagined. Their talk when they were together was of wings and gateways, machicolations and battlements, capitals, mouldings, traceries, and the like; sometimes, also, of investments and land; but of happy years to come, and tender promises, and sweet hopes reaching far into the golden future—never.

Still, De Benham went creditably through the business of his part; especially on the occasion of his last visit to Hardwicke Hall—going to Church on the Sunday, for instance, and sitting next to Claudia in the great cushioned family pew, at both morning and afternoon service; sharing her hymn-book when they sang; walking with her in the grounds after luncheon; and fulfilling all those devoirs and observances due from an engaged man towards the lady by whom he is to be made happy in less than a week. For when De Benham went down into Kent that Saturday afternoon, they were to be married in London on the following Thursday.

Yet, even now, as he walked by her, and talked to her, and sat with her, and called her by her name, it seemed to him as if he could not believe that she was in truth to be his wife—that in the course of a few more days they two were to be indissolubly united—that for at least the next eight or ten months, if not for a still longer time, they were to be utterly alone together, strangers in strange lands—strangers even to each other. What should they talk about, he sometimes asked himself, in those long evenings which they must soon be spending together in solitary Swiss and Italian hotels? What pursuits, what tastes were they likely to have in common? Should he ever know her much more intimately than he knew her now? And then he thought with a kind of blank despair of that far-off time when, if they both lived, they should both have grown old and weary—wearied of the long years, and wearied of each other.

“I really think we had better push on at once for Amiens,” said he, as they sat together that Sunday evening with a travelling map of Europe spread out between them on the table. “We leave London Bridge, you see, by the tidal train at twelve, and arrive at Boulogne at six thirty-five. A couple of hours more would carry us to Amiens, where, instead of the dirt and noise of Boulogne, we find a quaint old town, and a fine cathedral.”

“I detest Boulogne,” said Miss Hardwicke.

“You don’t think it would make the journey too fatiguing?”

“Not for me. We have generally gone through to Paris without stopping.”

"Our rooms in Paris are engaged," said De Benham. "I have stipulated for a salon overlooking the garden of the Tuileries."

"That will be very pleasant," she replied.

And then, for a few minutes, they were both silent. Mr. Hardwicke, meanwhile, was dozing over his paper in the adjoining drawing-room.

"I have calculated that we shall be at Lucerne about Saturday week," De Benham said, presently. "That is allowing five whole days in Paris, one day from Paris to Troyes, another from Troyes to Basle, and the last from Basle to Lucerne."

"The best hotel at Lucerne," said Miss Hardwicke, "is the Schweizerhof."

"I fear there is not much novelty for you in Switzerland, Claudia," said De Benham.

"I don't care for novelty," she replied, indifferently.

"The greater part of Italy, however, will be new to you."

"Yes. I know only Florence and Milan."

"See," said De Benham, running his finger along the map as he spoke, "here lies our route:—Florence—Rome—Naples—Sicily—Cephalonia—Corinth—Athens—the Dardanelles—Constantinople. Now we reach our limit, and begin to turn our faces westward. Constantinople to Trieste by steamer—Venice—Vienna—Prague—Dresden—Berlin—the Hague—Amsterdam—home."

"It is an immense journey" said Miss Hardwicke.

"We are not obliged to carry out our programme; we can turn back when we please."

"Of course."

And then they were silent again.

"We have undertaken a still longer journey together, Claudia," De Benham said, presently, trying hard to infuse some little tenderness into his voice. "I trust it will be a—happy one."

"I trust so too," she answered; 'not lifting her eyes, however, from the map.

"It depends, I suppose, upon ourselves."

"I suppose so."

He looked at her as if he would read her through and through; but there was nothing to read—not the slightest passing tremor, not the faintest variation of colour. Her voice was as level, her attitude as indifferent, as if they were discussing probabilities of rain or sunshine.

Just then the Twin Giants made their appearance, each carrying a mahogany form, which he placed close against the front drawing-room door. Then came the butler with a reading-desk and a pyramid of prayer-books, and deposited the same with much solemnity upon the table at which his master was sitting; the women-servants followed next, in order of domestic precedence; and lastly the two coachmen and three grooms. The household being now all assembled, De Benham and Claudia came in from the farther drawing-room, and Mr. Hardwicke read prayers.

Then the servants trooped out again in single file; the bedroom candles were brought; and Mr. Hardwicke, having invited De Benham to a cigar in the library, discreetly withdrew.

"It is good-bye, Claudia, as well as good-night," said the young man, when they were left alone. "I shall be gone to-morrow morning before your breakfast hour."

"You really take the first train?"

"I must, in order that my mother may not be travelling too late."

"Lady De Benham has not yet seen her house?"

"Not yet; nor has she visited Benhampton since my father was buried there."

"I hope she will like the cottage," said Miss Hardwicke.

"Aye—and the servants, and the pony and chaise . . . if she is not too lonely."

"It will amuse her to watch the progress of the building."

"Yes—and she will have my letters. . . . However, this is but a flying visit. I bring her back again on Wednesday."

Miss Hardwicke took up her candle.

"You also go to town on Wednesday?" said De Benham.

"At the latest."

"Then we meet no more till Thursday morning—in the church, Claudia."

And as he said this, De Benham took her hand, and tried again to make his accents sound more lover-like.

Miss Hardwicke smiled faintly.

"Good-night," she said, withdrawing her hand, and moving towards the door.

"Good-night," he replied, and touched her cheek lightly with his lips. And then he went down for half-an-hour and smoked a cigarette with his future brother-in-law in the big Gothic library down-stairs.

He left the house next morning before seven, and was driven to the station by Mr. Hardwicke. Claudia, who never breakfasted before nine, was not even awake when he went away. All that day his mother and he were travelling down to Monmouth, and in the evening they supped together in a sitting-room of the Beaufort Arms hotel, overlooking the market place. The next morning they started early, and went to see the little home that he had prepared for her use:—a charming cottage embowered in roses, with a rustic verandah, a thatched roof, and a garden nearly two acres in extent. Here Lady De Benham found on the walls engravings from her favourite pictures; in the bookcase, copies of her favourite authors; in her stable and coach-house, a shaggy-looking pony and a basket-chaise, with a seat behind for the smart groom who stood by, hat in hand, waiting to put the pony in and drive his new mistress to Benhampton. Seeing with what love and care her son had provided all these things for her comfort, Lady De Benham tried to forget for awhile that she was so soon to be parted from him, and to be as happy as he desired that she should be.

From the cottage, they drove in the new chaise to Benhampton, where they found a crowd of masons already at work upon the outer walls, and a clerk of the works established in the little nook which used to be occupied by the Bowstead family. Having gone over every part of the ruins, and compared the existing remains with the architect's plans and drawings, they then walked down the hill together, to the church. Here Lady De Benham, who had crossed that threshold but once before, and then on the saddest day in all her life, knelt down under the north window against the chancel, bowed her face upon her hands, and murmured a prayer over the spot where lay the husband of her youth.

"It was nearly twenty years ago," she said, rising up, pale and tearful. "Twenty sorrowful years ago—but it seems like yesterday."

"It was yesterday—it is to-day," replied her son, mournfully. "There is no past for those who love."

They walked round the church, and looked at the monuments.

"They were a goodly family," said Lady De Benham; "and you, Temple, are the last of their name and race."

"I would I were not so," he replied, gloomily.

"It seems incredible that—that he should be no nearer to us now, and no more, than one of these."

"Nay, mother, one may do worse than go over to so noble a majority."

Lady De Benham shook her head, and smiled sadly.

"Alas! my son," she said. "A majority of dust and ashes!"

The young man looked round, and his eye kindled.

"Diamond dust, then—every grain of it!" he said, proudly. "See, mother—two years ago I stood before that altar, in the presence of these dead, and I vowed, because they were my people and for the sake of the name I bore, to win back the lands they had won; and to build up the house they had built; and to be, for their honour more than for my own, De Benham of Benhampton. I have kept my vow—in two years—in two short years!"

As he said this, his colour changed and he leaned against a pillar for support.

"It is nothing," he faltered. "Only the old giddiness."

"Your hand is cold—you tremble! Oh, the fatal vow! I see it all now—and you have sacrificed your health to keep it."

"I would do it again," he answered, recovering himself by an effort. "I would sacrifice all that I have sacrificed twice over—aye, ten times over—to achieve the same end."

"Heaven grant that you have not sacrificed your happiness too, my own boy!" said Lady De Benham, with a pang of apprehension. "I have sometimes feared of late . . ."

He interrupted her by an imperious gesture.

"Hush!" he exclaimed. "Not a word of that, mother. Shall we go out into the air?"

CHAPTER LXII.—A MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

THE morning of the 25th of April dawned grey, and misty, and cold. To say that it rained would be incorrect, and to say that it was merely damp would be even less true. But an almost inappreciable and constantly descending moisture filled the atmosphere, clouded the windows, brought down the blacks by myriads, and covered pavements, and balconies, and iron railings, with a horrible cold perspiration. The streets looked inexpressibly dismal—only a little less dismal than the squares. The parks—especially the Regent's Park—were sloughs of despond. It was a day to chill the marrow in one's bones, to promote emigration, to foster meditations upon suicide, to do anything, in short, but get married.

De Benham, rising at seven after an almost sleepless night, sick and shivering from his tub, stealing noiselessly past his mother's bedroom-door, and tearing down to Saville Row in a Hansom before eight, looked out upon the dreary pavement and the murky sky with a kind of grim satisfaction. For in his heart all was gloom and despondency, and the cheerless weather befitted the cheerlessness of his mood.

"Do you think I shall live?" he said, abruptly, having been closeted with Sir Bartholomew Baxter for some ten minutes or more, and rising to take his leave.

"Certainly, if you are but commonly careful of your general health," replied the great man.

"I will try to be so."

"You ought not, for instance, to travel in such weather as this. Can you not put off your journey till to-morrow?"

"Impossible."

"Why impossible, when to do so is essential to . . ."

"Because at half-past ten this morning I am to be hung, and at twelve precisely my remains are to be conveyed out of the country," interrupted De Benham, with a bitter smile; "that is to say, I am about to be married."

Sir Bartholomew looked the surprise which he was too polite to express.

"In that case," he said, "I cannot do better for you than pass you on to my friend, Dr. Cherbuliez, of Paris. See him daily, as long as you remain there; and, for the rest, avoid all extremes of climate, and lead the simplest life in your power."

"Many thanks," said De Benham. "I will do my best. Good morning, Sir Bartholomew."

"Good morning, Mr. Temple."

And then "Mr. Temple" got into his cab, was driven home at a gallop, and stole up again to his bedroom before Lady De Benham dreamed that he was more than half way through his morning toilette.

In the meanwhile Claudia, seated before her glass and surrounded by her tirewomen, scarcely observed the weather. She saw that the day was dull, but she did not even know that it was cold. For to the luxurious bedrooms of Strathellan House, with their double windows and doors, heavy portière curtains, and carpets of Wilton and Axminster pile, no chill or damp from the outer world could possibly penetrate.

As she sat thus—one of her maids brushing her long hair, another going noiselessly to and fro between the bedroom and dressing-room, finishing the packing of her travelling trunks; the dressmaker and the dressmaker's assistant waiting in respectful silence till it should come to their turn to attire her in that gorgeous dress of creamy satin and delicate lace already displayed upon the bed—Claudia Hardwicke leaned back with half-closed eyes and folded hands, and told herself that she was well content with the life she had chosen.

Estimating her beauty and fortune at their value, she had resolved from her earliest childhood to achieve position. It was the one good thing which she prized above all other good things of the world. Living ever among moneyed citizens, she had come to aspire almost passionately to that purer and finer air in which the upper ten thousand live and have their being. And now this good thing was to be hers; this finer air to be her daily atmosphere. Already she saw herself mistress of a spacious town-house in Grosvenor or Portman Square, going to court, driving in the Park with her powdered footmen and her coroneted carriage, entertaining, visiting, presiding over the opening festivities at Benhampton Castle, holding her own among the noblest in the land.

And even now, as she sat before her glass, she had but to lift her eyes and feast them with evidences of this brilliant future. On yonder chair stood her new dressing-case (one of her brother's many costly gifts), with its superb fittings of gold and ivory—every stopper, every lid, every hairbrush in it, engraved with her coronet and cipher. On the dressing-table before her, grouped in two large cases, lay Mr. Hardwicke's latest offering—a suite of emeralds and pearls, necklace and tiara, earrings, bracelets, and brooch; a truly royal gift, brought to her bedside this very morning before she was awake, and entered in Emmanuel's books at a price not to be expressed in less than five numerals. And there, too, upon another table close by, lay heaped a variety of other presents, all more or less declaratory of the wealth of the donors.

As Claudia Hardwicke looked round upon these things, and thought these thoughts, a feeling of triumph swelled in her heart, and again she told herself that she had done well and wisely, and that her lot in life was pre-eminently fortunate.

Let it not be concluded, however, that the man whom she was about to marry went for nothing in this estimate. He stood in it for an important item. Miss Hardwicke was proud of Temple De Benham—proud of his ancient and noble descent, of his seniority among his peers, of his personal gifts, of his resolute character, his gallantry, his enterprise, his success. She compared him with the men whom she had met in society, and she knew that she preferred him before them all. Lord Stockbridge, though an Earl and a man of fashion, was not to be named in the same breath. Of love, in the true acceptation of the word—intense, devoted, passionate, irresponsible—Miss Hardwicke knew nothing, and desired to know nothing. Had any one ventured to tell her that she was even capable of such love, she would have deemed herself insulted by the supposition. But she knew herself to be capable of a decided preference, and this preference she accorded without reservation to Temple De Benham.

So the morning hours wore on, and bride and bridegroom, and many a guest in different parts of the town, prepared for the feast, and put on their wedding garments; for there were between thirty and forty invited to the ceremony, and a hundred and fifty to the breakfast; and in the evening there was to be an immense party, and dancing in the great ball-room built out by Mr. Hardwicke when his sister came of age. Meanwhile, Gunter's men, in shirt-sleeves and aprons, were busy in the dining-room preparing the breakfast; and in Marylebone Church were pew-openers bustling to and fro, dusting the hassocks, uncovering the altar-cloth, and putting things straight in the vestry; and the curates, in a flutter of expectation, were awaiting the arrival of the Right Rev. Lord Bishop, who was to perform the ceremony; and the beadle was arraying himself, like Solomon, in all his glory; and chill and shivering were the bridesmaids as they made their appearance by ones and twos at Strathellan House, and were received by Mr. Hardwicke in the drawing-room.

And here, for the benefit of such as delight in fashionable intelligence, it may be mentioned that there were eight of these young ladies attired in clouds of diaphanous tulle, and veils, and wreaths of pink and white roses—like eight inferior brides: and that one of them (the oldest and ugliest) was an honourable. The next day's Morning Post described them vaguely, but poetically, as a "galaxy."

At length, when the bride was dressed and ready, and the guests had driven off in advance, and the bridesmaids had been packed into two carriages and sent on by themselves, there came a moment when Mr. Hardwicke and his sister were left in the drawing-room alone. It was but a moment, and he seized it to say one last word to her in the home that had been his and hers together.

"Claudia—my own sister—my darling!" he faltered. "I pray that you may be happy."

"I am happy," she answered, smiling.

"I thank God for it," said Mr. Hardwicke, solemnly.

He would fain have embraced her once more; but he could not kiss her cheek, because of her veil; nor her hands, because they were gloved; so he took up a corner of the veil and pressed it to his lips; and as he did so the tears were running down his cheeks.

"My lady's carriage waits," said the butler, flinging open the door, and giving his mistress her title by anticipation.

The next minute they were driving through the Park in the big, old-fashioned chariot, which for some years past they had only used on state occasions.

Damp and greasy were the steps of Marylebone Church; shivering and shabby was the crowd about the porch; frosty were the noses of the galaxy drawn up in order within. Yet were these discomforts momentarily forgotten as the bride swept up the nave leaning upon the arm of her brother, and the bridesmaids fell into procession behind her, and the organ began to play softly, and the Bishop opened his book, and the bridegroom came forward in his place. Then the ceremony began immediately, and a sudden hush fell upon the whole church.

Near the altar stood Lady De Benham, Mr. Hardwicke, Archie Blyth, and the parents of the bridesmaids. The rest of the guests filled the nearest pews; and the strangers, of whom there was a large number, crowded the side aisles and galleries.

Archie's eyes were wandering, meanwhile, all over the church in search of Miss Alleyne.

"I mean to be there on Thursday," she had said to him a day or two before. "You will not see me; but I shall be looking on all the time from some dark corner."

And then Archie had remonstrated, advising her against it as earnestly as he dared; but she put his remonstrances and his advice somewhat pre emptorily aside.

"I have promised myself that I will be present at this marriage, Mr. Blyth," she said, "and I mean to be present. Nay, do not look so apprehensive! Do you suppose that I shall glide between them at the altar, like the ghost in the old legend, and carry off the ring? or confront your cousin with bowl and dagger, like Queen Eleanor?"

And thus, with a little quavering laugh, she turned the thing aside, and Archie said no more.

Now, however, instead of listening to one word of that solemn service which was fast binding two lives together for good or ill till death should sunder them, he was scrutinising every bonnet in the galleries, trying to pierce the gloom behind every pillar, and the shadows in every corner; but nowhere saw he the outline of any face or form that reminded him of the face or form of Juliet Alleyne.

And now, the promises being spoken, the ring given, and the hands joined, the Bishop pronounced that Temple De Benham and Claudia Hardwicke were man and wife together before God. Then he blessed them with the solemn blessing of the ritual; and the choir broke into a joyous anthem; and in some ten minutes more it was all over.

When De Benham rose from his knees, and gave his arm to his bride, and found himself presently in the vestry shaking hands with this person and that, he felt as if he were waking from some strange dream. When one of the curates handed Claudia the pen, and, laying his finger upon the blank space in the register, said, "Here, if you please, Lady De Benham," that title which he had never thought of till now, except as his mother's exclusive right, jarred unpleasantly upon his ear. The very sight of her signature close against his own, with the ink yet wet upon both, startled him. It seemed to him as if he had just traversed a profound gulf separating his past life from his future; and as if the bridge by which he had crossed over had suddenly given way, and crashed into the abyss behind him.

But as he led her from the church, and heard the open admiration of the crowd about the door, and took his place beside her in the post-chaise, which, with its four greys and two postillions, immediately dashed off at full speed through York Gate and into the Regent's Park, he did feel a momentary flush of pride and triumph.

"My imperial beauty!" he exclaimed, pressing his lips upon her arm with something like real fervour.

But Claudia, with a somewhat heightened colour, drew slightly back and made no reply; and De Benham saw that she considered he had taken a liberty.

In the meanwhile, the bridesmaids and the rest of the guests were grumbling at the weather, and getting into any carriages that came first; and it was not till they were all back at Strathellan House that Archibald Blyth was found to be missing. But Archie, at the last moment, just as the bridal procession was on its way to the church door, had caught a sudden glimpse of Miss Alleyne. It was but for an instant that her face flashed out upon him from behind a crowd of others, and, even in the moment of his recognition of it, vanished. But that glimpse was enough for Archie. With a muttered word of unintelligible apology, he dropped the arm of the lady whom he was escorting, made his way round by a side aisle, and found her in a dark pew under the organ-gallery. She was sitting with her hands folded listlessly together, and a pale fixed look upon her face, waiting till the crowd should disperse, and she could get away unnoticed.

"I'm so glad to have found you!" exclaimed Archie. "I've been looking for you all the time. Did you come alone?"

"Yes—all alone," she replied, smiling.

But the smile, such as it was, so touched him that he sat down beside her in the pew, and took her hand.

"It has been a grand wedding," she said, tremulously. "Who was the lady in grey satin that stood next to Mr. Hardwicke?"

"That was Lady De Benham—at least, the Dowager Lady De Benham," replied Archie, awkwardly.

"I thought so. He is not like her; but he has her eyes."

And then for some moments they sat listening to the confusion of voices in the porch, and the continuous clatter of wheels outside, as carriage after carriage drove off with its freight.

"Either she is more beautiful than ever, or I did not know how beautiful she was," said Miss Alleyne, presently.

Archie, not knowing what to reply to this observation, said nothing.

"They ought to be happy," she continued, more to herself than to him. "They have everything in the world to make them so."

And as she said this, she turned her face away and drew down her veil; and Archie saw that she was crying.

"Oh, don't do that—pray don't," he said, in great distress. "What's the good now? They'll be happy enough, depend on it—as happy as they deserve to be, anyhow."

"I hope so. I hope they may be very, very happy. I shall pray that it may be so."

"You'd much better forget all about them," said Archie, bluntly.

And then, seeing that her tears continued to flow silently, he took her hand again, and caressed it—as one might comfort a crying child.

"It's such a pity," he said, "that you should throw your heart away, my darling. He never really loved you—he couldn't have been false, you know, if he had. It may be that he doesn't love her either. I don't believe he does. I believe he loves no one but himself, and his ambition, and his precious ancestors, who, now that they're all dead, might as well never have been born. Forget him, dear. Forget him, and—try to think a little bit of me instead. I'm neither a lord, nor a genius, nor particularly clever in any way—but I'd sacrifice anything on earth to make you happy. A fellow cannot do more, you know, than be true and honest, and love a girl with his whole heart."

And by the time that he had got thus far, Archie, not without some amazement at his own temerity, fairly put his arm round Miss Alleyne's waist. At this, she rose hurriedly, protesting that they should be locked up in the church if they sat there any longer.

"No fear of that," said Archie. "The carriages have not yet done taking up."

"I must go, at all events. It is past eleven."

"I mean to see you safe home."

"Impossible. You are bound to be present at the breakfast."

"The breakfast be hanged!" said Archie.

"But . . ."

"But see now—if you'd only give me ever such a tiny scrap of hope to hold on by, I should be so wild with joy that my cousin Hardwicke's cold chickens and champagne would just choke me. And if, on the other hand, you were to tell me that it's all of no use . . . why, then the wine would be like poison, and the food like dust and ashes in my mouth. So, either way, you see, it's of no use for me to go to the breakfast."

Miss Alleyne opened the pew-door.

"It will be kindest, then," she said, with something like a sparkle of the old smile, "to give you no answer whatever."

And with this, she passed on quickly to the door. In the porch they waited for a moment. The last carriage was just driving away; the bells were clashing joyously overhead, and the few remaining loiterers were opening their umbrellas and preparing to be gone.

"Listen to the bells!" said Archie. "Don't you remember what your favourite Tennyson says?—

'Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going—let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.'

Let them ring out the old, false love for you, my darling—let them ring in the new love, and the true."

"I shall never forgive myself, Mr. Blyth," said she, "if you do not go to that breakfast this morning and make a speech. You'd do it beautifully."

"It's cruel to laugh at me, Miss Alleyne," said Archie, reproachfully. "I am in earnest, remember."

"And I have been in earnest so long, that I am tired of it. You ought to make the speech, however. Those lines would come in charmingly if you returned thanks for the bridesmaids. I had no idea that you quoted poetry, Mr. Blyth."

Archie, to escape, ran down the steps and called a cab. When he had put her into it, he stood for a moment with his hand upon the door, regardless of the misting rain and all his bridal splendour.

"Look here, Miss Alleyne," he said, with more agitation of manner than he had yet betrayed, "if I'm to be miserable, I may as well know it at once. Either let me see you home now, or send me away for ever."

"Supposing that I do neither—or both?"

"No, no—do the one or the other, I beseech you! As long as I hadn't spoken out, the suspense was bearable; but when I saw you crying just now, and when I knew all the time how much I loved you, the words came somehow in spite of me."

"I am afraid you will get very wet, standing there without an umbrella," said Miss Alleyne, provokingly.

Archie's lip quivered.

"Pray, give me an answer," he pleaded.

"Well, then—for fear you should take cold, and because you have no umbrella . . . you may see me home."

Archie jumped into the cab, and shut the door.

The Fates, apparently, had ordained that this young lady should be wooed—and won—in church.

CHAPTER LXIII.—MAN AND WIFE.

AT five minutes past twelve precisely, the tidal train glided away from the London Bridge Station, carrying with it De Benham and his bride, her ladyship's maid, a fierce-looking Italian courier in a blue cap with a gold band, and a mountain of luggage. The newly-married pair were installed in a compartment by themselves. They had had sharp work to get down to the station in time, and had driven off at the last moment without saying good-bye to the guests in the drawing-room.

"If it hadn't been for Bruno, we should never have done it," said De Benham, when he had stowed the umbrellas and parasols in the netting overhead, and counted the wraps and rugs, and seen that his wife's dressing-case was under the seat.

"I suppose not," said Claudia.

"And we started five minutes after time as it was. It would have been very awkward if we had missed this train."

"Very awkward."

"There is no other till 3.30, and no boat before 11.15 at night. We must have put off crossing till to-morrow."

"Even that would not have been so disagreeable as waiting in London for three hours and a half," said the bride.

"No, indeed. I scarcely know what we could have done. To go back to the breakfast would have been too absurd. In more propitious weather, we might have improved our minds by going over the Tower, or up the Monument, or through the Thames Tunnel."

Lady De Benham smiled faintly, and said—"How preposterous!"

"But to-day, even those pleasures would have been impossible."

"I hope we shall find better weather on the other side of the Channel," said Claudia. "Paris is so dreary when it rains."

And then they both gazed out of the window in silence. They had by this time left behind them the brick-fields and cabbage-grounds that lie between the Borough and New Cross, and were speeding on towards Croydon; but even the pleasant Surrey hills in their April greenery looked dismal and uninviting.

"I am inclined to think that Bruno is an acquisition," said De Benham, presently.

Bruno was the fierce-looking courier with the gold band, now fast inaugurating a flirtation with the lady's-maid in a second-class carriage adjoining.

"Yes; he seems to understand his business," replied Claudia.

And then the conversation dropped again.

They rushed through Croydon and some smaller stations without stopping, and halted for three minutes at Red Hill, where Debenham bought a Times and some other newspapers.

"We shall be glad of them by-and-by, on board the steamer," he said, half apologetically; for they were still in the first hour of their journey, and he felt that it would be unpardonable in him to want amusement already.

"Are you a good sailor?"

"Yes. That is, I can cross the Channel without discomfort."

"Such a mist as this acts like oil upon the sea," observed De Benham. "It will be as smooth as a mill-pond out yonder."

He was forcing himself to say something; but he had literally nothing to say. Two dreadful pauses had already occurred, and he felt that a third must be prevented somehow. And then it was his place to find topics—to make the miles pass pleasantly—to begin to evince something like devotion, and vivacity, and marital tenderness. All this, he knew, was incumbent upon him; but how, in heaven's name, he asked himself, was he to do it? His ideas were stagnant, his spirits profoundly depressed, his very accents weighted with constraint. Resolved, however, to keep up the conversation this time, if possible, he plunged desperately into the pages of his continental Bradshaw.

"We are allowed three-quarters of an hour at Boulogne for refreshments," he said; "but we don't get there till half-past four. You will want something long before then."

"I think not," replied the bride.

"They are just about sitting down to breakfast now at Strathellan House."

"I am so glad we decided not to stay for it," said Claudia.

"So am I. It is a horrible ceremony. Nevertheless, I wish you had taken luncheon before you started. Are you sure you feel no draught from those ventilators?"

To this inquiry she replied that she felt no draught from the ventilators, but that her feet were very cold—whereupon De Benham wrapped them in a rug, with much apparent solicitude.

"I must try to take such good care of you!" he said, smiling.

And then, having faced her up to this time, he changed into the seat adjoining hers.

"You must take care of yourself also," replied Claudia. "To-day, you have been looking paler than ever."

"Have I? That is unfortunate; for I wanted to look my best this morning. It will not do for your people to say that you have married a ghost."

"Try then to become less ghostlike and more corporeal."

"I will do my best. I have been somewhat overtaxing myself, you know, of late—there has been so much to do and to think of."

And with this he sighed, and leaned back, and relapsed into silence.

By this time they were nearing Tunbridge, and the day, instead of clearing as the afternoon wore on, seemed to be perpetually growing murkier and more misty. By-and-by, a thick steam settled on the glasses and obscured the watery landscape.

Then, Tunbridge being passed, and a long half hour having elapsed unbroken by the utterance of a word on either side, De Benham asked his wife if she would like to see the Times.

"It is so difficult," he said, "to talk in the train."

She took the paper; but presently laid it aside, and said:—

"I have been thinking that I should like to go to Zollenstrasse."

De Benham, already deep in the Daily News, look up surprised.

"To Zollenstrasse?" he repeated.

"Yes. Could we take it on the way?"

"Not without a wide détour and the loss of several days."

"Really?"

"But the place would not interest you."

"You think not?"

"I am sure of it. The country round is not more than ordinarily pretty; and in the town there is nothing to attract a stranger."

Claudia, looking out of the window, heard these objections without replying to them.

"For myself, of course, it is different," continued De Benham. "I am interested in the place, because it is full of early associations: but you, having no such associations, would be bored to death there."

"I have certainly no wish to die from ennui," said the bride; and resumed the reading of her newspaper.

But she was wounded; and De Benham was unconscious of having said anything to wound her. It never occurred to him that she might wish to see the place because so many years of his life had been spent there. Had Juliet Alleyn, in the sweet Chillingford time, told him that he must some day take her to Zollenstrasse, he would have known at once that she longed to make his past her own—that the little house in which he had lodged, and the streets through which he had passed every day to his work, and the classrooms where he had studied, and the examination-hall which had been the scene of his academic triumphs, would all have been dear and sacred in her eyes. And he would have taken her in his arms, and thanked her for the loving wish, and promised her with many promises. But that Claudia—his wife—should be interested in the place for his sake, never crossed his mind for a single moment. He took it for granted that she only fancied to visit Zollenstrasse as she might fancy Ems, or Schlangenbad, or Wiesbaden, or any other little German Spa; and in such case he knew that she would be disappointed. For himself, he felt that he should hardly care to go back to the old scenes en grand seigneur, hampered with a wife, a lady's-maid, and a courier. So he threw cold water on the proposal, and, having assured her that she would be bored to death at Zollenstrasse if she went there, dismissed the subject from his thoughts.

And so it was that he went back to his Daily News, and she to her Times, and that not another word was spoken between them till they reached Folkestone.

CHAPTER LXIV.—LADY DE BENHAM ASSUMES THE DUTIES OF HER POSITION.

NOTHING could well be more comfortable than the crossing. The air was chill, and raw, and stagnant. The blacks came down in clouds. The mist closed about their path like a curtain, and there was scarcely any perceptible motion; so that from the moment they drew off from the one pier-head till they almost bumped against the timbers of the other, the steamer almost seemed to be lying still upon the waters. De Benham would fain have had his wife go down to the ladies' cabin, but she preferred the wet decks and the rain; so he covered her with rugs, and the courier brought a stool for her feet, and she was made as comfortable as the place and the weather permitted. 'This done, De Benham said he would go aft and smoke a cigar; and so left her sitting under her umbrella.

Landing at Boulogne by-and-by in the rain, they sent Bruno to get their luggage through the Custom House, and drove direct to the station. Here they dried their steaming wraps by the fire; and had some soup and cold chicken at a little table in the warmest corner of the refreshment buffet.

"Are you quite sure—dearest," said De Benham, "that you prefer to go on to Amiens this evening?"

He had been thinking all the time he was smoking his cigar on board the steamer, that he ought occasionally to make use of some term of endearment towards her; and he had decided upon "dearest" as being most consistent with their mutual position. He brought out the word, however, with some difficulty.

"I do not object to stay in Boulogne," she replied; and although she did not look up from her plate, De Benham fancied that when he called her by that name, he detected a faint gleam of gratification upon her face.

"You are not tired?"

"Not at all. I am willing to persevere as far as Paris, if you please."

"Nay, Paris is too far; but Amiens is within easy reach; so we may as well stick to our programme. We shall be only an hour and forty minutes on the road."

It was past seven, and getting rapidly dusk when they again started. De Benham having, as before, wrapped Claudia in her rugs, and seen that Bruno had forgotten none of the smaller articles, placed himself vis-à-vis of his bride, with his back to the engine. Then the train began to move.

"It is almost too short a journey to justify one in going to sleep," he said, lying back languidly in the seat.

The words were scarcely out of his lips, when a dispatch box which he had himself placed only the moment before, with some books and other matters, in the netting over Claudia's head, toppled suddenly forward. He saw the danger—darted at the box with uplifted hand—caught it just as it was about to fall,—and, with a sharp, half-smothered ejaculation, dropped back into his place.

"What is the matter?" said Claudia.

"The box was coming down upon your head," replied De Benham, with a sort of catching in his breath.

"Is that all?"

"All? You don't know what a weight it is!"

"I fancied you had sprained your wrist," said Claudia.

"No; oh, no!"

With this De Benham rose up and changed over to a seat by the farthest window, so putting the width of the whole carriage between himself and his bride.

"Would it inconvenience you," he said presently, "if I were to let down this glass for a few moments?"

She replied that it would not inconvenience her at all; so he opened the window and sat for a long time in silence, looking out upon the wild country and the wilder sky. For the mist had lifted at the approach of evening, and was now rolling off towards the south-west; and where the sun had gone down, a lurid glow streamed out far and wide upon the horizon, reddening the barren sand dunes and the sluggish Somme as it wound away and widened towards the sea. Then the glow faded, and the dusk thickened; and, the coast country being left behind, deep cuttings and plantations of gloomy firs closed in upon the line on either side. And then, ere long, it became pitch-dark, so that there was no light save from the oil-lamp overhead.

"Claudia," said De Benham, "are you asleep?"

It was about twenty minutes since he had changed into the seat by the window, and all that time he had been silent, leaning somewhat forward with his cheek upon his hand.

"No," she replied, coldly; "but I thought you were."

"Have you any Eau de Cologne?"

"Yes; a large flask."

Then, struck by something unusual in his attitude and in the tone of his voice, she hastened to find the flask, saying, "I am sure you are not well."

"I—I am not very well," he replied.

"What is it? Are you feeling faint? Are you in pain?"

"Faint—very faint."

She bent over him; she saturated her own handkerchief with Eau de Cologne; she bathed his head and his hands.

"You will be better presently," she said, gently.

"Thanks; that will do. I am so sorry to give you this trouble."

And then he rested his head wearily against the corner of the carriage. As he did so, the light from above fell full upon his face, and Claudia was startled to see how white and haggard he had suddenly become.

"Had we not better stop," she said, "at the next station?"

But he would not hear of this. He was bent on Amiens. "Bruno," he said, "should get him a glass of wine at the buffet. If he had but a glass of wine—or, better still, a glass of brandy—he could go on quite well."

The next station being Montreuil, the brandy was procured, and they went on, De Benham leaning up silently in his corner, Claudia in the opposite seat, anxiously watching him. Then, for some ten minutes or so, seeing that his eyes were closed, she thought that he had fallen asleep. They had not gone very far, however, when he spoke again.

"It's of no use," he said. "I can't hold out. We must stop—at Abbeville."

And Claudia observed that he spoke each time with increased difficulty, still catching his breath, spasmodically, between the words.

"Abbeville?" she repeated, standing up under the carriage-lamp, so as to get the light upon the pages of the Bradshaw. "The last station we passed was Montreuil, the next will be Rue; the next Noyelles; then Abbeville."

"How long—before we get there?"

"About a quarter of an hour."

He closed his eyes again, and said no more.

It seemed to Claudia as if that last quarter of an hour would never drag to an end—as if they should never get to Rue; and then, when Rue had flitted by, as if they should never get to Noyelles. At length, when both were passed and left behind, the pace at which they were going began to slacken, and the train glided, with a long, shrill whistle, into Abbeville station. Here she summoned the guard and the servants; despatched Bruno for the luggage; and in a few moments had got De Benham into a kind of closed calèche, in which they presently found themselves rumbling along a paved country road bordered on either side by gigantic poplars.

Ill as he was, De Benham observed with surprise the calm promptitude with which his wife had at once assumed the duties of her position.

"This is a bad beginning, Claudia," he said.

"I am so sorry—for your sake."

"Not for mine—for your own. Will you lean upon me?"

"No—thanks. I feel the jolting less—this—way."

And as he spoke, he crouched forward, pressing his hand upon his side.

Claudia, seeing with what difficulty he got out the words, and with what pain he drew his breath, sat silent, and forbore to question him. And so they rumbled on their way; and the driver cracked his whip, and the harness bells jingled, and the poplars loomed through the darkness, and still Abbeville (its twinkling lights visible all along in the distance) seemed no nearer than when they started.

At length they came to a long, straggling suburb; rattled over a drawbridge and through a fortified gateway, and emerged presently upon an open Place bright with shops, gay with idlers, and ringing to the noisy music of an itinerant brass band. Here Bruno, jumping down from beside the driver, opened the door of the calèche, touched his cap, and said:—

"My lord will be driven to the Hôtel Tête de Bœuf?"

"To the best, whichever that is," replied Claudia, decisively.

Whereupon the courier again touched his cap, and said, "Cocher, Tête de Bœuf;" and ran forward on foot to announce their coming. The next moment they had turned into a broad, quiet street, driven under a low archway, and drawn up in the courtyard of a rambling old hotel surrounded by wooden galleries. Here, amid much ringing of bells, they were met by the smiling landlady and her staff of waiters, and maids. Seeing De Benham alight, however, leaning on the courier, and unable to support himself without assistance, the hostess became all eager commiseration.

Milord and Miladi were welcome. Was it that Milord was ill? Heaven! but he had the air of suffering. Could Milord have a quiet chamber? But without doubt. Milord should have the yellow chamber. Nothing of more tranquil than the yellow chamber. There he would be well. A doctor? Certainly! There was Monsieur the Doctor Laportaire, at the corner of the Place. François should run for him on the instant. Miladi would have nothing to fear with Monsieur the Doctor Laportaire—a man renowned throughout the Department for his skill. Would Milord and Miladi give themselves the trouble to come this way? Perhaps Milord would prefer to be carried in an arm-chair? No? It was as Milord pleased. The staircase, happily, was not steep, and the yellow chamber was here, close by—at the end of the gallery.

Thus voluble, the landlady of the Tête de Bœuf preceded her guests to a dismal room of huge dimensions, containing a catafalque of a bed surmounted with plumes of antique funereal feathers, and hung with a brocade that might once upon a time have been yellow. On the walls were faded arabesques in fresco; on the uneven floor a few scraps of threadbare tapestry; in the recesses a couple of curious black armoires with handles and scutcheons of tarnished silver. An old man in blouse and sabots was already upon his knees before the cavernous fireplace, kindling with his bellows such a pile of straw and faggots as might have served to burn a mediæval heretic.

De Benham dropped into the first chair, while Bruno and the landlady wheeled a spindle-legged sofa nearer to the fire.

Claudia, bending over him, touched his hand almost timidly.

"How cold you are!" she said. "Lie down, and let me cover you with rugs till the doctor comes."

De Benham shook his head. He seemed almost past speaking.

"A few hours ago," she continued, "you talked of taking care of me; but it has come to my turn first to take care of you. And I mean to do so—thoroughly."

A strange look—a look, as it were, of mental anguish, outweighing mere bodily pain—came upon the young man's pallid face.

"Claudia," he said falteringly, "it—it is—my fault. I might have—foreseen . . . I—I had—no right . . ."

"Hush! not a word of that. Here is the doctor."

M. Laportaire (bald, bearded, spectacled, buttoned to the throat in a sort of military frock) stood for a moment on the threshold, deciphered the situation at a glance, and glided at once into paternal possession of his patient. He felt Milord's pulse, looked at Milord's tongue, turned to Miladi for information of how the attack came on, and looked puzzled.

"There is a great want of strength," he said, taking off and wiping his glasses, "an unaccountable want of strength."

Then De Benham spoke. "I could—make my case clearer—to Monsieur Laportaire," he said, "if you would—leave us—Claudia."

The landlady and her maids had by this time dispersed to fetch sheets and other necessities; and the old fire-lighter had betaken himself with his bellows to the salon adjoining. Claudia at once turned thither.

"I shall be within call, Monsieur," she said, addressing herself to the doctor; and so, with a slightly heightened colour, passed into the sitting-room.

The door had scarcely closed upon her when De Benham—all unconscious that he had pained her—raised himself by a desperate effort, and holding to the back of his chair, said hurriedly,—

"Monsieur—il y a cinq mois que je suis blessé, et ma blessure n'a jamais été parfaitement cicatrisée. Elle s'est ouverte de nouveau il y a à peine deux heures. Ma femme n'en sais rien. Gardez, je vous en—suis obligé—mon secret."

With this he made two steps towards the sofa—reeled over—would have fallen headlong, but for the doctor's strong arm about his waist—and fainted dead away in the middle of the room.

All that Monsieur Laportaire could do was to break his fall, lay him gently down upon the floor, unfasten his cravat, and call for assistance. Claudia was back instantly, through the door of communication.

"Ah, no, madam—not you!" exclaimed the doctor, remembering his patient's injunction.

But Claudia silenced him with a look.

"It is my right, Monsieur," she said haughtily. And then she knelt down, and supported De Benham's head upon her arm.

By this time the landlady, the courier, and a posse of maids and waiters, had crowded back into the room. Monsieur Laportaire turned them all out, except Bruno, and bade some one fetch his assistant.

"What is this?" asked Claudia, pointing to a large dark stain upon her husband's coat, just under the left breast. Then, before the doctor could reply, she turned very white, and said in a low, shuddering voice, "It is blood!"

But though her cheek paled, and her voice trembled, the fingers with which she tenderly unbuttoned his coat and waistcoat, and laid bare the stiff, ensanguined shirt beneath, never faltered.

CHAPTER LXV.—AT THE HÔTEL TÊTE DE BŒUF.

ALL that night De Benham lay in the yellow chamber at the Hôtel Tête de Bœuf, in a state which was neither sleeping nor waking, nor suffering, but simply passive and unconscious. All that night his wife watched beside his pillow. Now and then she gently touched his wrist, to make certain that the feeble pulse was still beating. Now and then she put stimulants to his lips, and he swallowed them instinctively, not knowing what hand administered them, or upon whose arm his head was lifted to take them. A profound stillness lay upon the town—a stillness interrupted only by the stamping of the post-horses in the stables, the steam-whistle of the night-trains far away, and the chiming that pealed every quarter of an hour from the Cathedral towers hard by. Sitting there hour after hour by the faint light of the embers and the shaded lamp, Claudia could even hear the ticking of the great clock at the other side of the court-yard.

She had been urged to engage a nurse, but preferred herself to watch throughout the night. Her maid slept within call on the sofa in the salon adjoining; and the hotel-porter, snoring on a truckle-bed in his clothes, was prepared to start up at the first tinkle of "Miladi's" bell to fetch Monsieur Laportaire.

But the dark hours dragged by and the dawn filtered in, grey and cold, and still De Benham lay speechless, motionless, almost breathless. The doctor had desired that he might be sent for, "if there was any change." But there was neither change nor sign of change. He was apparently no worse. He was certainly no better. That he should by-and-by cease to breathe, and so drift passively out of life, seemed now, alas! the likeliest change of all.

Then dawn became day, and the sun rose in splendour, and the town woke up with ringing of bells, and shrill foreign cries, and the noise of many wheels. And then the doctor came. He drew back curtains and blinds, let in a flood of light, lifted the sick man's heavy eyelid, listened to the languid beating of his heart, counted the few and faint pulsations at his wrist, and went away with the same words as before. There was nothing to be done but to wait, and he was to be summoned immediately "if there was any change."

So the day waxed and waned. The morning's traffic died away; the sleepy afternoon went by; evening came on, and the town woke up again to vespers, and tables-d'hôte, and music in the market-place. And still De Benham lay between death and life, and still his bride of yesterday watched over him with unremitting steadfastness. She made no show of grief; she shed no tears; she importuned the doctor with no questions. Her anxiety manifested itself in silence and wakefulness only. Twice in the course of the long and dreary day her maid came to her and entreated that she would lie down awhile and sleep, or at least go out for half-an-hour into the fresh air and sunshine; but she would not.

"I am not tired, my good girl," she said; "I could not sleep if I were to try."

"But you will wear yourself out, my lady; and if you mean to sit up again to-night . . ."

"I mean to sit up again to-night, Foster; but I can do so without wearing myself out. You forget how strong I am."

Then Foster went away shaking her head and sighing, and told Bruno that till now she had never dreamed my lady cared half so much for my lord.

And the truth was that Claudia had not cared for him before as she cared for him now. She had admired him, and she had been proud of him; she had desired to know more of his past life; to enter with something like sympathy into his pursuits and tastes; to be associated with him in whatever might tend to further his ambition or gratify his family pride—but she had not loved him. It was not till the man lay before her in this his extremity of helplessness, that her heart filled for him with that rare pity that is not merely akin to, but is a vital part of love. That he should be so utterly dependent upon her, and at the same time so utterly unconscious of his dependence, was in itself enough to call forth all the unawakened tenderness of her nature. And she knew not, as yet, that she was moved by any feeling deeper than compassion or a sense of duty. She placed all her devotion, indeed, to the side of duty; she told herself that it was her duty, as his wife, to be anxious about him, to watch over him, to wait upon him hand and foot. But she dreamed not that these duties were fast becoming to her of deeper interest than aught else in life.

So, being in truth "strong"—physically strong, and able to endure fatigue and loss of sleep—she bore up unflinchingly, and sat hour after hour through the day as through the night—pale, and stern, and silent, waiting for the change.

It came at last. It came as the dusk drew on, with a slight quickening of the languid pulse and an almost imperceptible tint of colour in the lips; and Claudia believed at first that he was better. But ere long the colour became a hectic flush, and the pulse beat faster and faster; and by the time the doctor came his patient was moaning and tossing—unconscious still, but actively unconscious; with the fire of fever mounting to his brain.

Finding him thus, M. Laportaire stroked his beard, shook his head, and said:—

"Mais, oui—de la fièvre. Je la prévoyais."

And then, having scrawled an illegible prescription, he questioned Claudia upon this point and that, asking her with what kind of weapon De Benham's wound had been inflicted, how long he had lain ill at Horta, what had been the condition of his health since that time, and many like inquiries; to none of which she was able to give other than vague and unsatisfactory replies.

"I knew that my husband had been wounded, Monsieur," she said; "and that, owing to fatigue and exposure, and the want of proper assistance, he was laid up for some time with brain-fever at the Azores; but I have known no more than that."

M. Laportaire stroked his beard again.

"It is not a very uncommon case—this of Milord's," he said reflectively. "In time of war—or, rather, in the beginning of peace after war—we constantly meet with instances of wounds that refuse to heal; and in six cases out of ten the sufferer conceals that he suffers. A man is ashamed, somehow, to let it be known that he carries an unhealed wound about his person."

"I can suppose that," said Claudia.

"Milord must have been in almost daily communication with some surgeon?"

"I never heard so."

"Madame has observed of late, however, that Milord was ailing?"

"I have seen that he was delicate, and that he greatly overtaxed his strength."

"Still there must have been indications—symptoms," pursued Monsieur Laportaire. "His sleep was probably disturbed—his temper irritable—his manner moody—as the manner of one oppressed by some secret care?"

"It may have been so," she replied. "I cannot tell."

Then, seeing the surprise in the doctor's face, she added in a low voice, but with singular gravity and modesty,—

"We were married yesterday."

"Oh, Madame!"

And M. Laportaire, with all a Frenchman's ready chivalry, bowed profoundly, and looked the sympathy he might not take the liberty to express.

"One thing I beg you to tell me, Monsieur," said Claudia; "is there danger?"

The doctor hesitated.

"Ah, mon Dieu!" he replied, "Madame demands a very difficult question. There is danger—and, again, there is not danger. Milord is extremely weak. It is probable that he lost blood immensely when he received his wound; and because the deeper lesions belonging to the wound have been going on with latent mischief, his strength has not come back to him. And now that the wound has been exasperated by a sudden strain, Milord is in a hectic fever. I ask myself, how long will this fever last? Has Milord yet strength enough left to combat it? Will his wound fester? When Madame asks me if there is danger, I can only point to these possibilities; I cannot foresee results."

"At all events, Monsieur will do whatever his skill and experience can suggest?"

M. Laportaire bowed again, and pressed his hand upon his heart.

"Madame," he said, with emotion, "je ferai tout mon possible."

Then, promising to come again very early the following morning, or at any moment of the night if she saw reason to summon him, he took his leave.

Meanwhile, the evening gaiety of a French garrison town died gradually away in Abbeville, as it had died away the night before. The band in the market-place played "Par-tant pour la Syrie," and marched back to the barracks. The idlers dispersed. The cafés were closed, and the streets became dark and silent. Then, once more, the stillness of night prevailed.

And now, finding that De Benham continued to sleep the same uneasy sleep into which he had drifted as the fever came on, Claudia got out her desk and prepared to pass some of the weary hours in letter-writing. She had been thinking all day that it was her duty to write to her husband's mother; but as yet, for a twofold reason, she had delayed to do so—firstly, in the hope that when a change came, it might be for the better; secondly, for fear that Lady De Benham should take alarm, and follow them to Abbeville. This last, she felt, it would be very difficult for her to bear. For she had resolved within herself that, as far as might be practicable, the sick man should be nursed by her hands only; and the mere thought that she might be dispossessed of her charge by one claiming the privileges of a mother was intolerable to her. For now, at least, he was her own; and he might never, she told herself, be so much her own again.

Yet even at the cost of resigning him—for she knew her own pride too well to doubt that it would be resignation and not sharing—she had no sooner arrived at the conviction that it was her duty to tell all to Lady De Benham, than she sat down to write the letter.

But when she had put at the top of the page—"Hôtel Tête de Bœuf, Abbeville; April 26th, 1862;" and under that again,—"My dear Lady De Benham," she paused with the pen in her hand, not knowing how to go on. And, indeed, it was by no means an easy letter to write. The truth, she felt, must be told, and told quite fairly; yet she wished so to tell it that Lady De Benham should be as little alarmed by it as possible. Then she could not even guess how much of this very truth might, or might not, be already known to her husband's mother. It seemed improbable that, coming home as he did direct from Horta, De Benham should then have concealed, or have been able to conceal, the actual condition of his wound. And yet, on the other hand, he loved his mother so tenderly that if it were possible to endure in silence . . .

But when her thoughts had travelled thus far, a slight moan in the direction of the bed caused her to look round, and she saw that De Benham's eyes were open, and that he was looking at her. She dropped her pen, and went to him instantly.

"Claudia," he said, "is that you?" And his voice was so weak that it scarcely rose above a whisper.

"It is I. Are you comfortable? Shall I turn your pillow?"

"Give me something to drink."

She gave him something that the doctor had prepared before he left, tempering it first with hot water from the kettle, and lifting his head gently upon her arm.

"What o'clock is it?" he asked, when, having drunk eagerly, he lay back again upon his pillow.

"About ten minutes to one. We are at Abbeville, you know—at the Hôtel Tête de Bœuf."

"Yes; I remember. I fell down just now. I suppose I fainted. Have I been asleep ever since?"

"You have been asleep for some time," replied Claudia.

He had evidently no idea that a night and a day had gone by since the moment of his falling.

"And you are sitting up with me? Why could not Bruno have done that? You must be very tired."

"I am not tired at all. Is your head hot?" And Claudia laid her cool hand upon his burning brow.

"Thank you. You are too good to me!"

And then he moaned again, and closed his eyes, and lay for some moments silent.

"What were you doing when I woke?" he said presently. "Were you writing letters?"

"No—not writing; only thinking what I should say, if I did write."

"To whom? Not to my mother, Claudia! I charge you not to tell—my mother—anything."

This he said with great earnestness, looking up into her face, as if to see how much she herself knew of the truth.

"Shall I not tell her that you are ill?"

"Not for the world. I will write—myself—to-morrow."

"I fear you will not be well enough to do that," replied Claudia, gently.

"No matter, she must not be alarmed—she must not know . . . Promise me."

Claudia gave the required pledge very willingly. She certainly desired nothing less than to alarm Lady De Benham.

"I will not let her know you are ill," she said, "till you bid me do so."

This seemed to satisfy him; and presently he dropped off into a feverish doze.

Then Claudia went back to her desk and began a letter to Mr. Hardwicke; but before she had reached the end of the first sentence, it occurred to her that she could not well say anything to her brother that he might not be at liberty to repeat, supposing Lady De Benham to become impatient and apply to him for news. So, deciding that it was, upon the whole, better to write no letters for a day or two longer, she closed her desk and resumed her old place in the easy chair beside the bed.

He was now painfully flushed; starting and muttering in his sleep, and perpetually tossing his head from side to side upon the pillow. His hands, too, were hot and restless, and his breath came fast and flutteringly. Still he slept; and Claudia, watching by his side, dozed off herself every now and then for a few minutes at a time—dozed and waked, and dozed and waked again, and saw the grey beginnings of the dawn.

Suddenly, just as the sun had risen and the long, slow rumble of the country carriages began to be audible along the streets, De Benham woke, and said loudly,—

“Not for the world!”

Claudia, lying back in her chair, between sleeping and waking, started upright and found him looking at her with something of wildness in his face.

“She has never known it all this time,” he went on, hurriedly. “She must not know it now. I will write myself. But you must promise not to tell her—you must promise!”

“I do promise—I have promised already,” replied Claudia, soothingly.

“She has suffered too much—Liebe Mutter—and Juliet—Juliet has broken her heart. But my vow—my vow is sacred—I must not break my vow!”

And then he went on incoherently rambling about Benhampton, and Zollenstrasse, and the Stormy Petrel, till he fell asleep again.

But Claudia had heard that which startled her into keener watchfulness than ever.

“Who,” she asked herself, “was Juliet?—this Juliet who had broken her heart?”

CHAPTER LXVI.—NIGH UNTO DEATH.

DAYS went by—many days—and still De Benham lay in the same state, passing through all the phases of low fever; sometimes burning; sometimes shivering; sometimes sleeping torpidly for hours together; sometimes light-headed, and wandering back in fancy among all kinds of incongruous scenes and people—even back as far as the days of his early boyhood, when he first began to dream of music by the sea and sands of St. Owens. Again, there were intervals when he woke up weak, exhausted, almost speechless, but perfectly conscious of his condition and surroundings. At such times he would strive, in his utter feebleness, to express to Claudia something of gratitude, and even of contrition, apologising for the trouble and anxiety of which he was the cause, and accusing himself (not without justice) of certain shortcomings in the way of candour and plain dealing towards herself.

“It is a miserable beginning of married life—for you—Claudia,” he would falter. “I had no right—to lead you—into it. I ought to have told you—the truth. But—I hated—to tell it. And besides—I hoped—I believed—I should get well—abroad.”

“As you will—as you surely will, when once you are better, and we can move on again,” Claudia would answer.

“Aye—if I ever do move on—again. I sometimes—doubt—if I shall.”

“Nay, I never doubt it. Monsieur Laportaire never doubts it.”

“At all events—I wish—I had not—deceived you.”

And then he would turn his face away, and sigh, and Claudia would try to divert his attention into other channels. There was one point, however, to which he always went back in these intervals of consciousness—the necessity, namely, of disguising from Lady De Benham the extent and nature of his illness. That she should know he was laid up (say with a feverish cold), and unable for the present to get beyond Abbeville, was, of course, inevitable; but she must on no account be made uneasy. For this, he said, there would be time enough if he became so much worse that M. Laportaire apprehended danger.

Even when he was too ill to speak of other things, he never forgot to speak of this, and to enforce it with such urgency of look and voice as he had strength for.

By this it will be seen that, however De Benham may have been in doubt at first, he soon knew that Claudia was in possession of his secret. And, indeed, he was now so ill that her knowledge of it was more of a relief to him than an annoyance.

In the meanwhile she waited upon him, and watched by him with unremitting steadfastness, now and then sharing her vigils with a sister of charity sent by M. Laportaire; now and then going out for a few minutes to breathe the open air, when he was asleep; but living for the most part in his room, and at his bedside. And still the quiet town waked and slumbered, and the band played, and the chimes jangled, and the melancholy days succeeded and resembled each other.

These chimes had now become to her as the voices of familiar friends. They played some eight bars of a curious Breton melody—a cheerful tune upon any ordinary instrument, but inexpressibly wild and mournful upon the bells. Listening to them thus at all hours—in the dead of night when everything was still; by day, above all sounds of life and traffic; in the pauses of the sick man's wanderings; in the intervals of such light sleep as she herself would snatch from time to time—it seemed to Claudia as if they set themselves to the thoughts in her own mind, and echoed them. And then, indeed (for her heart was oppressed with questionings and misgivings), the tune sounded sad and strange enough.

For she saw the fever working its ravages upon him, and his strength ebbing, day by day. She saw that his attacks of wandering were becoming more frequent, his death-like torpors more prolonged, his periods of consciousness fewer and farther between. And then, gradually—very gradually, but very surely—a terrible fear began to take possession of her; a fear lest, being scarce a bride, she was destined ere long to become a widow.

And yet it seemed impossible that he should die—that he should die now, and thus; without having lived with her; without knowing that she loved him; without having even begun to love her in return. She could not bring herself to believe that Providence would deal with her so cruelly.

And then, together with these doubts and apprehensions, came two other fears—the fear that it was fast becoming a breach of duty, and even of honour, to keep her husband's mother any longer in ignorance of his condition; and the fear that he had loved and still loved, and would die loving some other woman of whom she had never heard anything but her name. And her name was Juliet. But who was Juliet? Where had he known her? In England? In Germany? In the Southern States? Had his mother ever seen her? Had he ever been engaged to her? Had he loved her and been false to her, and so “broken her heart?” Juliet . . . it was a pretty name enough; not a German name—but then the Germans were great in Shaksperian readings, and a German girl might easily be named after one of Shakspeare's heroines. On the whole, Claudia inclined to believe, and wished to believe, that this Juliet whose name had dropped from De Benham's lips so notably in the one instance, and, since then, some twice or thrice in a more casual and unimportant connection, was in truth but some boyish fancy of his academic days.

At length there arrived an afternoon when, having for more than fifteen hours alternately wandered in his mind and slept feverishly, he came to himself, and, looking at her, wistfully, said,—

“Claudia—you had better—tell her—to come.”

“I will write by to-night's post, if you wish it.”

“Aye; and bid her—come—at once.”

“I will; but she would be sure to do that in any case.”

To this he made no reply, but closed his eyes wearily, and fell asleep again.

Then Claudia, instead of writing a letter to her mother-in-law, put together a few lines of telegraphic message, every word of which was carefully weighed and chosen.

“Dear Lady De Benham” . . . (she put “Dear Lady De Benham,” hoping thereby to soften the abruptness of the thing, and make it less alarming) “Temple continues very feverish and weak. No chance of pursuing our journey for some weeks yet. He would like to see you, and asks me to write; but I know you will prefer me to telegraph. Pray lose no time, for your presence will do him more good than anything. Our courier shall meet you at Boulogne any day and hour you appoint.”

This done, and Bruno despatched with it to the station, her mind felt easier. Then all went on as usual till about nine o'clock, when De Benham roused again and called to her by her name. She was lying on the rug before the fire, half asleep, with her head and arm supported against the sofa; but she heard that whisper instantly.

“Claudia,” he said faintly—so faintly that she had to bend down over him to catch the words distinctly—“you will restore the old place—all the same?”

“We will both restore it—we are both restoring it,” she replied, taking his hot and wasted hand in hers.

But of this answer he took no heed.

“You must marry,” he said, going on with his own thoughts. “You must marry—again.”

She shook her head, and tried to force a smile.

“And your husband—and your children—must take the name of—De Benham. Will you promise?”

"How is it possible? How can I give such promises as these?"

And Claudia, though she spoke very calmly, had to struggle with a sort of tightening in the throat that she was not accustomed to.

"You can do so—for my sake—and your own happiness. Marry—some man—whom you can really love. And if—if I am to die—I shall die—content—knowing that my work—will not have been—all—in vain."

Claudia averted her face and was for a moment silent.

"I cannot pledge myself to marry again," she said at length; "but this at least I promise—if ever I do marry, it shall be as you wish."

His fingers closed upon hers with a feeble pressure, and something like a smile came upon his face. Then, still holding her hand, he fell asleep again.

All that night, and all the next day, he slept much and waked occasionally; rambling somewhat in his talk from time to time; but for the most part conscious of all that was happening around him. He was now as anxious for his mother to arrive, as he had before been anxious to avoid alarming her. Every time he waked, he asked if there were yet news of her. Did Claudia think she was already on the road? Was it likely she would sleep in London on the way? How soon, at the earliest, could she reach Abbeville? To these questions Claudia replied as best she could, soothing his impatience, and calculating by the help of the Railway Guide that Lady De Benham might, if she started by the first morning train from Monmouth, and travelled incessantly, be with them between eight and nine o'clock on the second morning after receiving the message. And this in fact she did; inasmuch as her first telegram (delivered at the Hôtel Tête de Bœuf next evening) announced that she had arrived in London, and was then starting by the night mail for Folkestone.

And now his impatience became so intense and his strength had ebbed so low, that Claudia began to dread lest he should sink under the excitement of the meeting. All that last night—the third, namely, from that on which Claudia's summons was despatched—he kept starting from sleep, counting the hours, and moaning that the dawn would never come. It came at length, however; and when he roused by-and-by from a restless dose, the sun was shining. Then he begged that the curtains might be drawn back, and the light admitted.

"What o'clock is it now?" he asked.

"Just six. You mother is by this time at Boulogne, waiting for her train. She will be here by nine at the latest."

"Still three hours!"

"Only three hours. Try to sleep again, and they will soon be gone."

"And Bruno?"

"Bruno went at midnight by the Petite Vitesse. He is with her now."

De Benham sighed and closed his eyes.

"Claudia," he said presently, "she has loved me with a perfect love—and I—I have loved her—above all the world."

"Is that so?"

And Claudia's thoughts, as she said this, reverted to the unknown Juliet.

"Aye—above all the world. You have been very good to me—Claudia. Be good—also to her."

"I will try."

"Thank you—God bless you."

All this he said without again opening his eyes, and then lay so long silent that she thought he had fallen asleep. But he was not asleep. He was only exhausted; too weak to pursue anything like a train of thought, yet dwelling dreamily on what had last been said.

By-and-by he spoke again—only three words:—

"Kiss me, Claudia."

She bent over him quickly, and kissed him on the forehead, putting his hair back gently at the same time with her hand. Then for a moment she let her fingers linger in those long dark meshes; and her lips parted, as if she were about to speak some words of wife-like tenderness. But those words, whatever they might have been, remained unuttered. She turned away instead, and held her peace; and sat down silently in her old place behind the curtain at his bed-side.

It was the first time she had kissed him; the first time he had ever asked her to do so. Now and then, in the last weeks of their engagement, he had made some formal pretence of saluting her when they met or parted, coldly brushing her cheek with his moustache; but that was all. He had never kissed her lips, or begged a kiss from hers. Never till now. Once, and once only, had he offered her anything resembling a genuine caress; and that was when he kissed her arm as they drove from the church-door the morning of their marriage.

Many a time since then, in these long days and nights of watching, she had thought of that little incident; remembered how, for the moment, she was half offended by it; remembered, too, the words and the look by which it was accompanied; aye, and felt again the warmth of his breath and the sudden pressure of his lips. Many a time, also, when he was sleeping, she had longed to give back that kiss—and dared not. Dared not for fear of waking him; would not, had she dared, because of the pride that was rooted in her nature so deeply.

And now that he had said to her—"Kiss me, Claudia," and she had kissed him—what was it worth? What did it imply? Not that he loved her. Not that he was even beginning to love her. Simply that he was grateful:—grateful, somewhat, for her care of himself; but grateful, above all, for the promises she had just given to him. And then she told herself that he only cared for her as one able and willing to carry on the main purpose of his life, and to be good to his mother, if he were taken from her. In herself, and for herself, she was nothing to him.

These were the thoughts that checked what she might have said, and caused her to turn away when her whole heart was going out to him in pity and tenderness.

Meanwhile De Benham dropped asleep again; and the chimes told off quarter after quarter; and the time drew on to half-past eight o'clock, when the early train from Boulogne would be due. Then Claudia went to another room, changed her dress, smoothed her hair, and ordered breakfast to be prepared in the salon.

By the time she had done this, De Benham was awake and asking for her.

"It is just nine," he said querulously. "Is she never coming? Am I to die—to die in this place without seeing her again?"

"Hark!" said Claudia, holding up her hand.

There was a sound of rapid wheels turning the corner by the market-place, rumbling under the porte-cochère, drawing up in the court-yard. The next moment Claudia was out in the gallery, and Lady De Benham, pale, breathless, haggard from fatigue and anxiety, was hastening up to the landing at the farther end.

The two women met half-way.

"Is he dead?" said the poor mother, trembling from head to foot.

"No, no—waiting for you—asking for you! This way."

And Claudia took Lady De Benham by the arm as if she were a child; drew her on swiftly to the yellow chamber; saw her dart to the bedside; heard the first long, low, sobbing wail of mingled joy and grief; and then, shutting the door upon that love and that greeting in which she had no part, turned away—alone.

CHAPTER LXVII.—TOO LATE.

WHAT with the suspense of expectation and the emotion of meeting, the sick man became suddenly and signally worse about half-an-hour after Lady De Benham's arrival at the Tête de Bœuf. Such factitious strength as fever and excitement had helped to buoy him up with deserted him at a blow. His feeble pulse went down to the lowest ebb, as the barometer drops before a storm; and he fell into a succession of fainting fits, each more prolonged and more obstinate than the last. The work of exhaustion was, in truth, so rapid, that it seemed at one time as if he could not possibly hold out through the day.

All that evening, all that night, his life was despaired of. He was quite unconscious—unconscious, that is to say, of where he was and who he was, and of the people watching by his bed; not unconscious, perhaps, of that strange Shore within sight of which his fragile bark was drifting; not unconscious, perhaps, of those sights and sounds, half from earth and half from heaven, voices of men and voices of angels, that meet and mingle midway across that dread mysterious gulf that flows between the worlds.

Monsieur Laportaire, having been in close attendance upon his patient all the day, sat up with him half the night as well; and in the morning a great physician, for whom he had telegraphed to Paris, arrived by the early train. A very great man in every sense was this famous physician from Paris. He was tall and he was bulky. He had a great head, and a great beard, and a great voice, and a great idea of his own importance. He wrote his prescription, too, in a handwriting so colossal that it sprawled over the page like the trail of some enormous beetle that had tumbled into the ink-bottle and escaped across the paper.

Now it so happened that De Benham had taken a turn for the better before this eminent man made his appearance. His breathing had become deeper and steadier; a certain warmth had begun to diffuse itself through his veins; a faint glow of returning life had dawned upon the death-like pallor of his face. It seemed as if the vital wave, having ebbed to its farthest limit, had begun to flow back again. Nature, and youth, and Monsieur Laportaire (and perhaps the prayers of two women who loved him), had saved him, indeed, just at that extreme moment when salvation seemed no longer within reach. And then—in strict accordance with that supreme Law of Contrary that governs things professional—the big man from Paris (having stayed a very short time and pocketed a very large fee) got the credit of it.

For some days, however, it could scarcely be said of De Benham that he was even out of danger. He was only out of danger in so far that, supposing him to have no relapses and to be tended with the most unremitting devotion, he might, by God's mercy, still recover. The fever, it is true, had left him; but it had left him as helpless, and almost as unconscious, as an infant. So he slept, and waked, and was fed, and slept again continually; scarce knowing the difference betwixt day and night; aware always of some watchful presence in the room, of some tender hand ever ready to minister to his wants; but so weak, so dreamy, so unobservant of things external, that for the most part he neither knew nor cared to know whether the noiseless footfall and the ready hand were those of wife or mother.

Then, by degrees, that which Claudia had foreseen and dreaded began to be the case. Lady De Benham fell gradually into her own old place, usurping first one, then another, of those duties upon which her daughter-in-law had come to set so high a price—usurping them, too, with a sense of undisplaced priority—that to Claudia was inexpressibly galling. And yet Lady De Benham, from her own point of view, was justified. For what, she asked herself, was this stranger's claim in comparison with her own? Of what value was that cold vow so lately taken, when weighed against the devotion of half a lifetime? The marriage, she knew but too well, had been a marriage of convenience, of interest, of ambition—no true marriage in the sight of Heaven; no irrevocable marriage, as yet, in the sight of man. Whereas she . . . was she not his mother? Had she not nursed him in sickness and adored him in absence? Had she not lived for him, prayed for him, struggled for him through as many years of exile and poverty as might twice out-number the weeks of his loveless engagement to Claudia Hardwicke?

It must be admitted, in common justice to Lady De Benham, that if she had dreamed how her son's wife had come to love him, not for his rank, but for himself, she would have acted differently. Hard as might have been the task, she would have yielded those privileges which now she believed to be reasonably and rightfully her own. But of this love she knew nothing; and so it came about that before she had been two days at Abbeville, she had taken the patient altogether into her own hands.

And Claudia allowed her to do so; yielding more and more ground at each fresh encroachment; saying nothing; making no sign; withdrawing silently into the citadel of her pride; and, as she had all along foreseen she should do if it came to this, resigning those rights which she would condescend neither to dispute nor to share.

And now, as the days went by and De Benham began by little and little to take a firmer hold upon life, so she had to endure the unspeakable disappointment of seeing how, in all things, and for all things, he turned to his mother instead of to herself. If he thirsted, if his feet were cold, if his head was not high enough, it was towards Lady De Benham that he looked when he complained of the inconvenience; it was she who held the cup of tisane, or spread the shawl, or placed the pillow. If he fancied to be read to, it was—"Mutter, dear, another chapter of that Tauchnitz novel;" or, "Mutter, dear, do you remember where you left off yesterday in that poem of Browning's?" And then Lady De Benham would bring the book to his bedside and read to him, holding his hand the while, till he would fall asleep. Nor was this all. When his mother fetched him this or that, or arranged any little thing for his comfort, he would smile at her for it, looking pleased and peaceful, but saying nothing. Yet, if Claudia did the most trivial thing, he never failed to thank her for it, as he might have thanked a stranger. This pained her keenly.

"Don't thank me," she said one day when, seeing that he was troubled by the light, she drew down the blind.

"Why should I not thank you?" he asked, with a passing gleam of surprise.

"Because it sounds as if you thought it gave me trouble."

"But it does give you trouble."

"I do not think so."

"Ah, but—but I should be most ungrateful, if . . ."

He hesitated, and looked uncomfortable.

"You do not thank your mother," said Claudia, smiling.

"No; but then she is my mother, and it seems only natural that she should do these things."

Claudia iced over instantly.

"True," she said coldly. "I observe the difference."

After that, she never again desired him not to thank her.

It was just at this time, when the constraint that he felt towards his wife was constantly manifesting itself in trifles, that De Benham's love for his mother seemed to gain intensity from day to day. If she left the room, ten to one but his first word to Claudia would be something in her praise. When she came in, his whole countenance would brighten. His voice when he spoke to her had a softness, and his smile a sweetness, that Claudia never detected in them at other times.

"It is so good, Mütterchen, to see you sitting there," he would sometimes say. "When you first came, and I used to wake and find you by my side, I could hardly believe it was not all a dream."

Another day, when she had been reading: "I don't care what book you take up," he said tenderly. "Your voice is like Cordelia's, 'ever soft, gentle, and low—an excellent thing in woman.' I often listen to the voice alone, and not a bit to what you are reading."

Now there was nothing little or envious in Claudia Hardwicke's nature. Her faults were masculine in their kind. She was proud; she was ambitious; she was hard; but she was not naturally jealous, or even exacting. These things, however, tried her severely. She put them from her at first, telling herself that Lady De Benham was the best of mothers and De Benham the best of sons, and that it was her duty to rejoice in their affection. But strive as she might to attain unto such rejoicing, it was impossible, as time went on, that she should not suffer, and suffer bitterly. She must have suffered if even she had not loved him. She must have suffered in the mere sense of solitude and exclusion; in the daily and hourly sight of an affection in which she had no part; in the knowledge that she was just the third person whose presence was a restraint upon them both. But loving him as cold and haughty women do love when their turn comes—silently, passionately, profoundly—great sorrow fell upon her as the weeks went on.

For, the more she suffered the more she loved; and the more she loved, the more cold and distant she became.

As De Benham progressed towards recovery (and that progress was very slow indeed) she fell into solitary habits, going out alone in the early mornings and again in the afternoons; attending most of the cathedral services; exploring the quaint old mediæval town; and leaving the mother and son to themselves for hours together. For it was now May, and the days were long, and warm, and bright; and Abbeville, however it may have been improved into commonplace of late, was then as curious and picturesque a town as any in France. Claudia soon came to know the place by heart—all the tortuous alleys of antique gabled houses with overhanging upper storeys; all the windings of the sluggish, Flemish-looking canals and no less sluggish river; the curious bridges, some of wood and some of stone; the neglected gardens and tottering summer-houses on the banks of the Somme; the dilapidated churches that seemed to have purposely hidden themselves in the darkest court-yards and most out-of-the-way corners of the town; the ancient fortifications, now converted into pleasant slopes all green with grass and silvered over with daisies; the sleepy barges; the primitive old-world charettes, some drawn by oxen, that came rumbling in with country produce every morning; the wizened old women in their black hoods and cloaks; the men in their sabots and blouses; the Sergents de Ville in their cocked hats and yellow facings; the cripple who sold candles and little rosaries in the Cathedral porch; the soldiers; the beggars; the railway omnibus; the sights, and smells, and noises of the place—she knew these all familiarly ere long; even passing the gates at times and wandering along the poplar-bordered roads leading to the station, to St. Valery, and to the field of Cressy, where the great battle was fought five hundred years before.

But picturesque as the place was, Claudia was now too restless and too unhappy to derive any real pleasure from these explorations. The beauty was there, and she observed it; but that was all. It moved her to no delight—it roused in her no thankfulness. To the proud, solitary woman wandering hither and thither with her silent anguish ever shut up in her heart, what joy could there be in effects of light and shadow, of architectural detail, of colour and combination; in gabled roof, and curious iron-work, and reflections of arches in still waters?

The pleasantest sight of each day, however, in her eyes, was the great square in front of the Cathedral, which (besides the general market held there once a week) used to bloom like a garden every morning with fresh fruits and flowers and early vegetables. There the country women sat behind their stalls under parti-coloured umbrellas "beautiful, Dædalian," like variegated sunflowers of gigantic growth; and the great old grey Cathedral filled all one side of the place, half in shadow, half in sunshine—a mountain of carved stone, and painted glass, and sumptuous tracery.

Claudia spent much of her time in the Cathedral. The doors were always open, and she used to go in and out as she pleased; resting there when she was tired; musing and dreaming up and down the shadowy aisles; listening to the friendly chimes; kneeling like others at service time, and saying her own prayers to the rolling music of the organ and the chanting of the choir. The verger came to know her by sight ere long, and, taking her for as good a Catholic as the rest, used to sprinkle her with his asperge when she went out with the congregation.

Meanwhile De Benham dragged on through all the stages of gradual convalescence, being carried first from the bed to the sofa in the middle of the day—then sitting up to dinner in an easy chair—then getting as far as the adjoining salon—then being wheeled into the gallery when the day was warm enough and the sun was shining. By and by, as his strength returned, he drove out daily, and even walked with the support of an arm to lean upon and the help of a stick. His wound, also, healed as it had never healed till now, and promised soon to give him no further trouble.

Abbeville, however, is not such a place as an invalid would choose to stay in when once he was strong enough to move elsewhere; and as De Benham got better, he longed to escape from the street noises, the chimes, and the comfortless hotel. M. Laportaire recommended one of the north coast watering-places—Boulogne, or Calais, or Dieppe. De Benham himself desired to push on to one of the Swiss baths—Albisbrunn, or Pfefers, or Loeche. But as yet he was too weak to undertake a long journey, or encounter prolonged fatigue of any kind. Claudia, listening meanwhile to this project and that, waited to see how soon her mother-in-law would propose to return to the cottage near Benhampton.

At length there came a morning when, Lady De Benham having gone out (it might be purposely) into the town, De Benham asked his wife how she would like to spend some weeks at Spa, in Belgium.

"I should object to no place that would be likely to do you good," replied Claudia.

"I have a notion that I should like Spa," he said.

"I have heard that it is pretty; and not wanting in amusements."

"And it is on our way to Switzerland and the Rhine."

"Yes—that is some recommendation."

He hesitated; looked down; fidgeted with a paper-knife and a book.

"You would not, I suppose, enjoy it less," he said, "if my mother accompanied us?"

The question was an awkward one, and awkwardly put. He might have said the same thing in half-a-dozen better ways; above all, without making it so difficult for Claudia to reply to him.

She paused—not because she was taken by surprise, for she had foreseen something of this request; but that she might weigh her words before uttering them.

"What you will enjoy most is now, I think, the point to be considered," she said at length.

De Benham looked at her anxiously. He observed that she spoke with some constraint; but her face told nothing.

"I wish nothing that you—do not wish," he said.

But Claudia would express neither inclination nor disinclination. There was nothing in the world that she desired so little as to have Lady De Benham for a permanent travelling companion; but this she was determined not to say. Neither would she affect, in the smallest degree, a willingness that she could not feel.

"For how long do you propose to stay there?" she asked.

"At Spa? Oh, a few weeks—perhaps five or six; till I am strong enough to go on in earnest."

Then Claudia was again silent, asking herself what she should do next? What she should say? Supposing Lady De Benham to spend those five or six weeks with them at Spa, would it end there? And if it did not end there, where would it end? What should then prevent her from going on with them up the Rhine, and even into Switzerland? And if to Switzerland, why not to Italy? Would it not be well, and right, and wise, to ask at once where the limit of her visit was to be drawn? She was to live with them at Benhampton. That had been settled long since; but they were to have spent a year together first. And now, perhaps, they might never be together—that is to say, really together, quite alone, learning to love each other and make each other happy. Ought she not to say something of this danger, and of the evil that might arise to both of them, if they were not careful to avert it? Yet how could she urge these things upon him? How could she ask him to travel alone with her, if he did not himself desire such close companionship? Had they at any time stood in more lover-like relationship towards each other, it would have been less difficult. Had they been alone together for even one short week before he fell ill, it would have been comparatively easy. But they were still strangers—as much strangers as ever; and his illness, though at first it promised to draw them nearer to each other, had ended by widening the gulf between them.

There, however, was the gulf; and there, also, was Claudia's pride. Her common sense, her convictions, her love, all bade her speak while the opportunity was to her hand. Her pride tied her tongue and constrained her to silence. How could she speak? Would it not be like asking for his love?

These arguments, which take so long to tell, chased each other through her mind so rapidly that they seemed to come simultaneously. But this last question came last, and decided her. De Benham, seeing only her grave, pale face and averted eyes, knew nothing, guessed nothing of the conflict within. Almost before he had observed her silence, that conflict was over.

"Shall I, then, invite my mother to go on with us?" he said.

"If you please."

"Or, perhaps, if it came from you . . ."

Claudia rose abruptly.

"Many thanks," she said, with a smile of irrepressible bitterness. "I think that invitation will come best from yourself."

And with this, she swept past his chair and into the adjoining room.

Now De Benham saw that smile, and a sudden misgiving came upon him. Had Claudia conceded this point unwillingly? Was it unwise in him to have asked it? Could it be, in any way, construed by her into a lack of courtesy, or of due regard, on his part? Was he not bound, now if ever, to consider what would be most agreeable to her?

Disturbed and perplexed, he waited a few moments; then rose and followed her.

"Claudia," he said, tapping at the door.

But Claudia did not answer.

"Claudia—are you there?"

Finding that she was still silent, he opened the door and looked in; but the room was empty and the wardrobe open, and the door leading to the gallery ajar.

"Ah, well!" he muttered, half aloud, as he dropped back again into his chair, "perhaps it is best so. If she cared for me, it would be another matter."

And then Lady De Benham came in, having passed Claudia in the court-yard, and his first words made the thing irrevocable.

"You must come with us, Mutter, dear," he said, eagerly. "It is all settled."

"But are you quite sure . . ."

"That I could not endure to part from you? Yes—quite sure. Ah, if you only knew how I longed for you when I was so bad! My desperate fear was lest I should die without seeing you."

Then Lady De Benham sat down beside her son, and took him in her arms, and drew his head to her bosom, as if he were a little child.

"Are you happy, my son?" she said, tenderly. "Are you happy?"

"Happy!" he repeated. "What is happiness? To live for one object, and attain it? If so, I am happy. I made a vow, and I have kept it. I thank God, that he has enabled me to keep it."

"But is that all?"

"Nay—I have yet more. Mutter, dear, I have you."

"And your wife?"

"My wife? Yes—I have my wife. We esteem each other. We respect each other. We have united our interests and exchanged certain advantages, and are both, I trust, so far content with our lot. But as regards love, we have never dreamt of such a possibility—and never shall dream of it. 'Tis not in the bond."

"If two persons who really esteem each other go together through life, it is strange indeed if that esteem does not become love in the course of the journey."

De Benham shook his head.

"My journey," he said, "lies through a desert."

In the meanwhile, Claudia had taken her hat and gone swiftly out, turning as usual towards the market-place. The Cathedral doors were standing open. In the market all was noise and sunshine; in the church all was silence and shadow. She went in; sat down in a dark and distant corner; and buried her face in her hands.

It was all over. The supreme moment, she told herself, was gone by. She might have spoken, and she had not spoken; and now it was too late. Now, too surely, his love and his confidence would never be hers. Now, too surely, that gulf would go on widening between them, never to be bridged over in this world. And then, as Claudia thought of the life that lay before her—of the love that would never be spoken and the solitude that would never be shared—a dreadful sense of hopelessness fell upon her ; a hopelessness so crushing, so profound, that it seemed to deaden heart and brain within her.

Poor woman ! she had thought to be happy, according to her ideal. She had bargained for position and a title ; she had not bargained for love. And Love had come—Love the Nemesis, Love the Avenger—and the things for which she had sold herself were turned to dust and ashes on her lips. What cared she now for that coronet which once stood to her as the outward and visible type of all human felicity ? What was it now that she had married a lord, and that her servants called her “my lady ?” She would have given it all—coronet, title, and the wealth she had paid for them—in exchange for the love that would never be hers. And was this, she asked herself, the punishment of her ambition ?

She sat for a long time in the church, taking no heed of the quaters as they chimed themselves away ; conscious of nothing but her own despair. By-and-by, the choristers met in the choir to practise, and a low, melancholy sound of chanting echoed down the aisles. Then, for the first time, tears came to her relief, and she wept long and silently.

When at length the singing was over and she had recovered her self-control, she rose and went out into the town and past the gates, taking a long walk into the open country beyond. Here she sat down for awhile on a bench by the roadside, took off her hat, and let the cool air blow upon her face ; nor did she go back to the hotel till she felt sure that no trace remained to show that she had been weeping.

That same evening, De Benham received, among other letters from England, the following from Archibald Blyth :—

“Prior's Walks, May 26th, 1862.

“MY DEAR DE BENHAM,—

“I am heartily glad to learn that you are so much better. Mr. Hardwicke informs me that you will be resuming your journey very shortly.

“This is good news indeed, and I cannot tell you how glad I am to hear it. I have news for you, too—the best of news, to my mind. I am engaged to be married ; and when I tell you who the lady is, I am sure you will agree with me in thinking that I am the luckiest fellow on this side of the Atlantic.

“The lady is Miss Alleyne. When I see how beautiful, and clever, and amiable she is, I can hardly believe in my own good fortune.

That she is ever so much too good for me, I know as well as you do ; but since she is willing to put up with me, and as I love her with all my heart, I suppose there is nothing more to be said on that head. Mr. Hardwicke has kindly given me to understand that he intends still further to improve my position in the house before long ; and I have great hopes of being married before Christmas.

“Pray remember me to my cousin Claudia, and believe me, my dear De Benham, with heartiest good wishes for your health and happiness,

“Your faithful friend,

“ARCHIBALD BLYTH.

“P.S. I don't know whether I ought to give you your title, and call my cousin Lady De Benham. If I have done wrong, please forgive the omission.”

“Here is a letter that will interest you, Claudia,” said De Benham, handing it to her across the table ; for they were at dinner when the post came in. “It is from Archie—and he is engaged to be married.”

Claudia read the letter, and returned it.

“Poor Archie !” she said. “His letters are just like himself. Who is the lady ?”

“She is the daughter of that Alleyne who painted ‘The Athens of Pericles’ which your brother bought out of last year's Exhibition.”

“And is she all that he says ?”

“Yes ; she is pretty—more than pretty. And certainly clever.”

Here Lady De Benham, having read the letter in her turn, joined in the conversation.

“I never heard of this Miss Alleyne before,” she said. “Where have you seen her, Temple ?”

“We met her—Archie and I—ages ago, at Chillingford, a little place on the Wye, that time when we made our pedestrian tour, you know, and I first went to Benhampton. We all happened to be staying at the same inn—it was a mere village, and there was only one in the place. Such a primitive little inn as it was, too ! Archie and I used to eat off wooden platters and get our dinners in the kitchen.”

All this he said with apparent ease and indifference—with almost too much ease, and too much indifference, as it happened ; for Claudia guessed the truth.

“Is the lady's name Juliet ?” she asked.

De Benham flushed scarlet.

“That is—I believe—Miss Alleyne's name,” he said, with evident embarrassment. “What do you know of her ?”

"Nothing," replied Claudia, coldly. "Nothing but her name."

"You will congratulate Mr. Blyth, I suppose, by return of post," said Lady De Benham.

To which De Benham replied that he was very glad to hear of Archie's happiness—very glad, indeed; and that he would write his letter that evening.

But, somehow, the letter did not get written that evening, nor till several evenings after. For De Benham, although he had, of all men living, the least right to feel aggrieved by the turn things had taken, did feel aggrieved, nevertheless, and told himself again and again that in this matter Archie and Juliet had not treated him well. By becoming engaged to each other, it seemed to him as if they had entered into some kind of league and covenant against him. That Juliet Alleyne should some day console herself with another was reasonable—perhaps. That Archie should marry and be happy was meet and right in the highest degree. But that Juliet Alleyne should console herself with Archie, and that Archie should wed with Juliet Alleyne—this was a consummation to which De Benham could in nowise reconcile himself with a good grace. By degrees, however, the sense of soreness wore off, and he succeeded in writing a letter of congratulation sufficiently cordial and sufficiently sincere; and as a letter perfect in its way.

In the meanwhile, partly by road and partly by rail, stopping at Arras, Mons, and Liège by the way, they moved on gradually to Spa, where they arrived towards the end of the first week in June, just as the fashionable season began. At what hotel they put up; how long they remained there; how De Benham, gaining health and strength by slow but sure degrees, became strong enough as the summer and autumn progressed, to do the Rhine and Switzerland and the Italian lakes, so getting well on the road to Rome before Christmas; how his mother constantly went on with them "a little farther," till at last there arose no more question as to her going or staying; how all went smoothly, and yet all went wrong; how they two who had vowed to become one flesh went on their long journey, together yet divided, wedded yet strangers—all this can be conceived, but need not be told.

For here our story ends. To those who may object that such ending is unsatisfactory, and that the heroes and heroines of romance should either die or be happy according to the received order of things, it may be answered that life is unsatisfactory, and death still more so; and that those men and women who neither die nor are happy constitute the great overwhelming majority upon earth. For the most part, apparently, the things of this life turn out neither wholly well nor wholly ill. Each star has its night side, and every cloud its silver lining. Prosperity is not all success; conquest is not all triumph; love is seldom an unmixed good or an unqualified evil. We have seen how Temple De Benham desired riches and Claudia Hardwicke rank; and how both attained the summit of their ambition. If, being successful, they were not also happy, then their story adds but another testimony to the truth of that maxim which tells us that to those whom the Gods chastise they grant the desires of their heart.

The End.

THE HUSS FESTIVAL AT PRAGUE.

AMONG the hills which mark the confines of Bohemia and Bavaria nestles a little town called Hussinetz. Its centre lies in a hollow into which its chief street dips from either side. At one end is its church, and towards the other stands a modest little house, with white-washed walls and a red-tiled roof, out of which two small windows, much resembling half-closed eyes, look out dreamily. In this house, about five hundred years ago, a boy was born who was destined to become world-famous. Jan Hus, his compatriots called him; we know him under the name of John Huss. In this little house he spent the early years of his life, and to it he retired when, in consequence of his preaching, Prague had been laid under an interdict. In the room which he occupied during his stay there—the upper one on the right-hand side of the archway—they still show the little cupboard in the wall in which he kept his books, and which may probably have then contained some work of Wycliffe's, which had escaped the fiery wrath of the Archbishop of Prague. On this occasion he did not leave Hussinetz until he set out upon that journey which ended in his death at Constance. How he was burnt at the stake on the 6th of July, 1614, and how his ashes were thrown into the Rhine, and how his countrymen rose in arms, and terribly avenged his death, making their name of Hussites, and that of their leader Ziska, sounds of terror to German ears, are facts with which most readers are doubtless well acquainted. But with the details of the Hussite wars they are not likely to be familiar; and so, if sufficient space could have been granted for the purpose, we would gladly have tarried for a time over what is the most interesting period of Bohemian history. As it is, we must pass rapidly on to more recent times.

Before doing so, however, we may be allowed to say a few words about the most interesting of the rooms in the Bohemian Museum at Prague, being that which is devoted to the memorials of the terrible Hussite wars. It contains a very good collection of the weapons then in vogue, and by their side are some of the horrible machines used in the torture chamber—heavy iron cramps intended to be fastened on legs and arms, and smaller ones adapted for the crushing of fingers, ingeniously fitted with rows of teeth within and an apparatus of screws without. All of them are worthy of attention, but most curious are the specimens which are here preserved of the arms used by the Hussites themselves. There are all manner of swords and spears, and there are cumbrous bows of various shapes, and rudely-formed arrows, feathered with cuttings from manuscripts, on some of which a few words are still legible, showing that they had been taken from controversial theological works. And there is one ghastly implement, something like a pitch-fork in shape, but supplied with a kind of spring, opening inwards but not outwards, and intended for the purpose of seizing a horseman by the neck and dragging him headlong from the saddle. But the arms which have the greatest fascination for the spectator, and to which he is sure to return again and again, are the Hussite flails of which he must have heard so much. There they are in all manner of shapes, the staff generally about three feet long, and the swinging part about half that length—terrible, cruel-looking weapons, the shorter arm generally cased with iron, or at least secured by iron clasps, and almost always bristling with spikes, or rough with knobs of metal. Another good collection may be seen at Pilsen, near which town so many fights took place, and indeed all Bohemia is rich in relics of those terrible years of contest, when the whole country was one great battle-field. Then it was that those grand hymns were composed which the Hussites used to chant in their fortified camps, and the sounds of which came to be feared in no small measure by their enemies, for when the German troops heard their slow but wild melody becoming louder and louder, and mingled with it the sounds of tramping feet, they knew that they were about to be attacked by foes who never fled when conquered, and who as conquerors gave no quarter.

Never during Ziska's life did his standard, the great black banner bearing a blood-red chalice, have to give way before the foe. But at last the plague struck down the hero whom no mortal enemy had ever overcome; and on October 11, 1424, he died. For a time the Taborites, as his followers were called, continued their successes under a new chief, Procopius; but at length a civil war broke out, and they were finally overthrown in 1434, by an army of their own countrymen at Lipan. From this period we pass rapidly on to the year 1547, when Ferdinand I., after the defeat of the German Protestants at Mühlberg, entered Prague at the head of an overwhelming force, and assembled what became infamous as the "Bloody Diet." Then commenced a time of crushing persecution. The constitutional rights of Bohemia were annulled, the king was made absolute, an ecclesiastical censorship was instituted, and the Jesuits were invited into the country in order to carry out its decrees. Rather more than half a century later a second Ferdinand took in hand the bad work which his namesake had left unfinished. An insurrection ensued, and for a time the cause of the insurgents seemed likely to prosper, but on the 8th of November, 1620, it was irremediably ruined by the battle of the White Hill. On that fatal field all that remained of the old liberties of Bohemia perished, and to this day they have never, except for a short and feverish period, been able to renew their life.

Ferdinand now commenced a true reign of terror. By means of the axe and the gibbet he decimated the ranks of his opponents, and struck terror into all hearts. Then he deliberately set to work to deprive the country of its national tongue. All Bohemian books were condemned to be burnt, and the Jesuits went about the country seeking them out and delivering them over to the flames. They hoped, no doubt, that the Bohemian language would die out as completely as has the Celtic in Cornwall. But it is not easy to compel a nation to give up its language, and so the Czechs continued to speak their mother tongue, if not in their palaces at least in their cottages, under the humble thatched roofs in which were often preserved some of their forbidden books, the Bohemian Martyrology for instance, the existence of which was known only to the father of the family and his eldest son. At length the thirty years' war came to an end, but not before half of the towns of Bohemia had been destroyed, by far the greater part of its nobles had perished, and its population had fallen from more than four millions to less than one. The remnant that remained of the nation seemed to have but little chance of maintaining its nationality, and recovering its independence.

But with the reign of Joseph II. a new era commenced for this down-trodden people. In 1791 the Diet instituted a Professorship of Bohemian in the University of Prague. When Joseph was deliberating what tongue should be chosen as the universal language of his empire, he was for some time inclined to select the Bohemian, that being the language which could be most readily acquired by the majority of his subjects. A school of students of Bohemian was founded by the great Slavist, Dubrovsky, and early in the present century a great impulse was given to its labours by the discovery of a manuscript which contained a number of old Bohemian poems. From that time may be dated the new life of the language. A band of enthusiastic students set to work, first to learn and then to teach it, and in a short time the tongue which had been allowed to fall into disuse, except among the ignorant peasantry, became the favourite vehicle of expression in every patriotic circle. In a few years a whole literature sprang into existence. In 1818 the Bohemian Museum was founded, and a little later its Review—an excellent periodical—made its appearance, and two societies were founded for the purpose of publishing books for the people, in the popular tongue, and at extremely low prices. Somewhat later a national press was started, its chief founder being a journalist named Havliczek, who adopted the ingenious plan of writing about Bohemia under the name of Ireland, and attacking the Austrian Government under the pretence of defending the Irish against their English rulers, a plan which all Bohemians understood, so that the word "Repeal" became the watchword of the popular party.* Up till 1848 all went well. Then came a period which commenced with hopes and smiles, and ended in tears, and all the bitterness of hope not only deferred, but finally disappointed.

But disappointed though they were, the leaders of the National party did not despair. Some of them were in prison, others were in exile, but those who remained once more devoted themselves to the task of making the Bohemian people fit for that liberty which they so ardently desired.

Seeing clearly the advantages which the Germans in Bohemia derived from their superior culture, they determined to raise the Czechs at least to a level with their rivals in respect to education, and so they did all that lay in their power to multiply and improve the schools in their towns and villages, to foster the growth of a sound popular literature, to create a taste for study among the masses, and in every way to dissipate the ignorance which is so apt to overshadow every people among whom the free expression of thought has been checked. The success with which they have met of late years is wonderful. Everywhere throughout Bohemia schools have been opened, libraries have been founded, the peasants have been educated, even in the remotest villages; and in the towns a large amount of true culture has been introduced among the workpeople. And everywhere, as education has spread, the love of the Fatherland has grown stronger, and with it the old yearning for political and religious freedom, the old indignation against falsehood and oppression. These feelings have never died out in Bohemia, but for a long time they had no power of manifesting themselves. Latterly, however, they have been trained and systematized, and now their expression begins to assume a real political significance. In the case of the great society called the "Sokol," for instance, it is viewed with considerable anxiety by the authorities. This Sokol is a great gymnastic society, comprising members taken from all classes, having its head-quarters at Prague, and branch establishments all over the country. Every man who belongs to it soon becomes, in all but the actual use of arms, a trained soldier, thoroughly well drilled, accustomed to prompt obedience to orders, capable of sustaining long-continued fatigue. Those who see a detachment of the Sokol swinging along in their admirable costume, at once picturesque and serviceable—a brown tunic fitting loosely over a red flannel shirt, brown trousers tucked into boots which come half-way up the calf, and a jaunty Spanish-looking cap, with a feather at one side of it—cannot fail to see that the society contains in itself the germ of a far from despicable army. Already, indeed, it is a little army in itself, for it numbers about eight thousand members, and its ranks are constantly being recruited. There is no little significance in the position attributed to the Sokol in a drawing which has had an immense sale in Bohemia. In the centre stands the national lion, the emblem of the country, looking out upon a landscape from which the storms of the passing night are drifting away, and on which the rays of the coming day are beginning to shine. By the lion's side is seen the form of the Genius of the country, worn by long and cruel suffering, and looking up to her from a thorny brake below stands a boy, the representative of the rising generation, who listens with clenched hands and sparkling eyes to the story told him by the man who stands by his side, dressed in the costume of the Sokol.

Among the numerous manifestations of popular discontent and patriotic feeling which have of late years taken place in Bohemia, by far the most important were the public meetings which have been held on various pretexts in divers places. On many a rising ground rendered famous in Bohemian history by some desperate deed of valour, or associated with some terrible tale of wrong, crowds gathered together by day to listen to speeches which sent a patriotic thrill along their veins, or camped out at night, dimly seen by the light of their scattered watch-fires. Especially on every Sunday morning did such gatherings take place throughout the length and breadth of the land. In vain did the authorities interfere; the tide of public feeling was too strong to be repressed. It is true that when the 6th of July arrived this year, the anniversary of both the birth and the execution of John Huss, a proposed pilgrimage in his honour to Hussinetz was forbidden, and the intending pilgrims had to wend their way to Constance, and to visit the spot on which he died instead of the house in which he was born. But a little later the original plan was after all carried out, and the forbidden demonstration took place, attended by the most unmistakable expressions of love and veneration for the man who had died a martyr's death four centuries and a half before, and to whose memory, during all that time, it had never been possible to pay its fitting meed of honour.

On the 4th of last September Prague wore indeed a gay and festal aspect. But a short time before the city had been in a state of siege, and men had moved about uneasily, not knowing what news the morrow might bring; but now all seemed bright and cheerful, as the sun shone down pleasantly on a better order of things. Fine weather is of great account as regards the success of a festival, and the elements combined to ensure that of the commemoration of John Huss. At one time, indeed, on the third day, the sky became veiled, and a thick cloud seemed to threaten mischief; but it only grumbled sulkily in the distance, and never fulfilled its menaces. The proceedings on the first day commenced with a morning performance of an oratorio, called Jan Hus, which took place in the New Theatre, and was attended by a very enthusiastic audience. In the evening a drama bearing the same name was performed in the same house in the presence of a very similar assembly, and was received with even more rapturous applause than had greeted the morning's music and song. Each piece was, as it were, an epitome of Huss's life, and each appealed strongly to the sympathies of an audience which was disposed to find an allusion to the present and the future of Bohemia in every statement about its past history. This was especially the case during the performance of the play, for the feelings of the people had been worked up to a high pitch of excitement by the events which preceded its representation. It would have been strange, indeed, if it had been otherwise, for even the foreigners who were present were unable, after witnessing what took place in the afternoon before the house in which Huss once lived, and the chapel in which he used to preach—to look on in the evening unmoved while the concluding scenes of the drama were being performed—while Huss was taking a last farewell of his aged mother before starting on what was to prove so fatal a journey, while he was boldly maintaining the cause of truth and freedom in the midst of an angry crowd of enemies, while he was slowly moving, attending monks singing the while Miserere ei Domine, to the spot appointed for his execution, and, finally, while the stage was lighted up by the lurid glow which told that he was passing through the terrors of his fiery trial.

The scene which was presented by the Bethlehem Place during the interval between the performance of the oratorio and that of the drama was one which none who saw it will readily forget. Few spots in Prague are richer in historical associations than this "Place," which still retains its old size and shape, though most of the houses which surround it have been rebuilt, or at least modernised. Here used to stand the house in which John Huss lived, and that Bethlehem Chapel in which he first preached the doctrines which were fraught with such important results both for himself and his country, and into this open space used to press the eager crowds which drank in the bold truths he uttered. At one end of the Place stands a house which dates from so early a period that its massive walls may have looked down upon the compact bands of students and townspeople who came to hear their favourite teacher thunder forth his protests against the falsehood and corruption of the age, and on the crowds of angry men who met together there a little later to talk over the news which had arrived from Constance, and how he had been put to a terrible death there, and on the wild troops of Hussite insurgents who, a little later still, swept past to the stern music of their sombre hymns, bent upon pillage and destruction, eager to make red with the blood of their foes the rude weapons they bore. In front of this quaint old house, by the side of the great yawning archway within which the shadows lie dark and cool even on the brightest and the hottest day, a sort of balcony had been erected, which was occupied by about a hundred ladies, and above it from out of a mass of green leaves and flowers a life-size figure of Huss gleamed brightly. Most of the other houses, also, were decked with boughs and flags, and streamers of various hues, and almost all the numerous windows which look out upon the Place were occupied by closely-packed spectators. Down below a vast crowd surged to and fro, almost setting at defiance the efforts of a strong detachment of the Sokol to keep the ground open around the tribune erected in front of Huss's former dwelling-place. About three o'clock a long procession made its way through the crowd with banners flying and music playing, and a little later the appointed speeches in honour of Huss were delivered. When the orators began to speak their hearers at first kept silence, but after a little while a loud chorus of cheering broke forth, which was repeated enthusiastically from time to time, and which reached its climax when at a given signal a curtain was let fall from before Huss's house, and a large medallion of the martyr was exposed to view on the wall. Four centuries and a half had passed since he had been unjustly done to death, and for more than two hundred years it had scarcely been possible even so much as to utter his name in public, and now it was uttered amid the enthusiastic plaudits of many thousands of his countrymen, met together there to do public honour to his memory. It was pleasant to observe the expression of sober joy which marked their countenances. The day was one of triumph for them, but they did not carry its manifestation to excess, great as must have been the excitement of tasting liberty once more after so long a time of wearisome waiting. But a few months before such a crowd as this would have been driven away by a strong detachment of the great army which occupies Prague. Now it was allowed to assemble in peace, and scarcely a sign of government interference was perceptible, beyond the presence of a couple of policemen who looked on tranquilly, and an Imperial Commissary who fidgeted a good deal, but took no decided step to muzzle the speakers. The proceedings terminated with the singing of one of the grand old Hussite hymns, a slow, majestic choral which seemed to speak of the terrors of those troublous days in which Ziska's terrible soldiers held their own on the bare hill-sides, amid whistling storms and biting cold, and driving rain and snow, and from within the strong circles of their linked chariots defied the serried ranks of the foe, who outnumbered them by ten to one. You had only to shut your eyes, and, as the modern scene vanished, you could see that of the olden times appear—could scan the ranks of the German knights and men-at-arms without the line of waggons chained together, the wild and haggard bands of the Hussites within, and in their centre Ziska standing calm and resolute, easily to be recognised by the veil over his sightless eye, the stern joy of combat scarcely lighting up his sombre and resolute countenance as he gave his curt orders to the fierce warriors who stood grimly swinging their spiked flails, and behind a background of unflinching women preparing supplies of food and ammunition, and children bending little crossbows in readiness for the coming fight. Then the hymn came to an end, and the crowds moved slowly away from the scene, and all was quiet for a time. But some hours later, when the daylight had faded from the sky, the Bethlehem Place was brightly illuminated, lights being set in the windows of all the neighbouring houses, except two which belonged to a German proprietor, and the statue of Huss at the further end being encircled by a blazing curve of fire. For some hours the place swarmed with crowds of visitors, in the midst of whom tramped up and down a detachment of policemen carrying, according to the cheerful custom in vogue here, rifles with fixed bayonets. Then the lights gradually went out, the crowds dispersed, and by midnight the stars which looked down upon the Bethlehem Place saw no figures moving there but those of the policemen, who slowly continued their monotonous walk to and fro.

On the following morning a special train started from Prague, conveying some six hundred excursionists, and among others the writer of the present article, to the points from which Hussinetz could most conveniently be reached. The great majority of our party were, of course, Bohemians, but all the Slavonic nations were well represented, there being a number of Russians present—the Russian press having sent no less than five special correspondents—and several Bulgarians, Ser-vians, Croats, Slovaks, and Poles. Before starting we met at the rooms of one of the literary societies, and from their windows looked down upon a bright and lively scene. Although the hour was an early one, all Prague was astir, and vast masses of people thronged the wide street in front of us, and the noble Wenceslaus Place, which leads from it up to the Bastions. Presently the sounds of music were heard, and a long procession passed through the crowd on its way to the railway station. All the trade societies of Prague were represented there, each in its own costume, and each bearing its own banner, the gay colours worn by some of the companies giving an added brilliance to the bright picture which seemed to unroll itself before our eyes. Here marched the green-clad brewers, there the butchers clothed in spotless white; at one moment the street was blue with the tunics of a great society of working men, at another it was a mixture of russet brown and rich reds, as a detachment of the Sokol swung past with lissom step. Then perhaps a band of firemen would go by, their helmets and axes blazing in the sun, or a company of the National Guard would advance in military array, or a band of students in fantastic dress and armed with long rapiers. At last appeared, amid vociferous cheering, the great black banner of Ziska, and the foreign guests were marshalled behind it and walked off to the station between two lines of enthusiastic spectators, who favoured them with a trying amount of attention and applause. It took some time to get the whole of our party seated in the carriages which awaited us, but at last we got fairly off, and glided from among the crowds of shouting sympathisers at the station into the open country.

For about eight hours we sped along the line, passing in that time from the middle of Bohemia almost to its southern boundary, and everywhere we were received with the greatest enthusiasm. During the early parts of the journey we traversed a country which is not over picturesque, slightly undulating, sandy flats, roads that looked like dried-up water-courses, and meadows from which the late hay crop had just been carried away. But as we went further the scenery began to improve, and towards the evening we found ourselves in a district to which frequent hills and dales lent a pleasant variety. But more interesting to us than the country itself was the reception given to us by its inhabitants. It was well known that the authorities had done all they could to throw discredit upon the expedition, and, at least in some places, the clergy had assisted them to the best of their power; so we were at first curious to know what sort of greeting would await us at the various stations. But a very short time sufficed to give the information. At station after station as we passed along the line we were received with a rapturous welcome. Everywhere an enthusiastic crowd was eagerly looking out for our arrival, and as we ran alongside the platform we were greeted by a chorus of friendly cries, by the banging of guns, and by the din of a band playing the most inspiring of national tunes. The brown jackets and red shirts of the Sokol were prominent everywhere; and when we had got a little distance from Prague the costumes of the peasants lent colour and picturesqueness to the scene, while at most of the stations groups of ladies decked with special ribbons in honour of the occasion helped to make up a picture which, lit with bright sunshine, was very pleasant to look upon. And amid such pictures as these we passed onwards along the line until we reached the town of Strakonitz, at which our party was to pass the night.

Towards four o'clock the next morning we found ourselves jolting along the road which leads from Strakonitz in the direction of Hussinetz. As we slowly mounted the hill which rises above the little town, the light of the stars which shone brightly above us just enabled us to make out the principal features of the scene below, the faintly glimmering houses, and the indistinct river, and the ghostly church tower, from which the sounds of the striking clock boomed mysteriously. A little later, and the sky was flushed with rosy colour, and the mists had risen from the valleys and gathered in fleecy clouds among the windings of the hills, and we could see the long file of carts which preceded and which followed us—strange vehicles, for the most part mere peasant waggons with wattled sides, but gaily decked with flags and green with leafy branches. A little later still, and we were rattling along amid a cloud of dust and under a blazing sun, exchanging friendly greetings of Ná-zdar with the peasants we passed in the fields or on the road; and being received with joyful acclamation in the two or three little towns which we traversed on our way, and which had erected triumphal arches in our honour, and got ready music and beer for our enlivenment and refreshment. By nine o'clock we had reached the top of the steep descent which leads into Hussinetz, and before long we had taken our seats on the platform which had been erected in front of the centre of attraction—the modest little house in which John Huss used to live.

At about eleven o'clock the head of a long procession began to mount the steep street. First came a number of horsemen, sturdy Bohemian yeomen, evidently thrifty, sober men, such as a nation may well be proud of possessing. After them followed a number of deputations, each bearing its own flag, and many of them dressed in striking costumes. As they passed up the hill their standard-bearers fell out from the ranks and passed behind the tribune erected in front of our platform, round which eventually upwards of forty flags were waving. Every here and there in the procession walked a band of girls, dressed in white and wearing white flowers in their hair, or little round hats with white feathers in them on their heads, and white and blue scarves across one shoulder. At length the last of the companies forming the procession had passed by, and its various ranks were grouped around the tribune. Then rose from beneath it the solemn sounds of one of the grand old Hussite songs, and when that was over the President of the Festival, Dr. Sladkowsky, mounted the tribune, and delivered an address, which was received with the most tumultuous applause. As he spoke of Huss's noble life and most courageous death, of his bold utterances in defence of truth and justice, of his determination never to yield, whatever force might be brought to bear against him, and of the undaunted valour with which he maintained his resolution even when the flames were rising around him as he stood bound to the stake, one could feel a thrill pass through the vast crowd which swarmed around. And when the curtain fell, which until that moment had concealed the medallion of Huss, newly fixed upon the walls of the house in which he used to live, such an outburst of hearty enthusiasm took place as cannot often be heard.

A few hours later we were once more in our waggon, slowly climbing the hill which looks down upon Hussinetz. Below us in the valley the white walls of the old church and of the irregular line of houses shone bright as the rays of the sun, which was now low in the sky, lighted them up and blazed here and there reflected from their windows. The long street was still thronged by numerous groups, chiefly of peasants, for the greater part of the visitors from a distance had already left, or were preparing to start in the large field at the end of the town in which the waggons and other vehicles had been stationed. That open space looked somewhat as if a fair were being held on it, numbers of tents having been pitched there, in which many of the visitors, chiefly the pedestrians, had encamped for the nights preceding and following the festival, and booths having been opened for the sale of refreshments. The night before all the surrounding hills had been lit up with bonfires, and the scene must have borne some resemblance to those on which the old Hussites were accustomed to look, when, from out of the circle formed by their linked waggons, they gazed through the darkness of the night at the signal fires which glowed on the hill-tops around, to tell them of the movements of their foes. The sun sank lower as we continued our journey, its last rays serving to light up the first of the little towns through which we had to pass, and in which the enthusiasm which had greeted us in the morning was renewed on our return. Long before we reached the railway station of Strakonitz all was darkness around. Even the starlight of our morning journey was absent now, for the heavens were covered by a veil of cloud foreboding rain. Three weary hours had we to wait at the station before the train arrived, and then came a night journey which could scarcely be considered a pleasure, for every seat was occupied in the carriage in which we were, and any other sort of sleep than a restless doze was out of the question. We were glad when the day dawned and we had something to look at out of the windows. It was a lovely morning, and in the bright sunshine the groups of peasants working in the fields on either side were set off to great advantage. The women do a great deal of field labour in Bohemia, as their prematurely wrinkled and wizened faces testify. It by no means improves their personal appearance, as may be seen when one observes them closely, but at a little distance they looked very picturesque as they worked in the meadows along the line, their bright red or blue handkerchiefs and petticoats dotting the landscape with telling bits of colour. Here and there a little company, chiefly consisting of women and children, might be seen among the fruit trees of some orchard adjoining the railway, and the green of the leaves and the gold of the fresh sunlight and the reds and blues of the dresses of the women made up a charming picture. Amid the friendly greetings of these wayside groups, with many an interchanged salutation of Slava and Na-zdar, we ran swiftly on our way, and about eight o'clock we found ourselves once more in Prague.

In the afternoon of the same day the foreign visitors reassembled in the banquetting hall on the Sophia Island, where they were received by their Bohemian hosts and sumptuously entertained. To any one who was acquainted with the sufferings through which the country had passed, and the difficulties with which even now it had to contend, the scene could not fail to be as interesting as exciting, especially when Dr. Rieger, the greatest of Bohemian orators and one of the most influential among the leaders of the national party, was uttering the noble speech in which he alluded to the sufferings of the past and the promise of the future, and after he had sat down, and, while the echoes of his strong words were still ringing in all ears, the spirit-stirring notes of the Bohemian National Anthem clanged forth from the orchestra. None of the foreigners who were present could help feeling their hearts beat faster than before as they listened to its dashing strains, or could avoid responding heartily to the hope expressed by the Burgomaster of the City, in proposing the health of the guests, that they had been pleased with the appearance of the people whom they had been visiting, and that they would carry back with them a pleasant recollection of their stay.

The day before the festival took place at Hussinetz a sermon was preached in its church, in which the officiating priest predicted all sorts of woes as likely to be brought upon the town by the honour it was about to pay to an ecclesiastical rebel. Many of his hearers were no doubt greatly alarmed, and went home full of gloomy forebodings as to the future. A few days later a misfortune did indeed befall the town, for a fire broke out which consumed many houses before it could be extinguished. But the preacher could scarcely triumph in the success of his prediction, for the flames nearly burnt his church down, while the house of John Huss remained unscathed. It is to be hoped that Huss's country may emerge equally uninjured from the terrible struggle in which it has so long been engaged.

W. R. S. RALSTON.

THE OLD MANOR-HOUSE.

AN old house, crumbling half away, all barnacled and lichen-grown,
Of saddest, mellowest, softest grey—with a grand history of its own,
Grand with the work and strife and tears of more than half a thousand years.

Such delicate, tender russet tones of colour on its gables slept,
With streaks of gold betwixt the stones, where wind-sown flowers and mosses crept.
Wild grasses waved in sun and shade, o'er terrace, slab, and balustrade.

Around the clustered chimneys clung the ivy's wreathed and braided threads,
And dappled lights and shadows flung across the sombre browns and reds;
Where'er the graver's hand had been it spread its tendrils bright and green.

Far-stretching branches shadowed deep the blazoned windows and broad eaves,
And rocked the faithful rooks asleep, and strewed the terraces with leaves.
A broken dial marked the hours amid damp lawns and garden bowers.

An old house, silent, sad, forlorn, yet proud and haughty to the last;
Of all its power and splendour shorn, but rich with memories of the past;
And pitying from its own decay the gilded piles of yesterday.

I saw it first in summer time. The warm air hummed and buzzed with bees,
Where now the pale-green hop-vines climb about the sere trunks of the trees;
And waves of roses on the ground scented the tangled glades around.

Some long fern-plumes drooped there, below; above, the sky was still and blue;
Just here—between the gloom and glow—a cedar and an aged yew Parted their dusky arms, to let the glory fall on Margaret.

She leaned on that old balustrade, her white dress tinged with golden air,
Her small hand loosely clasped and laid amongst the moss and maiden-hair.
I watched her, hearing, as I stood, the turtle cooing in the wood;

Hearing a mavis far away, piping his dreamy interludes,
While gusts of soft wind, sweet with hay, swept through those garden solitudes;
And thinking she was lovelier e'en than my young ideal-love had been.

Tall, with that subtle, sensitive grace, which made so plainly manifest
That she was born of noble race,—a cool hushed presence, bringing rest,
Of one who felt and understood the dignity of womanhood.

Tall, with a slow, proud step and air; with skin half marble and half milk;
With twisted coils of raven hair, blue-tinged, and fine and soft as silk;
With haughty, clear-cut chin and cheek, and broad brows exquisitely Greek.

With still, calm mouth, whose dreamy smile possessed me like a haunting pain,
So rare, so sweet, so free from guile, with that slight accent of disdain;
With level, liquid tones that fell like chimings of a vesper bell.

With large, grave stag-eyes, soft yet keen with slumbering passion, hazel brown,
Long-lashed and dark, whose limpid sheen my thirsty spirit swallowed down.
O poor, pale words, wherewith to paint my queen, my goddess, and my saint!

You see that oriel, ivy-grown, with the blurred sculpture underneath?
Her sweet head, like the Clytie's own, with a white stephanotis wreath Inwoven with its coil of hair, first bent to me in greeting there.

I shall remember till I die that night when we were introduced!
The great Sir Hildebrand stood by—her cousin—scowling as he used
To scowl if e'en a poor dumb cur ventured to lift his eyes to her.

I cared not. Well I knew her grace was not for him. I watched them dance,
And knew it by her locked-up face, and her slow, haughty utterance.
I knew he chafed and raged to see how kind and sweet she was to me.

O dear old window! nevermore the red and purple lights that stray
Through your dim panes upon the floor on sunny summer nights, will lay Soft rainbows on her glossy hair, and the white dress she used to wear!

'Twas there, when fell the twilight hush, I used to feed her wistful ears,
And make her cheek and forehead flush, and her dark eyes fill full of tears,
With tales of my wild fighting life—our bitter, brave Crimean strife.

'Twas on that terrace that we read the "Idylls," sauntering up and down,
With gentle, musing, measured tread, while leaves kept falling, gold and brown;
And mists kept rising, silver-grey—one still and peaceful autumn day.

In that green nook we used to sit; and I would watch her as she worked.
Her face had such a spell in it! and such a subtle glamour lurked
In even the motion of her hand! Why, I could never understand.

'Twas there I tied the little strap that held her netting down, one day,
And kissed the soft palm in her lap, that she so gently drew away;
Ay me, we held our tongues for hours, and I plucked off and ate the flowers.

'Twas there, soon after, in a ray of moonlight, standing still and dumb,
That first my straining strength gave way, and her reserve was overcome.
My glad arms had her then to hold, and all my burning love was told.

'Twas on that broken step we sat—where the yew branch is fall'n and bent—
And read the Colonel's letter that recalled me to my regiment:

'Twas there, on such a night as this, we took our first, long, parting kiss.

'Twas there I hugged the small Greek head upon my bosom, damp with dew;
'Twas there she soothed my grief and said, "But I shall still belong to you."
O my sweet Eve, with your pure eyes! you're mine now, in God's Paradise.

I sailed, you know, within a week en route for Malta's heat and blaze;
And tender letters came, to speak of love and comfort and bright days.
I tried to think it was not hard—of what was coming afterward.

I used to dream and dream and dream, from night till morn, from morn till night;
My future life just then did seem so full, so beautiful, so bright,
I could not see, I could not feel, the sorrow dogging at my heel.

At length it touched me. By-and-by the letters ceased. I looked in vain;
I roamed the streets dejectedly, and gnawed my long moustache in pain.
I wrote twice—thrice; no answer still; surely, I thought, she must be ill.

Until one evening Eyre came in, to lounge and gossip, drink and smoke.
I gave him leisure to begin; and, when his pipe was lit, he spoke Through curling vapour, soft and blue—"Guy, I've a piece of news for you.

"One of the girls you met last year at that poor, tumble-down old place—
The dark-haired one,—she with the clear white skin and sweet Madonna face,— She's married now, I understand, to her rich cousin, Hildebrand."

I felt my limbs grow stark and stiff; I felt my heart grow cold as lead;
I heard Eyre's quiet, musing whiff—the noise swam round and round my head.
I veiled my eyes lest he should see their passionate, mute misery.

"I only heard," he said, "to-day. It's out in all the papers though.
She did not care for him, they say. But the old house was falling low—
Her father's name and fame at stake. She would do anything for his sake.

"Some mortgages foreclosed—the price of years and centuries of debt;
The manor doomed for sacrifice—or else the Lady Margaret.
Doubtless for Hildebrand's red gold the rare Madonna face was sold.

"I fancy that's the history," he ended in a bitter tone.
 "It's not a new one, by-the-bye." And, when he went, I sat alone,
 And tried to ease me with a prayer, but ground my teeth in my despair.

Then I grew stupid, numb, and tired. A fever crept through all my veins,
 And wearied out my heart, and fired my dazed, tumultuous, teeming brains.
 I hung, suspended by a breath, for weeks and months 'twixt life and death.

Then I recovered, and had leave to go to England—where she dwelt—
 In my home climate to retrieve my broken health and strength. I felt Twice ten years older than before. I knew I should come back no more.

Soon as I touched my native land, my feet turned toward the Manor-House.
 They told me that Sir Hildebrand was in the Highlands, shooting grouse—
 That she was in her father's care. That night I found her, sitting there,

On that third step, just where the trees cast down their greenest, coolest shade;
 Her weary hands about her knees, her head against the balustrade;
 And such dumb woe in her sweet eyes, uplifted to the fading skies.

She did not see me till I burst through the rose-thickets round about.
 She sprang up with a cry at first—and then her arms were half stretched out—
 And then caught backward, for his sake. I felt as if my heart would break.

I knew the truth. I did not care,—I did not think. I flung me down,
 And kissed her hands, her wrists, her hair, the very fringes of her gown;
 While she sat cowering in a heap, and moaned, and shook, but could not weep.

It was soon over. O good God, forgive me!—I was sorely tried.
 'Twas a dark pathway that I trod; I could not see Thee at my side.
 It was soon over. "I shall die," she whispered, "if you stay here, Guy!

"O Guy, Guy! you were kind to me in our old days,—be kinder now,
 Be kind and go and let me be!" And then I felt on my hot brow
 The brush of her cold finger-tips—the last soft contact of her lips.

And I obeyed her will and went, and vowed to tempt her nevermore.
 I tried hard, too, to be content, and think of that which lay before.
 I knew my dream of love was past, yet strove to serve her to the last.

With strange companions did I dwell one scorching summer, on the heights
 Of Tangier's Moorish citadel, and mused away the days and nights.
 With loose white garments and long gun, I roamed the deserts in the sun.

I painted Atlas, capped with snow, and lifted, cool, and still, and fair,
 Out of the burning heat and glow into the solemn upper air;
 And Tetuan's gleaming walls I drew on fields of Mediterranean blue.

I haunted Cairo's crowded ways, and sketched carved doors and gilded grates, Mosque-domes and minarets ablaze, and sweet dark heads with shining plaits;
 And now a grave old Arab sheikh, and then a slim, straight-featured Greek.

I roamed through Nubian desert flats, where vultures sailed o'er burning seas;
 And forests where the yellow bats hung large and lifeless from the trees;
 And marshy wastes where crocodiles slept on the shores of sandy isles.

Roaming through India's burning plains, I chased wild boars and antelopes, Swam brawling nullahs in the rains, and haunted dew-wet mango-topes;
 Shot bears and tigers in the gloom of the dense forests of Beerbhoom.

I crept with curious feet within imperial China's sacred bounds;
 I saw the palace of Pekin and all its fairy garden-grounds;
 The green rice-fields, the tremulous rills, the white azaleas on the hills;

The tea-groves climbing mountain backs; the girls' rich robes of blue and white;
 The cattle 'neath the paddy stacks; the gilt pagodas, tall and bright;
 And in a merchant-junk I ran across the waters to Japan.

I saw, where silk-fringed mats were spread, within his lacquered, bare saloon,
 With his curled roofs above his head, on muffled heels, the great Tycoon.
 Familiar things they were to me—the pipes, and betel-nuts, and tea.

I dug in Californian ground, at Sacramento's golden brim,
 With hunger, murder, all around, and fever shaking every limb;
 Saw, in lush forests and rude sheds, the Dyaks roasting pirates' heads.

I shot white condors on the brows of snowy Andes; and I chased Wild horses, and wild bulls and cows, o'er the wide Pampas' jungle-waste;
 And saw, while wandering to and fro, the silver mines of Mexico.

In Caffre waggons I was drawn up wild Cape gorges, green and steep,
 And camped by river-grove and lawn, where nightly tryst the wild things keep;
 Where glaring eyes without the line of circling watchfires used to shine.

I built an Australian hut of logs, and lived alone—with just a nooze,
 A trap, a gun, my horse and dogs; I hunted long-legged kangaroos;
 And oft I spent the calm night hours beneath the gum trees' forest bowers.

I threaded miles and miles and miles, where Lena's sad, slow waters flow
 'Mid silent rocks and woods and isles, and drear Siberian steppes of snow;
 Where pines and larches, set alight, blaze in the dark and windless night.

I saw when, in my flying sledge, I swept the frozen tundra slopes,
 The white bears on some craggy ledge, far off, where ocean blindly gropes
 In her dim caves—where bones lie furled, the tokens of a vanished world.

I saw across the dread blue sky, spanning blue ice and bluer mist
 (That shows where open waters lie), the bright Aurora keep her tryst,—
 That arch of tinted flame—so fair! lighting the crystals in the air.

Then, all at once—I know not why—I felt I could no longer roam;
 My feet were irresistibly drawn toward my England and my home.
 And I began to pine and fret for one more glimpse of Margaret.

So on a sudden I returned. I reached the village in the night.
 At one small inn a candle burned with feeble, pale, unsteady light.
 The hostess curtsied, grave and strange. She did not know me for the change.

My broad white brows were bronzed, and scarred with lines of trouble, thought, and care;
 My young bright eyes were dim and hard—the sunshine was no longer there;
 My brown moustache was hid away in a great beard of iron-grey.

"The manor-house is habited," to my brief question she replied.
 "To-night my lady lies there dead. She's long been ailing, and she died At noon. A happy thing for her. Were you acquainted with her, sir?"

"A sweeter lady never walked! So kind and good to all the poor!
 She ne'er disdained us when she talked—ne'er turned a beggar from her door!
 Ah, sir, but we may look in vain; we ne'er shall see her likes again!"

"I heard the squire's great bloodhounds bark, and woke, and shook, and held my breath.
 My man, he stirred too in the dark. Said he to me, 'My lady's death Is not far off. Another night she'll never see.' And he was right."

"'Twas over in twelve hours, or less. They laid her on the golden bed,
 In her old confirmation dress, with the small white cap on her head
 Which bore the Bishop's blessing hand,—she asked that of Sir Hildebrand."

You see that window in the shade of those old beeches? 'Twas that room Wherein my dear dead love was laid. I climbed the ivy in the gloom
 And silence—just once more to see the face that had belonged to me.

I stood beside her. No one heard. On the great rajah's bed, alone
 She lay. The night-breeze softly stirred the Cashmere curtains, and the moan
 Of my wild kisses seemed to thrill the solitude: all else was still.

In the pale yellow taper-light I gazed upon her till the morn.
 I see her now—so sweet and white! the fair pure face, so trouble-worn!
 The thin hands folded on her breast, in peace at last, in perfect rest.

ADA CAMBRIDGE.

CHRISTMAS CAROLS.

THE return of Christmas calls forth year by year a fresh crop of sentiment: it has become fashionable, and we are now determined to do Christmas in England after an English fashion, and to let the Germans and the Romans keep it in theirs. Our celebration of the holiday (as distinct from the festival) takes the shape of eating and drinking, of family gatherings, long bills, large puddings, and a profusion of evergreens. The literature of the season has a certain gorgeousness about it, from the reward cards for schools, illuminated with robins and red berries, up to the pretty books of the Etching Club, and to the beautifully bound copies of favourite authors intended for Christmas presents. Within recent years too there has been a touch of archæology in our Christmas works, and gift books now contain a fair proportion of old as well as of new pieces bearing on the Feast of the Nativity. These bits of poetry or prose are all more or less familiar to us in their tone, because, though "Christmas," as the carol says, "comes but once a year," it occurs on an average thirty times in every life: and yet these Christmas feelings are ever new, because it is individually that each man realises for himself all that the season has to convey of sadness and of hope.

Holidays, games, and pies make Christmas merry to the young; but it is in later life, when we are tired of Christmas games, when we are made sad by Christmas gatherings, despondent by Christmas bills, and dyspeptic by Christmas fare, that we really understand why so much enthusiasm is got up every year about the matter, both connected with and apart from the deep religious gratitude which commemorates the birth of Christ. There is a fascination in the Festival derived from contrast and from hope. The year, having tried all forms of life, having been gay and then sober, seems finally to do penance in a white sheet. The earth, having been so fruitful and active, now sleeps passive and silent, letting men plough long furrows in her breast, as the December winds rock her in her sleep. But in this blank time of the world men find pleasure: for this sleep is not unto death, but unto more work and always more life. It is fitting then that Christians should celebrate at such a time the birthday of the Christian year.

Yet Christmas doings have not all got their origin in Christian sources. Its cakes and ale have now, as we know, an antiquarian value on account of old pagan draughts in honour of Thor, and of cakes once baked for the Queen of Heaven, though it is true that pies, rounded at the ends in memory of the cradle, have replaced the crescent-shaped loaves dedicated to Astarte. Some such superstitious origin doubtless gave rise to the horribly tough paste made of pine-kernels, almonds, and the like, which the Roman peasants devour at Christmas—perhaps, to the pan calendan of Languedoc; but it is an undoubtedly Christian, if irreverent, association of ideas, that first suggested to an Italian confectioner to prepare a model of the stable and manger of Bethlehem in burnt sugar for a gala dinner at this season: a bakement that we have ourselves really seen handed round in Nice.

No doubt the superstitions about Christmas are many. If the eve be serene and cloudless, this is held in Languedoc to be a good promise for the harvest of the year. The day is thought a lucky one all over Christendom: it is often ushered in with a discharge of guns and with merry chimes, and people exchange good wishes with each other, in accordance with the belief mentioned in the "Golden Legend," that any wish formed on that day, "by a person of righteous life and clean lips," is granted by the Almighty. Many of these old symbolical customs are pretty, whatever be their origin—such as the night-watch, which tells of "the people that sat in darkness;" or the lamp which the Burgundian peasant keeps burning throughout his vigil, ere the ringers touch the slumbering bells.

From the chimes that announce the glad day to the carols that hymn its praises the transition is easy. The custom of carol singing lingers still in the more primitive parts of England; and the modern revival of many old fashions has brought carols greatly into notice. These carols, or noëls as they are called in France, form a mass of curious old literature; and though an acquaintance with them is now confined mostly to parish singers, curates, and persons of archæological taste, they once occupied the attention of priests and poets. "As for songs and carols, brethren, they are collected and composed out of the Scriptures, and contain matter of instruction and edification; they implant the history and benefit of Christ's birth in the minds of poor, ignorant people, and sometimes he will be taken by a song that will flye a sermon." So says an old author in 1652; and in 1868 some of our readers may care to bestow a glance on these old Christmas songs.

The word carol has been variously derived: by some it is taken from karole (an early English word for a ring or circle); but it more truly seems to mean a little chorus, a diminutive form of the word choro, thence chorollo. And it is noteworthy that all genuine carols have a chorus or burden, and that this chorus is prefixed to them in every instance, whether it consists of one or, as is more common, of two lines, thus:—

DE NATIVITATE.
Jhesu, fili Virginis, Miserere nobis.

I.

Jhesu of a mayde ye woldest be born,
To save mankynde that was forlorne, &c.

The derivation of the word noël is more disputable. It was long said that it was a mere corruption of natale (nativity); but this would not seem to be a satisfactory reading. Preferable is its origin in nova, thence nouvelles, or news; nowells, the old English form of the word; nouvê, the Romance, and noël, the modern French terms. In short, noël, rightly understood, is nothing but news, a name for the thing, the good news of God, the glad tidings of good-will, the birth of the Saviour of the world. The oldest carols confirm the use of the word in such a sense; and so, in an indirect manner, do many fifteenth-century books. It was, for example, the custom to cry nowells for any king or hero in a triumphal procession. "Item—to the boys who cried nowells before the king's majesty," appears in the municipal expenditure of an English town during a royal visit. "To ride and cry nowells on high days is not the only business of a true knight," hints Gutierre de Gamez, in his great Spanish chronicle, called the "Victorial." And so on, for it would be easy to multiply examples of this custom; but the carols speak for themselves. Take this one, for example:—

A child this day is born,
A child of high renown;
Most worthy of a sceptre,
A sceptre and a crown.
Novels, novels, novels,
Sing all we may,
Because the King of all kings
Was born this blessed day.

Also, of older date, the following:—

ANE SANG OF THE BIRTH OF CHRIST
(With the tune of Bawulalaw).

I.

I come from hevyn to tell
The best nouvelles that ever befell
To you these tidings true I bring,
And I will of them say and sing, &c.

The many collections of authentic English carols are excellent and curious. Wright's is perhaps the finest, but Sandys' book will be found full of interest, and he has admitted some translations of French noëls with their notes. As regards MSS. collections, one of the rarest is at Oxford, in the commonplace book of one Richard Hill, servant to an Alderman Whynger, afterwards Lord Mayor of London in 1505.

Of French noëls there is no lack either, the best being the "Noëls Bourignon," collected by M. la Monnaye (the ingenious author of "M. de la Palisse"), and a volume dating from the reign of Louis XIII., the work of Michael Saboly, a priest of Avignon. Yet of carols both French and English it must be admitted as a rule, that the authors are long since forgotten, and that they, in their turn, probably drew from older sources. What, for example, has become of all the airs Saboly loved? of the tune of "l'Ecò," to which one of the quaintest of his poems is set? or of the tune and words of "Dans a beau jour," or of "Dis-moi, Grisel?" or who was the composer of that tune of Bawul-lalaw, which we have seen was of fifteenth-century reputation in England? They are all past recovery, and any classification of the carols can only be made by guessing their date from their spelling, and by noticing some peculiarities which are found alike in the carols of France and of England.

The first place we shall assign to those which are written partly in Latin and partly in the vulgar tongue, and which we can imagine to have been composed by clerks, and persons conversant with the ritual and phraseology of the Church. The chorus, or chorollo, of these pieces is in Latin; sometimes the last line of each verse is in Latin, and the rhyme is thus carried on in what may really be called tags of verse.

An example of the first method is taken from Hill's MSS.; of the second, from a rare French tract of the sixteenth century:—

Alleluja! Alleluia!
Deo patria, sit gloria.

Ther ys a blossom sprung of a thorn,
To save man-kynd that was forlorne,
As the Profittis sayd before,
Deo patria, sit gloria.

* * *
Ther shon a star out of hevyn bryght,
That men of earth should deme aright,
That this was Jhesus fulle of myght:
Deo patria, sit gloria.

NOËL NOUVEAU, SUR L'AIR DE "OR DITES-NOUS, MARIE!"

Célébrons la naissance,
Nostri Salvatoris,
Qui fait la complaisance,
Dei sui Patris.

Cet enfant tout aimable,
In nocte media,
Est né dans une étable,
De Casta Maria.

A second class is the historical ballad. Of such are the carols—

When God at first created man;
On Christmas-day in the morning;
Augustus Cæsar having brought
The world to quiet peace;
When Jesus Christ was twelve years old;
Joseph being an aged man truly;

and—

A Virgin most pure, as Prophets do tell:

all carols still in use in the West of England, and familiar to many of us. These are just passages of Gospel history done into rough verse; and besides the songs intended for Christmas there are similar carols suited to Innocents', St. John the Baptist, and St. Stephen's Days, as indeed also for the Feast of the Epiphany, and pieces which commemorate the later events in the Saviour's life, as connected with his Advent into the world.

A third kind of carol is founded on a legend. Take, for example, the well-known one—

Joseph was an old man, and an old man was he,
When he wedded Mary, the Maid of Galilee, &c.

This carol tells how a cherry-tree was made to bend and yield its fruit to the Virgin Mother at the command of her Divine but yet unborn Son. It is a tradition familiar, in one shape or other, to the whole of Europe, though in Spain the tall and beautiful date-palm replaces the cherry-tree of the northern nations. It is probably therefore a fragment out of that vast mass of unwritten, fanciful, and semi-pagan tradition which occupied the mouths and memories of men even in the earliest Christian centuries, which assumed shape and consistency in the so-called apocryphal Gospels of Nicodemus and others, and which went, at a later period, to fill the pages of the Legenda Aurea of Jacopo de Vorragine. Two of Saboly's carols bear marks of such an origin, viz., a dialogue between Lucifer and the Archangel on the subject of the Nativity, and the altercation between St. Joseph and the landlord of the inn at Bethlehem. Of the same kind is a thirteenth-century hymn for St. Stephen's Day, where it is set forth that St. Stephen "was a clerk, i kyg Heronde halle;" and a more modern one, which has been arranged to a pleasing air—

King Wenceslaüs looked out,
On the Feast of Stephen,
When the stars were shining bright,
And the snow lay even, &c., &c.

This goes on to record a miracle and the alms-deeds wrought on St. Stephen's Eve by the patron saint of Bohemia, but we searched in vain last summer in Bohemia for any further traces of the legend. Either King Wenceslaüs and his little page are forgotten, or this act of charity has been confounded with his other faits et gestes.

We are next brought to observe a fourth set of Christmas songs: the begging letters of a former age, still practised by the waits, with a view to extracting largesse from sleepy-headed citizens. A fifth class relates to wassail and feasting, and as these represent practices still in vogue among us, we need not expatiate on them; the songs for the "Bringing in of the Boar's head" being the most picturesque, and the "Beggars' Complaints" the more monotonous of the two.

There is however a kind of carol now quite forgotten, which, for want of a better name, we shall call the Christmas pastoral, and explain our meaning by quotations from English and Provençal sources. We are convinced our readers will be glad to know—

JOLY, JOLY WAT, THE SHEPHERD.*

Can I not sing but hoy !
When the joly shepherd made so mych joy ?

I.

A shepherd upon a hill he satt,
He had on hym his tabard and hatt,
Hys tarbox, hys pype, and hys flaggatt ;
Hys name was called Joly, Joly Wat.
Can I not sing but hoy !
When the joly shepherd he made mych joy ?
For he was a gude herdis boy,
Ut hoy !
For in hys pype he made so mych joy !

II.

The shepherd upon a hille was layd,
His doge to his gyrdyle was taid ;
He had not slept but a lytelle brayd,
But "Gloria in Excelsis" to hym was sayd.
Can I not sing, &c.

III.

The shepherd upon a hille he stode,
Rownd about hym his shepe they yode ;
He put hys hand under hys hode,
He saw a star as rede as blade :

The shepherd sayd a-non-right,
"I wille go see yon farly syght,
Wher as the angelle syngeth on hight,
And the star that shyneth so bryght."
Can I not sing, &c.

V.

"Now farewell Mall, and also Will !
For my love go ye all styll,
Unto I cum agayn you till ;
And ever more, Will, ring well thy bell."
Can I not sing, &c.

VI.

"Now must I go ther Cryst was borne.
Farewell ! I cum a-gayn to-morn,

And warn well warroke when I blow my horne."
Can I not sing, &c.

VII.

When Wat to Bedlem cum was,
He swet : he had gon faster than a pace :
He fownd Jhesu in a symple place,

Can I not sing, &c.

VIII.

"Jhesu ! I offer to thee here my pype,
My skyrte, my tarbox, and my srype,
Home to my fellows now wille I skype,
And loke unto my shepe."
Can I not sing but hoy !
When the joly, joly shepherd made such joy ?

No gleanings from sixteenth-century song-books can be pleasanter than this, and the volume of Provençal Nouvè, which we have already alluded to, is full of similar pieces. It is written in dialect, the "lengo de las pastouras," as the Provençals say, and their patois certainly lends itself with infinite grace to the subject.

Micoulau, or Michael Saboly was born in 1614. Jan Saboly, of Montèri, his father, and Felise Meliorat, his mother, were of gentle blood ; and the boy's education in the Jesuit College of Carpentras removed him early from the peasantry of his native district ; but he had found apparently both love and piety, and their handmaid poetry, in huts where the poor men lie, and, speaking and writing in their language, once that of kings and troubadours, he still survives as a poet of the people. His verses even now gladden the peasants at the time of Calendes, for so this population, which uses the oldest of the Romance dialects, persists in calling the season which in the pagan division of the year fell into the Kalends of January. The Provençals are naturally religious : gifted with lively and sensitive imaginations they write and read a quantity of religious poetry, and their genius is apt to express itself in this way, whether the subject be the sufferings of the Protestants during the persecutions, or the great festivals of the Latin Church. To them Christmas is what they call it, "the mother of nights ;" and the Nouvè of Saboly are still living poems, not scraps of antiquarian lore exhumed by the ritualist or the antiquarian. The good old priest who composed them was for twenty-five years prior of Sainte Madelaine of Carpentras, and was then removed to the collegiate church of St. Peter in Avignon ; the university bestowing on him the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In Avignon, as maestro di capello, Saboly lived ; he played on the great organ of the church, and he played on the hearts of the people by his beautiful Christmas hymns. He has been fondly called "the troubadour of Bethlehem ;" and when he died, he was buried in the church where he had sung : and there by the swift Rhone he rests. There has been a new edition of his Nouvè brought out within the last three years by Roumanille, the poet-bookseller of Avignon ; and it is in general use, for the Avignonese still speak the same dialect, the softest, if not the purest, of all the patois of the south ; and by them the Nouvè are yet often said and sung, though perhaps in St. Peter's choir the congregation may have learnt to prefer to the quaint tunes that Saboly played on his organ, Adam's magnificent Christmas music ; for that splendid hymn, "Minuit, Chrétiens ! c'est l'heure solennelle," is now the most popular piece of church music in all France.

Saboly's noëls are, for the most part of the kind we have called pastorals ; sometimes he makes us hear the shepherds asking leave of their employers to go and see the babe of Bethlehem. Thus :—

* From the MSS. of Richard Hill.

LOU PASTRE.

"Es fort bien veritable
(It is very really true)
Que lou pichet innocent,
(That the little innocent)
Es na dins un estable,
(Is born in a stable.)
Qui es auprès de Betelem,"
(Which is near Bethelem.)

SÒN MESTRE (The Master).

"Que lou Ficù de Dien sie nas,
(That the Son of God is born,) Per lou creire
(To believe it)
Lou fau veire :
(One must see it :)
Jeu pòde pas me l'imagina."
(I cannot fancy it.)

After some more altercation both master and servants depart on the joyful errand.

Sometimes he shows us the shepherds carrying pine wood for the fire, and woollen stuffs for the clothing of the marvellous Babe. Sometimes we hear them calling to each other:—

"Venès leu !
(Come along !)
Veire la Picucello.
(See the Little One.)
Venès leu !

Gentil pastoureux :
(Come, gentle shepherds :)

Soun Enfant es pu blanc que la nèu,
(Her Child is more white than the snow,)
E trèlús coume un' estello.
(And shineth as a star.)
Ai, ai, ai ! que la Maïre es bello !
(Ah, but the Mother is fair !)
Ai, ai ! que l'Enfant es beù !"
(Ah, beautiful is the Child !)

On arriving at the stable they are refused admittance, because they are too noisy:—

"Chut, chut, chut ! que l'Enfant soumiho !
(Hush ! let the Infant slumber !)
Chut ! que lou Petit dor."
(Hush ! let the Little One sleep !) &c.

It is no small praise to say of a modern carol of Joseph Roumanille's, that he has absolutely improved upon the naïve tenderness of this piece; in his poem, the shepherds, when refused, begin to pray, and the door is instantly opened to them. "Enter," says the mother, "since Jesus, O my friends! when men are praying, cannot sleep."

One of Saboly's happiest efforts is his Carillon or Carillon, or a "Song of the Christmas Bells," page 87:—

"Sus ! campainé ! revihaz-vous !
Lou jour pareis, l'aubo es levado :
Voici l'rouss matinado !
Mounte devèn renaisse tous :
Dieu vèn, e pèr soun arribado
Sounas la proumièro sounado :
Fès que la grosso sone avan—
Din, don ! din, dan !
Dique, dique ! dique dan !
Din, don ! din, dan !
Dieù s'es fach Enfant,
Pèr sauva lon genre uman—
Din, don ! din, dan !
Fòro, Satan ! (Bis.)
Plusgès de guerro,
Que tout sie nouvé !
La glori au ceù,
E la pas sus la terro !"

(Up ! bells ! Awake !
The day appears, the dawn is breaking :
Behold the happy morn !
Let all arise and meet it :
God comes, and at his coming
Ring the first rounds !
Make the great bell ring—
Din, don ! din, dan !
God makes Himself a child,
To save the race of man—
Din, don ! din, dan !
Avaunt, Satan !
No more of war
Since all is new !
Glory in heaven,
And peace upon the earth !)

And now, as we take leave of the old priest of Avignon, whose bells are still chiming above his grave in St. Peter's choir, we enter a little into the joy of his song. This day is bright, even in the saddest year; it is an anniversary of youth, and peace, and heavenly hope in the loneliest lie; in every life from which the birthdays and the holidays have been erased by death or change, or have been blotted out with tears. Under the crumbling porticoes of Rome, through all the short and rainy Advent days, you may hear the Pifferari piping and singing to their Madonna of the joys of the coming Nativity; and we ourselves, beside the broken idols and in the dismantled homes of this life, can sing our carols before the dawn. However irreparable be the loss, however harassing be the memories, yet glad is the promise of His Second Advent: "Behold, I make all things new." "Noël ! Noël !"

PEEPS AT THE FAR EAST.

BY THE EDITOR.

XI.—CALCUTTA.

ONE of the most painful experiences of a traveller is to know how much is to be seen and learned in any place he visits; and yet to be unable, owing to circumstances over which he has no control, to take full advantage of his opportunities for acquiring knowledge. Such was my case at Calcutta. It was a grievous disappointment to be beside so many scenes of interest without seeing them; so near many streams of Eastern thought and life, without being able to taste of their waters ! But my days were, in a special sense, numbered, and they were few. Nor was it possible to prolong them. An ailment seized me which, though not serious, might have become so had it been trifled with. So I was obliged to submit, and to make the most of my time and opportunities.

I recall with peculiar pleasure an evening party at the "palace" of the Bishop of Calcutta, who heartily welcomed us and assisted us in our mission. This party was full of interest to me. Nowhere else had I seen in India—though possibly similar meetings may take place—such an assemblage of Europeans and natives of all ranks and professions. The Viceroy and state officers, missionaries, judges, merchants, and professors, represented European society; while natives of rank—rajahs, princes, Hindoos and Mahomedans, barristers, editors of native papers, represented native society. Here they all met in the home of a Christian bishop, as his friends and guests. How wise, how conciliatory, how Christian, was the idea of such an assemblage! And what an advantage it was, too, to have a clergyman who had such means and social position as enabled him to exercise this gift of hospitality! The more we know of the world as it is, the more we feel the vast power of personal intercourse as a means of creating a better understanding between man and man; of increasing charity; and of destroying prejudices, and diffusing that spirit of good-will which is essential to the best and surest kind of Christian progress. Nowhere on earth is this personal intercourse more difficult, and yet nowhere is it more needed, than among the natives and Europeans in India. It is much needed between governors and governed, as a means of creating that sympathy which is the soul of true union and the secret of real and lasting political power. It is immensely wanted between missionaries and those whom they instruct, in order that, as members of God's family, they may realise what they have in common with each other, alike in their joys and their sorrows, their affections and their hopes, their doubts and their fears, their pleasures and their pains. It is wanted between the native and European laity—at present separated so widely! Sacrifices there must be on both sides—sacrifices of tastes, of feelings and prejudices. Let the best and noblest who have most to give begin the great work! Above all, let Christians do so, following Him who was rich, yet for our sakes became poor. The meeting at the Bishop's was to me peculiarly pleasing, as recognising, and in as far as possible meeting, this great want.

Whilst I was in that episcopal residence, I could not but think of him who had last occupied it, and whom, above all other men in India, I had longed to see—the good and noble Bishop Cotton! As with my heart I searched for him in vain during my journey in Bengal, and thought of him in his helplessness, falling at night into the Ganges, I could not but repeat to myself these lines—giving to the words a meaning not their own :—

“ I sought him east, I sought him west,
I sought him far with moan and sorrow;
I only saw the cloud of night,
I only heard the roar of Yarrow ! ”

The question of female education in India is one which, I need not say, is full of difficulties owing to the peculiar position of the women in relation to their husbands and families, and especially in relation to European society. Their ignorance is very great, their inferior position incredible, their seclusion from the outside world complete. All this, combined with native orthodox prejudices, which have lived down through long ages, and have been wrought into the warp and woof of native society, make the condition of women most deplorable, but most difficult to deal with. Our readers may appreciate some of these obstacles to Western influences when they remember that Hindoo girls may be betrothed, or formally married, as early as their fourth year; may occupy their husbands' house at eight; and may be mothers at twelve! So long as the natives themselves do not revolutionize their national customs, an efficient system of female education is almost an impossibility, especially among the higher castes. But the natives are beginning to do this. The education, knowledge, and tastes acquired by the men, together with what they see among the Europeans as to the position occupied by women, have of themselves gradually created an impression which is every day taking a deeper hold of the more intelligent natives, that their women must be educated and be able to sympathise more thoroughly with them both intellectually and morally. A revolution in the right direction has long been slowly but surely advancing. Though as yet comparatively weak, it is fast gathering strength, and its results will, I have no doubt, appear before many years are over. This will not only affect the women themselves, but react on their husbands, as well as on their families. It will be the means also of making personal intercourse between the ladies of the East and West more and more possible and pleasant.

It is about twenty years since Mr. Bethune opened a female school for natives in Calcutta, which was afterwards supported by Lord Dalhousie. Since his death it has been upheld by the State. This was the beginning of that movement which has advanced more rapidly in Bengal and the North-west Provinces and the Punjab than in any other part of India.*

The purpose of the Zenana mission is, by the aid of female missionaries from Europe or America, to gain access to the native Zenanas, and to influence the native women in their own homes. This mission is partly evangelistic, in so far as it endeavours to convey to the adults, by conversation only, a knowledge of the Gospel, not, however, to the exclusion of instruction in what are called the "secular" branches, as they are disposed to receive it. But one of its first objects is to get the female children of the different families taught in the Zenana. We had the greatest pleasure in meeting at the house of Sir William and Lady Muir—names dear to all who know them—nine ladies who are employed in this work, in connection with the leading missionary societies in England and America. They had then altogether twenty-two schools and five hundred scholars in the Zenanas. It should be remembered, however, that owing to the patriarchal customs of the East, these families contain the representatives and offshoots of more than three generations, and have from fifty to a hundred and twenty souls in each. There is no more hopeful mission work in India than this when such agents can be found to undertake it as those we had the pleasure of meeting. All of them were earnest-minded and thoughtful, possessing too what is of vast importance—very pleasing manners. And I may here take the liberty of expressing the desire that home societies, which have the easiest portion of the work to do, would not so greedily demand from their agents "interesting" information, and "interesting" stories, as if our home Christians were like babies to be kept in good humour with sweetmeats! Such demands are a stumbling-block and a snare in the way of true and honest missionaries. Let us carefully select our agents; trust them out and out; pray for them earnestly; support them liberally; and be willing to wait long and patiently for the fruit of their labours.

This Zenana mission affords a grand opening for the energies, talents, and devotion of many of our ladies who now sit idle and listless at home. I hope also that those who are engaged in it may meet with much encouragement from their countrywomen in India. Certainly, they ought not selfishly to ignore this work, but, as they can, should help those labouring in it, and this, too, for their own personal good as much as for the good of others.

Another visit we paid was to the mission schools of the Free Church, and of the Church of Scotland. I have already said so much in these papers regarding this phase of mission work, that I should only weary the general

* I regret to have no information later than 1866-7 on female education. At this date there were, in connection with Government in Bengal, 244 schools, attended by 4,844 pupils; 2 normal schools with 34 pupils; and in the North-west Provinces, 595 schools, with 12,002 pupils; and normal schools 2, with 31 pupils. In the Punjab, which began in earnest only in 1862-3, there are no fewer than 650 schools, with 20,534 scholars. But in addition to these there are a very large number of private female schools. In Bengal there were—at the date of Mr. Marshall's report in 1865-6—217 schools, with 5,559 pupils. In the North-west Provinces, 77, with 1,494 pupils. In the Punjab there were 223 elementary schools, in Lahore and Umritzer, superintended solely by native gentlemen, and having 3,841 pupils. Missionaries besides have done their share in this work, and support many female orphanages as well as schools, which are not reckoned in the above estimate. All this shows what great strides female education has made during the last ten years, about which period the movement began in anything like earnest. What may we hope for it in the future! We rejoice in the noble and self-sacrificing attempt of Miss Mary Carpenter to organize well-taught female normal schools, which are essential for the carrying out of this work, which must eventually, like mission work, be accomplished by the natives themselves. The seed is but sown. We must wait with patience, and labour with earnestness and hope.

reader by attempting to say more. The battle in favour of educational missions as being the best for preparing the way, and ultimately affecting most deeply and permanently the opinions and character of Hindoo society, need not be engaged in here. Any convictions which I had on this point before going to India were confirmed, and any doubts dispelled by what I saw and heard when abroad.

There is one great department of education which one would like to have seen represented in Calcutta or anywhere else in India. This is a native Eton, or Oxford, where the children or young men of the old aristocratic families could receive such an education as would fit them to occupy positions of power and influence in their native country. The Imperial Government is fully alive to the importance and the desirableness of thus employing natives as a measure of justice and as a means of consolidating and strengthening the empire; and would no doubt be glad to find among the higher classes persons fitted for such employment. This, too, would probably prove the best practical solution of the difficult question—how to utilise for the good of the country those who were connected with once powerful but now broken-down dynasties; who supplied the native armies with officers, and filled, sometimes to their credit, various places in the native states. These youths must be educated in the true sense of the word, and not crammed merely. They will thus be enabled to take a worthy place in the government of their country. There is no reason I can see why all their prejudices in regard to caste should not be as fully respected in any Government schools specially established for the higher classes, as the prejudices or claims of rank are recognised at home.

I was glad to form an acquaintance with even one of our worthy missionaries, Dr. Ogilvie, with whom my old friend Mr. Wilson is associated. For a quarter of a century, without his ever having come home for rest, Dr. Ogilvie has modestly and perseveringly laboured as teacher and superintendent of our Institution. The Free Church missionaries were kind enough to join their numerous English-speaking pupils to ours, to hear a parting address from me in the great hall of our Institution, which was crowded. It was to me a most interesting occasion, and not the less so that it was my last day in Calcutta before starting for the North.

The native lads were very interesting-looking. There is a peculiar expression in the Bengalee which I saw nowhere else in India—a sleepy droop in the eyelids, which gives to the countenance a cast of melancholy and weakness, yet a certain suggestion of meditateness.

One great object of missionary schools, by whatever Church upheld, has been to raise a native ministry, so as to realise, sooner or later, that one hope of establishing Christianity in India—a native self-supporting Church. To some extent they have succeeded. A few able, well-educated, and good men, have been ordained. But there are grave difficulties in the way of fully attaining this—difficulties which are not sufficiently estimated by the Churches at home. For example, it is far from easy in a large heathen school to fix upon any pupil who, from his talents, and from indications of character, seems likely to have in him the embryo evangelist; and there are, as yet, no schools among the Hindoo Christian families, where the experiment, as at home, might be hopefully made. And if one or more lads give promise of higher and better things, there must follow, on their part, the profession of Christianity, together with such evidences of their sincerity and intelligence as, for their own sake as well as for the sake of others who are "without," will warrant their baptism. But this baptism again involves not only serious consequences to the convert himself, but to the mission also, in as far as temporal support for him may be required; and such support may affect the morale of the convert himself, and the judgments of the heathen. Even should all these difficulties be got over, there arises the further question as to his education for the ministry. This not only requires some years of special study, but the missionary is compelled to ask himself: Am I warranted in hindering this young man from providing for himself in other ways, and in educating him for the ministry when there is no native congregation ready either to call him or to support him? And can I assure him that the home Church, or any other party, will aid in his support? What amount will they guarantee? This last question is by no means easy to dispose of.*

* I take this opportunity of saying that, owing possibly to incorrect reports of my speeches, I have been grossly misunderstood by native preachers. I have been held to have asserted that native agents demanded salaries equal to those given to Europeans, and, still worse, that—as quoted by Mr. Chandra Mitter—"ordination ceased as the feeling of the converts ceased!" I was to a small extent led astray on the former point by the pamphlet of Mr. Chandra, sent to me when in Calcutta. As to the latter assertion, I spoke of baptism only as having ceased in our institution with "the barrack system"—for such was the information given me. Of all men in India the Native pastors are those to whom I should be sorry to do injustice by any mistake on my part. I was led to form a high opinion of their worth and their self-sacrifice, and I believe that upon them depends ultimately the Church of the Future in India. This being so, I need hardly say that I have a profound interest in their well-being.

As to the European missionary, the principle I wished to apply was this:—Whatever his sense of duty is in regard to the emolument he demands, the duty of the Church as his employer is clear, being bound to give him not only such a sum as is adequate for his support, but likewise a fair compensation, as far as mere money is concerned, for the temporal prospects he has given up at home. I applied the same rule to the native pastor, and the question I asked was this: What amount of remuneration—taking into account his education, and duly estimating the fact of his having obtained it as capital from the mission school—might he reasonably expect to obtain if he entered any department of the Government civil service? The reply, fairly made, came to this—what those who employed him as a missionary should feel liable to secure to him. But I did not intend by this conclusion to blame the native evangelist as if he asked too much, but rather to prove that the Church at home was not likely to raise the funds required to Christianize India by taking up such a number of men of this stamp reared in our colleges, as would tell on British India. Besides, the Bengalees raised in Calcutta colleges, while possibly fitted to give prestige to a native ministry; to command the respect of educated natives; and to begin an influential native Church, were not well fitted—as far as one could see—to undertake the rough, commonplace work in the Mofussil. These remarks, which apply especially to Calcutta, are in most respects equally applicable to the other Presidency Mission Colleges. And they are made chiefly for the purpose of enabling people at home to form some idea of the practical difficulties which missionaries encounter, in trying to meet the demands made by their eager but impatient supporters, who, because a native clergy are not poured in among the Hindoos like a flood, are disposed to fly for immediate results to the aborigines, and to leave the Hindoos alone to themselves or to Satan!

But it occurs to me that while these and other difficulties I could mention, are being overcome, we might do something more to meet the wants of the many who we saw were already so far taught, I cannot say educated, as to receive instruction in the English language. Why should not men, both laymen and clergymen in this country, whose names are known in India—some of them like household words—men who have a firm belief in Christianity as taught by Christ and his Apostles, and possess a knowledge of those questions of the day bearing upon it—why should they not go to India for at least one season, to preach or lecture to the educated natives? They might not, possibly, know more than the best educated Christian clergy or laity on the spot; but the very fact of their going for such an unselfish purpose would command a large, intelligent, and most attentive audience everywhere. What a noble use this would be for the highest talents! What knowledge might they themselves acquire, and afterwards turn to account for the good of the Church, and of the nation! and what encouragement would they give to the labourers in that difficult and far-off vineyard! Such a work as this would be worthy of the highest dignitaries, the ablest men, of any Church or of any profession. It would be a high honour conferred upon them to be permitted to aid in building up Christ's kingdom of truth in India; and if they engaged in the work in a right spirit, would it not be like the work of Christ?

Why again should a residence of a lifetime in India be insisted upon any more than in an English or Scotch parish or village? This is going ahead of Providence, and is in no wise called for. We would rather engage every missionary for, say, five or seven years, and insist that he should come home before his constitution is broken, and his energies weakened. But at the same time, to get quality as well as quantity, the churches at home must pay their missionaries better; and when they spend their strength in India, and are called home to make room for younger soldiers, we must have some fixed provision made for them and their families.

We are in this matter to determine our own duty towards missionaries, and not the duties of missionaries towards the Church. On what conditions a missionary may be disposed to give his services—for what amount of salary, small or great, or whether for any guaranteed to him—this is what he alone can determine. It is a question between himself and his conscience. But, on the other hand, it is for the Church to determine what she ought, in justice, to guarantee to any labourer whom she sends to work in the vineyard, and who is thereby declared to be worthy of his hire. No salary, of course, can make a good missionary, but neither does it need to make a good missionary worse, or to lessen the probability of his services being obtained. We must not apply one principle to clergy at home and another to clergy abroad. The Apostle Paul—and by what money-standard could his services to the world be measured?—went forth, casting himself on God's providence for support, at the same time labouring with his own hands to gain it. But while this was noble self-sacrifice and sublime faith on his part, specially demanded by the circumstances of the Church, was it like worthy conduct on the part of the members of the various Churches not only to permit such a man to be sometimes in want and nakedness, but even to taunt him with being actuated by motives of selfish aggrandisement? He was too noble to complain, yet he was also too much alive to the duties of Christian love and justice not to assert his claims as a missionary for support, and to express in deeply touching language his gratitude to those who ministered to his necessities. It follows, therefore, that whatever sacrifices any missionary may be willing to make in serving us, we are ourselves bound to make such sacrifices as will adequately support him while doing so. It must not be forgotten that, after long years spent in India, with comparatively few opportunities for cultivating the gift of preaching to an English audience, and probably with a constitution weakened by climate, a missionary, in spite of all his experience, is placed at some disadvantage if he presents himself as a candidate for employment at home. I am persuaded that such an arrangement as this, with a competent salary guaranteed, would be much more satisfactory to the missionaries themselves than that of supplementing their salaries in other ways, such as by making allowances for widows, and for the education of orphans, &c. The missionary abroad, like the minister at home, would thus be enabled to provide for his family and to settle their affairs as he thinks best. But let me protest here against the idea which seems to be entertained by some, that missionaries live in luxurious ease and enjoy large salaries. Will any man affirm that £350 or £400 a-year is too much for an educated minister at home? As yet no higher salaries are paid to our missionaries in India! What commercial man, after eight years spent in preparatory study, would go abroad for the same sum, and under the same conditions? But there are very few missionaries in India who enjoy even this salary; and when one knows their noble struggles, and the large fortunes they might obtain in other spheres of labour, and the large share they contribute to the good and happiness of the world, it makes us blush for those who grudge them their miserable pittance! To the honour of the Church Missionary Society be it told that there are (I believe) six university men among its India missionaries who support themselves from their own private funds. It will not do, by way of reply, to point to the small salaries which good and able ministers receive in Britain and in America. This is only additional evidence of the want of consideration—to use the mildest term—of those who demand self-sacrifice from all but themselves. While the cry is raised by Christians for learned, able, and devoted missionaries, let the sincerity and earnestness of it be evidenced by their giving—what is much more easily obtained than such labourers—salaries adequate for their decent support.

In saying all this, however, I am not forgetful of those gifts and graces which God alone can give, which are essential to every true missionary, whether at home or abroad, and without which “churches” and “missions” are but dead machinery.

I have said nothing here as to the means by which native missionaries are to be supplied to the millions in the Mofussil! I see no light on the question. It must, however, be solved, as far as I see, in connection with the education of the people.*

The short period which we had at our disposal for Calcutta was rapidly drawing to an end, and even this was practically lessened, to me at least, by temporary illness. But even this time was not wholly lost. A number of the missionaries in Calcutta, at my request visited me, and formed such a cordon of brotherly kindness and instruction around my bed, as made this a time of improvement and happiness which is gratefully remembered by me.

One great disappointment was my being prevented from accompanying my colleague to a dinner at Government House, which the Viceroy had prepared in our honour, and

* Although, in one sense, the education of the natives by Government has hardly begun, it must not be imagined that nothing has been attempted. In the famous Government minute which inaugurated the Government Education movement they were included. Little has been done as yet, but it is doing; and from the interest taken in this great question in Calcutta much more we believe will soon be done, and on a scale worthy of the cause and of the Government. The Government scheme, as hitherto worked, was reared on the foundation of the native schools already in existence. These are divided into two classes, the superior native schools, in which, by means of Sanscrit, the philosophy and the religion of the Hindoos are taught; and the tens of thousands of village schools, in which the teaching is of the very lowest kind. Government, accepting these facts, endeavoured, by small contributions of about £6 per annum, to induce the teachers to attend a normal school for a year, and if they passed the required examination, and submitted to government inspection, generally by educated natives, to give them some aid when they returned to their village schools. In this way there were (in 65-66) 19 deputy inspectors in Bengal, several training schools, 521 village schools with 10,561 pupils, paying £2,650 in fees. Yet what is this among forty millions! It is a beginning, and that is something. But it is a mere drop in the bucket to what will yet be. There are other features in this scheme on which I have neither space nor time to touch. It is a noble virgin field, calling with the eloquence of ignorance and downtrodden misery for a Christian Government to help it.

to which he had, with his considerate kindness, asked many to meet us.

I have not alluded to the Sunday services which we had the privilege of conducting in Calcutta. The crowded audiences included the highest functionaries in Calcutta, with all the leading natives. The sight of those congregations, so full of varied and overwhelming interest to a Christian minister, and the like of which was not probably to be seen by him again in this world, will remain in my memory, with such freshness and vividness as cannot fade with years, or become dim even to the eyes of old age.*

The last day we spent together at Calcutta, immediately before our intended visit to the Punjab, was the busiest, the most interesting, and the most fatiguing, I ever spent in my life! It was closed by a magnificent public festival, given in our honour as public men who had been deputed to do some work intended for the good of India, and who had done it so far as to meet the approval of those best able to judge. It took place in the Town-hall, and was attended by about a hundred and fifty persons, including his excellency the Viceroy, the Lieutenant-governor of Bengal, the Commander-in-chief, &c. It was the highest honour we had received, and in strict truth I felt it to be "the proudest moment of my life," and as such I now look back upon it. Wishing in these pages to avoid as much as possible allusions to personal matters, I trust I may yet be pardoned for recording this event, which was so gratifying to us, as evidencing the sympathies of all ranks of our countrymen in India. This was a good ending of our work in Calcutta. We thanked God and took courage!

The question has sometimes been asked as to the impressions made upon me by English society in India. The only reply I can give is that it is much the same as English society at home!—although, I would add, English society of the best kind. Whatever defects may be attributed to the administration of patronage by the old company, they certainly managed to send to India such a number of well-bred gentlemen as to found a type of high caste refined manners which has lived down to our own day, and has become traditional in India. If it has a weakness, it is a tendency to degenerate into Pomposity. It was supposed by some that the "Competition Walla," from the mode of his selection, would disturb this tradition, and introduce a lower caste. But, while he is superior in other respects to the average of his predecessors, he has not done so. In point of intellect and statesmanship, the civil servants are, I think, higher than the average members of the House of Commons. With all due reverence for that distinguished House, I would dare to hazard the assertion that Great Britain would gain much more than India by an exchange, say, of five hundred of her M.P.'s for a similar number of India's best civilians. As regards forms of religious thought, India reflects England. If there is any difference between them it appeared to me to consist in this—that our countrymen abroad were more pronounced and decided, whatever side they determinately embraced—Christian men on the one hand confessing their faith more openly; while on the other, unbelief uttered its dicta with less hesitation. The public native opinion against Christianity tends of course to strengthen the tendencies of both parties.

During this my last busy day in Calcutta I knew that I was running risks as to health, and that the "bull was after me." But I hoped, if I survived till ten next morning, to escape his horns; and then, all severe work being over, I should be refreshed by my northern journey, and find sleep and repose even in a railway carriage. At night I was surprised, and rather amused, at my teeth chattering beyond my power of checking them. I awoke refreshed, however, and early in the morning we sent our first telegram home—"All well; off for the Punjab." But an hour afterwards the bull caught and tossed me! and I was laid down again. A medical order, signed by three good friends, physicians, forbade my going to the Punjab. So Dr. Watson had to go alone. Fortunately, I so far recovered in a few days as to be permitted to join him at Patna, he having taken a détour in Gyah. I accompanied him as far as I could travel by railway, and this, to my great satisfaction, included all the north to Delhi. I left Calcutta for the northern tour on February 11.

It was my intention, when I began these papers for this year, to have included in them my return home via Ceylon. But writing as I have done, with little leisure time at my command, from month to month, with few notes to guide me, and with new subjects constantly rising up from memory to be described, together with the fact of one month being lost as regards writing while I was occupied in preparing for, or in presiding over, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland—all this has made it impossible for me so "to time my stages" (to use an old coachman's phrase),* as to do the whole journey within the prescribed limits. But, good readers, we must have a "Peep" or two together at the splendid North, including Benares, Cawnpore, Lucknow, Agra, and Delhi. This I hope to give in a few papers in the beginning of the year, and before we "hear the birds of spring." For the present, Farewell! We shall again, I hope, meet at Calcutta before we finally part.

HEROES OF HEBREW HISTORY.

BY THE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

XI.—SAMUEL THE PROPHET.

WHILST the troubled life of the Danite judge was running out its wild course, another Nazarite from the womb was growing up in Israel under other influences and with a far different destiny before him. He, too, was given to a long barren mother, in answer to the cry of her half-broken heart. Deep sorrow had, through the grace of God, wrought in her its true work, and brought her to cast herself, with all her cares and oppressions, at His feet. In every sense of the words, Samuel was given to her prayers. Given in his natural life; given, too, as St. Augustine was given to the prayers of Monica, and as so many saints besides have one by one been given, in his spiritual life, to the cry of her heart to her God. She herself practised the abstinence from wine and strong drink which formed so large a part of the Nazarite vow, and she devoted the child for whom she prayed, not only to bear from his birth the ordinary obligations of a Nazarite, but also to render to the Lord a life-long service. Accordingly, when he is three years old, she brings him up to the sanctuary at Shiloh, and leaves that precious life with the high priest Eli. There that holy childhood grew on, fed by the special dews of the blessed Spirit. Every opening faculty of his young heart was thus from the first consecrated to God, whilst with childish blamelessness, girded with a linen ephod, he ministered in the sanctuary by day, and lay down within its precincts to sleep at night.

It was a great life, and pregnant with mighty issues, which was being thus guarded. In him the line of the judges was to end, in him the mysterious line of the prophets was to begin. It was a great crisis in the dealings of God with His people. They were to be recalled to Him, to be roused out of their apathy and spiritual deadness, to be consecrated anew to Him. They were to be delivered from the yoke of their oppressing enemies; their national life was to be developed; they were to be consolidated into a kingdom, instead of being held loosely together as a congeries of tribes.

To meet the needs which this new development of national life must create, the prophetic office was called into being. The throne of the King of Israel was to have beside it this special honour, that one should be ever near who could speak the utterances of Israel's God. For reproof, for direction, for counsel, that voice could ever be awake. To Saul, to David, to Solomon, to Rehoboam, to Hezekiah, to the founder of the northern kingdom, and to his successors, we hear it from time to time speaking its solemn, its alarming, its consoling accents. It is ever present as a real abiding power to the kingdom's end; dying out, at last, in the sad wail of Jeremiah's lamentations.

For this office in its earliest, and, in some respects, never equalled strength, Samuel's youth was training within that shelter of the tabernacle at Shiloh. Those were dark days with Israel. The tribes had, one and all, wandered far from Jehovah, and yielded themselves up to the abominations and impurities of the heathendom around them. They chose new gods; then was war in their gates. And in those wars they were continually worsted; until the Philistines had brought them so utterly into subjection that they had almost ceased to rebel against the yoke of their oppressors. Samson in the west, and Gideon

* One or two words of explanation. If in these papers I have mentioned very seldom the name of my dear colleague and fellow-traveller, Dr. Watson, it has been solely as a matter of taste and convenience, and to avoid repetitions in every page. We were one in everything—in travel, in duty, in labour, in heart. Without his unwearied kindness, and wise counsels, the mission, as far as I am concerned, would have been impossible, instead of being what it was—unbroken success and unbroken happiness. As to the several correspondents, at home and in India, who have pointed out and corrected minor errors in my narrative, I am much obliged to them, and shall pay every attention to their corrections. Should my papers ever take the form of a book, these corrections will be duly attended to, and likewise many repetitions avoided which have occurred from my forgetting, and not again reading my previous articles. I shall be very thankful, however, for any fair and honest criticism, and glad also if those who know India will recognise my "Peeps" as being on the whole correct; and as tending to excite in any degree a greater interest in that grand country, and in the grandest work in it—the spread of Christianity.

in the east, had indeed, in some measure, rebelled against this evil domination, and whispered some hopes to the downcast heart of Israel. But they had wrought no enduring deliverance for their people. To work such an emancipation far more was needed than the mere overthrow of their enemies. Israel's subjection was the fruit of Israel's sin: and the heart of the people must be brought back to Jehovah before they could break the heathen yoke asunder. But whence was this deliverance to come? It could not come from the mass of the degraded people, nor could it spring from the line of the priests. For it was then, as with the people so with the priests. They, indeed, as being set apart to witness for Jehovah, were sunk into a debasement greater than that of the ordinary Israelites around them. Nothing can be darker than the figures portrayed for us by the hand of Revelation as constituting the very heart of the priesthood. The high priest's office, and that, as it seems, of the judge of Israel, was now in the hands of Eli, of the house of Ithamar. How it had travelled to that branch of Aaron's family is nowhere distinctly stated, though there is a shadowy revelation of the youth of Eli as having been marked by martial prowess, which, it seems probable, had secured for him the judge's office. In it he had grown old and feeble. God's honour was really dear to the heart of the ancient man; and the loss of the ark of the covenant broke down his spirit as as not even the destruction of his two sons could do. But his rule was lax and feeble; feeblest and most lax where, above all others, it should have been strong—over his own sons, who bore the priestly office, and shared the trust and duties of his judgeship. Utter godless worldliness in its two terrible outbreaks of grasping avaricious oppression and flagitious all sacrificing lust, defaced in them the priestly character; whilst a superstitious valuing of the mere externals of their covenanted service alone lingered on amongst them, witnessing, by its dark presence, against those who had put out the light which once those outward instruments were the divinely fashioned channels to convey to Israel.

To purge out such evils judgment must begin at the house of God. Nor would one act of judgment, however terrible, suffice. The violent death of the high priest, the fall of his two sons in battle, the desecration of Shiloh, and the captivity of the ark—these startling judgments would help perhaps to stir the sleeping heart of Israel. But beyond these the deep degradation of the priesthood had made it needful that the new office of the prophet should stand beside the priest as well as beside the king. The dim outlines of such an approaching dispensation may be traced in the coming of the man of God to Eli with that fearful denunciation whose burning letters of fire have witnessed now in God's volume for nearly four thousand years to His separated ministers in every age of what must be the end of using for themselves the mighty trust for others committed by the Lord's election to the keeping of His priests (1 Sam. ii. 27-36). But it was in Samuel first that this new ministry was embodied, and the great features of his life are the history of its fulfilment. We see the outlines of the great office beginning to fashion themselves forth even at that tender age when first distinct self-consciousness tremblingly reveals itself within him. The child Samuel—ministering in his linen ephod, clothed with the long garment of honourable proportions which his saint-like mother brought him year by year when with his Levitical father she journeyed from Ramah to offer the appointed sacrifice—comes forth first before us from that shrouding which ever hangs so thick around a holy childhood as supernaturally called by God to this prophetic office. How that "uncovering of the ear" was wrought we are not distinctly told; but the whole narrative forbids the supposition that it was upon the mind alone of Samuel that the voice of the Almighty fell. Into all the mystery of that secret visitation which in the dim shadowy light of the sacred precincts, through which the rays of the seven-branched lamp scarcely struggled, we may not safely gaze, but the words "the Lord came, and stood, and called" (1 Sam. iii. 10) must not be weakened or explained away. There was, it is plain, an act upon the part of God antecedent to the impression made on Samuel; and the voice which spoke was doubtless real, as through the still silence of the holy tent its mysterious accents fell upon his watching ear, and syllabled out to his trembling soul the singleness of his own name.

So the long silence of God to His people was broken. That word of God which was so "precious" from its rarity began again to sound in Israel, and the "open vision" which the mists of idol-worship had veiled revealed to the holy child its sacred proportions. At once the special character of the new office is declared by the prophetic youth being sent to the high priest himself with the message of the Lord. Those young lips utter the tremendous doom, declaring by the natural feebleness of the instrument how entirely it is the voice of another which speaks through them ; and so the old man receives the words. To him plainly they are not Samuel's ; his dim eyes can trace "the Presence" being now restored to Israel, and his saddened utterance is that of one who felt through all his frame Jehovah's nearness when he said, "It is the Lord ; let Him do what seemeth Him good" (1 Sam. iii. 18). How does the startling sight of the lad of twelve years old (for so his age has been reckoned), standing with such a word of prophecy before the marvelling chief priest, point on to Him, the one true Prophet, in whom all the lines of God's dealings with man converge, of whose days "all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, have foretold," as He too, coming forth from His holy home at Nazareth, was found at twelve years old sitting in the Temple in the midst of the astonished doctors of the law, both hearing them and asking them questions !

When next the prophetic power rested upon Samuel we know not ; but that it did again and again reveal itself is most distinctly stated in the words, "Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him, and did let none of his words fall to the ground. And all Israel, from Dan even to Beersheba, knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord. And the Lord appeared again in Shiloh : for the Lord revealed Himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord" (1 Sam. iii. 19-21).

Such had been his childhood and his youth, when the storm of predicted judgment fell upon his people. Roused at last to resistance by intolerable oppression, Israel went out to battle against the Philistines. But though "the word of Samuel came to all Israel," it is not written that they took any counsel of the Lord through him. Their insurrection was but the natural outbreak of the oppressed against the oppressor. There had been no putting away of their idols, no turning to their fathers' God, no seeking, as it seems, of His direction ; and so, when "they joined battle Israel was smitten before the Philistines." Then came another exhibition of that spiritual blindness with which the evil lives of their priests had done so much to darken their souls. They had seen abominable iniquity so ostentatiously united with the performance of all the outward acts of their enjoined worship, so abundant around the very doors of the tabernacle (1 Sam. ii. 22) itself, that they had grown to trust in the visible tokens of the invisible presence, instead of believing in the Lord their God. "Let us fetch," was the cry of this dark superstition, "the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, that when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies." This was a form of misbelief into which the dark hosts of infidel Philistia could enter, and they too trembled at the coming of the ark. But they trembled needlessly. Israel must be taught its lesson by the hands of the heathen. The people of Jehovah must know that not in the priesthood, or in sacrifice, or in the shrine of Shiloh, or in the ark itself, but in the living God was their defence against their enemies ; and so, as before, "Israel was smitten, and there was a very great slaughter, and the ark of God was taken, and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain." Then was Ichabod indeed written on Shiloh, and upon every door-post in Israel. Then indeed did Philistia triumph. For twenty years, as it seems, from this decisive victory she held her cruel heathen sway over the people of Jehovah.

Where Samuel was during this interval, we know not. It was doubtless needful for him to be thus for a season withdrawn from action and observation. His holy childhood and his prophetic youth needed calm, silence, introspection, and secret communion with God, to mature the great strength of his after life. Like St. Paul in Arabia, like a greater than Paul at Nazareth after that communing in the temple, he was hidden away by God ; hidden, it would seem, like the son of Mary when he left Jerusalem with her for almost twenty years before he was manifested to Israel.

Those twenty years of Samuel's hidden life were a weary time for Israel. Throughout their span Philistia asserted and cemented his dominion over the chosen people. This was probably the season of Samson's single-handed acts of heroic bravery, ending with his mighty destruction of his enemies under the crashing ruins of the Dagon house of Gaza. Samson's deeds of heroism must have stirred many hearts in Israel and aroused their sunken spirits. But they needed a deeper awakening yet before they could break the yoke of the heathen. There must be a turning of their heart to God before He would bare His arm for their deliverance. For such a return to Him the sorrows of these twenty years had been preparing their hearts. The ark abode in Kirjath Jearim. The time was long ; for it was twenty years, and all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord. For such a time the prophet had been kept in that still shelter of the hand of the Almighty. Now he suddenly appears again in Israel. His words catch the tone of that lamenting penitence which had at last begun to stir the national heart. "If ye do return unto the Lord with all your hearts, then put away the strange gods and Ashtaroth from among you, and prepare your hearts unto the Lord and serve Him only, and He will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines." And they answered to his call, and put away the strange gods. And He gathered them at Mizpeh for a searching national humiliation. Then in the absence of the ark, and with Shiloh desolate, and the great priestly office in abeyance, the Prophet, under the leading of the Spirit, himself offered a burnt-offering, and made intercession for his people, and God accepted them. To the wild, passionate Samson it had been given "to begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines." But the strong man had lacked that turning of the heart to God with which the new Nazarite opened his commission. He was to effect what the other had begun; to him was given the far greater charge of beating down Philistia, and at once he set about fulfilling it. Even as he offered the sacrifice the fierce cry of a coming multitude mingled wildly with his prayer; the weeping penitents looked up to see the great Prophet in the long mantle, which from his holy childhood had ever been his garb, standing with his long Nazarite locks floating on the hill-side breeze, in the energy of supplication; "crying unto the Lord" before the altar of burnt-offering, whilst on the other side they could already note the dark hosts of Philistia marching on with all the confidence bred by accustomed victory to the dread encounter. Then in his prophetic power Samuel poured down upon the astonished assailants the ancient might of Israel, when loud above all the din of the battle broke forth on every side of heaven the pealing answer of Jehovah's thunder. A panic-dread fell upon the uncircumcised, and they were utterly discomfited, and slain with such a slaughter that they were "subdued and came no more unto the coast of Israel; and the hand of the Lord was against the Philistine all the days of Samuel."

The wearied land rested and breathed again with ease under the great deliverance. The cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were delivered out of the hands of the heathen; the neighbouring Amorite tribes made peace with the conquerors, and "Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life. He went from year to year in circuit to Bethel, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh, and judged Israel in all those places, and his return was to Ramah, for there was his house, and there he judged Israel, and there he built an altar unto the Lord." Such he was in his official life as judge over Israel; of an incorruptible purity, of unwearied diligence, of undisputed power, of life-long continuance.

But there was another side to this great character. In him the temporal administration of the judge, noble as it was, is cast wholly into the shade by the brightness of his prophetic office. This was, as we have seen, a new administration of the One Spirit. So new was it that St. Peter dates from Samuel the rise of the prophetic utterances which announced the coming of Messiah's kingdom of grace. "Yea, and all the prophets, from Samuel and those that follow after, have likewise foretold of these days" (Acts iii. 24). This novelty of the office would of itself make its first administration as a new development of the working of the Spirit of God a matter of the deepest interest. But beside this, two circumstances of the life of Samuel tend to aggravate its grandeur and bring out all its variety of aspect. The first was, that for him it was appointed to guide the difficult transition of Israel's political organization from a Divinely ruled republic into a regularly constituted monarchy. He was the last of the judges, and under his rule their long line, which through four hundred and fifty years had been God's gift to His people, passed into that of the anointed kings of Israel. The second cause of the greatness of Samuel's prophetic administration is to be found in the character of Saul, by whom he stood as an external conscience; as a director, and revealer, and speaker of the Will of God to one of the most wayward of men. It was not without a struggle of his human will and a shock to his natural affections that Samuel heard the first cry of the people for a king. There was in it ingratitude to him; there was a rebellion against the order of deliverers which God had already given them; there was an earthly craving to be like unto the nations round about them. "The thing displeased Samuel;" but his refuge was near, and he "prayed unto the Lord." "Hearken," was the answer, "unto their voice, for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me." Their sin was an impatient forestalling of what it was the Will of God that they should have in His way and at His time. How grandly does the great prophet's form stand out when seen against the background of the restless people's earthly clamouring! In him all natural indignation dies out at once. The Voice has spoken to him, and it is enough. His faith accepts without the shadow of a struggle what he now knows to be "the Will of God." At once he proceeds to prepare the chosen of the Lord for his vocation, and then to anoint him king, and to secure to him the undivided following of the people. Hero-like, he is free from every taint of jealousy—he exalts to the uttermost the new monarch. "See ye," he says to all the people, "him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among all the people" (1 Sam. x. 24); and the people, catching the enthusiasm from him, "shouted and said, God save the King."

All the attributes of the young king tended to kindle such a passion of loyalty. Commanding in stature, eminent in personal beauty, brave and successful when first tried on the field of battle, his bearing was ennobled by a most gracious and winning modesty. Doubtless the prophet's eye looked on to a reign of holy obedience to Jehovah's Will; to the earthly monarchy being indeed the true reflection upon earth of the heavenly King; to the consolidation of the tribes of Israel; to the subjugation of all their enemies; to their establishment, as a true world-kingdom amongst the nations of the earth, bearing Jehovah's name and upheld by His might. But, alas! beneath those flowery meadows and graceful uplands there were already struggling volcanic fires which wanted opportunity alone to burst forth with destructive vehemence. The real temper of the young monarch was too soon shown. The relation between the king and the prophet, as it was established by God, was, that prophetic utterances were to be received by the ruler of His people as coming direct from His own mouth. Early in Saul's reign his obedience to such "a word" was tried with some severity. In the third year of his reign his gallant son Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines on the hill of Geba. Forthwith the whole might of their old oppressors was put forth for one great effort, to reimpose upon their old victims the detested yoke of the uncircumcised.

The Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots and six thousand horsemen, "a people as the sand that is on the sea-shore in multitude." The scarcely recovered courage of the men of Israel fainted at the sight. The greater number hid themselves away from the terrible enemy "in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits;" even the few less faint-hearted men who still kept the field "followed Saul trembling." It seemed to the eye of sense that there was madness in waiting, as the prophet had bid him do, seven days in Gilgal, until he came down and offered sacrifice, and showed him what he should do (1 Sam. x. 8). That waiting seemed simply ruinous. Day by day the enemy grew bolder; day by day his own troops more down-hearted and demoralised. The winds of danger told sorely upon the ill-cemented mass, and like the sands under the blast of the desert, they were scattered from him.

Still for seven days he waited, fretting under the command, and with a growing impatience at its unreasonable requirement. The seventh day came, and the prophet still tarried; longer the rising wilfulness of his nature could not submit, and disobediently he himself offered the sacrifice. His disobedience was his sin. The ark of God was not in its place: the prophetic commission superseded the priestly. Samuel himself offered not as a priest, which he was not, but as a prophet. The king's sin was not an intrusion of himself into the priestly office, it was a simple sin of wilful neglect, under strong temptation, of the word of Jehovah, spoken by the mouth of His prophet. No sooner has he offered than Samuel appears. Saul goes out to seek his blessing; but that blessing is turned into reproofs, which the excuses of the wayward king cannot turn aside—"Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God. Thy kingdom shall not continue: the Lord hath sought Him a man after his own heart, and commanded him to be captain over His people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee" (1 Sam. xiii. 14). Here is the first voice of the thunder of coming judgment; distant, undefined, as from an almost unclouded sky, capable of being averted. It leads to no separation between him and the prophet. Samuel goes up to Gibeah of Benjamin with the king. The Spirit of God has been grieved, but it does not leave him. He strengthens himself on his throne. Years pass on, and bring with them victories and power. "He took the kingdom over Israel, and fought against all his enemies on every side, and whithersoever he turned he vexed them." Once or twice the wilful temper of his soul breaks forth: but on the whole he fights bravely the battle of Israel, and prospers in his ways. Fourteen years have passed away, when again the discipline of his life gathers itself up into a special trial. The great prophet's voice brings him a new commission from his God, and preludes it by a note of very special warning. "The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people; now therefore hearken thou unto the voice of the Lord." That tone of adjuration surely tells all. It speaks the prophet's judgment of his character, of prayers and intercession, of days of watching and nights of grief, for one he loved so well, as he saw growing on that darkening countenance the deepening lines of wilfulness. The prophet sees that this will be a crisis in that life-history, with which, by God's own hand, his own has been so strangely intertwined. He gives the king the charge of God to "smite Amalek, to destroy them utterly, and spare none." To go forth on this campaign suited well the martial and violent temper of Saul, and he readily obeyed. The assault was perfectly successful. But the wilful heart of the conqueror could not obey entirely. He could not resist the temptation to bring back in triumph the captive king of Amalek, or to spare the flocks and herds which might enrich Israel. The sentence of God was not long delayed. As he returned with his victorious troops, the prophet met him. That sorrow-stricken countenance, around which hung the long Nazarite locks, now whitened by the snows of ninety years, pale and worn with the long night's unbroken, but ungranted, intercession, as in grief for the offender he had cried unto the Lord all night, might have told all. But he was bidden to speak it out, and so he meets the king in the triumph of his return with a reproof, sterner far than when fourteen years before he had chidden his early disobedience. Now the thunder-cloud, then distant and well-nigh undiscernible, darkens the whole sky, and peals over the sinner's head. "Stay," is the sad and terrible voice as it breaks through the cobweb films of self-deception and excuse, "and I will tell THEE what the Lord hath said to me this night. . . . The Lord sent thee . . . and said, Go and utterly destroy the sinners the Amalekites. Wherefore then didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord, but didst fly upon the spoil?" Then comes again, with trembling dishonesty, out of that once strong man's mouth, the poor excuse, "The people . . . took of the spoil to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God in Gilgal"—the very utterance of dark superstition and mean equivocation. And forthwith, like the darting down of the brightness of the lightning's flash, the prophet's voice, gathering itself up into one of those magnificent utterances which, belonging to another and a later dispensation, antedate the coming revelation, and are evidently launched forth from the opened ark of the testimony of the Highest—"Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and in sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. Because THOU hast rejected the word of the Lord, He hath also rejected THEE from being king." And now judgment—as is its terrible wont—gathered round him in contracting circles. The doom was irresistible. "The Strength of Israel is not a man . . . that He should repent."

It was a fearful meeting—it was followed by an almost life-long parting. "Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death." Once only in life, some seventeen years later, the king, when too far hardened in his wilfulness for instruction or reproof, saw again his face, to sink at Naioth under his prophetic power. But now upon the hill of Ramah, where the prophet dwelt, the cry of mourning intercession ceased not: "Nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul." The judgments of the God that heareth prayer seem to have been stayed by that mighty supplication of him who is classed by the Word of God with Moses, as the greatest of human intercessors. And so, with faithful love, the prophet cried unto his God, until the voice which in his childhood had spoken to him the transference of the priesthood of Eli, now told him of the removal of God's anointing from Saul to David in these fearful tones: "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from reigning over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil, and go unto Jesse the Bethlehemite, for I have provided me a king among his sons."

At the peril of his life from the anger of the king, Samuel goes, and, guided against his natural judgment to David, pours on his head the anointing oil, and the Spirit of the Lord owns the commanded act, and comes from that day forward upon David. Then the cloud settles darker and darker upon the rejected king. The Spirit of the Lord had departed from him, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. That dark heart was haunted by the gloomy delusions which usher in despair. Reason trembled on her seat of rule; whilst passion and hatred led madness on, and seated her instead upon that throne of inward mystery. For years the awful conflict lasted; gleams of light there were, but evermore the darkness deepened, and its evil, half-discerned figures thronged him in wilder and denser companionship, and gathered closer around him. Upon David, his preferred successor, all the hatred of his soul concentrated its venom. How must the ever-during "mourning" of the prophet have deepened in its tones as he saw the utter wreck of that early brightened life! Happy was it for him that he lived not to see its bitter end upon the mountains of Gilboa. But he had set for all time the great example of the office of the prophet of the Lord, when called to stand in God's name not only by the side of His willing and obedient servant, but also in the deep shadows which settled on the wilful king.

Nor was it only the lineaments of this great model and example which this first of the prophets left for after times. With that prescient eye which belonged to one employed to conduct the nation and the Church of Israel through a great transition in its history, he foresaw the need of providing a new system of training for those who should be his successors in the prophetic office. For this end he formed into fixed societies the sharers of the mysterious gift, which was plainly capable of cultivation and enlargement. As at every leading crisis of the dealings of God with man, unusual operations of the Spirit marked the time of Samuel. They were not confined to him, though his is far the most conspicuous figure on the canvas. "There was the company of the prophets, and Samuel standing as appointed over them" (1 Sam. xix. 20). These companies of the prophets eminently foreshadow that Church which the greater than Samuel should form. In it, as amongst them, the gift is diffused throughout the whole body; is capable of increase; breaks out in one and in another in separate manifestations, but is still the One Spirit; abounds when sought by all as one, and by each as a part of the whole, but dies out in separation, and languishes in each as it ebbs from the common body.

Therefore were they gathered by the great Seer, from his insight into the future, into these communions. From these came the spiritual successions which gave Gad and Nathan and Samuel's own grandson Heman to the Church of Israel. Thus he provided for the time when he no longer could uphold in person the new institution. For he too was bowed by age and must sleep with his fathers. Peacefully and gradually the change passed over him. It was the due end of his even and consistent life. It was a grand parting between him and Israel when he laid down the active exercises of the judge's office to hand it over to the king they had desired. Equable progression from the beginning to the end was the special characteristic of the life of Samuel. No sudden development of military prowess lifted him from common life into the judge's office. The Nazarite vow was marked on him by promise even before he was born; the morning dew of grace glistened on him from his birth; his childhood was opened to special visitations of God's grace in the stillness of the sanctuary and amidst the sanctities of Shiloh. Of the life which followed this he could speak without contradiction or dispute: "I am old and grey headed . . . and I have walked before you from my childhood to this day. Behold, here I am, witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed." The death was like the life; it was the gathering up of the feet into the bed, the calmest lying down to die; the whole inspired record of it is the three solemn words, "And Samuel died." So giveth He His beloved rest. He is buried in his own house at Ramah: there he was born; thither probably he withdrew at the desecration of Shiloh; thence he judged Israel; there he lay down and died. Around him were the lamentations of his people. It is written with expressness of emphasis, "ALL the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him and buried him." All had known him,—the tall figure, mantle clad, the long white locks, the reverend countenance—they should see them no more; no more hear that voice of wise counsel and of brave rebuke. Another mighty one had passed away; one who, like Moses and Joshua, had inaugurated a new dispensation; he, too, was gone—the great prophet, the gifted seer, the upright judge, the inspired hero, he had passed away: the very heart of the nation sighed out its loving, weeping requiem. All Israel, with a mighty lamentation, mourned for Samuel. Who amongst them all mourned as that son of Jesse on whose head he had, at God's command, poured the anointing oil? Heavy thoughts were in that mighty heart as David passed again from under the shadow of Samuel's dwelling-place at Ramah into the cold bare world which had no resting-place for him, as he "arose and went down to the wilderness of Paran." Doubtless in its waste places he heard again, in loving memory, the echoes of the prevailing "cry" of him who was so great amongst those who "called upon the name of the Lord." Doubtless his own discipline was perfected in this new sorrow, and he learned in losing Samuel to lean more simply and alone on Samuel's God.

A GIRL'S FAITH.

No two leaves above us waving
Are quite like in form and hue,
No two flowers in equal measure
Hold the blessing of the dew;
Nothing is on earth repeated,
All is special, all is new.

So of all the hosts of lovers,
Now and in the days of yore,
Loving deeply, loving lightly,
Loving less, or loving more,
None have loved—I hold it certain—
Quite as you and I before!

Hearts have beat, but not as ours did
When this hope upon us broke;
All our former life mere dreaming,
Till to consciousness we woke,
In a world anew created
By a little word each spoke.

Not as ours! for that was needed
What belongs to us alone;
Just the years we two have counted,
Just the sorrows we have known,
Just your strength, and just my weakness—
Love! our love is all our own!

A WIFE'S WONDER.

If I had never met thee, my beloved,
As in this world, where so much waste is seen,
Or seeming waste, might easily have been,
I wonder what my nature would have proved!

I am so much thy work; thy thoughts rule mine,
Give them direction, lift from what is low;
What grasp or play of mind I have, I owe
To the strong happiness of being thine.

I catch thy tastes, enjoy what pleases thee,
Learn what is beautiful from thy delight,
Wait on thy choosing to decide aright;
'Tis but thy shadow any praise in me!

To love, to pity, to forgive with ease,
In others' hopes and fears to claim a part—
Are but the o'erflow of a blissful heart;
And having thee, how should I fail in these?

If thou shouldst leave me!—in that utter woe
I wonder what of life could still be mine!
Would mind be quench'd, and heart grow cold with thine?
O God! forbid that ever I should know!

“NOBLESSE OBLIGE.”

An English Story of To-day.

BY THE AUTHOR OF “CITOYENNE JACQUELINE.”

CHAPTER LII.—A SUDDEN SUMMONS.

THE whole group were still standing before the picture in the centre of the great wareroom, when a telegram was handed to Phœbe. It had been delivered at Stephenson Street, and forwarded by her landlady. Phœbe read the telegram, and held it out mechanically without saying a word. It was from Lady Dorothea, and ran:—

“Lord Wriothesley is dying. Come immediately. Travel with one of your aunt’s servants. Sleep at Mrs. Skinner’s in Edinburgh. A carriage will be waiting at Strathavie Station.”

Phœbe did not scream, or drop down, or even exclaim. She left it to her mother and the Clays to moralise, which they duly contrived to do.

She did not believe the information, as she stood there, with bloodless face, staring straight before her. She had not so much as heard that he had been ill.

But whether Phœbe believed the information or not, she must act upon it. To reach Edinburgh next night, she knew enough of distances to be aware that she must start from Folksbridge by the first train next morning. Yet the better part of a second day would pass before she could reach the Highland station where the Exmoor carriage was to be in waiting for her. She was mistress of herself again, only eager and intent on setting out and reaching her destination.

“Let me take charge of you and your maid. It is my part to your father’s daughter,” said Barty, coming forward. “I shall not be in your way at all, while it will be the easiest thing in the world for me, and it will set your mother's mind at rest."

Mrs. Paston closed with the offer on the instant; while she put in a plaintive dogma that her mind—her mother's mind—was the very last thing that Phœbe or Lady Dorothea would think of.

The Messrs. Clay seconded and applauded this plan, although it sounded irrelevantly in the half-inattentive ear which barely caught the old gentlemen's sympathetic compliments.

"Very good and handsome of Barty. There is nothing need detain him, madam, from offering his services under the afflicting circumstances in which the young lady, his old friend's daughter, is placed. Barty's attendance is a very proper piece of respect to poor Lord Exmoor, who is really an excellent nobleman, and deeply to be felt for. His Lordship will value this evidence of our regard as it deserves."

Mrs. Paston insisted that, if Phœbe were to go, it was to be under Barty Wooler's escort, since she could not bestow her own. She would not be fit to stand after the fatigue of such a journey. Moreover, Strathavie House would be but a dreary dwelling for the present, and a bad bath for her nerves, which had been torn to tatters, and had never recovered the injuries done to her by the loss of her poor, dear Paston.

Phœbe was too much set on starting to be able to dispute and resist the combined opinion and authority in arms against her. Nor was she greatly helped by having to supplement with her own thought her mother's dislocated jumble of preparations and injunctions.

Phœbe, still in a dream, was seen away by her mother in solemn testimony to everybody's doing his or her duty, and she was joined by Barty Wooler at the North station, from which they were to leave in the cool morning that was rising over the huge seaport.

She was thankful for the early hour which delivered them from curious remark and knots of gazers. But she remained quite sceptical and unprepared for Lord Wriothésley's extremity. Neither did it shake her confidence when, a few stations on, Mrs. Edgecumbe came out of a waiting-room, and, after a little search, came up to Phœbe's carriage. Mrs. Edgecumbe caught her hand and whispered—

"My dear, I know. I do not presume to say anything, not that even I foreboded you were both too good and patient. It seems like protanation to speak of my sorrow, but I could not rest till I came down and watched to see you pass. And I think I may say, God bless you, poor child! You are to be pitied, and yet you are better off than you think."

To this Phœbe was unable to give any response, and simply shook Mrs. Edgecumbe's hand as the train moved off.

Sitting gazing out abstractedly on reaped fields, and the woods getting sombre and dusky, she was tempted to forget, at times, the object of her journey in the marvel of finding herself travelling for hundreds of miles alone among strangers, except for Margaret Coutts and Barty Wooler.

Barty did not discuss probabilities with her, or set before her the calamity which was in store for her. He kept as much out of her way as he could. He did not even seek to divert her from her anxiety by pointing out the features of the country, which were new to her, but well enough known to him. He was studying his railway-guide, reading his newspaper, and leaning back in his corner with his cap over his eyes, thinking his own thoughts, even when the day was drawing to a close, and Phœbe was raising herself mechanically to catch a first glimpse of the peerless picturesqueness of Edinburgh so soon as it should disclose itself.

Mrs. Skinner was an old housekeeper of the Exmoors who had married one of their butlers, and Phœbe was quite familiar with her name. Instead of having a hotel, she kept furnished lodgings, which were patronised by the family and their friends. Mrs. Skinner also had got a telegram apprising her of her guest's coming, and requesting her to be waiting for Phœbe at the station.

The two easily recognised each other, and Barty Wooler, with grave punctilio and precise information for the following morning, gave over Phœbe into safe keeping.

Mrs. Skinner had neither more particular nor later intelligence from Strathavie than what Phœbe herself had received, and was equally satisfied that Lord Wriothésley would not die. No wonder Mrs. Skinner was incredulous, when she remembered the rejoicings at his birth, the festival at his christening, the sedulousness and success of his rearing, and the triumph of his coming of age. Another difficulty was, that while she was prepared to show all respect and attention to Phœbe, she was at a loss to determine the extent of it, because of her ignorance of the young lady's exact relation to the family, which, in Mrs. Skinner's eyes, was something more than of sovereigns. It would never do for a person trusted as Mrs. Skinner was to make an awkward mistake. Luckily, Phœbe was too much preoccupied during her short stay to weigh the ambiguity of Mrs. Skinner's manner.

CHAPTER LIII. — "A HEAVY HEART MAKES A LONG ROAD."

PHŒBE was punctual to her appointment next day, and quite able to proceed on her journey.

It was one of those silvery, hazy days, which precede autumn. The harvest-work, which was past in England, was still going on briskly and cheerfully on the Scotch leas. But the giant mountains beginning to rise before her, and to awe her unaccustomed eyes, frowned upon her in her growing fear, and struck her with an impression of savageness and horror. Under these grim precipices, and on these barren wastes, the freedom and the grandeur of which would have chiefly laid hold of her in happier circumstances, there was brought home to her, for the first time, amidst the care which travelled with her, a sense of shivering desolation.

Page 875.

The little bark-covered shed which stood for the station at Strathavie was reached before sunset. The Exmoor carriage, with the coat of arms and family livery, was in waiting.

Phœbe knew the sober Wellfield face of the man-servant, who knew her and her errand, and who came forward, saying quickly, as he touched his hat—

"My Lord is neither better nor worse."

Then he gave his mind to business, and looked for the maid to point out the traps he was to appropriate. Phœbe drew a sigh of relief, though she could not say what she had dreaded.

"Will you not come on with me?" and Phœbe faltered, as Barty Wooler was about to take leave of her, after helping her into the carriage. "It seems so strange to come so far, and part here. You do not need me to tell you how hospitably Lord Exmoor would have welcomed you any other time, and seen that you had plenty of sport, which, in ordinary times, is what men think most of in these quarters, I fancy."

"No, thanks. I shall hear, every one will hear. This is not a case which will be hidden. He may recover yet, who knows? He has youth and everything in his favour. Don't begin to despair now. And keep your wraps about you, the air is much colder here," said Barty, turning his head, and looking at the horses, as if he were impatient for them to be gone. "I shall go back to the large hotel at Balnabhair, and have a little fishing and shooting and sketching. Let me know if you want me: I shall be at hand ready."

And in a moment he was gone, as if his act of mercy being accomplished, there was nothing more for him to do.

The drive between the station and the house took Phœbe through some of the loveliness of wood, water, and rock, which lay within the girdling mountains. The features of the scenery were very striking, both in colour and form. The brown burn leaped, foaming, into the blue loch; the tangled thicket of mountain-ash, weeping-birch, and oak coppice rose on the slopes, relieved by patches of golden oats; while the olive shoulder of the mountain, where the line of the horizon was beginning to be dyed with a blush, swelled in the sunlight, the grey splintered rock broke through the red bloom, and behind all rose a chain of delicate lilac peaks. There were fragrant, novel scents of bog-myrtle, heather, and peat-reek, and a mingled melody of sounds—bees humming, blackcocks crowing, sheep bleating, along with the constant trickle and splash of water. Phœbe could not help being a little comforted. She thought God was so good to make so much beauty and delight, He would not break and bruise the hearts of His human creatures, as if His works of nature were around men and women to mock and taunt them.

Below the rustic porch of the house, which commanded the little lake, reflecting the sky above it, stood Lady Dorothea, young, fair, and noble, if ever woman was so. When she saw Phœbe, who had seen her offer a brave front to every trouble she had met, there was nothing left for her to do but lift up her voice and weep.

"Yes, it is true, Phœbe; we are to lose the chief of our strength. The great thing Wriothsley is to do, is to die in his promise without a stain on his shield. And that is something too; but God knows it is hard for us to give him up."

"Is there no hope?" besought Phœbe.

"None, my child; skill and science, and the wealth of worlds, if we had as much, can do nothing for him. But I am forgetting you, and how tired, as well as sick at heart, you must be. You must come and rest, and have something to eat, or—I was going to say—Wriothsley will never forgive me."

Lord Wriothsley's illness had seemed nothing out of the common when he was attacked by it ten days before. He had caught a chill, which had been followed by fever, such as he had often suffered from. The attack had been more obstinate than usual; but there was nothing so extraordinary in it as to excite apprehension. Lord Exmoor did not even send for additional advice to that of the experienced country-doctor who was watching the case along with Dr. Mitford, who was living in the house, till at the crisis, when the bodily forces should have rallied, ominous symptoms suddenly presented themselves. He had not thought himself in danger until he looked on the faces, subdued in their forced cheerfulness, which gathered about his bed, and heard of the medical men who were summoned from Edinburgh and London to his aid.

CHAPTER LIV.—A BEATEN MAN.

"WHEN we were studying time-tables and calculating distances for the arrival of the doctors," Lady Dorothea explained to Phœbe, "I met Wriothsley's eye, and I knew there was somebody not here whom he wished to see, and I remembered you. I inquired of him, 'Shall we send for Phœbe Paston, Wriothsley?' he replied instantly, 'Yes, the time is so short now, that it is my turn and hers at last.' Mamma dictated the telegram, I wrote it, and papa went with it himself to the station and sent it off. We were sure you would come. You understood us, and did not blame us any more than we blamed you."

"You are right," murmured Phœbe.

"Mamma is with him almost always. She seems to be learning to live without rest or refreshment of any kind, for as small and frail as she is. We let her do it, for we know that all her rest is in being with him while he is here. I think he must be dozing, for she must have heard the carriage, and otherwise she would have sent for you. You must let me take you to papa. Poor papa! Men do not know what to do with great sorrow any more than with great joy, and it sits the more heavily on them."

Phœbe found Lord Exmoor much the same as she had always found him, except that he looked shockingly haggard, and was more nervous than ever. He made no allusion to his son and Phœbe. He was good-naturedly kind to her, anxious to ascertain that she had not done herself up with travelling, and very solicitous to discover what solace she was capable of taking in the way of soup or wine. Indeed, save for the absence of the Countess, and for the family's dining strictly in private, and dispensing with the rite of Lady Dorothea and Phœbe dressing for dinner, social state and form went on unimpaired. To Phœbe, while they were a wearisome burden, the circumstance of her dining for the first time with Lord Exmoor, which would have been a trial for her to think of a month ago, dwindled into a mere necessary ceremony.

Lord Exmoor plunged into Wellfield gossip, in order to keep up a semblance of conversation, and to avoid another topic, as if both he and Phœbe had left the town but yesterday. During all the time he spoke, he was listening intently to every sound in the house, making suggestions and comments upon them to Lady Dorothea, and sighing inadvertently woeful sighs. At one time, when he asked abruptly, "And how goes the painting, Miss Paston?" Phœbe was afraid that he had forgotten her father's death, and that the next question would refer to him as still living and working in Woovers' Alley. She was sure Lady Dorothea had the same fear, for she interrupted her father, prompting him gently:

"You mean Mr. Woole's commissions for Mr. Paston's pictures, don't you, papa?"

"Certainly. What should I mean?" answered the Earl, confused and testy in his confusion. Then he thought no more about it, observing hastily—

"There, that is your mamma's step"—at the same time starting up from his walnuts and wine to forestall the servant in opening the door for the Countess, in order to ascertain what was poor Wriothlesley's state now.

If the Earl was friendly to Phœbe, with a little agitated chivalrousness that had not appeared before in his tone to Paston's daughter, the ice of the Countess's manners melted at once into the quiet, devoted motherliness which rendered her so dear to her children. She came forward, looking smaller—more like a piece of old, discoloured china than ever. Yet she walked steadily, though slowly, from being more or less crippled by rheumatism. She took Phœbe by both hands, drew the girl close to her, and kissed her.

"My dear, you are cold yet! Has Dorothea not managed to have you warmed?"

We have always fires in the rooms here of an evening, for the hill air is so keen. If no other room was sufficiently heated, Dolly ought to have taken you to mine; I should have been so glad to have had you there."

"Did you not hear the carriage, mamma, or was Wriothlesley dozing?" asked Lady Dorothea, with a little flutter in her manner.

"We heard the carriage come up, yes; Wriothlesley knew the time and the hour of the train, and he has not been dozing at all. But he would not have you come to see him till you have rested and dined. Will you come now, Phœbe? I shall show you the way, if you please."

"But that is giving you so much trouble," objected Phœbe, with bated breath.

"No, don't say anything of the trouble. I should like to take you myself, Miss Paston—Phœbe. I am not tired; somehow I am never tired just now; I have ceased to know what the feeling is, I think. I am sure you know what it is not to be able to feel tired; for I remember Wriothlesley's telling how you nursed your father."

Then, as Phœbe and she went up the stair together, the Countess said in a low tone—

"I shall give up my place to you for the quarter of an hour which Dr. Ashby thinks will not be too much for him. He is very weak, but you need not be frightened; there is no immediate danger, and he is too good to hurt himself and you. I can trust you."

What eyes were those light grey eyes of the Countess's, when they melted like the rest of her, in faithful, fond, self-abnegation! and what tones her thin, weak voice acquired of single-hearted, vibrating sweetness!

The Countess left Phœbe in the dressing-room, while she went in herself to Lord Wriothlesley. A doctor, who was a stranger to Phœbe, and who was sitting with his patient, rose and withdrew by the opposite door. Lady Exmoor called Phœbe forward, and her Ladyship's stammer was gone for the moment, when she announced, "Here is Phœbe, Gerard," and followed the doctor.

Phœbe was not frightened, as Lady Exmoor had apprehended. Neither was the white face on the pillows so changed as to distress her. The fine traits were all brought out, and refined, as it were, by the removing of every grosser line in what had never had much grossness. Phœbe could not bear to see him lying there looking so bright. She began to cry, unable to keep back her sobs and tears, vexed and shocked although she was at her weakness.

In his kindness, Lord Wriothlesley took no notice of Phœbe's emotion. With a faint but audible voice, he was thanking her over and over again for coming, and praising her for her goodness. When she had composed herself, he wanted to hear of her journey, and what she thought of Strathavie. The next moment he was repeating what he should have shown Phœbe at Strathavie—the Rock of Lamentation, the Black Spout Waterfall, the Corrie-Nan-Ban; and then he was calling himself back to inquire for Mrs. Paston, for the Halls, for little Bess. Phœbe could hardly believe that he knew and was reconciling himself to going away from them, from all his friends, honours, and ambitions, in a few days or hours.

With that conversation in the sick-room the time was up. A servant knocked at the door, and delivered a message from the doctor requesting Phœbe to withdraw.

Lord Wriothlesley smiled a little at the implied authority, took her hand, and held it, reluctant to part from her. He told her once more how kind it had been of her to come so far to see him, and how good she was. He added, that if she was not very tired—he was a terribly selfish fellow to ask it, but he had no choice—would she let him see her again by relieving his mother, and sending her Ladyship to lie down in the dressing-room, instead of sitting with him, in the early part of the night? His nights were apt to be bad, and—no one could tell.

In the beginning of the night Phœbe was back at his side. At his desire she unfastened the shutters, pulled up the Venetian blind, and drew aside the curtains for a few minutes, to enable him to see the harvest moonlight on the loch. He began to murmur some lines which had once caught his fancy:—

"Lay him down, his work is done;
Vain for him is friend or foe-man,
Rise of moon, or set of sun,
Hand of man, or kiss of woman."

"You have been my one true love, Phœbe. Though I have not been able to say it to you in so many words before, I think you knew it. Have I been yours?"

"You have been very dear to me, Lord Wriothlesley," replied Phœbe, trembling.

"But have I been the dearest, Phœbe—dear before every other?"

"Great death" appeared already to look Phœbe through and through, demanding that truth without which tenderness is worthless.

"I never had a brother, but I do not think I could have had one dearer than you," Phœbe said, faintly.

"That answer would not have served me living—it hardly serves me dying. Have you no other answer for me, Phœbe?"

There was silence in the room save for the beating of Phœbe's heart, and the labouring of his breath.

"Then you have the answer for another?"

Still there was only the silence that is assent.

It was a great shock to him, even at that hour—like a second shivering of life, and what was dearest to him in it. But there was not only justice, there was magnanimity, too, in the blood of these Exmoors.

"Never mind, Phœbe," he spoke again, gently. "I daresay you loved me as well as you could, a great deal better than I deserved. I suppose everything is right, even to Wooler's being conqueror, and I the beaten man."

"If he were to know, he would not call you beaten," Phœbe vowed solemnly, "though I have heard him say heaven was for beaten men. All you have given me—(would you had given it to a worthier woman!)—I shall prize to my dying day."

Until Lord Wriothlesley's death, his eyes never rested on her whom, to the end, he desired to have near him, without repeating, with tender gallantry in their glance, "Never mind, Phœbe."

His last feeble gesture, after his eyes were dim, was still to put away the most distant shadow of reproach from the love, grown ripe beyond measuring love in return.

Phœbe remained at Strathavie, and returned with Lady Dorothea and the Countess, who followed Lord Exmoor and his melancholy charge to Brockcotes in time for the funeral. Then she bowed her head in her hands, and remembered that a thousand years are with God as one day, and one day as a thousand years; and she found unspeakable consolation in the remembrance.

The funeral was one of those spectacles which belonged to Wellfield, and was witnessed by crowds of strangers, who arrived for the purpose. It was a poor and passing compensation for what was a special blow to the town as well as to Lord Exmoor. When the present Earl died, and the titles and estates passed out of the direct line to the Essex branch of the Latimers, it would be to bring in a race which, though it was fairly creditable to the main stock, and possessed at least a share of the traditional virtues of the house, yet knew not Wellfield.

Among the swollen train of noble relatives, connections, friends, tenants, and retainers, there was one carriage, the occupants of which could afford to be private in the show, and to consider only who had been nearest and dearest to Lord Wriothlesley. The women of the family were not part of the sight. By the shortest, most private road, a carriage carried a company of them within the bounds of the family burial-ground in the park, and set them down close to the mouth of the vault. These cloaked and hooded mourners were the Countess, Lady Dorothea, and Phœbe Paston.

When dust had been given back to dust, and the carriage on its return was about to drive up to Brockcotes in the state of its pile, and the magnificence of its autumn verdure, the cold, stiff little Countess pulled down Phœbe's head for a moment on her poor shoulder, and told her, "You were his darling; you must consent to be mine."

Before night all Wellfield was apprised of the members of the group. The knowledge afforded foundation for the extravaganza that Lord Wriothlesley had left Phœbe Paston his sole heir, and that he had got Lord Exmoor to swear to adopt her, and make her the same in the family as Lady Dorothea.

Mrs. Paston was exceedingly proud of Phœbe's visits to the Exmoors, and eager to spare her daughter for them, each time they were proposed, reserving her grumbling over her own loneliness till she had gone. On each occasion of Phœbe's return, Mrs. Paston did not fail to wonder and feel aggrieved that Lord Exmoor had not executed some deed of settlement on Phœbe, as in a sense the widow of poor Lord Wriothlesley, the word of whom had kept away others.

It might be more in reference to what had been Phœbe's relation to Lord Wriothlesley than poor Mrs. Paston at all comprehended that she brought back with her at last a curtain of the Countess's hangings.

"This is all there is left to finish, mamma; but Lady Exmoor's sight is impaired. She has asked me to do what remains of the work."

"Upon my word, a modest request—if this is all the Exmoors can do for you! Why, child, you will stitch yourself blind; and why doesn't her mother blind Lady Dorothea? They have done you enough harm already."

"Lady Dorothea does not like to embroider, and cannot do it. I like it, and can, though, perhaps, I should not say so. Besides, Lady Dorothea has so much to do—more than ever now. I am allowed my own time to this work; and if Uncle Hall do not succeed and win back his wealth, I shall think no shame of taking, nor Lady Exmoor of giving, wages for my work."

"She may think shame, considering all that has come and gone," protested Mrs. Paston, indignantly; "and I think, Phœbe, that you are a poor-spirited girl to mention such a thing."

Phœbe did not notice the little spurt of pride and anger, but hurried on with the compensation.

"The best thing of it is, that these hangings, which have been more than a century in working, and which the present Countess, after having done so much to them, naturally wishes to see in their place before Brockcotes passes to the younger branch of the family, have been, till now, embroidered only by the Countesses of Exmoor. Don't you see it is the highest compliment our Countess can pay me, to ask me to complete the hangings?" Phœbe urged, eagerly.

Mrs. Paston did not quite see it; but she did not interfere with her daughter's grateful response to the compliment. So Phœbe lost a little of the listlessness which tarried with her, and grew busy and interested in her work, until her pensiveness brightened in the business. By the time she had accomplished a great centre-piece of tiger-lilies, white roses, and love-lies-bleeding, the autumn and the winter of a third year in the lodging in Stephenson Street had given place to a fresh spring. She still put up her nightly piteous prayer—"Lord Jesus, wilt Thou not come to set the wrong right, and bring back the lost, as Thou wert wont? Lord, forgive our unworthiness and unwillingness, and make us less unworthy, more willing." But the keenness of the anguish and the yearning of the prayer was dying out, and hope and peace were taking the room of sharp pain.

CHAPTER LV.—THE TRUE ELIXIR.

ONE evening in March, Phœbe had drawn the window-curtains earlier than usual to shut out the dispiriting sight of a late shower of snow. She was a little reconciled to the untimely fall which had secured her and her mother all day from visitors—those somewhat constrained, shallow, and idle acquaintances of the upper ranks of Folksbridge into which the Halls had eventually succeeded in introducing them.

On the back of Phœbe's finally assuring herself of immunity from company, even from that of her cousins, and of Mrs. Paston's being seized with a formidable fit of yawning, a carriage drove up to the door. A double knock was heard; and while Mrs. Paston was balancing her cap, and Phœbe was insisting that there must be a mistake, Lady Dorothea was shown in.

Her Ladyship had not been in Folksbridge since the Pastons came to it, and Phœbe had received no intimation of this visit. The Exmoors had begun to go into the world again, and Phœbe had seen and heard less of them lately.

Phœbe's impression was that some extraordinary event must be in the wind; and then, as the fire-light flickered up from the black dress which Lady Dorothea still wore, to her little white face, Phœbe's heart sank in thinking what that something might be. Lady Dorothea, with her old quickness, speedily read the look.

"No, Phœbe, I am not going to die yet,—though I was very near it a month ago; but I am going to be married to-morrow, and I am come myself to carry you away with me to Phantasy, to stay with me there till it is all over. You need not see any of the Essex Latimers, who are at Phantasy just now, unless you like; but you must come with me."

"Yes, I will go with you," promised Phœbe, but with the most urgent look of inquiry.

"Of course," said Lady Dorothea, anticipating the question Phœbe insisted on putting, "the bridegroom is Mr. Blount, who has come across from Canada to make a settlement with his cousin, in which his sisters are concerned. Mr. Blount offered them a home with him, but they would not think of it. Mamma and papa are coming down to-morrow on purpose. Is it not very good of them, when mamma has to make such an effort?—and there is no doubt the marriage is a great trial to them, though you may be sure I have their consent, otherwise I should not take the step."

Phœbe asked no questions then, but left her mother to offer the puzzled malapropos congratulations, which were brought to a sudden stop by Lady Dorothea's candid, naive confession.

"Oh, dear, no! I am getting no fine things this time, Mrs. Paston. Don't you know, I am leaving all my fine things behind me? Of what use could they possibly be to a farmer's wife in Canada?"

It was sufficient occupation for Phœbe during the half-hour Lady Dorothea waited for her, to equip herself for her expedition, and find a dress not altogether out of keeping with a wedding.

It was like another dream to Phœbe that Lady Dorothea was going to be married in this offhand fashion; and, after all, to Mr. Blount, a colonist, working on borrowed money, with the slur of the bar-sinister on his shield. Phœbe could not quickly take it all in.

Lady Dorothea was too wearied to enter on explanations on the road to Phantasy. She had driven to Stephenson Street, leaving the carriage, with her maid in the rumble, at the Pastons' door. She was on her way from the station where the Essex Latimers had met her, and whence they had gone on before, at her request, to Phantasy. She was just recovered from a severe illness, of which Phœbe had got no intimation. Lady Dorothea was keeping herself up for the fatigue of the next day, and of the journey, till, as she trusted, the voyage should recruit her; for Mr. Blount could neither afford to remain in this country absent from the bringing in of his lots of land and the reaping of their virgin crops, nor could he come back for her in less than a year. But Lady Dorothea told Phœbe that once they had arrived and got a cup of tea, she would be able to chat to her, and tell her everything.

Lady Dorothea decided that she must exert herself, and go down and dine with the family, and that Phœbe had better show herself under her wing. "They are commonplace, goodish sort of people, and perfectly harmless, these Essex Latimers. They will stare a little at you, but I shall divide their attention. Certainly, they have been very friendly in lending us their house and their countenance just now."

Lady Dorothea spoke always of her marriage as an act to be done in a corner, and yet she never alluded to Mr. Blount without a glistening of her clear eyes, and a sweet suspicion of colour coming into her pale cheek.

Phœbe was in no perturbation at facing the commonplace, harmless Latimers. She had come to stand such fire. Lady Dorothea looked at her in approbation.

"You have got the one thing you wanted, Phœbe—unconsciousness, which is nine-tenths of ease and breeding."

"I am glad I have got anything I wanted, and am the better of," Phœbe answered. "I am only afraid it has been a little dearly bought," she finished, with a sigh.

There were only Mr. and Mrs. Latimer and three of their daughters at Phantasy. There was no company staying in the house beyond Lady Dorothea and her friend—not even Mr. Blount, who was not to come down till before church-time the next day.

The Latimers' stares were all within the bounds of conventionality and courtesy, and, as Lady Dorothea had promised, she divided them fully. In spite of everything, had it not been for her wretched health, Lady Dorothea looked as sure of her own mind, and as satisfied as if Mr. Blount were still Marquis of Fairchester, and Lord of Sans Pareil and Ford-in-the-Marsh.

There was one good in Lady Dorothea's recent illness, that it afforded her a pretext for retiring early to her own room. No sooner was she in her dressing-gown, than she sent to Phœbe, whom she had taken care to have established in the room next to hers. She begged her to permit the door of communication between the rooms to be opened, and to come in and sit with her till it was a Christian hour to go to sleep. She dismissed her maid—no longer Thorpie. As Lady Dorothea had told Phœbe, Thorpie, with many expressions of regret, and with much to suffer from the righteous reprobation of her aunt, Miss Thorpe, had given her leave from the hour Lady Dorothea's marriage was announced.

"I don't deny Thorpie's instant secession was mortifying, but it was so far good," declared Lady Dorothea. "I cannot afford any but the plainest sewing-maid in my new condition; and as I have told you often, Thorpie was a terrible handful in a strange place."

"Now we shall have it out, Phœbe," Lady Dorothea proposed, when Phœbe was seated close to her in the cosiness of Lady Dorothea's room. "The evening is my best time still. I feel so washed-out and run down in the morning—a weakness which, it is to be hoped, will mend by-and-by, else I shall be a great drag on my colonist. Now, I have got over all the sickening aches of my journey from town. How little I used to feel it all the way down to Brockcotes! When shall I travel that road again, I wonder? Only in dreams for many a long day, and I am not a bit sleepy to get a chance of dreaming to-night."

Notwithstanding Lady Dorothea's assertion, she sat long silent, dreaming by the hearth, with her head on her hand, and her hair falling round her like a cloud, out of which her eyes shone like stars.

"I wanted only to be a dutiful daughter," Lady Dorothea continued, "unexceptionable in my conduct and my submission, in order to give pleasure to poor papa and mamma in the end. But it would not do," continued Lady Dorothea, shaking her head. "I think I took too much out of myself, as Wriothlesley wouldn't be persuaded not to do. What brought the climax and broke the camel's back was the new Lord Fairchester, Edmund Blount, presuming to pay his addresses to me, and to suppose he could fill his cousin's place. The Earl and Countess were as much shocked and affronted as I was. But we began to meet him everywhere, and he would take no repulse. It was so like profanation, that I think it turned me sick and made me light-headed, for I got ill just at that time."

"One could scarcely wonder, I think," protested Phœbe, indignantly.

"Well, I was so ill, and so like Wriothlesley, that even when the fever left me, I and everybody else thought it was no more than a reprieve, and that I was going to die, too. As that was the case, I thought I might see John Blount, who had come home then on his sisters' business. I could not tell whether I should be permitted to go to him and help him as a disembodied spirit, though I hoped so with all my heart; and while I was still in the body, it would be such a comfort to meet him and hear his honest, kindly voice again. As I was to die in a month or two at the latest, the indulgence could not signify, would not harm anybody much. You cannot think how sorry he was for me, and how he was distracted—he who was so staid—between his sorrow and his gladness to be with me once more. I had somehow made him so fond of me, we had grown so fond of each other. I got him to tell me about Canada and his settler's life. It was so nice and primitive to hear of, and reminded me so forcibly of my little bit of New-found-land which I was wont to be so busy and happy about, that I forgot the hopelessness and mournfulness of our position, and felt quite freshened and brightened. The next day I was a great deal better instead of worse, and so I was every day after he sat with me, nursed me, and cheered me. And then it entered into dear mamma's wise head whether, instead of dying to them, I might not live to him? My heart cried out for that other dying before mamma whispered it to me, and when he, poor fellow, could only look the possibility. It was a common, human cry that of my heart, Phœbe; but it taught me, right or wrong, that common humanity, in its sacredness, is the highest nobleness. Its rights and needs are surely the first obligations and lie at the root of all others."

"Yea and amen to these words, Lady Dorothea," responded Phœbe.

"I had sacrificed them once, and it might have been a mistake. Was I again to sacrifice both them and him? Besides, many of the reasons for the sacrifice have ceased. It was to serve my brother's career, and extend the Exmoor influence. It is papa and mamma who have to suffer loss, but they will do it for me. Mamma had some difficulty in talking over the Earl, but he has got over his scruples, and he is coming down to-morrow, poor dear old man, to give me away."

The tears fell from more eyes than Lady Dorothea's.

"There is one thing that troubles me, Phœbe," Lady Dorothea went on wistfully. "You may think that I have been kinder to myself than I was to you, because I had not then learnt to understand all that I understand now."

"No, Lady Dorothea," Phœbe declared, deliberately; "I think more of you than ever; I was never so proud of my friend as now."

"But our marriage as it is would have been horribly out of place at Brockcotes. It would have been only mocking Wellfield, you know. I am sure I ought to spare papa and mamma, Richardson, Clarges, Mrs. Bald, and Miss Thorpe, and the rest, as much mortification as I can."

Phœbe did not see how Lady Dorothea's marriage could be anything else to Wellfield but a lesson in true nobility, latent unworldliness, and tender fidelity. But she could not see everything.

"Phœbe," Lady Dorothea took up the conversation again, "Mr. Blount and I owe our re-union in one light to Mr. Wooler. If it had not been for your friend's confidence and liberality, it is very likely a marriage would not have been feasible. Since Mr. Blount came over, he has been seeing Mr. Wooler, and I need not say how favourably the one man has impressed the other. I had always a favour for Mr. Wooler from what I had heard of him."

"I think Mr. Wooler deserves your favour on the whole," answered Phœbe, a little dryly and a little shyly. She would have turned away her head, but she could not do it with a grace. It was not an easy ordeal to undergo the light of those eyes of Lady Dorothea's.

"We know that Wriothlesley loved you to the last with a love that might well pass beyond time," said Lady Dorothea, softly. "But I never thought that Wriothlesley living would stand between you and another man. If that is true, Wriothlesley dead would have been the very last man to have wished to stand between you and Mr. Wooler."

"Lady Dorothea," exclaimed Phœbe, smarting under a sense of humiliation, "I have no more to do with Mr. Wooler than you have. He owes no love to me. All that was over an age ago. I have not spoken half a dozen words to him for a year and a half. Even when he sold the last of the pictures at which both papa and he had worked, he sent our share of the price through a bank."

"Possibly; but he cannot remain always absent from Folksbridge, where he has gone into his uncles' business," Lady Dorothea arrived at the logical conclusion; "you cannot escape speaking to each other for the term of your lives. And, my dear child, you may find, to your tremendous confusion, as I have done, that things you thought over and done with, have no end at all. But let us suppose them over, by all means. What was I going to say next? Oh! Mr. Wooler has promised to cross the Atlantic—he has crossed it more than once already, it seems, and it is a holiday-trip nowadays—in order to visit Mr. Blount."

"He will be very fond of you, when he comes to know you, as my cousin Frank Hall was," proclaimed Phœbe, impulsively.

"Ah! I can but recollect Mr. Hall, which sounds ungrateful, and he was Wriothlesley's friend, too. It is not that my memory is bad. I used to pique myself on not forgetting anybody. But we saw so many people, and I seem to have gone through so much. You cannot think how old I feel—old enough to be John Blount's mother—so that I wonder he has anything to say to me in so juvenile a sense as love and marriage. I have much need to go to the Far West till it reaches round to the East, and the sunset wears back into the sunrise. What I suspect I shall miss most, when I grow young again, is loads of people to think for and look after. What shall I make of myself with only him to mind? He says I must begin anew and try—humanising the log-cutters and the waggoners. Mr. Wooler, when he comes, will bring his wife with him, Phœbe. It stands to reason that a man in the prime of life, and in the possession of a large fortune, will marry some day yet—above all, when any disappointment he may have had in early days is 'over an age ago.' When Mr. Wooler comes to Blount's Land with his wife, I do hope she will be a dear soul. Don't you, Phœbe, for Mr. Wooler's sake, as well as for mine? When we drive in the forest, and work in the newly-laid-out gardens, it will be like old days, though the scene be in Canada-West and not in England."

Phœbe turned away.

"I never imagined," Lady Dorothea resumed, after a silence, wandering back, as she did naturally and perpetually this night, to her own affairs, "I never imagined, though I had been a traveller in my own estimation, that I should ever set eyes on the real Newfoundland, or that my little wilderness was only to furnish practice for my settlement in a great one. And did I tell you, Phœbe?—he has brought me such a love of a fur-cloak. I never had anything so rich in fur to wrap round my poor meagre bones, in place of the fragments of his old travelling-cloak which he gave me to cover the bare boards in Germany, and which he found me hugging still when he came back this time."

CHAPTER LVI.—"THROWING HERSELF AWAY."

LADY DOROTHEA'S marriage was as different as possible from the grand marriage which had been arranged for her years before at Brockcotes, although the principal performers remained the same. It was celebrated on a blustering March morning, in the little parish church nearest Phantasy. Nobody was present beyond a few of the relations and Phœbe Paston. The most of the company were still in mourning. The bride herself was neither in Honiton nor in Brussels lace, but in the plainest of white silks. The very season seemed to be against a wedding: it did not admit of many flowers, and the whole marriage-party were shivering with cold, if not with agitation. Only the bells in the tower up in the air sent forth an unmistakable sign of rejoicing. Lady Exmoor walked into church, but was forced to sit throughout the service. Lord Exmoor brought in his daughter, in a violent hurry, as if he were afraid lest he should repent and forbid the ceremony at the last moment. Then he took up his position, keeping guard over his wife, and looking sterner than he had ever looked before, in his thin-haired long-legged dignity.

Phœbe could not say that the world would have called it a beautiful marriage, though the bride had been one of the reigning beauties of her first season; and she held that it was one of the finest elements of Lady Dorothea's beauty that care and thought did not impair it. And Mr. Blount was young and manly, not without inherent nobility in his adversity—without doubt something of a hero to others as well as to Lady Dorothea.

There was one relative present at Lady Dorothea's marriage, who, like Lord and Lady Exmoor and Mr. Blount, arrived on the wedding morning, but unlike them, unexpectedly and without receiving a cordial reception from the owners of Phantasy.

This was Mrs. Edgecumbe.

"Never mind," she said to Phœbe, drawing her aside when the register was being signed. "I have been accustomed to have people turn up their noses at me, even such small noses as that of Mrs. Latimer—the greater sinner and fool I, my dear, to have given them the opportunity. But at least I won't contaminate the may-poles of daughters;—and what successors to Lady Dorothea! Each would make half-a-dozen of her Ladyship out of bread and mutton material. I hope I'm above taking the shabby welcome out of the woman, or retaliating in any way. But I won't go in for the déjeuner. I can do without champagne and lobster pâtés. I have got sherry and sandwiches in the carriage, and it is due to the Squire, who swore over me for coming at all, thus exposing myself to their squeamishness and impudence, that I should not stay. I only wanted to see Lady Dorothea throw herself away; and I declare I think there must be more soul in me, smirched though it may be, than in these people, for I saw it with all the pleasure in life. I protest I don't grudge her, who is the jewel of the Latimers, the only jewel left, to a man of honour like Mr. Blount. We are turning over a new leaf, after all; and this is the finest thing that has been done among us these fifty years. It will be your turn next, Phœbe. Don't look vexed; I don't mean to hurt you. What I want to say is, that I never see a coy, reasonable girl coaxed and coerced into a romance and tragedy, without guessing that, in the reaction, she will go off at last with some fellow the very opposite of the first—a humdrum, middle-aged man of business, who will seek her for somebody to play with, to keep his keys, and make his bread and butter."

And with this Mrs. Edgecumbe entered her carriage, without so much as allowing Phœbe to reply.

CHAPTER LVII.—MRS. WOOLER'S AMBITION.

THE last popular prediction of Phœbe's fate was that she would go and live with the ailing Countess of Exmoor, since Lady Dorothea was "married in Canada." Her own mother was hale for her years, lived quietly in lodgings near her own relatives, and in the world's opinion could do without her daughter for the present; while it would be a fine thing for the family of a deceased painter, who had lost money by Mr. Hall of Garnet Lodge, to have the daughter adopted and carried about in the train of Lady Exmoor. On the other hand, it would be the easiest way for the Exmoors to provide for the young lady, from whom, for their own credit, they could not withhold a provision, since she had been so near to becoming Countess of Exmoor.

But although Phœbe continued to visit Lady Exmoor occasionally, and although she was assured by many a kind remembrance that her Ladyship did not forget her, and that it was not by mere forms of words that the Countess, in the letters which she still contrived with her crippled fingers to write to her, addressed her as "Dear Phœbe," and signed herself "Your true friend, Anne Exmoor;" and although there came to Stephenson Street "no end of game and fruit," as the Halls reported, there was not the smallest ground for the supposition that Phœbe was to be transplanted to Broockotes or Piccadilly.

The single change which was likely to take place in Phœbe's circle was the marriage of Frank Hall. After a somewhat lengthened career of bachelorhood, and on his bare income as a journalist, he was about to rush into matrimony, after the slightest possible acquaintance, with a young lady of slender expectations.

The one particular which tallied with Lady Dorothea's argument for Phœbe's future experience in Folksbridge was that Barty Wooler was stationary there this summer, more stationary than he had ever been. He was tied down by a bond, the obligation of which he had never slighted. The Messrs. Clay were as much specimens of immortelles as ever. They were as dry and shrivelled, and as likely to see out the century as he was. But their niece, who had been buxom Judith Clay when they were middle-aged men, on coming to spend a few days with her son in his rooms above the great shop, was smitten by a stroke of the disease of which she had long before had an incipient touch, and was deprived in a great measure of the power of motion, being reduced for the rest of her days to an invalid's chair.

After the first few weeks there did not seem to be much more danger to her life than there was to that of the strong man her son. Her mental faculties were unimpaired, her speech was preserved. With Barty by her side, and the memory of an honest life to ponder upon, Mrs. Wooler announced that she could bear her captivity.

"It is not worse than the county prison, Barty; and it is without the bread and the water and the disgrace," she said, with a gleam of her old humour. "I daresay I'll get in time to doing coarse sewing and knitting with these quaking hands of mine. It is well that I can put my food into my mouth, and read a verse or two till I've served my 'prenticeship to being helpless and a burden. But you'll have to bring Becky, lad, and give up the house in Wellfield, if you are to keep me here. My word! if it be shut up, or get a careless tenant, the boys will riot among the laburnums."

Deprived of her old occupation as vigilant watcher over the public morals, and as vigorous administrator of justice on her own account, Mrs. Wooler was reduced to the consideration that a daughter-in-law might be an acceptable addition to the household. She would not have coveted such an arrangement when she was well, but now that she was sickly matters were altered. It would be an advantage to Becky too; for Becky was likely to be lost without a mistress's active superintendence.

With characteristic freedom from scruples, and complete independence of consultation with the individuals principally concerned, Mrs. Wooler sent Becky with a summary message to Miss Paston, bidding her come and speak with her.

Phœbe had frequently sent to make inquiries after Mrs. Wooler during the first weeks of her illness, and had several times gone there with her mother to see the invalid. But she was not the less startled and a little alarmed by Mrs. Wooler's demand. She complied, however, with the request.

"Of course you'll go instantly, Phœbe. I wonder if the old lady would like anything you could take to her?" said Mrs. Paston.

Phœbe went just before tea-time, when she had some notion that Barty would be smoking and reading in the Folksbridge reading-room; and this though the cool of the morning or of the evening would have been a more seasonable time for a walk from Stephenson Street.

She did not go into any of the several doors of the swarming shop, where she had been introduced to the Messrs. Clay, but walked round the corner and applied herself to a private door. It was opened to her by Becky—no longer distracted by swift chase after urchins, but having time granted her to attend to her toilette as well as to her old mistress. Becky testified to the improvement by presenting a broad face, with all her processes of hooking and buttoning completed.

Phœbe was shown into the sitting-room beyond the great wareroom where Barty had done his part of the picture of the rebel lords, and where she had received the telegram requesting her to join Lord Wriothesley. She had been within these walls since then, but the neighbourhood recalled freshly to her mind the events of two years back.

Barty Wooler's bachelor rooms, with their artist's sketches and relics of travel, had their temporary, tent-like character very much modified by the figure of the old woman, a fixture in her chair set by the window, and by the elaborate provisions for her comfort.

Phœbe went up with some alacrity, and clasped the nerveless hand, in whose power and craft Mrs. Wooler had once had her pride.

She received Phœbe graciously, and was some time in coming to the point of explaining why she had sent for her. The old woman was so ready to talk of the weather and of trade, of Phœbe's mother, and the Messrs. Clay, of old Wellfield people and stories, and so slow to introduce her object, that Phœbe fell into a suppressed fidgeting to be gone, lest a third person should break in on the prolonged tête-à-tête. This covert fidgeting, which Mrs. Wooler was still acute enough to detect, roused the old woman's ire.

"You may rest and keep yourself cool in this summer weather, Miss Paston," said Mrs. Wooler, with a gleam in her eyes; "you won't be put about by Barty intruding upon us. He is away out to dine at his uncles', and won't be back till past my bed-time. There, now, that must relieve you. I am not so stupid yet, though I am become such a poor creature, that I can't see you looking at the shadow on the foundry wall over the way, setting your glove and pulling your bonnet-strings, because time is on the wing, as the hymn-book says, and you are wild to be on the wing too, in terror of whom my tea-hour may bring to me. By all the world it reminds me of the tea-party I gave to please Barty in our house at Wellfield, the first time you set foot in it. You remember that, Miss Paston? You were so toity because your mother brought you, and you were forced to sit among the company and suffer that poor Barty should betray he had no eyes for any lass but you, and would give his two eyes for a kind look from yours, the more fool he! but there do be no fools like old ones—you mind me of that, Miss Paston."

Mrs. Wooler, having delivered herself of her piece of temper, was softening in the very act.

"Not that I'll say you weren't a fine girl," she began again, in a deprecating tone, "and deserved that Barty should set his heart on you, and our young Lord should forget what he were come of and go after you in his turn. But now, Phœbe Paston," she said, starting to execute her purpose, and directly pressing on to it, "you've had to wade in the waters Scripture tells of, and lift your own load in the old, old story, which quiets both men and women, but most women. You were cast down, as you might be, when we were all fain to hang our heads for Lord Wriothesley. It was natural you should take the wind when it blew in your barn-door. I do not blame you, my dear, that you said Yes to being a great lady. I thought something in my day of being a parson's wife, but I thought more of being Clerk Wooler's dear, so I know something that you do not know, for as hard a woman as you may think me, Phœbe. You do not look to have buried your heart as well as him."

Phœbe wondered disconsolately, as she sat in the shadow of the window-curtain, her tell-tale woman's face showing her confusion.

"Phœbe Paston, I am not an unreasonable woman, or blindly dotting either. But," and Mrs. Wooler now gave out her line with due emphasis, "I will speak out what I've held my tongue upon so long, though Barty forbade me to tell it; a mother owes no obedience to her bairn, though he be a big man. Phœbe Paston, you know Barty and your father were thick together when they were lads, so thick that their regard could survive quarrels, separation, and all, and yoke them in the same team again at the end. They were main clever lads. I do not say that there are not any so bright and helpful now. But Barty has long been a kind of broken man, in spite of his health and strength. He wanted then what he wants yet—a woman to sit by his side, like he told me Gainsborough's wife sat, and settle him by showing him she is waiting to glory in his success. I had my own fight then to keep myself, and rear my lad as Clerk Wooler's lad ought to be reared. More than that, a lad will not stand from his mother what a man will relish and prize from his love or his wife."

Phœbe thought to interrupt the old woman, and urge what she could mean by saying all these things to her; but before she could get words Mrs. Wooler resumed—

"Old Lord Exmoor—that's the one before the present Lord, Phœbe, for I remember three old Lord Exmoors—happened to see some of the lads'—Caleb's and Barty's—copies from the paintings at Brockcotes, and was struck with what they had done. He said, my Lord did, that he did not know what talent might be lying lost in the town and among the clods in the neighbourhood. To draw the talent out, Lord Exmoor offered a great prize—two years' lessons in the London Academy and the expenses of a journey to Rome—to the artist who should paint the best picture—the subject to be left to the artist—within four months. The offer made a great noise. Both your father, who was five or six and twenty—he had been kept back by his hard youth—and Barty, who was nineteen, were to compete among older men, drawing-masters and daubers for their own fancies, who would have a try for the chance of honour and a visit to Rome."

"I have heard of it," murmured Phœbe.

"But if Barty or Caleb won, the winner was to share as far as might be with the loser, so that there was to be no loss where they were concerned. They had many a consultation on their subjects. I heard them till I was fair sick of the clatter, leastways I professed it, to keep the lads in their proper places. At last Barty hit on a new idea, and dead set he was upon it. He would paint the repentance of the prodigal Lord Thomas, instead of a scene from the battle of Agincourt, or the visit of his Majesty King Charles. It was a bold venture of Barty, for Lord Thomas and his misdeeds had always been held a scandal since they had brought disgrace on the virtuous Exmoors. But Barty maintained that Lord Thomas had suffered for his sins in his day, and that it was time his atonement held honourable mention among other valiant deeds of the Latimers, and that Lord Exmoor should be both pitiful and proud of this forefather as well as of the others."

"I think he was right," granted Phœbe.

"But who could say till Lord Exmoor was tried, and who thought of it till it entered into Barty's head? He was always fighting the battles of the men whose backs were at the wall, and calling on the world to see to it and right them."

"I believe it," accorded Phœbe, lifting up her head.

"How Barty descanted on his poor, gallant, weary reprobate, who had been dust and ashes for a good hundred years, as if to win his righting late in the day should be the best of the prize, till we almost thought we had set eyes on him, as we believed we were never to hear the last of Lord Thomas.

Caleb Paston listened: he was, for the most part, the listener; and I heard Caleb say that Barty fired his imagination, whatever that might be. Caleb spoke less of his subject. He tried first one thing, and then another, pondered and altered, and began all over again, according to his way."

"I know it: he was self-distrustful and patient," put in Phœbe.

"Barty had but thrown his idea on the canvas, when his Uncle Jonathan proposed to treat the lad to a jaunt to London, when he went to buy goods. Barty was wild after the great city, where he had not been above once before. Besides, he trusted to get hints out of the galleries there. He meant to be back with good elbow-room for his work. But Jonathan Clay was detained, and persuaded Barty to remain with him to the last moment."

"That was the evil," alleged Phœbe, strongly. Mrs. Wooler looked at the girl, and went on—

"I do not know whether there was a plot in Jonathan Clay's head to keep Barty back from the trial, and disgust him with the whole business. If Jonathan had so much guile, he was punished for it. Barty broke away from his granduncle in the long run, and came tearing down night and day by the mail-coach, in a very jimp time. I was out of sorts and out of conceit with Barty for letting himself be made a weathercock of, but Caleb was full of desperate excuses for his friend. The very night Barty returned, your father met him at the coach, and took him to the old brewery, where he was allowed to paint. Caleb let Barty see his own design of Lord Thomas, worked up as your father could work up his pictures even then, and confessed that he had been tempted to borrow Barty's idea. But what then? There was no harm done on two counts: the story was common property, and open to all competitors, when you came to consider the question, and there were still three weeks in which Barty might supply his own version of the prodigal's repentance. But Barty withdrew his name from the list of competitors a week before the trial."

"Yes," assented Phœbe, heavily.

"When Caleb Paston gained the prize and favour of Lord Exmoor, and of his son alter him, there was no more word of halving the gain. Barty went up to London when he was a little older, and struggled and studied for a footing to himself; and he went abroad too, but not because he was not light-minded and fickle, to be easily set aside.

He went abroad, and he stayed abroad; he travelled wherever his fancy took him. He pleased himself with roaming and roving and laughing at himself and at others; only he trifled with his youth and his powers, and threw them away as a reckless jockey gambles at the Wellfield races. His early pride had gotten a sore wound. What if the best and bonniest lass in the land were to go a step out of her way to heal the old wound in the man's pride, and give the loser back his faith? Would that be a mighty favour, Phœbe, from you to Barty Wooler, now you have heard my story?"

"Mrs. Wooler!" exclaimed Phœbe, with a mixture of pride and humility, of defiance and sadness, "I heard every syllable of it, and more, from papa's lips one night before he died. Do you think he died with a lie on his lips? He would have told the story to the whole world if it could have done any good then, or if Mr. Wooler would have suffered him to do so."

CHAPTER LVIII.—FORTY-SIX AND TWENTY-SIX.

MRS. WOOLER was taken aback. Her great fire was but spent shot after all. She had risked offending Barty, and wrung Phœbe's heart to no purpose.

Phœbe hid her face in her hands. At that moment a footstep was heard in the next room. Mrs. Wooler, who had already been balked of the effect she had sought to produce, betrayed some trepidation.

"Don'tee! don'tee!" she conjured Phœbe, lapsing into her purest vernacular. "It is Barty come back, and he'll think I've been as good as beating you."

It was Barty, who had either returned by accident, or had found some reason to suspect that his mother was stealing a march upon him. He had not exactly expected to find Phœbe with his mother, for he stopped for an instant before he came forward with a quick, gratified gait to greet her.

Phœbe had made a violent effort to meet his mother's wishes in one respect; but the signs of agitation were plain to a man in whom suspicion was roused. He broke off before he had asked her how she did, and addressed his mother shortly and sharply instead, looking from Phœbe to her and back again.

"What is this? What have you been saying or doing to Miss Paston, mother?"

"Nothing, son Barty," answered Mrs. Wooler, aspiring to smooth him down, but doing it the wrong way; "nothing, save what she as well as you may thank me for—even bidding her to be friends with you, lad, and make it up while she has it in her power."

"There is nothing to make up," protested Barty, "and I will not have any one meddle."

"No, it is not to be thought of," rejoined Mrs. Wooler, "not even in your mummy of an old mother, who was only seeking to serve her ungrateful flesh and blood, by spending her breath—all that she has to spend—and shaking up her poor wits to convince Phœbe Paston that her father's daughter should dole to you a share of the kindness which she has lavished on the quality. Ah! better I were in my quiet grave than trying and troubling you as I do." Mrs. Wooler took refuge in the childishness which had always been one side of her narrow, wilful character.

Barty made a gesture of despair.

"Why will you say such things, mother? It is you who are unkind. Better come with me, Miss Paston, and see what I am doing: that will be a more agreeable study."

Phœbe was glad to go with him; awkward as it was, it was less awkward than to stay.

Mrs. Wooler bade Phœbe a good-bye, in which huffiness was oddly tinged with triumph, as of one who had long promised herself to take an extreme and vehemently opposed step, and who had taken it.

When Phœbe and Barty were out together in the great wareroom, it seemed Barty was doing nothing, or that he had forgotten what he was doing, for Phœbe looked round with dazzled eyes in vain for the work they were to look at. Instead of it there had been a flood-gate opened in Barty's nature which would not shut again. In the face of his indignation with his old mother, he set his back to the wall, and echoed her reproach with bitterness of his own.

"Phœbe, it is so far true what she said. You might have been less kind to the Exmoors, and less cruel to me. Why have you been so soft to the one and so hard to the other?"

"It is not true," protested Phœbe, baited beyond endurance. "It was the reverse. I told Lord Wriothsley so, and he did not blame me."

The inference did not gall Barty, as it might have done if it had had another origin.

"The reverse? You were kind to me and cruel to him—was that it?" he questioned her with a flood of light following the flood of passion in his face. "It must have been in the end then, for certainly it was not in the beginning."

Phœbe was silent, with burning cheeks and beating heart.

"Was it in the end? Tell me, Phœbe."

"You did not seek to know," Phœbe defended herself, though his arms were round her.

"How could I seek to know what I had no reason to suspect?"

"And yet I think if you had spoken to me again after papa died," Phœbe whispered, "it might have helped me, and not left Lord Wriothesley so long in ignorance. I might have married him out of pure gratitude, loyalty, and reverence."

"While you loved me?"

"While I loved you."

"Surely that would have been a grievous wrong to all of us!" he remonstrated, seeking to draw her nearer to him.

"Yes. But I don't think you have to learn that women often do something that is very wrong out of fear to own what is right when it is too late—out of weariness with struggling against themselves and others. I loved Lord Wriothesley in another sense," added Phœbe, looking up in Barty's face; "and now, I should love the very little dog that had belonged to him, even though it were not my pet, for its own sake."

"And I should say, God bless your heart for it, Phœbe!" pronounced Barty, stooping down and kissing her. "But how on earth could you prefer a hasty, battered old traveling-apprentice like me?"

"I cannot tell. Because I could not help it, I suppose," answered Phœbe, quite simply, and quite convincingly.

"And how could I come between you and such high honour, Phœbe?"

"Why do you call it coming between, if I was yours all the time?" she asked, directly.

"Then I was a fool, and I was served rightly, for there was no darkness equal to mine. It was not so much from jealousy—I do not think I have a jealous temper—but that I had never had the least hope to build upon. I had told you I was not a boy to change my mind, and the declaration did not seem to give you much pleasure."

"And I have told you I was a girl, and so fit to change my mind. But you must remember how we argued when we knew each other first," ended Phœbe, with a sudden glad laugh, which was enough of itself to remind him of the bright girl who had been both his friend and his foe, when he had met her, in her first experience of the world.

"I have remembered a great deal too much of what passed when we knew each other first, Miss Phœbe. I wish you had found your memory as soon, and kept it as long. But what are we to do now?" he demanded all at once, shrugging his shoulders.

"What are we to do?" echoed Phœbe, puzzled, and with a shade of timidity in the joy which was so fresh that it still trembled in its sparkling.

"I should say, set about settling at once, when the sinews of war are here in abundance—thanks to the old gentlemen downstairs. No, by-the-bye, they are not downstairs just now, so that you need be under no apprehension that I shall try your modesty by calling them up. We shall ask their blessing in good time, and they will not refuse it, for they are liberal old men. Why, Phœbe, every relation we have, including my old mother—and she will never cease crowing over us, under the outrageously absurd notion that she has brought you round, and set us all right—every one of them will take us to their hearts as a happy couple whenever we like! Ah! but, Phœbe," he exclaimed, in a lower tone, "your father, my dear old friend, would have rejoiced more than any friend we have."

"He would have thought," she told him, "that I was making up for what came between you and him; what he and your mother told me of; but you never hinted to me. Papa would have hoped as much, little as I am worth."

"You are worth all the world to me, as you know very well, or may know any day; and there is nothing to make up—that is a delusion," he said, reprovingly; "unless between you and me, where, of course, there is everything to make up. And you must see I have no time to lose," represented Barty.

"I don't see it," she professed.

"Forty-six and twenty-six are better matched than forty and twenty, eh?" he concluded himself on a subtle calculation.

"I should say so. But you have not told me your difficulty."

"This is so wide apart from grand old Brockcotes, Phœbe," he reflected, a little ruefully; "and, to come a shade nearer the point, I am not going to dispossess my granduncles, or to intrude into their miserable bachelor's hall out yonder. Neither am I going to put off till I fall upon another Garnet Lodge; I warn you of that. I need to be up and doing; I have so much to do now, to vindicate your choice to yourself."

She put out her hand to contradict him.

"Very well, if you don't mind—to the world."

"I don't mind either this or that."

"You are an enthusiast, or there is something more in woman than I was aware of. I have been suspecting so for some time now, with some shame. But you will have patience, and set me right at last. Only I wonder if I ought to take you at your word?"

He looked at her and smiled.

"The place is not without its romance to us, Barty," she represented. "I think heroism has something to do with romance."

"I'll think anything you like, to please you and help myself."

"No, don't talk nonsense. You came here to please your uncles, and show you were not ashamed of the trade by which they had made the fortune that you were willing to succeed to."

"So I did, and I like to hear you say so."

"You had the manliness and the faith to believe that you could paint as well with the load of business on your shoulders, as if you were merely a gentleman at large."

"I am afraid I did not think of the painting."

"Don't contradict me," insisted Phoebe, "but rack your brains and consider—cannot you imagine that I might care to live with you here so long as you like to remain, as generals go into camp at times and take the field in active service with their soldiers?"

"I should be proud to imagine it."

"I could help you and your mother, sir, and learn to know and to aid that multitude of shopmen and shopwomen, boys and girls on whom you had compassion, to spur them on and prop them up till they can do without us. Is that so much more inconceivable than that I should like to sit and watch you painting, as I watched papa?"

"Not at all inconceivable, as you put it."

"I do like that," exclaimed Phoebe eagerly. "I can be your model when you are not too particular. I can lend a hand—I don't fancy you know how handy I can be; for I dared not show it while you were so severe as you were painting me in the character of 'Peggy, Lady Balnerino.'"

"You are saucy, if I was severe."

"No, indeed, and I don't want to be coaxed now. I can arrange drapery and rub down colours better than the best colour-boy, and without messing myself too frightfully. I may engage to go up to town and see how the pictures look after they are hung on the exhibition walls."

"When I send you."

"I shall promise to read every remark of the reviews, and to have the most exalted opinion of the taste and the judgment of favourable critics and liberal purchasers."

"Ah, that is a fair promise."

"But all that is understood. Should not I, we, aspire to do something more, Barty? To be public-spirited traders, as well as famous painters? Would not that be acting in some degree in the spirit of public service and private devotion, which has made and preserved such grand old homes as Brockcotes?"

"I think, Phoebe, I shall take you at your word," returned Barty Wooler.

The End.

"TRAVELS BEHIND A PLOUGH."

OCCASIONAL SUPPLEMENTS TO GOOD WORDS

MARCH 1, 1869.

TRAVELS BEHIND A PLOUGH.

N impression obtains that farmers' labourers are stolidly indifferent to the beauties of the country. If this were universally true, it would be no great cause for wonder. Some preparatory schools for young gentlemen are kept by very breezy upland, personally associated with rheumatism, gnawing, like a sleepless rat, at both shoulder-blades. A sun-gilt sheet of water may look very picturesque; but a cottager dwelling on its banks shivers with gloomy anticipation as he thinks of the ague-breeding mist that will brood over it when the sun has gone down.

Nevertheless, it was from an English ploughman, and in a county which has no fame for scenery, that I first found out that nature's stock of "what do you think I've got to show you?" is inexhaustibly interesting for those who will only take the trouble to open their eyes to it; and that, unlike other shows, the oftener you see the same things in it, the more interesting they become. His own county was almost all of nature that he had seen. He had travelled only at the plough's tail. Although he had a drolly reverential faith in my "book larnin'," he was almost startled into incredulity when, by the aid of Cocker, or rather of Colenso, I made out the imposing number of miles he had so travelled in his lifetime. He had, it is needless to add, no scientific knowledge of nature (and such knowledge would have been of small interest to me then), but he had a keen, loving eye for the living things about him; and, though he was generally a man of few words, he amused himself, like his equally unscientific and far less practical good-looking young ladies, but unless they are exceptionally good-humoured also, they rarely number their pupils amongst the admirers of their charms. To most English peasants, analogously, nature, however lovely, presents herself as a stern task-mistress, demanding hard labour, and rewarding it with hard living. They see her in all her moods—frowning in work-a-day dishabille, as well as wearing the gay gala-dress and company-smile in which she greets her holiday visitors. It is hard work to get into raptures over a brother naturalist, Goldsmith, by quaintly "moralising" them occasionally.

A puny youngster, sick of physic, I heard with delight, which I took good care to curb within orthodox languid limits, the new regimen which the doctor at last prescribed for me—to wit, an exchange of alternating school-books and medicine-bottles for life at a farm-house, and milk fresh from the cow; and when I reached the farm-house, I may add, I was very careful not to grow well (in word, that is) too rapidly. As the day on which I started was not market-day, the carrier's cart was the only conveyance open to me. Railways had not yet reached our parts: one—fiercely petitioned against—was, nevertheless, slowly approaching us; but it was still some miles off; and when a stray navvy, in nightcap and clay-stained jumper, drunkenly straggled into our old town, and went to sleep in some odd corner, we looked upon him as an audacious advance-guard of the enemy whom it would be almost lawful to put to death without waking him. He ought, at any rate, to be made a prisoner of war; but the local constabulary were shy of tackling the stalwart intruders, even when they snored across the High-street pavement.

The old grey-tilted cart bobbed on, as if playing bo-peep with the cattle on the other side of the hedges—pulling up at almost every roadside public-house, delivering its jangling iron-rods at roadside smithies, its fascies of mops and brown-paper parcels of very miscellaneous goods at little roadside shops, and all kinds of things, in all kinds of coverings, at roadside private residences. At last, it put me down at the inn where my future friend, Sam Siggers, was waiting for me, in a dusty little gig, with his master's name painted in tall, thin, white letters on the back, drawn by a hog-maned Norway pony, looking slyly round his loose, chapped blinkers. Sam was the universal genius of the farm. He could plough, sow, mow, reap, shepherd, thatch, hedge—do all farmer's work, in short, better than any one else upon it; and he had been selected to drive the sickly little "towney" to the farm in the gig-of-all-work. Coming to the comparatively large village where the carrier put me down was an "event" to Sam (there was no "street" in the parish to which we were bound), and he had put on his new green smock, crinkled like a primrose leaf on the shoulders and the breast, in honour of the occasion. He was tall, lean, brown, middle-aged—manly-looking, in spite of his stooped shoulders, and the heavy way in which he lifted his feet, just as if he was pulling them out of clayey puddles. The boots were laced so tight that his legs looked like mere black sticks just below the brown bulge of the buskined calves. He had brown, contemplative eyes, like those of a good-tempered bullock chewing the cud, but with a twinkle of fun in them now and then, which the bullocks have not got. "Beasts" grow very grave as they advance in years, and seem to forget that they ever twisted their tails and scampered about as calves. Their life appears to be overshadowed by the ever-present recollection that "all flesh is beef."

Because he had heard that I was not strong, Sam considered it to be part of his duty to lift me into the gig, and he handled me as if he was afraid that I should break. I thought it very strange that he should be so shy at first, when he was such a great strong man, and I was such a weak little boy. We soon, however, became excellent friends. He found out that, though I did come from the town, and had been at school, I knew next to nothing about things which were more familiar to him than A B C, and when he saw that I was interested in them, his tongue-strings quickly loosened. I remember one of the first lessons which I received in rural matters. "That there, sir," said Sam, pointing with his whip, "is what we calls a stack." He did not say it for a joke, but quite seriously. When a heron had flown high over our heads, with his long legs stretched behind him, I had asked Sam what it was—so how should I know anything about haystacks?

During the time I stayed at the farm Sam Siggers was my guide, philosopher, and friend. I found him out in the fields when he was on his "travels;" and when he was not at work, I used to ramble abroad and potter about his cottage with him. He lived in a thatched, black-boarded cottage by the horse-pond. There was a long, narrow strip of garden-ground at the side, running up to a point—it had been taken in from the road. It was shaped like a horn, and it looked like a horn of plenty, with its jumble of vegetables, apple-trees, and fruit bushes, balm, pot-herbs, and old-fashioned flowers. Sam was too honest a fellow to steal corn, and, therefore, he was allowed to keep a pig and a little poultry. He kept bees too; and so, for a labourer, he was comparatively well off. All his children were out at service, except one daughter, who was laid up at home with a spinal complaint. Mrs. Siggers seemed to look upon this daughter as a great encumbrance, but Sam was always kind to her. He used to sit by her, reading the Bible, when she wished him, and because she was fond of flowers he had nailed up a rose-tree so that the blossoms could look in at her bed-room window. Sam was as fond of flowers as his daughter, and talked about them as if they could understand him. In the beginning of the spring I spent at the farm he was feeding his bees with a plateful of sugar and salt and beer, when some of the bees flew off the plate, and buzzed about a golden-rod that was planted near. Of course it had no blossoms on it then, and so they soon came buzzing back, as if they were very much disgusted. "Ah, but they'll think a deal of she," Sam explained to me, just as if he feared the golden-rod might be hurt in her feelings, "when November comes, and she's out and all the other flowers is gone. She's a friend in need, she is." Sam had a good deal of quiet humour in him, and when he told me that I could easily tell which were the drones, because they made the most noise, he added, slyly, "like other folks in the world that don't do nothing." He did not mind destroying wasps in the interest of his bees, "because they was like fierce French sojers come to rob honest English folk," but he spared the butterflies. "Some says you should kill 'em," he said, "but it seems a pity like, when they'll die so soon without your killing on 'em. They're most as pretty as the flowers about a garden." He taught me to see, too, that the butterfly is misrepresented in being called a fluttering trifler—"a lazy gadabout" was Sam's phrase. They only flew from leaf to leaf, he told me, to find one unoccupied as well as fit on which to lay their eggs. "There's Christians don't care as much about their young un's," commented Sam. "They'll drop 'em anywheres to fend for theirselves, food or no food."

When swarming time came, both Sam and I chanced to be at hand, and I was promoted to the dignity of tinkling on the basin with the key, whilst Sam went off to borrow his daughter's veil and gather an armful of fresh nettles. Although assured that the bees would not harm me if I didn't "rile 'em,"—not even if they settled on me, so long as I stood still,—I felt very nervous as they buzzed angrily round in dizzying and deafening mazes, darkening the air; and very much relieved when they began to congregate about the branch of a currant bush, which they soon bent almost to the ground with an Eshcol cluster of close-packed brown bodies and gauzy wings. When Sam had deftly tilted the new hive under the swarm, and placed them with the nettles still about their fresh home upon a board, he moralised the occasion as he took off the veil. "There, no harm's done, you see. Bees is very easy to deal with, if you let 'em have their own way, and help 'em to it. But ain't it wonderful the sense there is in them little things?—packing theirselves tight a-purpose for me to get 'em in, or p'raps it's because they're afeard their queen should run away." I am not sure now that Sam's explanations of natural history were always as accurate as his observations of it, but I shall report him faithfully to the best of my recollection.

His fowls he believed, according to the old notion, to be thanking God when they held up their heads after drinking; and, at the worst, such "grandmothers' theories of the universe" are only wrong in the particular instances they have selected for proofs. Sam's poultry cost him very little to keep—a handful of corn now and then, a little bran, and a few boiled potatoes. The ducks almost "found themselves" in the pond, and the fowls straggled and scratched about the lane, helping themselves to seeds, sow-thistle, and chickweed. I used to help Sam in hunting for their eggs in the grassy ditches. It was during one of these hunts when I had said that the field-cricketts were making an uncommon row, and had noticed, too, that the flowers of the chickweed were shut up, that he told me these were both signs of rain. "In fine weather," he said, "the chick opens at nine and shuts up at noon, just as if it had got a clock. Ain't it wonderful how all them little things does what they was meant to do?" It don't seem so strange about the big things that anybody can see, but He must be a great God to keep such a lot o' little things in order that nobody can't count."

Spring ploughing was going on when I reached the farm. As I lay in my little room—the bars of the lattice that overlooked the yard gradually becoming distinct in the morning twilight—I could hear the heavy-hoofed cart-horses clumping and clattering by to work; and as soon as I had finished my basin of bread and milk, not at but in, the great kitchen fireplace (it ran into the wall like a little room, with a low settle on each side), I was off to the forty-acres in search of Sam. Two or three teams besides his were crossing the great field like slow shuttles, but Sam's could be distinguished from afar by a young piebald horse of which he was very proud. The other men called it "the carcass colt," but Sam called it "Sloe-blossom." It was quite a journey to plod from hedge to hedge over that heavy field, but backwards and forwards across it I used to trudge with Sam, until I could hardly lift my legs, they ached so, and my shoes were so ballled with clay. Sometimes Sam put me on one of the horses, and sometimes he took me between his hands and let me fancy that I was doing the ploughing, and sometimes I lagged behind, just ahead of the glossy rooks that followed the plough as regularly as we did—fluttering a little way off when we turned at the headlands—to gobble the greasy, white, red-headed grubs and the moist radish-like worms which the share turned up. Sam talked very little whilst he was at work. I asked him once what he was thinking about. "To make my stetches straight," was his answer. "A mill's about the only thing that can clack when it's workin'." But when he sat down under the hedge to munch his noon-day bread and cheese or bacon, he made amends for his long silence; talking with the mouth full being no breach of his code of etiquette. "Them's young cockchafers," he explained in reference to the grubs. "They eats up everything they can get hold of, but then, you see, the rooks eats them, so I s'pose that's what they was made for. It seem queer though, if we was meant to grow corn, that the cockchafers should ha' been taught to lay their eggs in the ground, for the grubs is very mischeevous. P'raps we was meant to grow it for 'em." Another time, as we sat against the clayey hedgebank, Sam called my attention to what looked like a bit of cobwebby mortar; but when he gently prised it open with the point of his knife, and then let it go again, it shut-to like a spring door. He opened it with a stick next, and pushed the stick a little way into the hole inside, and after he had wriggled it about, brought it out covered with silky spider's web. "There, sir," said Sam, as if he was proud of living in a neighbourhood that could boast such cleverness, "that's a spider's house. It's got reg'lar walls as well as a door. I've dug 'em out to have a look at 'em, and there's mortar walls, and this soft stuff is the parlour paper like. Ain't it wonderful them little things should know how to do all that—just as if they was bricklayers and carpenters?"

Sam's garden made a gay show in spring and early summer, with its succession of yellow and purple crocuses, golden daffodils, white lilac and lilac lilac ("laylock" was Sam's word), wall-flowers, stocks, white lilies, tawny tiger-lilies, tulips, peonies, pinks, roses, sweet-williams, marigolds, columbines, apple-blossoms, and puce and pink and sulphur hollyhocks; but Sam's daughter had a craving for wild flowers. "They seemed to make her breathe freer like," she said. Accordingly Sam and I used to gather them for her in armfuls—primroses, and white violets and blue violets, buttercups and daisies, dog-roses and bell-bind, paigles and ox-lips, pale-blue wild chicory and strong-scented tunhoof. The first spray of blackthorn Sam found in blossom he took home to his daughter, and he did the same when the may came out.

We were in a little wood one evening, gathering the thick-stalked wild hyacinths that made great patches of blue in the green grass, and the pale wild anemones that trembled on their hair-stalks between the moss-gloved fingers of the tree-roots, when we heard the cuckoo for the first time that year. "The old women says that you should wish when you hear him first," remarked Sam; "but that seems piggish to me. Ain't it enough to know that the fine weather is comin'? It's queer how them birds keeps to themselves," he went on, "when they gets over here—it's hard to ketch sight o' one. And yet I've seed 'em by the half-dozen and more together when they first come over, down by the Backwater. I s'pose they finds the sea lonesome, and so they sticks together there. Ain't it wonderful how they should know just when this country's ready for 'em, and find their way all them miles from furrin parts? There he goes—him with the yaller legs."

The farm swarmed with wood-pigeons—doves Sam called them; and Sam, being a good shot, was sometimes entrusted with the farmer's gun to make a retaliatory raid upon the saucy thieves. Whenever I could, I accompanied him on these occasions, but I could not often manage it, because I always came back to breakfast from the dewy woods with trouser legs so sodden, and shoes so void of polish, that the good farmer's wife used to ask, in querulous despair, whatever was the good of any one taking care of me, or having my boots blackened? Sam took a sportsman's pride in bringing down the plump, ash-coated, rainbow-necked robbers, but his general love of birds troubled his enjoyment. "Seems hard to kill 'em, don't it?" he used to say, "just because they help 'emselfes when they're peckish. It's nice of a hot Sunday afternoon to hear 'em cooin' when you're settin' in church."

The church to which we went—a very little church with a wooden steeple—had woods all round it. I generally managed to walk to and from service with Sam, because he showed me birds'-nests. He did not think it a sin to show them to me then; but he would not let me take any of the eggs. "We're a-resting," he used to say, "and let them rest too." He was not quite so strict on week-days; but still he never encouraged me in bird-nesting. "They're prettier where they be—so let 'em bide," was his argument. "You could easy pull that to pieces," he said, pointing to a round, mossy thrush's nest, with four jet-dotted blue eggs lying on the smoothly-plastered floor; "but you couldn't make nothing—no, not half a quarter as good. And if you was to blow the eggs, you'd smash 'em in a week. Now, if you let 'em be, there'll be four mavishes next year, singin' in Janivory, maybe. It's cheery to hear 'em when there ain't a bud on the hedges.—Them's young black-birds," he said, as we peeped into another nest. "Them three darkest is the young cocks. I must take one o' they as soon as his tail sprouts, because my poor Hester have took a fancy to have a blackbird. There's no harm in that, if you feed 'em well.—You see that chaffinch up there on the apple tree," he said to me another time. "Well, his beak's blue now; but it was white a while ago. Their beaks turns blue just afore they begins to sing. Birds and men is very much alike in some things. Jack Musset's beak al'ays turns red afore he begins to sing at the 'Leather Bottle,' and the wives don't get much o' the singin'. It's queer, too, that the hen-birds shouldn't be nigh so smart as the cocks—though that ain't much like some on our wives. That's all my joke, you know; but some on us might larn a lesson from the birds. There's the bull-finches. See how they sticks together, and the cock is al'ays a-kissin' and a-talkin' kind like to his mate."

When the swifts came in May, Sam took up his parable in reference to them also. Sometimes he seemed to me not to be talking to me in particular, but, having the excuse of some one to talk to, to be merely thinking aloud. "I've heerd tell that they can fly hundreds o' miles at a stretch, an' yet they couldn't walk a foot. They've got no legs to speak on. Get 'em down on the ground, and they flounder about like a fish out o' water. They was fitted for the air, with them long wings o' theirn, just as the fishes is for the sea. They make me think somehow o' my little gal. She was the first we ever had, and we made a deal on her, as folks al'ays do with their first babbies. But she died when she was two year old; and though we've had nigh upon a dozen since, I miss my little gal at times, and wish I'd got her back. But then I think she's a little angel now—she wouldn't feel no more at home down here than the swifts does. So it's all for the best."

When the time for the singing of night-ingales was come, Sam took me one evening to a little meadow between two woods, where he correctly prophesied that I should hear them by the dozen. The meadow was tufted with withering cowslips, and "cowslips and nightingales," said Sam, "al'ays goes together. Yes, you can hear 'em plain enough now, pretty critturs; but you could hear 'em by day too, if you only listened. That's summum like the Bible, I think. We don't pay much heed to it betimes when we hears it read at church. We're thinkin' about wages, an' the weather, an' the crops, an' that; but when ye gets laid on yer back, like my poor Hester, it sound sweet-like when ye're so lonesome, an' ain't got no other comfort."

Very little work was done at the farm on Whit-Monday. The parish's benefit club, headed by the parish orchestra, converted for the nonce into the parish band (the Sunday performer on the bass-viol selecting the drum as a more portable secular instrument) marched, with blue banners flying, up to and into the parish church, to attend service and pretend to listen to the annual club sermon. After service there was dinner in a tent, in a meadow, and the day was wound up very boisterously at the "Leather Bottle." Sam went to the dinner, but he did not go to the "Leather Bottle." "Clubs is good things," he said, "if so much o' the money didn't go in drink. Some o' the parsons don't like to have the flags brought inside, but I can't see the harm o' that. But it do seem queer to go to church in the mornin', and then to get drunk at the 'Leather Bottle.'" So Sam stayed at home with Hester. They had the cottage to themselves, for Mrs. Siggers was out, like the other women, to see all that was going on, and I was similarly employed.

Next morning we began to cut, and in a day or two mowers and haymakers were busy on every farm in the parish. It was glorious weather for haysel: a golden sun in a bright blue sky, with just breeze enough to keep the air from being sultry. The long grass stirred gently like a summer sea, and half drowned the creamy hawthorn hedges. The air was laden with the aroma of clover, and melilot, and sweet-scented vernal grass. The larks were singing up above, and men, women, and children were laughing down below. Their laughter did not always sound so merry if you heard the jokes.

Sam was one of the mowers. It seemed so easy to swish the sharp blade through the grass that I asked him to let me try; but I only drove the point into the ground. The other men laughed so, that I felt pleased when one of them drove his scythe into the ground—into an old ant-hill. He began to swear at the little vermin, but Sam said, "No, God won't do that, Smith. He made ants as much as He made us." "What did He make 'em for then?" Sam was puzzled at first for an answer. They had done so much mischief in his garden that he had been obliged to dig in ashes round his apple trees, but still, because they had been created, he felt bound to stand up for them. When the men saw that he was puzzled, they began to laugh at him, but presently he said, "Why, to teach us not to stand still. Go to the ant, thou sluggard," and that turned the laugh on the other man. It was only when he was sharpening his scythe, or taking his "beavers," that I could get much talk with Sam in the hay-field. But I trotted after him like a little dog, and when he had a chance he moralised, according to his wont, the events of the day. One day we had got a mole, and Sam blew away the silky hair to let me see its eyes. "As blind as a mole, they says," said Sam, "but there's his eyes, and yet they keeps on sayin' it. I'm puzzled sometimes to give a reason for things. I was riled a-Tuesday because I couldn't answer Smith back about them ants. But I don't doubt there's good in 'em, any more than the mole's got eyes, if we went the right way to look for it."

When the hay had been cut, and tossed, and cocked, and carried—littering the trees that joined hands across the lanes with wisps that the birds would have been glad of a few weeks before—and forked up into stacks under tarpaulins, and combed into neatness of side, and thatched into security of top, an atmosphere of languor brooded for awhile over the farm. The weeders and the rabbits seemed the only busy creatures on it. The woods grew darker, the hedges grew dusty. Bees were ever humming drowsily round the flowering sweet-lime in the farm garden. The luscious-scented blossoms dropped off in the blue-green bean fields. Green corn was fast becoming golden, with heavy ears which, in heavy land, tapped sleepily, as the wind softly moved them, against even a tall man's hat. The brown coveys of young partridges that sprang whirring up in sudden fright, and then as suddenly dropped like stones into the goldening green seas, spangled with blue corn-flower and rough-stalked scarlet poppies, were daily growing less distinguishable from their papas and mammas.

During this waiting time Sam obtained leave to take me for a row on the Backwater. On our road down we passed a field in which there was almost as much ryle—bearded darnel—as barley. The sight disgusted Sam. "Our master," he said, "would take on if we'd got a piece like that. Did you ever hear, sir, that them's the tares we read on in Scriptur'? I was right glad when our parson told us that, for I could never make head nor tail o' that about the good seed 'r' the tares, you know, afore. We give the hosses tares for green food. I can understand it now. It look summat like corn, don't it? But it's a rare thing to make a man stupid, is ryle. I've knowed a man get drunk on a quarter loaf, when the ryle had got into the meal. What's them? Them's barberries. They'll be as red as the poppies come Michaelmas. I showed ye a barberry bush down by the pond in the forty-acres, wi' the yaller blossom, you know. There's some farmers wouldn't have barberries so nigh a barley-field, but Mr. Bultitude don't seem to set great store on his crops. They says barberries can blight corn, like the witches, just by lookin' at it." My next question was about a tree. "Why, sure-ly, sir, you ought to know him by this time. An ash, that is. There's a lot just inside the park gates. I showed 'em to ye when they was in flower. The flowers comes out afore the leaves, like that almond tree master's got in his garden. The leaves seems to wait till they're sure as it's goin' to keep warm afore they'll come out, an' arter all, they drops off afore the other leaves does. I should like to know the meanin' o' that. They should teach ye them things at your school."

The Backwater was a long, broad, straggling waste of salt water, formed by some long-forgotten inburst of the sea through the low coast-line. On all sides but one there was a dreary spread of damp, dyked, coarse-herbaged marshes, protected from inundation by a grassy sea-wall, with a fringe of spiry samphire between its foot and the streaming mud-banks, over which the long-legged, dull green and yellow little crabs sprawled at low water. At the head of the lagoon stood the "Leather Bottle," a low, lonely, beetle-browed public-house, with an uncanny look about it. Its gibbeted sign creaked under the shade of an aspen, ever shivering as if in recollection of unholy sights that it had witnessed. "They says," said Sam, "as the aspen shakes because Christ's cross was made on it; but I don't see why it should shake for that. It warn't the aspen's fault, an' if our blessed Saviour hadn't a-been crucified, what would ha' become o' us? Yes, it is a lonesome place, an' there's been queer doin's here—specially in the old smugglin' times. In my time, Sam Rouse, the Stoke ridin'-officer, was made away with somewheres down here. Anyways, he was last heered of at the 'Leather Bottle.' They're a rough lot, the bargemen as uses it." As Sam spoke, a solitary tan-sailed barge was slowly coming up the Backwater. When we pushed off from the rusty-piled, rusty-ringed little wharf, our boat and the barge were the only craft on it. The rumbling of the oars in the rowlocks, the splash of the water against their blades, the popple against the bows and the mud-banks, and round the swaying reeds, the sigh of the wind, a wail now and then from a marsh bird, a sullen low from a marsh bullock, and the distant yelping of the dog on board the barge, were the only sounds that we could hear. "Yes, it is lonesome," said Sam; "an' they says the sea keeps on eatin' and eatin' away, an' will come in on us some day. There's only about ninety acres left o' Claythorpe out yinder. The wheat grows right by the water, an' there's stones, they says was the church, a quarter o' a mile out at sea. There must be some wise meanin' in that, but it seem queer somehow that the sea should be let to eat up the good land. It's like Pharer's lean beasts eatin' up the fat uns, for there's no fish to speak of to be caught in the Backwater. The wild ducks comes, though, an' the wild geese comes too. What knowin' birds them are! He must be wise as made em', to have such a sight o' knowledge to give away. I've seed them grey critturs walkin' over a field that had been sowed broadcast, just as if they was sojers—peckin' as they went, an' one on 'em walkin' wi' his head up, and lookin' about as if he was a officer. He's on the look-out, ye see, an' if he sees anybody comin' he gives a cackle, and up they flies, and falls in just like sojers—on'y they've the sense to fall in in a wedge like."

We landed, to stretch our legs, at a place where there had once been copperas works. The site had been blighted by them into black barrenness. Little heaps of dingy bricks, and pools still scummed with dull irises, made it look very dreary. "They used to make it," explained Sam, "out o' the stones they picked up on the sands out yinder, so, you see, the sea's some good. Most things is, if you can on'y get to the bottom on 'em. But it must ha' been nasty kind o' work. When you're ploughin' an' harrerin', you can think as you're workin' along wi' God like, instid o' makin' man's messes. Not as He wants any help. I get stupid like when I think o' the sight o' things He's made, an' the uses there is for 'em. Now, while I'm speakin', there's a puff-ball. I shouldn't like to eat one that growed anywheres hereabouts—the copper might ha' got into 'em; but mostly they does you no harm. And yet, if you burns 'em, the smoke makes the bees drunk—dead-drunk like. Ain't that queer?"

As we pulled back, Sam showed me the Peewits' Island. "They al'ays comes on St. George's Day, an' they sits on their eggs, without ever goin' to sleep, till the little uns is hatched. Anyhow, that's what folks says, an' there's stranger things than that. They must care a sight for their little uns. Look how they cuts about, hangin' down their wings as if they was broke, when they thinks you wants to grab the little uns."

During our walk home from the Leather Bottle Wharf, we saw a glow-worm gleaming on a hedgebank. "Yes, that's a glow-worm," said Sam. "You've heered about them, have ye? They calls it a worm, but it's a sort o' brown beetle like—not much to look at when you sees it by daylight. I've caught 'em with wings and without wings, an' kep' 'em in a pill-box. It's the one that ain't got wings that shines the most. That's the she, I reckon. T'other chap can gad about, and so God's made her look cheerful like, to make him want to come home to her. The house looks twice as cheery when you can see the fire shinin' through the winders, when you comes home as wet as muck."

In spite of my efforts to the contrary, I had manifestly grown well so rapidly that I was doomed to re-exchange free farm life for cramped form life before harvest. Sam drove me to meet the carrier on a bleak November day that had been intercalated into the golden August. "The wind's in the east," he said, as he bade me good-bye, "an' the caterpillars will be swarmin' in my garden. It's queer that bad things like them should come together, but then, you see, you get's them both over together. You won't forget the stuff my Hester ast ye to ax yer mar about?"

CHARLES CAMDEN.

AMATEUR MUSIC IN ENGLAND.

THE musical amateur may be a depressing subject for contemplation, but he is the best possible index to the musical tastes of a people. Given the musical amateurs of a country, and the music they like, and it is easy to say where the nation is in the scale of musical progress. We place Italy and France below Germany when we see that the ordinary Italian is satisfied with melody and a little noise, the ordinary Frenchman with less melody and more noise, while the German insists upon melody, harmony, and thematic treatment combined.

Who are the English amateurs? What do they like? How do they play and sing? In the following paper these questions will receive some definite answers, and these answers may furnish us with a clue to the state of music in England.

The first obvious description of musical amateurs is, PEOPLE WHO PLAY THE PIANOFORTE.

In twenty years Mr. Broadwood has sold 45,863 pianos; Mr. Collard, 32,000. About 20,000 are annually issued from the manufacturing of Great Britain, whilst about 10,000 foreign pianos are annually imported. Now, putting down about 5,000 for old pianos still in use, and deducting about 5,000 for export, we shall still have altogether 30,000 employed annually. Suppose that only three people ever play on the same piano,—a modest assumption when we remember that one piano in a house is often used by all the girls in a large family,—then we shall have to face a statement which is probably far short of the mark, namely, that 90,000 persons in these islands answer to the description of PEOPLE WHO PLAY THE PIANOFORTE.

All these are not amateurs, but most of them are, and the exceptions exist chiefly for their benefit.

Most young ladies play the piano as an accomplishment. A girl's education is as much based on the pianoforte as a boy's is on the Latin grammar, and too often with similar results. A girl without musical tastes objects to Mozart, as a boy without a classical turn hates Cæsar. Meanwhile it is pleaded that the education of the sexes must be carried on; that some routine must be adopted that what need not be pursued as an end is nevertheless good as a means; that the Latin grammar strengthens a boy's memory, and teaches him to study the meaning of words; that the piano makes a girl sit upright and pay attention to details; and against the schoolroom view of music as training for mind and body we have nothing to say. But the other prevalent view of music as a necessary accomplishment, is more open to objection.

In Germany no girl is ashamed to say she cannot play or sing ; but in England such an ill-bred admission would be instantly checked by mamma. The consequence is that young ladies whose honest ambition would naturally begin and end with Cramer's exercises in the schoolroom, are encouraged to trundle through Beethoven's sonatas in the drawing-room, and perhaps pass their lives under the impression that they are able to play the "Lieder ohne Worte."

By all means let every girl begin by learning the piano. Such a chance of gaining a sympathetic companion for life should never be thrown away. Even to the unmusical girl it is valuable as a training, but to the musical girl its value is beyond price. If a woman's life is often a life of feeling rather than of action, and if society, whilst it limits her sphere of action, frequently calls upon her to repress her feelings, we should not deny her the high, the recreative, the healthy outlet for emotion which music supplies. Joy flows naturally into ringing harmonies, while music has the subtle power to soften melancholy by presenting it with its fine emotional counterpart. A good play on the piano has not unfrequently taken the place of a good cry upstairs, and a cloud of ill-temper has often been dispersed by a timely practice. One of Schubert's friends used to say, that although often very cross before sitting down to his piano, a long scramble-duet through a symphony, or through one of his own delicious and erratic pianoforte scores, always restored him to good humour.

But if a person is not musical, pianoforte instruction after a certain point is only waste of time. It may be said, "Suppose there is latent talent." To this we reply that, as a general rule, musical talent develops early or not at all. It sometimes, though very seldom, happens that a musical organization exists with a naturally imperfect ear. In this case it may be worth while to cultivate the ear. But when the ear is bad, and there is no natural taste for music, we may conclude that the soil is sterile, and will not repay cultivation.

If a boy has no taste for classics, when he goes to the university his tutor tells him to study something else. Why should not a girl try drawing or painting or literary composition? Why should the money be spent on music when she has perhaps shown some other gift? Many a girl with real literary and artistic taste has achieved excellence in nothing because her energies have been concentrated upon the piano, which she will never be able to play, or upon songs which are just as well left unsung. But such performances are otherwise inconvenient. Why am I expected to ask a young lady to play, although I know she cannot play, is nervous, dislikes playing before people, and so forth? How many are there who would fain be spared the humiliation of exposing their weak points! The piano is a source of trouble to them and to their friends. If they cry over their music lesson, their friends groan over the result, and it is difficult to say which is the worst off, the professor who has to teach, the pupil who has to learn, or the people who have to listen. But the cause of music suffers most of all. We have no hesitation in saying that the rubbish heaps that accumulate every year under the title of pianoforte music, and which do more than anything to vulgarise musical taste in England, owe their existence to the unmusical people who are expected to play the piano. If such are to play at all, then indeed it is better that they should play anything rather than Beethoven and Mendelssohn ; but why should they play at all?

The piano is a noble instrument, less scientifically perfect than the violin and less extensive than the organ ; it has more resource than the first, and infinitely more delicacy than the second. With the aid of a piano we can realise for ourselves and for others the most complicated orchestral scores, as well as the simplest vocal melody : intricate harmonies lie beneath our ten fingers, and can be struck out as rapidly as the mind conceives them. Not a single great work in oratorio, in opera, in quartett, in concerto, or in song, but can be readily arranged for two, or four, hands, and be rendered, if not always with the real instrumental or vocal impressiveness, at least with unerring polyphonal accuracy. And lastly, there has been written expressly for the piano a mass of music which, for sublimity, pathos, variety, and gradation, is equal to anything in the whole realm of musical conception, whilst, in extent, it probably surpasses the music extant for all other instruments put together.

And now, what are some of the uses to which we apply this noble instrument, this long-suffering piano? When the gentlemen in the dining-room hear that familiar sound up-stairs, they know it is time to have tea in the drawing-room. Let us enter the drawing-room after dinner. The daughter of our hostess is rattling away at the keys, and quite ready for a chat at the same time ; if conversation comes her way, she can leave the bass out, or invent one, as it is only the "Sonate Pathétique." She has long passed the conscientious stage, when an indifferent or careless performance caused her the least anxiety. She plays her fantasia now as lightly as she rings the bell, not for its own sake, but because it is time for the gentlemen to come up, or for the ladies to begin a little small talk, or for somebody to make love. When she gets up, another sits down, and continues to provide that indispensable stimulant to conversation, called "a little music."

It must be admitted, that to be a good player is no distinction in English society. It has its reward, no doubt, in the quiet happiness of long hours—hours of loving application; hours of absorption; hours lived in a world of subtle and delicate emotion, such as musical dreamers alone realise; and, above all, real musicians have the luxury of meeting occasionally those who can listen to and understand them. They give, but they also receive. Good players and good listeners are equally happy in each other's society. How seldom they meet in England! how few, even fine amateur pianists, have anything like a musical circle! It is very seldom that a neighbourhood can muster the materials for a Mozart or a Beethoven trio, not to say quartett; and seldom that an amateur has the opportunity of playing a concerto of Mendelssohn's with string accompaniments, or any other accompaniment than that of noisy children or general conversation. But no. Late years have witnessed some remarkable combinations, which, however indifferent, are often respectfully listened to.

The harmonium and concertina force themselves upon our attention. There are certain perfect forms and perfect players of both these instruments; but we deal not now with the master workmen, the Regondis, the Blagroves, the Tamplins, and the Engels. The same instrument which in the hands of these men is a thing of beauty and delight, is capable of tempting the musical amateur into wild and tuneless excesses! We will put it to any impartial person, was there ever found in the house of an amateur, a concertina or harmonium in tune with the piano? Was there ever an amateur who could be deterred from playing these instruments together, however discordant the result? When there is a chance of having a duet, people seem to lose all sense of tune. If the concertina is only about a half-semitone flat, the lady thinks she can manage. A little nerve is required to face the first few bars, but before "Il Balen" is over, not a scruple remains, and the increasing consternation of the audience is only equalled by the growing complacency of the performers.

The same indifference to tune may be observed in the amateur flute and cornet. Each player has his method of treating the piano, which, as he tells you, is only the accompaniment, and must follow him. If the piano is more than a semitone flat or sharp, the flute inquires whether it cannot be tuned to his instrument. The piano replies that the tuner has just been, and asks whether the flute cannot alter his pitch. This ends in the flute trying to unscrew himself a little. Then he sounds a C with the piano—thinks it is a little better, unscrews a little more, and asks the piano whether that will do. The piano does not know. Cannot flute get a bit flatter? Not a bit. The heat of the room will make it all right, and then they begin!

The cornet is not much better, with this exception, that the cornet is generally ready to play alone, anywhere. For there is this peculiarity about him—he is never tired of playing, as some people are of hearing, the same tunes over and over again, and, after playing them next door for six months every day, if you ask him to your house, he will play them after dinner in your conservatory, with the same touching expression, and crack exactly in the same place. There is a composure about the flute and the cornet, an unruffled temperament, a philosophical calm, and an absolute satisfaction in their respective efforts, which other musicians may envy, but cannot hope to rival. Other musicians feel annoyed at not accomplishing what they attempt; the cornet and the flute tell you at once they attempt what cannot be done.

The organist is disturbed if his organ begins to cipher, the violinist if his string breaks, the pianist if the pedal squeaks; but if the flute is out of tune, or plays octaves by mistake, our friend is easily satisfied after unscrewing and screwing up again; and the cornet, however prone to crack, feels quite happy after putting in a new crook, and fidgeting a little with the pistons.

The amateur violin is seldom heard in mixed society. If good, as he usually is, he is fastidious about accompanists, still more sensitive about conversation, and won't play. If bad, nobody cares to ask him. However, most of us have come across a fine violin amateur, and enjoyed his playing as much as, perhaps more than, that of many professional artists. It is difficult to speak of the bad violin player without being thought censorious; but we all know the shriek of a slate pencil on a slate, and how bad and wanton little boys use it to torment governesses. Better that than the scratch of a greasy bow on a bad fiddle ; and better, too, the boy than the man, for the boy knows he is bad and can be stopped, but the absorbed violinist knows not, neither can he be told, neither can he be stopped !

It is difficult to explain the ascendancy which the violin gains over the minds of its votaries for good or for evil. It can boast of two distinct types of admirers—between which, as between two poles, all the others may be said to vibrate. There is the man with one bad fiddle who plays much and miserably, and there is the man who cannot play a note, but has collected with enthusiasm a room full of splendid violins, most of which remain unstrung. But we must not dwell on this tempting subject. We proceed to notice the lowest form of the solo instrumentalist.

It is the amateur who plays by ear. Ladies will often gratify you by playing a little of Chopin "by ear"—that means, as much as they can recollect of the tune with any kind of bass. It would be well for all young musicians to remember that it is never safe to attempt Chopin, Mendelssohn, and above all Schumann, by heart, without a most careful previous study of the notes, and the regular process of committing a piece to memory : even when once learned, the notes should be occasionally used to refresh the memory and ensure accuracy.

The difficulty of expressing or reproducing in notes a given musical idea is greater than at first sight appears. A piece of music is heard, it rings in your ears, you try to learn it, or you sit down and try to play it. If you have little musical culture, merely a natural taste and a good ear, you will soon satisfy yourself, and you will say, "That is exactly the tune I heard." Probably it is only an imperfect suggestion of what you have heard. There is sure to exist a gap between it and the original piece. When the subject happens to be good music, even small deviations are fatal to the composer's thought, and a slight change will suffice to vulgarise a theme, just as in poetry a word transposed may destroy the power of a fine line. Who does not see that a note transposed, or left out, or altered, is as fatal to a phrase as the following rearrangement lately made in our hearing, of one of Mrs. Browning's lines, is to the beauty of that line. The verse stands—

"O supreme love ! chief misery,
The sharp regalia are for thee."

As improved in quotation—

"O love supreme ! chief misery,
The sharp regalia are for thee."

Of course, there can be no harm in a general way of singing and playing by ear to amuse one's self ; but how troublesome it is on some occasions to hear people sing and play for your entertainment their so-called reproductions of the opera or classical music, most musicians know very well. But it is not easy to convince them of this ; and the poor critic has generally to retire sad and wounded ; in short, he is voted a rude, ill-natured, or eccentric kind of person, and is hummed and strummed out of court.

Let us now turn to the second great class of musical amateurs : THE PEOPLE WHO SING.

It is thought almost as rude to interrupt a lady when she is speaking as to talk aloud when she sings. Accordingly the advantages of being able to sing in society are obvious. The lady can at any moment fasten the attention of the room on herself. If a girl has a voice, the piano is too soon suppressed in favour of it, and the only chance of her becoming a musician is thrown away. It is true she usually accompanies herself ; that is, she dabbles about on the keys, and strikes a chord at the end of her song, always cutting out the closing bars as not of the "voice voicy," but the room listens, and the room applauds. The maiden is happy ; and mamma thinks she requires no more singing lessons.

Every one likes to understand and talk a little about music, and a very slender knowledge will enable an unmusical person to take a very creditable part in most musical parties. The following hints may prove useful. Perhaps a chorus is got up. If you are asked to sing bass, first make sure that all the parts are doubled. Then stand behind the piano with the others. You need not sing if you don't like, but you won't do much harm if you sing. If you sing loud, the other bass will think he is wrong ; if you sing low, he will think that you are reading the music ; if you don't sing at all, he will only think you have lost your place ; and as the chances are he has never found his own, he will take no notice. The piece is almost sure to be "The Bearded Barley," and you can say at the end, "All Mendelssohn's part songs are so good." Perhaps some one will say, "The Bearded Barley is not Mendelssohn's." Then you can answer, "Of course not !" Very likely, however, the piece may be Mendelssohn's. Then it is sure to be "O Hills and Vales of Pleasure," and at the end you can say, "Do you know another part song called, 'The Bearded Barley ?'" Then some one is sure to say, "Yes, but I like Mendelssohn best ;" and then you can answer appreciatively, "Oh, yes, of course !"

When a soprano duet is sung, the name of it is sure to be, "I would that my Love," by Mendelssohn. When a contralto sings alone, the song is usually, "In questa tomba," by Beethoven. When a soprano sings, it is more difficult to speak with certainty. However, you can always, if you are at a loss, ask, "Which do you like best, the ballads of Virginia Gabriel or Claribel?" Then, if the singer says, "Virginia Gabriel," it is quite open to you to say, "Claribel," or vice versa. If a tenor sings, you will not be far wrong in supposing the song to be "Spirito Gentil." If, however, it is neither that nor "Martha," nor "Oh, che la morte," you may justly compliment him upon his original and extensive repertory. You must speak of Beethoven as "sublime, but occasionally obscure;" of Spohr, as "too sickly and chromatic;" of Mendelssohn, as "fascinating;" of Schumann, as "a man of some genius;" and you may say of Gounod, that "he is very charming, but that you doubt whether he will last;" and it will always be safe, except in the presence of really good musicians, to sniff at Wagner and the music of the future.

And, now, if we seem to have conveyed a somewhat harsh estimate of drawing-room music and drawing-room criticism under the form of mock counsel to the reader, let us ask whether the blots of amateur music may not be pointed out as effectually in this way as in any other? Is it not true that a person following the above advice will be able to conceal his ignorance of music in almost any "at home" in England? And why? Simply because so few English people know the difference between the good and the bad in music, or rightly estimate its value. So many regard it as the most frivolous of pastimes, as a tea-bell, as a cloak for scandal, to drown or to promote conversation, to attract to self, or to outbid a rival. There is nothing wrong in being without ear and in caring nothing for music; it is a misfortune, but it is no fault. If a man has no taste for conchology, he is not ashamed to say so. In Germany people never pretend to play; in Italy they never pretend to sing; and if they know nothing about it, they can afford to be silent. Why should not some of us do likewise?

We have dwelt on a somewhat gloomy side of drawing-room music, because few people seem to realise its serious defects; and until this is done improvement is impossible. But light dawns as we think of the noble amateur singers and fine professional performers, which it is more and more our privilege to hear in private society. Power makes its own terms, and professional singers and players, beginning to assume a position and dignity which they ought never to have lost, refuse any longer to promote conversation, or to be turned on like machines. Let amateurs who can, follow their example. If it were considered hors de règle for people to sing and play in company unless they had both talent and cultivation, and equally objectionable in others to interrupt those who had, or fancied they had, the necessary qualifications, bad playing and bad taste in music would soon go out of fashion.

We pass on to a more encouraging phase of amateur music. We find ourselves in a quiet, cheerful room, at the back of a good house; it is morning; there are only four people present; they are all intent upon playing; they can all play, and there is no one present to molest with praise or blame. Two violins, viola, and violoncello, and the quartett is complete. The first violin is a gifted amateur, the second violin is a thoughtful gentleman, perhaps an art critic, not a brilliant player, but steady, and never tired. Viola is a rather testy, but thoroughly goodnatured professional, who never can quite get over the fact of somebody else playing first fiddle, and occasionally has to be called to order for putting in little bits which belong to some one of the other instruments. Violoncello is a good amateur, or perhaps a semi-professional, who plays a little of every instrument under the sun. However, these men can really make music. Let us begin with a light Haydn quartett—No. 63.

It begins with seven-bars rest for the first violin, and seems to glide off the bows—facile, easy, rippling along like a summer rivulet. Every one knows it, every one likes it: the smart allegro moderato, the cantabile adagio, just long enough, the rousing minuet and trio, and the smart vivace staccato, which invariably runs all the fiddlers off their legs, and ends with "Bravo, first fiddle!" and a good laugh at violoncello and tenor, who have too often been dancing through the movement with the light and airy gait of elephants. But now all four have whetted their swords—rosined their bows, we mean—and feel eager for more serious work. Beethoven is put up on the desks. Let us choose the first of the set in F. What an opening movement! Good, broad music, nothing laboured or obscure, but inspiration everywhere flowing from a full fount. It is phrased like a symphony, and yet all is fairly within the compass of the four instruments. The slow movement—than which nothing more tender and lofty was ever invented—tries the first violin; and our professional tenor, who is much dissatisfied with his reading of the closing bars, kindly fiddles them over in the right way, to the disgust of first fiddle. But in the trio that presumptuous fiddle is fairly beaten. He is a good player, but a scramble is all he can make of it. He masters, however, the not difficult bravura passage at the end of the closing movement, and comes in for a compliment from his friend and mentor the cantankerous tenor. Then there is a general motion in favour of Mozart. It must be one of those six perfect works dedicated to "Papa Haydn." After this, as a complete contrast, we select a solo quartett of Spohr, not very hard, although so showy; and then, every one having got into full swing, we may be able to rattle through Mendelssohn's canzonet before the lunch-bell rings.

Four hours of it in the morning might seem enough; but that is nothing to the quartett player. After lunch those four men will begin again, and work away till dusk. Then they will go out for a turn in the park or by the sea before dinner, and will very likely set to again after dinner, and play from nine till twelve o'clock. In musical country-houses it is not uncommon to have a quartett party staying in the house; and then woe to the unmusical! The best quartett work is no doubt done in the morning; but the quartett is irrepensible, it may break out at all times, and anywhere—suddenly on the lawn, in summer; in the dining-room, after dinner; in very hot weather, in some sonorous house-keeper's room; even in the pantry, all over the drawing-room, in the library, on the balcony, or up-stairs in any of the bed-rooms.

But we must not linger. Converse with these exceptionally fine amateurs spoils us for the kind of performance which it is now our painful duty to describe, and which we may call THE SCRATCH QUARTETT. Our friend Harmonics, who is rather a good player, has invited three worse than himself. They come with their wives, and a musical friend is perhaps asked in to listen. The ladies are not to talk, and the friend is not to talk; they are to listen. Harmonics leads off with a Haydn. Our heavy friend, with greasy bow and inferior violin, stumbles after him, tenor scrapes placidly—flat, of course, but not unhappy, for he has a bad ear. The neighbouring organist, rather glad of a little violoncello practice, grins at the noise, but goes on. It seems a print of honour with these men not to stop. They are all wrong, and they know it. But first fiddle pretends he has never got out, second fiddle declares he was beating time (which he certainly was, with his foot loud enough to be heard all over the room), and therefore couldn't be wrong (which does not follow). Tenor smiles, and has no opinion. 'Cello thought they would get right somehow if they pulled on through the breakers into the smooth water, commonly known as "the place where the subject begins again." After each double bar there is a regular discussion, in which each performer defends himself, and brings counter-charges, and then the Adagio begins. Second violin now has a chance, the theme has come his way at last. He plays the pp.'s fortissimo—he rasps the accompaniment, so that Harmonics cannot hear himself; but, of course, if No. 2 will hack and hew, he must play out. The violoncello will not be outdone—even the tenor is roused at last—and all seem to rush headlong upon the music with screams of discordant sound, until, apparently maddened by their own scraping, they finish in a sort of wild scrunch, which they call "coming in all right in the end." The ladies exclaim, "How beautiful!" Musical friend says it's delightful, and, remembering another engagement, is off in a hurry, and then these infatuated men begin again. At last outraged nature herself protests. Even Harmonics is exhausted. No. 2 thinks they have done enough. Tenor is simply sleepy and pensive. Violoncello can hardly lift what he calls "his strad." It is late—a glass of wine and a sandwich—a couple of cabs. The reader heaves a sigh of relief. They are gone, and may they ne'er come back again!

Out of Quartett Societies, good, bad, and indifferent, comes the ORCHESTRAL MUSICAL SOCIETY, or, as it is sometimes called, the SYMPHONY SOCIETY. The theory of these societies seems to be, that a good many who cannot play by themselves can play very well all together. The amateurs of the band usually supply a few violins, violoncellos, a flute, perhaps two, let us hope but one cornet, and any number of volunteers for the drums. The rest are professionals, who supply a leader on the violin, brass, clarionet, oboe, as required, and an excellent professional gentleman, who conducts with a bâton. How ever the public performances are got through is a wonder, for the rehearsals cannot be said to be got through at all.

Impelled by the noblest aspirations, nothing will daunt our devoted band: not Beethoven's C minor, not Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, not Weber's overtures. Haydn's symphonies, which they might play, are soon voted slow; Handel's music is out of date; even Mozart is too easy a triumph. A few Italian overtures they could perhaps manage, but then they are classical players, and cannot stoop to that sort of thing.

"Seven o'clock punctually, if you please, gentlemen, for the next rehearsal!" says Mr. Amadeus Le Bâton, at the end of the practice; and at seven punctually Amadeus enters a perfectly empty room. There are about twenty or thirty music desks waiting. The conductor's desk stands facing him. Presently in comes a man with a violin case. Then another, dragging a double bass. In about a quarter of an hour the leader and one first fiddle have arrived, but as first fiddle is above playing second, nothing can be done. Le Bâton pulls out his watch, and upbraids those who have not arrived to those who have. Perhaps by a quarter to eight they are ready to begin; but to begin what? Tuning, of course. Some people admire the tuning of the Handel Orchestra, others have been known to appreciate the tuning at Exeter Hall more than the performance. But for a dreadful orgie in sound—the very memory of which is calculated to make you start in your dreams for months afterwards, under the impression that all the cats and dogs which have ever been drowned in the Thames have come to life again, and are howling round your pillow—for a row compared with which the noise of a menagerie about feeding time is positively agreeable—commend me to the tuning of an amateur orchestra. But we have more to hear than that. In the midst of it all, some violin will play the Carnaval de Venise, the flute will practise his bits, the violoncello tries to do fiddle passages up high on his finger-board, the cornet has the effrontery to add to the confusion by playing a waltz, some one behind him is imitating the howl of a dog or the squeak of a rat on the reed of his clarionet. Kettledrums is pretending to tune, by alternately thumping the parchment and screwing at the side with a key. Triangle, when pulled up, solemnly declares he is practising his part in Q flat!

At last they do seem to be off. Every one playing as if his were the only instrument in the world, for piano is the last word the amateur learns. Still the conductor does not complain, until Drums (who has two hundred bars rest and then two little notes very soft) comes down half a bar too soon with an absolutely deafening roll. The flute is thrown completely out; the cornet seems much excited by that noble "rataplan," and keeps on his note a bar too long. The violin bows are literally at sixes and sevens, like the pendulums in a watchmaker's window. Amadeus may stamp, Amadeus may shout, Amadeus may beat his poor little bâton to bits against the desk, no one heeds him, or ever thinks of looking at him—the band took some time to get ready, but now they are off for better for worse, and who can stop them? Even if half the band stops, the other half will go on. Poor Amadeus Le Bâton! what can he do? It is obvious that he can do nothing, and after shouting himself hoarse, and gesticulating wildly, he gives it up, claps both hands to his ears, and gazes despondingly at the "score" before him.

THE VOCAL ASSOCIATION OR SINGING CLASS, in its various forms, is a more popular and generally a more successful affair. All over the country such societies are now being established, very often on Mr. Hullah's sound and lucid system, which enables a very moderate professor to teach the general principles of part-singing to large numbers with comparative ease. As a part of parochial machinery the singing class is most valuable. Since young people will have amusement, what more delightful pursuit could be found for them than music? And since they persist in taking a peculiar delight in each other's society, where could they better meet than at the music class in the schoolroom, or town-hall, when their minds are to some extent occupied, discipline is maintained, and a healthy and exhilarating recreation is provided for them?

The parochial aspect of singing societies has hardly been sufficiently recognised. Literary institutes, popular lectures, elocution, French, arithmetic, or drawing classes, will all grow naturally out of the musical fount. But of this we cannot speak here more particularly.

We have discussed instrumental and vocal societies separately, but perhaps amateurs succeed best when the two are combined. A piano, harmonium, or both, will very well eke out a small but by no means inefficient string band. The organist will conduct, choruses will be got up at separate rehearsals, the Prima Donna of the neighbourhood will consent to learn the principal solos, and an oratorio will be forthcoming about Christmas time. That oratorio is invariably "Judas Maccabeus," and indeed it is but another proof of the simple and sublime genius of Handel that he should be welcomed at Exeter Hall, and not out of place in a village schoolroom.

But we have already chatted too long about AMATEUR MUSIC IN ENGLAND. As we look back upon the pages truth forbids us to tone down some painful and unpalatable admissions, but whilst it cannot be said that we have omitted to point out blots in the existing state of things, we may be accused of gliding too lightly over much that is really hopeful and striking in English musical taste.

We seem, as a people, to be musically many-sided, unbalanced, and above all unschooled by the inexorable laws and conditions of true art. We deal in heights and depths—we abound in inconsistencies which admit of no reconciliation. We pay our shilling and rush to hear the "Messiah" at the Agricultural Palace, then we go home and sing Glover. We sit for two hours in St. James's Hall to hear Beethoven's or Spohr's quartetts, and the next day we buy "God bless the Princess Too."

All this is simple fact. But it is fair to add that whilst for want of high national models, English musical taste falls below that of France or Italy, it rises higher than either in its honest enthusiasm for the great German masters.

It may be that we are on the eve of a creative period in the history of English music. This confusion of ideas may be nothing but the coming together of what will by-and-by develop into our national school. This eclectic taste, which at times looks much like chaos, may also be the ferment out of which a new and beautiful life is ready to be born.

As an original artist will be caught and absorbed by one influence after another, being possessed by his art long before he learns to possess himself,—as he will at times appear to be swayed to and fro by various distinct impulses, without being able to bring them into harmonious relationship,—as we may watch him year by year melting down one style after another in the crucible of his genius, until he has gained fine gold, and stamped it with his own image, even so we seem to see England now calling in the musical currencies of the world, which she may before long re-issue with the hall-mark of her originality and genius.

H. R. HAWES.

"LITTLE MAY."

SEE, she stands, my little May,
Where the sun and shadow meet,
Shakes her little hands for wings,
Taps out music with her feet.

Mine she is ! this wingèd joy—
And the thrushes sing, and sing,
Loving to keep company
With so glad, so pure a thing.

Mine ! this creature of the dawn,
With the sweet cool breath of flowers :
That she comes, I wonder much,
To a world so cold as ours.

Do I say the world is cold ?
No ! she loves me, little May ;
From my heart its cloud of care
With her smiles she draws away :

Strokes my face with dimpled hands ;
With her warm hair, soft and fair,
Crowds my face ; the world looks bright
Through the sunshine of her hair.

Still, she walks in Eden shades,
In her guileless baby white,
With a heart of peace, with eyes
Full of wonder and delight.

Innocent of fruit forbid,
In her thoughts no bitter leaven ;
Child, and angel too, she moves
Through a mingled earth and heaven.

I can see her in the light—
As without the gate I stand,
In the shadow, in the cold—
See the angel sword in hand.

I must strive with weed and thorn,
I must suffer, watch, and wait,
I must lay this body down,
Ere I can repass the gate.

Gracious spirits that love man
Whisper through her rosy sleep,
And she smiles ; if they should come
Whisp'ring me, I could but weep.

Dumb things love my little May ;
 Could they shrink from eyes like these ?
 Full of faith that knows no fear,
 Eyes that hold no mysteries.

On the gravel Mop will rush,
 Gambol, keep her tiny pace,

Heedful to her baby talk,
 Slowly turn the wisest face ;

Watch her hand for crumbled cake,
 Wait her will, and begging stand,
 Have long patience till she please,
 Take it softly from her hand ;

Willing on her baby knee
 Lay his head without a fear ;
 Shut his lazy eyes and sleep
 While she curls his shaggy ear.

At her round pink finger-tips
 Tenderly the dove will peck,

Nestle white as innocence,
 With his head against her neck ;

Coo his gentle soul to her,
 Knowing that her heart is meek ;
 And the kitten makes his paw
 Velvet soft, and pats her cheek.

JANE MORESBY.

TRAVERS MADGE.

I Biography.

THE name of Travers Madge was probably known to comparatively few before the publication of Mr. Herford's Memoir.* He started in life without the prestige of academical distinctions. He never rose to celebrity as a preacher. He wrote no books. His literary labours were limited to the editorship of a Sunday-school Penny Magazine. He was not conspicuous for wide culture or keen powers of thought. And yet, if I mistake not, most readers of his life will have felt their hearts burn within them, as they followed him in his work and his self-devotion, with a glow which the memoirs of men much more eminent in the "religious world" often fail to kindle. The nearest approach in contemporary literature to the life of the young Unitarian ascetic is perhaps to be found in that of the Curé, d'Ars, which the Contemporary Review, the Christian Remembrancer, and other journals, have brought before English readers. Add to what Travers Madge had, as by the grace of God and the stirrings of his own soul, the superstition and sacerdotalism of the Church of Rome, and he might have become such a one as M. Vianney was. Place him, by an effort of imagination, in the atmosphere of the thirteenth century, in a system which favours organization, and brings all individual energies under hierarchical order, and checks all doubts and inquiries, and he might have developed into a Francis of Assisi, and played a conspicuous part in ecclesiastical history. As it is, his life was spent in comparative obscurity. We have only—but what an only!—the story of a soul seeking after God, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and led through that righteousness to the Truth, who is its Centre and its Source. It is every way interesting, as bearing witness at once to the high ethical and spiritual excellence which may be produced within the bosom of Unitarianism, and may therefore be regarded in some sense as its natural fruit, and, on the other hand, to the inadequacy of the Unitarian system to satisfy the cravings which it has itself created.

The father of Travers Madge is still living and working as minister of the Unitarian chapel in Essex Street; and that fact forbids one's saying more than that his son never ceased, in the midst of all their divergence of convictions, to hold him in the truest reverence, that he never ceased to treat his son with the kindest indulgence. The relations of the two seem indeed to have been every way, from first to last, in the true sense of the word, exemplary. From earliest childhood there seem to have been in Travers traits of character such as Roman Catholic writers love to note as proof of saintship, such as Calvinistic writers record as evidence of election. At the age of six or seven he shows the calmest patience under sharp pain or long weary illness. At eight he rises before all his schoolfellows that he may get his own work done and have time to help the little ones. Further on in youth, when he enters University College, London, in 1840, at the age of seventeen, he sets his face like a flint against the whole system of competition, examinations, prizes, as "simply ministering to selfishness." The "bright beauty" of childhood ripens into a face of "spiritual joy and sweetness," which wins the hearts of all men. He throws himself, with a zeal prophetic of his future work in life, into the labours of a Sunday school, seeking out the lads who came there in their wretched homes, reproaching himself with being better off than they were, seeking to share their poverty. He spends five years at the Manchester New College, in an atmosphere which would seem likely to ripen simply the critical, intellectual side of religious thought. John James Tayler, James Martineau, Francis William Newman, were his chief teachers there. Channing was his great hero, the pattern which he strove to imitate in his own life. One who compares the life which Travers Madge led under these circumstances with the average of what he has known among the best men even of religious "sets" at Oxford or Cambridge, with what his own academic life has been, is constrained to do homage to him as to a nature of a higher order. He lives upon potatoes and bread, taking meat only as an act of filial obedience; becomes a teetotaler, and afterwards a vegetarian; gives up even butter and tea; with a strange, almost fantastic desire to taste the poverty to which he was not born, he earns sixpence a day by "carrying book-shelves," and talks of "holding somebody's horse" that he may pick up a few coppers; spends all his leisure time in his beloved Sunday schools, and in the week-day labours that grew out of them. With a touching simplicity, as one who seeks to be a follower—an imitator—of Christ, he writes:—

“Would not it be a beautiful thing to think about, to picture to oneself Christ teaching in a Sunday school, with his arm folded round one boy, his hand resting on the head of another, his face smiling, his lips uttering such words as would make the boys love him as much as he loved them?”

All this naturally led his father and his friends to think that he would take to ministerial work as a profession. To their astonishment and regret, he resolutely refused, and resolved to earn his livelihood as a shopman. He shrank from the possibility of being a hireling, and therefore would not work for hire at all, just as he had refused before to work for prizes and other college honours. Among detached off-shoot sects of Methodism lapsing into Unitarianism, among a body of Christian brethren who identified themselves with no sect, he finds congregations who accept his services, and to them he preaches, and with them he prays. His words fall on the hearts of men as the good seed of the word of life. This he can do for its own sake. He shudders at the thought of being paid for it.

“Should you like to be paid,” he wrote to a friend, “for teaching in the Sunday schools? Should you like to be paid for visiting in your district? If not, do you not think it is rational for me to object to being paid for visiting—to object to being paid for praying?”

In another letter he sets forth more fully what he aims at.

“It grieves me to see the amount of idle time—of time wasted in mere amusement, of money too, of health too, all in amusements and luxuries, while brothers are by our side, weeping and wailing and gnashing their teeth. I sometimes feel ready to sit down and cry. I sometimes cannot help it when my heart wanders from home to home, to different scenes of wretchedness, brutality, and sin. And yet here we Christians are, sitting at our ease and doing nothing. How can the world be made happier but by our all working, working, working, harder than we have ever dreamt of? My idea is for a few, who feel this strongly, to unite simply and naturally, and be constantly together, cheering and encouraging and helping one another on. . . . Let us devote ourselves entirely to God—not to amusement, idleness, or pleasure-seeking; not to large houses, fine food, or fine clothes, in all of which things perhaps we most of us err, but to being and doing good.”

For a time his trade-plans fell through, and he opened a day-school for boys at Norwich, working with his usual earnestness among the poor, taking preaching tours in the Staffordshire potteries and in Cornwall.* It ended in his going back to Manchester in 1848, once more to resume his labours with a recognised office as home visitor in his beloved schools in Lower Mosley Street, infusing a new life in them, making the roughest lads feel towards him as to a brother, getting their parents together for an evening service, speaking and praying from his heart.

His religious creed up to this time appears to have been simple, undogmatic, tending in feeling to mysticism, in life to asceticism. He had not as yet renounced the negative elements of the creed in which he had been taught. The communities with which he fraternised were chiefly those that may be described as “unattached,” floating off from larger and more organized sects. In the language of his biographer, he was never a “sectarian Unitarian”—was able to sympathise warmly with the devotion of those who worshipped as God Him whom the Unitarians reverence only as the divinest among men. He trusted in the love of God and His readiness to forgive sin, without connecting that forgiveness with the sacrificial aspect of the death of Christ. But about the years 1849—50 there came a change. There fell on him, as on so many strivers after righteousness, a “horror of great darkness.” The kind of life which he was leading, through that very effort of self-consecration working on a temperament naturally intensely sensitive, may have had its share in the change. Insufficient food, insufficient rest, the constant strain of that most exhausting of all forms of educational labour, the instruction of grown boys in the rudiments of religious knowledge,—all this may have fostered the tendency to the intense depression of which the lives of saints record so many instances. “All his previous life seemed to collapse miserably and utterly. He would wander off from home and friends, aimlessly, simply craving to get right away from comforts, and associations, and ways of life, which seemed to him a mockery of the lost, forsaken misery with which his work had made him so familiar.” The work itself, thus viewed, became stale and unprofitable. He could bear it no longer. In earlier days something of this feeling led him to give up the ministry and to take to school work, then to give up the school at Norwich for a preaching tour in Cornwall, finally to abandon even the schools in Manchester that he loved so well, and to settle down to the mere mechanic drudgery of tions, and was becoming an infidel, he says, though still apparently earnest and devout.” Has the Bishop of Natal a “double” at Penzance?

a printer's office, working in shirt-sleeves and apron, black with printers' ink, carrying his dinner in a pocket-handkerchief. Wherever he was there was the same restlessness in every form of good, the same absence of peace and rest from doing it. To him, whose life was so irreproachable, there came an "intensity of self-reproach," as if "the tears of all eternity could not wash out the stains of sin." What was in him came out in the almost fierce question with which he turned upon the friend who wrote his life, "Don't you feel that you deserve to be tormented and punished for ever?"

And to him, as to ten thousand times ten thousand, a multitude that no man can number, of like sufferers, the message of glad tidings came in thoughts, which to him were new, of the meaning of the death as well as of the life of Christ.

"At last," he writes, in or about 1850 (the letter is given without a date), "at last, in the deepest shame and uttermost despair, I was led to look to Jesus. When I thought I could hardly come to God on account of my sins, it was told me that 'God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that all that believe in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' When I felt that I did not love God as I ought, I was told not to think of my own feelings; that the more I tried to love Him, the more impossible I might find it, for the very effort often rendered it impossible; but still, to look to Jesus, to read in Him the expression of God's will, to feel in Him the outpourings of God's love; and thus, by looking to Jesus—to Jesus living, praying, and dying on the cross, to save me and every wretched, perishing soul—to love God because He first loved us."

He notes in the same letter at once the excellences, and what he had found to be the defects of the teaching of his sect.

"Unitarian preaching and devotion will help one through many sorrows and trials, will comfort one in many afflictions, will strengthen and purify and bless the heart; but it will not, in general, enable one to pass through the seasons of fierce struggle with the devil, and of reckless, hopeless, despair. The tendency of the Unitarian religion is to be entirely subjective . . . Instead of God hearing and answering prayer, prayer is said to work a change in our hearts and to conform our will to that of God. Instead of going to heaven or hell, the consequences of virtue are described in the joy and peace of the heart obedient to God, and of vice in the pangs and remorse of an evil conscience. Instead of throwing ourselves at the feet of Jesus, and being sprinkled with His blood, and being clothed with His righteousness, we are told that we must, by sympathy with the mind of Christ, and in conformity with what He requires of his disciples, work out our own salvation with fear and trembling."

He confesses, with an almost startling candour, that in his earlier days, when he was most thoroughly an Unitarian, he had doubted whether his friends were right in calling themselves Christians. If Christ were only a man, only a teacher, only an example, was it not "a departure from the Christian spirit" for men to call themselves by his name?

The result of this change was to bring Travers Madge into sympathy with a wider circle of Christians, with many who were to be found in the sects whose faith on these points was in harmony with that which has been the characteristic faith of Christendom. Churchmen, Methodists, Independents, were ready to welcome one who felt and spoke as they did. But with this adoption of "evangelical" doctrine there was the old craving after righteousness, the old asceticism, shewing itself at once in self-denial and in deeds of love. The "easy, worldly, respectable religion of some Christians seemed to him like the cold and clammy hand of death." The new faith did not bring with it at first any conviction of the necessity of joining another visible society than that with which he had hitherto been connected. His name remained on the roll of the Presbyterian—i.e., Unitarian—congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire at the very time when he looked on Unitarianism as weighed in the balance and found wanting. The Primitive Methodists seemed to him to "keep more directly in view the objects which a Christian church ought to have, than any other denomination." He himself preached wherever he found men willing to listen to him—in Independent chapels, or the like. In the strength of his new faith, he went back to Manchester in 1851, and resumed his old work in his beloved schools in Mosley Street; still, as before, loved and loving, received by the rough lads as an angel from God, with clasped hands, and eyes that glistened with delight. But as he gave utterance to that faith which had come to him as a message of glad tidings, the conviction was forced upon him that those to whom he spoke were not ripe for it, had not felt the need of it. "I am inclined," he writes, "to think that the preliminary preaching, 'Repent ye,' is what we now want; and when we are casting about in despair for something to lay hold of, then will be time enough to speak of the redemption which may be found in Jesus Christ." That which most shocks him in the state of feeling round him is the absence of any sense of needing that redemption. He reads a sermon by Mr. M. (Mr. Martineau?), who says that "we have passed beyond the thought and want of salvation, that redemption is as much a thing of the past as the old outward law," and feels that such words are at once "the most distinct disavowal of the essence of Christianity, and yet the most honest confession of the general state of the Unitarian mind," that he ever met with.

A sudden and entire break-down in health compelled him to leave Manchester and retire to Norwich, and the remainder of his life was that of an invalid, prematurely old; for many years that of what has been scoffingly called a Christian "unattached," joining any congregation of men like-minded with himself, working, wherever he was, with the old love for souls, the old regardlessness of self, the old power to win the hearts of the poor, gathering men round that which was to him and them the "Table of the Lord,"—a "Communion Service," which one who was often present described as seeming "more like the original one than I ever felt it anywhere else. We all sat around a long table, and the bread and wine were passed round, and each spoke who wished, and the Master himself was present there to our hearts, and the poor room felt like the holy of holies."

After some years spent in this comparative retirement, he re-appeared at Manchester, in 1859, as the minister of a congregation of stragglers from various folds, tradespeople and working men, some from the Plymouth Brethren, some from the Baptists, some from the Independents, many from the Methodists. Such materials did not promise much in the way of unity, and divergencies of thought and feeling soon began to show themselves. Travers had to throw himself, as into a spiritual asylum from the strife of tongues, into his old work with the rough street lads, and to teach them to pray, and repent, and love Christ, and sing hymns, till the evenings which he spent with them seemed to him as though he had passed them "amongst the angels in heaven." The work lasted, however, only for a few months. Health and strength again gave way: he was once more thrown back upon himself.

And with this there came that which is seldom found in a mere proselyte to a creed, a mere apostate from a party, but which is perhaps the characteristic crown and glory of the progress of a seeker after truth. There is a blending together of old things and new; third thoughts, which harmonize the first and the second thoughts that had seemed in blank contradiction with each other. His confession of an evangelical faith is not less distinct than before.

"If I have not spoken much in my letters lately of that wonderful revelation to the burdened hearts of sinful men, 'that the blood of Jesus Christ, God's own Son, cleanseth from all sin,' it is not because my faith in this is shaken, or because I feel the need of it less than I did. Never, never did I feel the preciousness of this truth as I feel it now. Without it I should be in outer darkness, in misery without any comfort, in uttermost despair."

But with this there is a wider view, a more hopeful recognition of the good to be found in those who had not yet received the truth as he received it, a stronger faith in the possibilities of the future. At one time the whole state of Christendom had seemed to him full of "wounds and bruises and putrefying sores;" now he had learnt the lesson, Meliora latent.

"God has, I believe, been instructing me in some things of late which I did not see before, and which I have perhaps, therefore, more frequently referred to, such as the true conversion of all who repent of sin and seek to live to God, though they may frequently stumble, and know nothing of the experience which so-called evangelical Christians and Methodists seem to regard as necessary; also the hope, rising to an assurance, that the work of redeeming mercy is not confined to this world, and that the sentence of eternal death may at any time be remitted; also that all doctrinal exclusiveness in the church, and all attempts to judge of others' internal fitness for church membership, are alike evil and unscriptural; and, last of all, that Christian influence is not confined to conversation on religious subjects, but that the Christian's character shines forth in the midst of the various pursuits, intercourse, and amusements in which he may be engaged. And here it is that, I think, we have been judging harshly, both doing harm and receiving harm. Perhaps I ought not to say we. I have, I know I have, misrepresented Christianity, and especially those truths which have brought me so much peace and comfort, by the course which I have taken."

And again, in the same strain, he writes:—

"I dare not say anything about the counsels of God, more than He has revealed. When men say that the death of Christ satisfies His justice, or that the wrath of God against sin fell upon Christ, I think they are using rather venturesome language. Yet I cannot but feel that, by divine appointment, and by His own self-sacrificing love, and His oneness with poor, suffering, sinful man, Jesus plunged himself into the abyss of human woe, even into that deepest human misery which we might have imagined it impossible for the sinless One to have experienced. In accepting this sacrifice God reveals His forgiving mercy to the whole human family. In that forgiving mercy all who seek His face find peace and joy. Forgiveness, in the sense of the removal of future punishment, does not seem to me to enter into the minds of the Apostles, or to be that of which Christ speaks. We rejoice in forgiving love, inasmuch as we know that, notwithstanding our sins and wanderings from God, His ear is open to our cry, and His arms are always stretched forth to welcome us home."

We cannot wonder that, in this state of feeling, he should note with especial joy his presence at a lecture given by Professor Maurice at the Working-Men's College, and a conversation with him, and contrast the teaching which he found there with Mr. Spurgeon's more popular theology.

The remainder of the story of his life may be told rapidly. Old affections drew him, in 1861, once more to the Crown-Street congregation at Manchester, but more as an outsider, as a member not of that particular church, with its tests and limitations, but of the great family of the redeemed. A home mission for the ragged children and their parents occupied and exhausted the little strength that remained; the Lancashire distress roused him, in 1862, to fresh labours and exertions. When they were over, consumption had made such progress that the two years which followed were simply a time of patient, cheerful suffering and hopeful expectation of the end. In 1865, chiefly, it would seem, through contact with the Bishop of Norwich at Scripture readings at Lady Buxton's, at Cromer, he was drawn towards the Church of England—with which he had indeed been for some time in a secret, half-conscious sympathy—was baptized into membership with her, and became, till his death, a regular communicant. In March, 1866, the end came. The love of Christ still filled his soul. He read the story of his own life in the words of a hymn:—

"O Saviour, I have nought to plead
In earth beneath, or heaven above,
But just my own exceeding need,
And Thy exceeding love.

"The need will soon be past and gone,
Exceeding great, but quickly o'er;
The love, unbought, is all Thine own,
And lasts for evermore."

The Unitarian father and the Church of England son found to the last, in their trust in that love, a bond of union, and read and prayed together. And then the end came, as it has come to thousands of the saints of God,—the sweet smile in the midst of sharp suffering, the eyes wide open as if he gazed on the celestial city, the whispered fragments of old hymns, now more precious and full of meaning than they had ever been before. The last words that ever passed from his lips were—

"With God eternally shut in."

The life which had been so long "hid with Christ in God" found its natural, say rather, its supernatural outcome, in that consciousness of the beatific vision.

There is so much, from first to last, of fairness and openness in the way in which Mr. Herford has done his work—such a total absence of any attempt to suppress or disguise what tells against his own creed—that I am reluctant to note any omission. But I must own that the Memoir in one point creates a craving which it does not satisfy. The last stage in Travers Madge's progress through his "phases of faith," is summed up in half-a-dozen lines. Those who must naturally look on that stage as at once the highest and the happiest, may be pardoned if they express the wish that they had been told, not only of the bare fact, but how it was brought to pass—by what influences, of individual teachers, or books, or trains of thought; what his feelings were as to the Creeds, Articles, Prayer-Book, of the Church of England, and the contending parties within her pale. Those who hold that there is a special, though not necessarily a decisive, value in the judgments formed on such points by one whose life was pre-eminently saintly; who believe that there is a substantial and unfailing truth in our Lord's words, that "whosoever willeth to do His will, shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God," may legitimately desire, with far other motives than mere curiosity, to know what he thought and felt on matters of vital interest. Far as they may be from accepting the ipse dixit even of a saint, the sic cogitavit of Travers Madge would have had a claim, surpassed by that of very few others, upon their most earnest attention.

The thoughts which rise from the life which I have thus traced, even as it is, are obvious enough. It bears its witness, valeat quantum, at once against the merely ethical teaching of modern Unitarianism, against the tendency, more or less developed in different Unitarian teachers, to ignore man's consciousness of sin and the need of an emancipation from it, and against the vehement, coarse assertion of the merely forensic and substitutive theories of the Atonement, which enter so largely into popular evangelical theology. It shows how that theology, while it presents to the soul that is oppressed with the disease of sin a remedy which is indeed a true remedy, and rescues it from death, fails to give it that which can sustain its life and lead it on to a strong and vigorous health, and too often narcotises its spiritual energy and stops its spiritual growth.

And it suggests, also, a question which cannot be lightly passed over. Those who read it must, I imagine, feel that there was hardly any stage of Travers Madge's life of which they would not have said, Sit anima mea cum illo. The heretic, the schismatic, the unauthorised "celebrant" of what ecclesiastically was a mock communion, wins our admiration and our love throughout. We cannot admit for a moment, however much we may rejoice that he was led on from truth to truth, the thought that had he been called away at an earlier stage, he would have been on the "left hand" among the accursed and condemned. And if so, in this as a typical representative instance, may it not be so in twice ten thousand instances? May there not be in others, as in him, an unconscious faith in the midst of a verbal negation of the truth? Is not Meliora latent a motto for us also in our judgments or our hopes for others? And if so, again, is it well to surround the witness which the Church bears to the truth with anathemas which at least seem to reverse that judgment and to shut out that hope? The "damnatory clauses" of the pseudo-Athanasian Creed have, it is true, been explained over and over again, as sentencing only the unbelief which knows itself to be unbelieving, the heresy which believes itself to be heretical, the denial which involves not merely intellectual error but moral evil,—and in that sense thousands of the clergy accept them, and tens of thousands of the laity are content at least to acquiesce in them; but in the ears of yet more, among both clergy and laity, they seem to say, and that with no faltering voice, that those who fall asleep, being as Travers Madge was till the last few years of his life, shall "without doubt perish everlastingly." Is it not time to get rid of defences which do not defend, warnings which do not warn, words that have to be explained in a non-natural sense, aids to faith which surround the truth that attracts by its own beauty and completeness with that which simply repels, and rouses, as by way of protest against the denunciation, a not unnatural antagonism?

E. H. PLUMPTRE.

MOHAMMED AND HIS RELIGION.

As lying outside the boundaries of the Roman empire, and beyond the reach of its persecuting orthodoxy, Arabia in the latter part of the sixth century had become the refuge of sectaries of every shade, both from the Jewish and Christian communions. In the first century before Christ, when the irresistible grasp of Rome was gradually closing over Palestine, a considerable Jewish emigration had sought refuge and freedom in the trackless immensities of Arabian deserts; and the later miseries of the age of Titus and Hadrian brought large accessions to their numbers. The Marcionites, the Manicheans, the Nestorians successively found their way from the more densely peopled countries of the East into the great Arabian plain, where the impracticable nature of a great part of the country and the sparseness of the population induced a looseness of political organization highly favourable to religious liberty. Other systems of still earlier introduction had their representatives. From remote prehistoric time the Sabians had carried from Chaldea, across or round the Persian Gulf, their curious septenary* tenets, and their astronomical knowledge; and nearly by the same route the Magian followers of Zoroaster had brought from Persia their famous doctrine of the two principles, Ormuzd and Ahriman, eternally contesting the supremacy over nature and the human mind. Among these religions those of the Jews and the Christians came recommended with especial force to the Arabian mind. The Scriptures had already been translated into Arabic, and the natives recognised with pleasure the descent from Abraham common to them and the Jews, and were ready to commend, if not to adopt, the sublime doctrine of the divine unity. Christian communities were numerous and flourishing in Arabia Felix; so much so that in the days of Mohammed's grandfather the Abyssinian Christians were nearly becoming masters of Mecca. But the subtlety which the moribund philosophy of Greece had bequeathed to the church had already caused many divisions and subdivisions in the Eastern Church; all kinds of abstruse questions about the angels and the devils, about the mode of the Incarnation, and the nature of the divine personality, were argued with the greatest heat, and with little difference of intellectual acuteness, among the various sects to which Gnosticism had given birth. One is reminded of the occupations of some among the fallen angels:—

"In discourse more sweet,
Others apart sat on a hill retired,
In thoughts more elevate, and reasoned high
Of providence, fore-knowledge, will, and fate,
Fixed fate, free-will, fore-knowledge absolute,
And found no end in wandering mazes lost."

The doctrine of the one, almighty, all-wise God was hid from sight in the dust of these interminable logomachies, and, Christianity being presented to him under this uninviting form, the Arab felt no desire to embrace it; he continued to worship his idols as his ancestor Laban had done before him. Around the Kaaba*—the central point, before no less than after Mohammed, of the Arab's religious hope and religious fear—three hundred and sixty-five idols were ranged; not that he did not believe in the tenet, taken abstractedly, of one Supreme Intelligence, but he shared the common superstition of barbarous nations, which prompts them to propitiate the many malevolent powers, though of a lower order, whom they believe to be nearer to them and their affairs, more sedulously than the one gracious Being high aloft in the heavens, whose general benevolence they regard as incompatible with attention to the interests of individuals.

* Seven gods, or angels, directing the course of the seven planets; seven days of the week, &c.—Gibbon.

Among a people thus circumstanced arose the prophet-king Mohammed.† He belonged to the noble family of the Hashemites in the tribe of Koreish, a family which had for some generations held the guardianship of the Kaaba, and the government of the city of Mecca. The Arab historians invest his birth and infancy with an impalpable haze of miracles, most of which are common-place enough; one, however, contains a beautiful fancy; it is that which makes the angels who took the holy infant out of the nurse's arms, draw his heart out from his bosom, and squeeze out of it the black drop of original sin, which is naturally engendered in the offspring of Adam. His father and mother died when he was yet an infant, and Mohammed was brought up by the eldest of his numerous uncles, Abu Taleb. Two of the others bear names famous in history—Al Abbas, the ancestor of the long line of the Abbasside Caliphs, and Hamza, who died fighting for the faith on the field of Ohud.

Mohammed was certainly by birth an aristocrat, but it was of no slight importance that he belonged to that branch of the Arab aristocracy which dwelt in towns and gained wealth by commerce, and not to that which exercised chieftainship over the rural tribes, and whose substance consisted in their flocks and herds, and droves of high-mettled horses and patient camels. The former class had far more opportunities and means of culture; the intercourse of the market, books, and travel, might strengthen and expand their minds; the hold of tradition and custom would be less enthralling over them than over their brethren of the plains. Thus

Mohammed himself, in his fourteenth year, accompanied Abu Taleb into Syria on a mercantile journey; and though the particular stories about his intercourse with a Nestorian monk and others, on this occasion, are said to be undeserving of belief, there is no reason to doubt the fact implied in them, that he had unusual facilities for getting a knowledge of the opinions and tendencies of many sorts of men. Among the different elements that go to make up the Koran, three are conspicuous; the first is that root of idealism, that nucleus of pure spirituality, which lies at the basis of the religion, and enables us to justify the Divine Goodness in allowing it to have flourished so widely, and still to flourish;—the second is the fanaticism, in its various forms of superstition, charlatanism, intolerance, &c., which all too closely wraps round the primitive and purer element;—the third is that practicality, that knowledge of the busy life of man, which dictated some of the deepest and wisest things to be found in the volume.* Sayings of this kind have been quoted by modern writers in order to point out in contrast the absence of such practical maxims from the New Testament. But if one may dwell for a moment without irreverence on the human aspect of the life of Christ, the silence complained of admits of a very natural explanation. The Christ was born and lived among the poor; the wisdom of the economist or the prosperous citizen came not from his lips, because it had no natural place in his human sympathies. From the lowest stratum of human society upwards to the topmost, the lessons of a higher morality and a glorious self-denial were to permeate; but these were to be applicable to all alike; the special ethics and economics of different states of society were left for human reason to elaborate for itself.

Mohammed remained up to his twenty-fifth year with Abu Taleb, and then entered into the service of Kadijah,† the widow of a rich merchant of Mecca. For three years he served her faithfully and prudently; her affairs prospered; and the grateful mistress rewarded her factor with her love and her worldly goods. The disparity of years may excite a smile, for Kadijah was forty-five, while Mohammed was only twenty-eight.

* The Kaaba, so called from its square form, was the temple of Mecca, the building of which was ascribed by Arab tradition to Abraham and Ishmael.

† The name Mohammed signifies "renowned" or "most glorious;" it is formed from the past participle of the verb hamad, "to praise." There are discordant statements as to the date of the prophet's birth; Sprenger, his latest biographer, prefers the year 571.

* Take as one instance among many this from chapter xvii., entitled "The Night Journey:"—"And let not thy hand be tied up to thy neck! neither open it with an unbounded expansion, lest thou become worthy of reprobation, and be reduced to poverty."

† I do not think it worth while to alter the received mode of spelling names at once so familiar and so comparatively unimportant as those of Kadijah, Ali, Zeinab, Mo'anna, &c., for the doubtless more correct orthography of Sprenger—Chadyja, 'Alyy, Zaynab, Madyna, &c.

But the reality of the affection which united them is proved by the honest and generous warmth with which, years after her death, Mohammed sheltered her memory from disparagement. I quote the passage from Gibbon. "Was she not old?" said Ayesha, the favourite wife of his old age, with the insolence of a blooming beauty; "has not God given you a better in her place?" "No, by Allah," said Mohammed, with an effusion of honest gratitude, "there never can be a better. She believed in me when men despised me; she relieved my wants when I was poor and persecuted by the world."

Twelve years of this union, which was blessed with eight children, of whom only one, Fatima, the wife of Ali, lived to perpetuate the race of the prophet, passed quietly on. For several years in succession it became the practice of Mohammed to spend the month of Ramadan in a cave on the mountain called Hira, a few miles from Mecca. A soul which from its earliest years had had a bias to religious meditation must at these periods have met with wonderful experiences; the book of nature was unrolled before his eyes; the awful truths which he had learnt from the Hebrew Scriptures would feed and satisfy the mystic and serious cast of his mind; here he might feel "the shortness of time and the length of eternity," here become conscious of the depths of living will and energy within, inviting him to teach what he had received, tempting him to supply the shortcomings of inspiration. To regard all this as the premeditated cheatery of a wily impostor is a view of things which, common as it was even in the last century, has ceased now to be considered tenable by any person whose judgment is worth having. Without cavilling at particular expressions, nor yet accepting the view in its entirety, let me lay before the reader a well-known passage from Carlyle's "Lectures on Hero Worship," in which this later conviction finds a voice:—

"Mahomet was in his fortieth year when, having withdrawn to a cavern in Mount Hara, near Mecca, during this Ramadhan, to pass the month in prayer, and meditation on those great questions, he one day told his wife Kadijah, who with his household was with him or near him this year, that by the unspeakable special favour of Heaven he had now found it all out; was in doubt and darkness no longer, but saw it all. That all these idols and formulas were nothing—miserable bits of wood; that there was one God in and over all; and we must leave all idols and look to Him. That God is great; and that there is nothing else great! He is the Reality. Wooden idols are not real; He is real. He made us at first; sustains us yet; we and all things are but the shadow of Him; a transitory garment veiling the eternal splendour. 'Allah akbar, God is great;' and then also 'Islam,' that we must submit to God. That our whole strength lies in resigned submission to Him, whatsoever He do to us. For this world and for the other!

* * * * *

"Such light had come, as it could, to illuminate the darkness of this wild Arab soul. A confused dazzling splendour as of life and heaven, in the great darkness which threatened to be death; he called it revelation and the angel Gabriel;—who of us yet can know what to call it? It is the 'inspiration of the Almighty' that giveth us understanding. To know, to get into the truth of anything, is ever a mystic act,—of which the best logics can but babble on the surface. 'Is not Belief the true god-announcing miracle?' says Novalis. That Mahomet's whole soul, set in flame with this grand truth vouchsafed to him, should feel as if it were important, and the only important thing, was very natural. That Providence had unspeakably honoured him by revealing it, saving him from death and darkness; that he therefore was bound to make known the same to all creatures: this is what was meant by 'Mahomet is the Prophet of God;' this too is not without its true meaning."

In contrast to this, take the account of Simon Ockley, a writer of the early part of the eighteenth century:—

"It is probable that he employed himself for some years in the care of his family, and the prosecution of his trade; conforming all the while to the idolatrous superstition of his countrymen. By the Christian writers he is said to have been profligate in his morals; but nothing of the kind, as was to be expected, is mentioned by any Mohammedan author. However this may be, in the thirty-eighth year of his life he began to affect solitude, retiring frequently into a cave of Mount Hara, near Mecca, to spend his time in fasting, prayer, and meditation. Here he is supposed to have composed so much of the Koran as he first published. Mohammed, who, it is agreed on all hands, could neither read nor write, has evidently borrowed many things from the Old and New Testament, and from the Jewish Talmud. His assistants in the work are said to have been Abdia the son of Salem, who was a Persian Jew, and a Nestorian monk named Bahira by the eastern and Sergius by the western writers. From a statement we shall presently give from Abulfeda it seems probable that Waraka was also in the secret, if he did not lend a helping hand. In his Koran, chap. xvi., the impostor complains that his enemies charged him with being assisted by that Persian Jew, but endeavours to clear himself in these words: 'They say, certainly some man teaches him; he whom they mean speaks a barbarous language; but the Koran is in the Arabic tongue, full of instruction and eloquence.' As for the monk, he is said to have murdered him when he had no farther occasion for him. No doubt he took what care he could to conceal his being assisted."

Compare again with both of these the masterly sketch of Gibbon, whose clear Italian intellect never touched a subject that it did not illustrate. One may prefer Carlyle, and think his account goes more to the root of the matter; yet who can deny that it requires to be corrected by the accents of pure intelligence breathed in the following passage?*

"The son of Abdallah was educated in the bosom of the noblest race, in the use of the purest dialect of Arabia; and the fluency of his speech was corrected and enhanced by the practice of discreet and seasonable silence. With these powers of eloquence Mahomet was an illiterate barbarian; his youth had never been instructed in the arts of reading and writing; the common ignorance exempted him from shame or reproach, but he was reduced to a narrow circle of existence, and deprived of those faithful mirrors which reflect to our mind the minds of sages and heroes. Yet the book of nature and of man was open to his view; and some fancy has been indulged in the political and philosophical observations which are ascribed to the Arabian traveller. He compares the nations and the religions of the earth; discovers the weakness of the Persian and Roman monarchies; beholds, with pity and indignation, the degeneracy of the times; and resolves to unite under one God and King the invincible spirit and primitive virtues of the Arab. Our more accurate inquiry will suggest, that instead of visiting the courts, the camps, the temples of the East, the two journeys of Mahomet into Syria were confined to the fairs of Bostra and Damascus; that he was only thirteen years of age when he accompanied the caravan of his uncle, and that his duty compelled him to return as soon as he had disposed of the merchandise of Cadjah. In these hasty and superficial excursions the eye of genius might discern some objects invisible to his grosser companions; some seeds of knowledge might be cast upon a fruitful soil; but his ignorance of the Syriac language must have checked his curiosity; and I cannot perceive in the life or writings of Mahomet that his prospect was far extended beyond the limits of the Arabian world. From every region of that solitary world the pilgrims of Mecca were annually assembled by the calls of devotion and commerce; in the free concourse of multitudes, a simple citizen in his native tongue might study the political state and character of the tribes, the theory and practice of the Jews and Christians. Some useful strangers might be tempted, or forced, to implore the rights of hospitality; and the enemies of Mahomet have named the Jew, the Persian, and the Syrian monk, whom they accuse of lending their secret aid to the composition of the Koran. Conversation enriches the understanding, but solitude is the school of genius; and the uniformity of a work denotes the hand of a single artist. From his earliest youth Mahomet was addicted to religious contemplation; each year, during the month of Ramadan, he withdrew from the world, and from the arms of Cadjah; in the cave of Hara, three miles from Mecca, he consulted the spirit of fraud or enthusiasm, whose abode is not in the heavens, but in the mind of the prophet. The faith which, under the name of Islam, he preached to his family and nation is compounded of an eternal truth and a necessary fiction, THAT THERE IS ONLY ONE GOD, AND THAT MAHOMET IS THE APOSTLE OF GOD."

Kadjah is honoured by the Arabian writers as the first among the children of Adam to embrace Islam. Her example was soon followed by Ali, Mohammed's cousin, the son of Abu Taleb, by Zeid, his favourite slave, and by Abu Beker, his friend, one of the leading men in Mecca. For a long time the belief in the new religion was propagated very slowly. After three years, according to Abulfeda, Mohammed received an order from above to preach to those of his tribe. He summoned his kinsfolk, and they came together to the number of about forty. He offered them, as the ambassador of God, the good both of this world and of the next, if they would follow him and help him. "Who then will be my vizier" (i.e., take part of the burden with me), "my brother, my deputy?" The young Ali could not contain himself; he fiercely declared himself ready to exterminate out of hand the adversaries of the prophet. Mohammed embraced his neck, and commanded all present to pay him obedience. The older men hardly knew whether to take this strange scene in jest or in earnest; but gradually, from one cause or another, the commencing avalanche gathered to itself congenial materials. The story of Omar is remarkable; he was the St. Paul of Islam. He was the son of Al Ketabi, and one of the principal men in Mecca, and up to the time of his conversion was violently set against the new doctrine. "His anger rose to such a height, that having girded on a sword, he went in search of him with an intent to kill him. By the way he called in at his own sister's, where the twentieth chapter of the Koran was reading. Omar demanded to see the book, and, upon his sister's refusal, gave her a violent slap on the face, who then gave it to him, upon his promising to restore it her again. No sooner had he read a little of it, when he cried out, 'Oh, how fine is this! How I reverence it! I have a great desire to be a believer.' He immediately inquired where Mohammed was to be found, and being told, went to the apostle, who, taking hold of his clothes and pulling him forcibly to him, said, 'O son of Al Ketabi, what do you stop at? Why would you stay till the roof of the house falls upon your head?' Upon Omar's replying, 'I come hither that I may believe in God and his apostle,' the apostle gave praise to God; and thus was completed the conversion of Omar."*

The mission or call of Mohammed is assigned to the year 611; nine years after Abu Taleb died, making on his death-bed that profession of Islam which till then, through fear of the Koreishites, he had deferred. Soon after Kadjah died also. While she lived

Mohammed had abstained from exercising the privilege of a plurality of wives which his revelations had indulged him in; he had been the faithful husband of a worthy wife. The tomb of Kadijah is still remaining, and is still an object of religious pilgrimage. Hadjis regularly visit it on Friday mornings. All Mussulmans hold her in the highest veneration, esteeming her, with Mohammed himself, to rank amongst the only four perfect women that have ever lived, the other three being Asia, the wife of Pharaoh, Mary, the sister of Moses, and Fatima, the best beloved of the prophet's daughters. After the meeting described above, the Koreishites began to persecute the rising sect, but their proceedings had the usual fate of coercion which stops short of extirpation. Mohammed boldly appeared in all public places at Mecca, exhorting the pilgrims to the Kaaba to abandon their idols, believe in the one true God, and accept Mohammed as his prophet. Though the doctrine was simple, the last clause required immense faith; yet herein lay, on one condition, the secret of its success. That condition was that at bottom the preacher should be a true genuine man; a man who had really communed with the Supreme, and undoubtingly believed, not that fact only, but also that Heaven had selected him as its instrument in raising and reforming his fellow-men. This being granted, this condition fulfilled, faith was easy and natural to those enthusiastic children of the sun. Here was a man who said that God visited him through the intervention of angels, and told him this or that; this man's life was plainly, according to Arab standards, virtuous and noble; it was consistently ruled by some powerful spirit within; he refused no responsibility; shrank from no depth or height of trust reposed in him; was ready to lead if they would follow; to teach authoritatively if they would listen: was it very wonderful if they took him at his word, hailed the voice of God as speaking by his mouth, and rapturously bade him lead them whither he would? He has read carelessly the annals of mankind who does not know that when the passion of loyalty comes to be transfigured in the light of religious faith, no enterprise is too great for those under its potent influence, no form of suffering or death can deter, no human sagacity can calculate the consequences of the resulting movements.

Of Mohammed's night journey to the seventh heaven, which is usually assigned to the year 621, I shall say very little. Mohammedan tradition presents the tale under a variety of forms, all more or less absurd and childish. What really happened was probably a vision in a trance, for Ayesha is said to have declared that Mohammed never left the chamber all that night. The visit was supposed to be made from Jerusalem under the guidance of the angel Gabriel. Each of the seven heavens was found to be in charge of some great and holy personage of the Jewish or Christian religion; but their order of succession is differently stated in the different traditions. Beyond the seventh heaven Gabriel could not go; but Mohammed passed on alone until he came in sight of the throne of God, on the right side whereof was written the formula of Islam, "La Ellah Ellalla, Mohammed resul Ellah."* In these traditions there seems to be scarcely any really original and non-Jewish thought except the conception of Azrael, the angel of death. In the third heaven the prophet found Abraham, "who recommended himself to his prayers; and there also he saw more angels than in either of the former heavens. One of them was of so prodigious a stature that the distance between his two eyes was equal to the length of a journey of 70,000 days. This, Gabriel told him, was the angel of death, who had a table before him of an immense bigness, whereon he was continually writing down the names of those who were to be born, and blotting out the names of those who were to die."† It was upon this occasion that the practice of praying five times a day, which the Mohammedans still observe, was, after a process of gradual reduction strongly suggestive of the intercession of Abraham for Sodom, enjoined as a religious duty.

In the year 622 Abu Sofian, the chief of the family of Ommiyah, and the inflexible opponent of Mohammed, succeeded to the government of Mecca. He and his faction saw that if the new religion was to be put down at all, the most vigorous measures were necessary; and a plot was laid for the assassination of the prophet. The secret oozed out; Mohammed, with no companion but Abu Beker, fled from Mecca at the dead of night, and took refuge in a cave a league from the city, where they lay hid three days. Every one has heard the story of the spider's web and the pigeon's nest. "The pursuing party halted before the cave where he and Abu Beker had hid themselves. During the three days they had lain hid here, a spider, they tell us, had spun its web over the mouth of the cave, and a pigeon laid two eggs near it. The sight of these objects convinced their enemies that the cave could not lately have been entered by man, and so they passed on without searching it.* His enemies were prowling around seeking his life, but the soul of Mohammed was anchored on the rock. "We are but two," said the trembling Abu Beker. "There is a third," replied the prophet; "it is God Himself." The fugitives sought refuge in Yathreb, thenceforth to be called Medina, a city about 300 miles to the north of Mecca, where Mohammed had already some earnest disciples. This event is the celebrated Hegira,† or flight from Mecca, the recognised era of all Mohammedan countries.

From this point till the triumphant return of the prophet to Mecca, in 630, eight years of confused military operations ensued. Many refugees followed the prophet to Medina. Along with these ranged themselves many Ansars, or "helpers," from the place itself; for Mohammed, after trying gentleness and persuasion in vain, had become convinced that the stiff-necked and unbelieving members of the tribe of Koreish were open to no argument but that of force. In the battle of Beder (623) the idolaters were defeated; but at Ohud next year the Mussulmans met with a severe repulse. Hamza, one of Mohammed's uncles, was killed, and the prophet himself was wounded in the face. Among the Arabs, as in every other community, there were many "waiters upon Providence" in whose breasts the prophet's ill-success caused serious scruples and misgivings. But he never lost his self-possession for an instant; declared that those who had fallen on the field were martyrs for Islam, and had entered immediately into the joys of paradise, and reproved the weak and irrational faith which made the truth of the religion dependent on temporal success. In 627 a truce was made with the people of Mecca, and from that time he commanded the true believers to make their pilgrimages to Mecca as before. For he had decided not to forbid the ancient and popular custom of going on pilgrimage, but only to purify it from its abuses. The idols were to be propitiated no longer, but the pilgrim was still to go seven times round the Kaaba, and might offer as many victims as he chose in sacrifice to the true God. In 629 Mohammed visited Mecca for the first time since his flight, and performed the regular seven circuits round the Kaaba. In 630 two important conversions occurred, that of Khaled, the "Sword of God," the future conqueror of Syria, and that of Othman, the secretary and third successor of the prophet. Amrou, the conqueror of Egypt, became a Mussulman about the same time. The resistance of the Koreishites was broken by these defections, and in this same year Mohammed, marching a large army to Mecca, received the submission of the city. Little blood was shed, and for most of that Khaled, not the prophet, was answerable. In 631, which is called by the Mohammedan writers the year of embassies, nearly all the nations dwelling in Arabia, most of whom had waited to see the issue of the struggle with the Koreishites, embraced Islam, and put away their idols. In the following year Mohammed died, being sixty-one years of age. In their wild devotion many of his followers refused to believe that death had power to call away the apostle of God, and uttered threats against those who spoke of interring the body. But Abu Beker recalled them to noble thoughts. "Is it Mohammed," said he to Omar and the multitude, "or the God of Mohammed whom you worship? The God of Mohammed liveth for ever, but the apostle was a mortal like ourselves, and, according to his own prediction, he has experienced the common fate of mortality." He was buried on the same spot on which he expired; and his tomb at Medina is visited to this day by hosts of pilgrims, engaged in the pilgrimage to Mecca.

What may have been the hidden counsels of the divine will in suffering this new religion, of which, whatever Carlyle may say, a large portion grew out of conscious or half-conscious imposture, to spring up, to extend itself over northern Africa and south-western Asia, and not only to check the progress of Christianity in those two continents, but to wrest from its influence many countries where it had flourished and borne fruit,—is a question which defies our speculation. Yet some of the circumstances and conditions under which this surprising success was achieved may be pointed out, although the relative stress laid on each will vary with the inquirer's special point of view. Gibbon places first in the list of forwarding causes the temporal advantages and the indulgence of man's lower nature, which the religion of the prophet offered to those among whom it came:—

"The millions of African and Asiatic converts who swelled the native band of the faithful Arabs, must have been allured, rather than constrained, to declare their belief in one God and the apostle of God. By the repetition of a sentence and submission to the rite of circumcision, the subject or the slave, the captive or the criminal, arose in a moment the free and equal companion of the victorious Moslems. Every sin was expiated, every engagement was dissolved; the vow of celibacy was superseded by the indulgence of nature; the active spirits who slept in the cloister were awakened by the trumpet of the Saracens; and, in the convulsion of the world, every member of a new society ascended to the natural level of his capacity and courage.”*

Hallam enumerates among the causes of leading importance which contributed to the rapid propagation of Islam—

“In the first place, those just and elevated notions of the divine nature and of moral duties, the gold ore that pervades the dross of the Koran, which were calculated to strike a serious and reflecting people, already perhaps disinclined, by intermixture with their Jewish and Christian fellow-citizens, to the superstitions of their ancient idolatry; next, the artful incorporation of tenets, usages, and traditions from the various religions that existed in Arabia; and, thirdly, the extensive application of the precepts in the Koran—a book confessedly written with much elegance and purity—to all legal transactions and all the business of life.”

He adds that, in his opinion, the indulgence given by Mohammed to sensuality, and the effect of this indulgence in extending the religion, have been much overrated; that “a devout Mussulman exhibits much more of the Stoical than the Epicurean character.” But from this opinion we shall presently see that there are solid reasons for dissenting.

Other grounds on which the quailing of the Christians of the East before the sword of the Arabs may be partly explained are these. It seems as if the Christianity of a people were sure to become corrupt, if not attended by those constant advances and improvements in the spheres of morals, politics, intellectual inquiry, and industry, with which Christianity, though it may not initiate nor directly promote them, is always sure to be found in perfect harmony as soon as they have been elicited by reason. Now, for centuries before the rise of Mohammed, the Byzantine despotism, imposed at first upon the Greeks and Asiatics by a stronger race, and operating continually so as to degrade them to a lower level, and make them incapable of shaking it off, had killed out all activity in politics and the higher industry. Morals had been infected by the condition of politics; for it is an observation as old as the days of Homer, that slavery takes half a man’s virtue away:—

“Jove fixed it certain that the self-same day Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away.”

In intellectual inquiry, all that was eagerly prosecuted was research into the most abstruse and mysterious doctrines of Christianity; a morbid and excessive development, which the general hampered condition of the human faculties and activities engendered out of the metaphysical refinements of the philosophic schools. But to success in war there are two great leading requisites, one or the other of which must be always present; either a perfect, or comparatively perfect, intellectual adaptation of means to ends, or an enthusiastic persuasion that the side on which we fight is especially favoured by Almighty God, and that our enemies are at the same time His enemies. This last requisite to success was possessed by the early Moslems in a supereminent degree. The Christians whom they attacked had it not, nor was it to be expected that they should have it; but they could have dispensed with it perfectly well had they possessed that other requisite, the due adaptation of means to ends. But this, the chilling, cramping influence of centuries of despotism—a despotism, too, not strong or wise, but generally feeble and unintelligent—prevented them from having. Whenever they did exert their intelligence—as, e.g., in the invention of Greek fire, which saved Constantinople from capture in the eighth century—the material effect in checking the progress of the Saracens was proportionate. At the present day, of course, if we conceive of equal forces of Frenchmen and Arabs as meeting each other in the field, though the Frenchmen might be all Voltairians to a man, absolutely destitute of faith, and the Arabs all brimful of the pristine enthusiasm of their religion, nevertheless it is certain that with average leading and average fortune the Frenchmen would defeat the Arabs. Why? Simply because their means of offence and defence would be more perfectly organized.

Let it not be thought that in these words any denial of the doctrine of an ordering and overruling Providence is intended. Special instances of extraordinary deliverances of individuals, and even communities, from imminent external peril are recorded, and can probably be authenticated. But, on the whole, when war once breaks out, when the appeal to pure force is instituted without disguise, success is ordinarily on the side of “the strongest battalions;” that is, Providence commonly works through general laws, the operation of which is known, and can be, in great measure, calculated upon beforehand, so that those who neglect to avail themselves of them have themselves to thank for any miscarriage in their fortunes which may thence arrive. As God "sends rain upon the evil and upon the good," so He brings the calamities of war upon the good as well as the evil; and if a nation would secure itself from those calamities, it must provide and keep up means of national defence—means which no study of divine revelation will aid it in discovering, but for which it must resort to science and intelligence. To pretend to find in the Bible any system of perfect jurisprudence, or any infallible physical theory, or, in short, any set of truths which human reason is capable of excogitating for itself, is to assimilate it to the Koran, tends to the discredit of revelation, and raises up stumbling-blocks in the way of faith.

But however the spread of Mohammedanism may be accounted for, the disastrous import of the fact itself must not be lost sight of. In Palestine, the "early home" to which Christian love repaired in the fourth century to cheer its sadness with "its own native air,"* round Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul, and Ephesus, the episcopal see of Timothy—in the country of the great Athanasius, and along the greater part of the coast of North Africa, once thickly set with Christian and civilised communities, and renowned for ever as the home of St. Augustine—by the waters of the Bosphorus, where Gregory Nazianzen sat on the patriarchal throne, and from Philippi, when Paul first touched the land of Europe, round by Thessalonica and Berea to the Gulf of Volo—the religion of the False Prophet hangs like a foul malarious mist, making society dead and progress impossible, blighting the life of woman, and fostering pride and sensuality in man. These things are so notorious, and these consequences so inevitably flow from a system which condemns one-half of the human race to a condition morally worse than slavery, that any detailed proof of them might seem superfluous: yet, as some modern travellers—particularly Mr. Layard and Sir Charles Fellows—happening to have been well treated by Turkish pachas, and to have found much knavery and deceit among the Christian Greeks (as if anything else could have been expected after ages of servitude!), have laboured to confuse the natural and healthy perceptions of Christians in the West, and to represent Mohammedan domination over Christians as endurable, if not even desirable, it may be useful to collect a little evidence, drawn from sources unimpeachable, and conveying the most recent information, from which the reader may form some estimate of the real character of Mohammedan rule. We need not go further than the Blue-book presented to Parliament by Lord Stanley last year, containing reports from British consular agents in different Mohammedan countries, replying to certain questions forwarded to them from the Foreign Office.

Writing from Larissa, in Thessaly, on the 16th April, 1867, Mr. Suter reports,—

1. That the Christians of Thessaly, in common so far with the Mussulmans, are heavily taxed, and have no voice in the matter;* and that the taxes are increasing. The tax called beddell (answering to the old English escuage) is exacted not only from adults, but even in respect of infant children, though it is professedly paid in commutation of military service. Forced loans, with all their attendant rogueries and oppressions, are largely resorted to.

2. That forced labour, angaria, is imposed upon the peasantry largely and increasingly; so much so that it "has become a system applied to all the works and necessities of the government." This grievance of compulsory labour, often involving the fortunes of the cultivator in embarrassment and ruin, resembles the corvée of France before the revolution, and has always been regarded as a peculiarly odious and intolerable form of oppression.

3. That the Albanian frontier police, being irregularly paid, commit many acts of plunder and violence upon the Christian population with perfect impunity.

4. That promises of a reform of abuses have been frequently made in the most solemn manner, but have never been kept.

5. That the system by which the evidence of Christians is excluded from the courts of law in criminal cases and in suits regarding real estate, "often places both (life and property) wholly at the mercy of Mohammedan false witnesses, and of corrupt interpretations of the Koran law."

Until the Christians get the upper hand, real improvement is impossible, for the Moslem can no more change the character which his religion stamps upon him than the leopard his spots. Mr. Stuart, consul at Janina in Epirus, has in his report some remarkable observations bearing on this point. After mentioning certain favourable traits in the Mussulman character, he says:—"Observed, however, in the wider circles of society, and from a political point of view, the Mussulman of this country appears under a different aspect. His religion has set upon him a seal which nothing can change or efface. It pervades his whole life, individual, social, political; it enters into all his motives, and regulates all his actions; admitting no change, and allowing no fraternity with others." This is said of Mussulmans of rank and education ; as to the ignorant majority among the Albanian population, they "know little more of their religion than the pride and indolence which it inculcates."

Writing from Cyprus, Mr. Sandwith says that the results of the law excluding Christian evidence from the courts would be far worse than they are, but for the circumstance that Christian suitors, being as a class wealthier than the Mohammedans, are frequently able to bribe the judges to do them justice ! The same consul, after observing that the only Christians in public employ in Cyprus were a few clerks, adds :—"If capacity and merit were really titles for preferment to public offices, the relative positions of Turks and Greeks in this island would be reversed, the latter occupying the important, and the former the inferior posts." Out of a population for the whole island roughly estimated at 200,000, the Christians compose more than three-fourths. Yet this is the degraded condition to which Mohammedan rule, supported by the policy of the western nations, reduces a population as sensitive, as well educated, and far more intelligent than any corresponding section of our own people. Evidence of a similar character from other parts of the Turkish dominions might easily be added ; and if there are any reports of a more favourable complexion, the cause seems to be that they describe the state of things prevailing at seaport towns—great commercial centres, where mixed tribunals are established, and where, in the consular or diplomatic agents of the Christian powers, the oppressed rayah finds willing and able protectors.

But, after all, the blackest, the utterly irredeemable feature of Mohammedanism is its sensuality—that ingredient in the religion which wars against the dignity, the equal rights, the virtue, and the happiness of woman. If men were silent, every Christian woman with a heart and a tongue should seize all occasions to cry aloud against a social principle which condemns her sisters, throughout the wide-spread Mohammedan territories, to social nullity and intellectual imbecility ; which makes her the toy, not the companion of man. To dream of a reformed Mohammedanism, from which this feature of sensuality were absent, is idle ; from the first it has been an inseparable adjunct of the religion. Mohammed himself, though, as we have seen, possessed of many virtues, yet in his later years especially, and while he was composing the Koran, appears, in his relations to the other sex, in the light of a mere animal. And since "the disciple is not above his master," we shall find, if we come to examine them closely, that all those followers of the prophet whom Mohammedan writers have most extolled for their self-control, abstinence, justice, integrity, and veracity, have been at the same time disfigured by this foul taint of sensuality. Omar, the second Caliph, appears in the pages of Gibbon as a very type of moral perfection : turn to the fuller narrative of Ockley, and you will see that in the life of this hoary sensualist, self-denial in the direction of eating, drinking, and sleeping, was balanced by unlimited self-indulgence in another direction. In the earlier portion of this article we described the legendary origin of the fivefold daily prayer still offered by all Mussulmans. But does the reader suppose that Mohammedan women are bound to the same duty ? Nothing of the kind ; the prophet disdained the sex too much to include them within the scope of the precept. While the pious Mussulman, just risen from sleep, prostrates himself in prayer before the great Father and Ruler of all, his wife, or rather his favourite wife, fills his chibouque, or looks about for his slippers, or prepares his coffee. What could prayer avail from the lips of frivolous beings, created only for the satisfaction of the masters of the world ?* Christianity is the only religion which ever has, or ever can raise woman to her true position. If this be so, and if it be also true that missionary zeal falls powerless from the sevenfold shield of Mohammedan bigotry, does not that Christian nation incur a grave responsibility which neglects any opportunity that political contingencies may offer for abating and limiting Mohammedan influence in the world ?

"A FEATHER IN JACK'S CAP."

I.

"UNSTABLE as water, thou shalt not excel." Now, why need the Rev. Felix Littleton have chosen that particular text on this particular Sunday in May? And why need the congregation of the little village church of Bulhatch-Tye have turned round to openly stare or furtively glance at Jack Graysfield? Poor Jack! he did not quite know where to look. Farmer Graysfield's seat, which was in the chancel, could be seen from any part of the church; and right opposite sat the rector's servants, instead of the wife and sons and daughters, who would no doubt have filled the pew had he not had a disappointment early in life. Jack felt his honest-looking face growing scarlet; and his feelings were not at all improved by hearing his mother give an audible sigh, and his father a suppressed chuckle, as though he said, "Now for it, my lad."

Well, Jack felt that if he looked down, everybody would think he was ashamed of what he had done; and though he was as sorry as could be that he had pained his mother and angered his father, he wasn't going to hang his head before everybody. So he set his mouth firm, sat bolt upright, and stared round the little church in rather a defiant manner, until, at length, his eyes fell upon a pew very near the door. In it there was a weather-beaten old man, with white hair and a scar over his eye, which made him look very fierce; and by his side sat the prettiest dark-eyed, rosy-cheeked little maiden in the world, as Jack thought. In a moment, the young fellow's whole expression changed. All indignation vanished directly his eyes met the soft glance of Katie Leng, who looked all the more winning, because Jack saw, or thought he saw, an effort to keep down the tears which would come into her eyes at the thought of his going to sea.

Yes, that going to sea was the cause of all the disturbance. Jack Graysfield had made up his mind, and nothing would turn him from it. He would be a sailor. Now, if it had been one of the Copford boys, or the Pages, it wouldn't have mattered. The village would have permitted their departure without any other visible sign of regret than that arising from the certainty that they would return again to fulfil the old proverb, "He that is born to be hanged can never be drowned." But that the only son of the richest farmer in Bulhatch-Tye, or for miles round, who would soon have a basket-fortune in the continually dropping legacies of maiden aunts and bachelor cousins, should go roaming in foreign lands, and be shipwrecked, and maybe drowned, was not to be permitted. Old Ned Leng ought to be ashamed of himself for filling the boy's head with such rubbish.

The contention had first begun two years ago, when Jack was sixteen. At that time, he had begged his father to let him go one voyage, and then, if he didn't like it, he could return and settle down to farming. But Mr. Graysfield would not listen to this; he flew into a violent rage, and declared that he would horsewhip Jack, never speak to him again, and cut him off with a shilling. All this seeming to have no more effect than idle threats generally have, he tried a more powerful argument. Jack's going to sea, he urged, would kill his mother, and he would never see either father or mother again, for the old man would soon follow his wife when he had nothing to live for. Mr. Graysfield went on in this way until the lad at last consented to try and overcome his passion for a sailor's life, and said that he would not even speak of it for two years; but that if, at the end of that time, the wish was still strong upon him, his father must let him go, lest he should do no good at home, and perhaps bring disgrace upon a name which for generations had been held in honour by the whole county.

II.

And now the two years had passed. The time had dragged slowly with Jack, although it had flown so swiftly with Mr. and Mrs. Graysfield, that they were completely staggered when, a week ago, Jack had somewhat abruptly informed them that, come what might, he could not stay and spend all his life in Bulhatch-Tye. His heart, he owned, ached sorely at leaving them, but he hoped they would let him try the sea, and not think too much of what might seem his want of love for them.

Of course, Mrs. Graysfield's tears began to flow, and the farmer was in a worse rage than ever. He used such threats, and said such sneering and bitter things to his son, that though Jack remained silent, as he had determined, Mrs. Graysfield could not do so; but, woman-like, dried her tears, and entered upon such a defence of her boy's character and spirit, that the farmer was completely discomfited, and was at last obliged sulkily to say that Jack might go if he liked, but, as his consent wasn't needed, he shouldn't trouble himself any further; and though he'd no wish to speak in the spirit of prophecy, Jack would rue the day he left Matching Farm, and his mother might wish she hadn't been quite so ready with her tongue.

Although matters were thus far settled, Mrs. Graysfield was not minded to give in. She was still determined to leave no stone unturned to induce Jack to give up his idea. She went to all their friends and relations, and begged them to write him persuasive letters. Jack was overpowered by heart-rending epistles from aunts and cousins and sincere "well-wishers." But what were all these missives in comparison with the letter he received one morning from Cousin Watson, at Bristol, saying that a friend of his would be very glad to give him a berth aboard his ship, which was to sail almost directly for the Mauritius? When Mrs. Graysfield saw this letter, all hope seemed extinguished. She now began to turn her animosity (born solely of the grief she felt at losing her son) against those who were reported to be the originators and main cause of his taking this mad fancy. She had never yet given Jack her opinion of old Ned Leng and his daughter; but if the last arrow left missed its aim, then she would spare them no longer. Thus resolved, she went to the rector (than whom an easier, kinder-hearted man never dozed away his existence in a remote country parish), and begged him with much earnestness, and as a special favour to herself and her husband, to preach such a sermon next Sunday afternoon as would go home to her boy's heart, and would not spare those she looked upon as being the cause of all her troubles.

III.

Mr. Littleton was not a little perplexed as to what he ought to do, and still more so as to what he could possibly say in event of his consenting. He had never said "No" to anybody in his life—the word being very familiar to his ears, but a complete stranger to his tongue. How could he refuse Mrs. Graysfield, she was such a good creature? She made the best "ginger tickle" in the county, and was always sending him cream cheeses and game pies.

"Well, well, Mrs. Graysfield," he said, wistfully, "I'll see what can be done."

"Oh, thank you, sir; I shall take care that all my family are present;" and then she rose to take her departure.

"I don't promise much," said Mr. Littleton, "but I'll do my best, Mrs. Graysfield; I'll do my best."

"Then, sir, I'm sure, unless his heart's turned to adamant stone, he'll be touched by your feeling words."

At this the good woman bowed herself out, and left the poor rector to fidget and worry as to what he should say, until it was quite late on Saturday afternoon. He had scarcely sat down earnestly to work, when he was interrupted by a friend; and on this friend proposing to stay to dinner, the rector could not summon up courage to say that he was engaged. The consequence was that ten o'clock found him very tired and sleepy, trying to lash himself into a rage with young Jack Graysfield, and all who had anything to do with his having to write this philippic.

Everybody said afterwards, that Mr. Littleton quite surpassed himself, and that even although it had been a funeral sermon, the discourse could not have been more impressive. They could easily see that; for notwithstanding Jack and the Lengs holding their heads so high, they were completely taken aback by the rector. But the preacher knowing nothing of all this praise, walked home in a very dissatisfied frame of mind, his tender conscience upbraiding him for having been over-severe with persons whom he did not know. Perhaps he had caused pain to them, and to his favourite Jack Graysfield. But both parson and people were very far out in their calculations and surmises. Beyond the text, and an occasional sentence, at which Jack "pulled himself together," as old Leng would have said, denunciations, rebukes, and appeals were completely lost upon him. And I doubt very much whether Jack's reflections did not prove far more conducive to his spiritual welfare than a grave attention to every word of that memorable discourse.

His mind and fancy were busy enough all the time the rector was speaking. He was only eighteen, and he was going out into the world, which to him hitherto had been Bul-hatch-Tye—going to leave all his friends and dear associations. Why, everybody in the village knew him, and all about him; and there wasn't a single man, woman, or child in the church that afternoon but he could tell their names and histories. Oh! how often he should think of them as sitting in church—the doors wide open, affording a glimpse of the splendid avenue of elms, each tree of which seemed bending down to try and listen to the parson's voice! And then the coming out and the shaking hands with everybody, and the accustomed walk as far as the mill with Mr. Leng and Katie. Would Katie be true to him? He could not help questioning himself. He was too young to speak to his father, but there was something in his heart that rose up and cast all doubt away. Before he had time to think any more the congregation were standing up, the rector had pronounced the blessing, and Jack's head was bowed down as he sent up perhaps the most earnest prayer he had ever uttered, that God would bless and take care of Katie, and his father and mother, and Mr. Littleton, and everybody whom he loved, that they might all meet again.

IV.

Bulhatch Mill stood at the top of Friar's

Lane, and half way down it was the cottage in which old Ned Leng and his daughter Katie lived. Bulhatch-Tye was Ned Leng's native village, which in youth he had seemingly loved so little, that he had run away from it to go to sea. But when he was nearly fifty, he suddenly reappeared one day, saying that his prayer for many a year had been that he might lay his bones in Bulhatch churchyard. He appeared to think that time ought to have stood still in his rustic home while he was away; and he listened with a blank face as he was told that many of his old playmates had already taken possession of their "narrow cell," whilst others had left the place, and some had forgotten him altogether. Still Jane Walters was alive, and to her he could show the lock of hair which her sister Kate (now dead and gone) had given to him at parting. As she was a widow in delicate health, and not able to get the comforts she needed, Ned asked her, for her sister's sake, to marry him. She consented, and for twelve months she seemed stronger, but after little Katie's birth, she slowly faded away. The old sailor was thus left with his baby charge, which he seemed to regard as a gift from God, who had answered his prayer in His own way; for now there was a Katie Leng after all.

Ned soon became very popular in the village, especially with the youngsters, and with Jack Graysfield above all. He carved out models of boats for him, and rigged a cutter that would sail well, no matter how the wind blew. He taught the lad to sing sea songs; and in the long winter evenings he would amuse the youngsters by telling stories, as he sat in his big chair puffing his pipe, Katie on her little stool between his knees, and Jack opposite, drinking in every word he said. Best of all was it, when, with the whole enthusiasm of his nature, he recited how he had served on board the Victory, had borne part in the battle of Trafalgar, dilating with utmost vividness on the minutest details, until, sinking his voice, and reverently lifting from his head the old cap he always wore, he told how he saw the great conqueror fall, "the like of whom no mortal eye would ever see again."

Mrs. Graysfield often asked Mr. Leng and Katie to Matching Farm. She felt grateful to them for amusing and interesting her son as they did, little dreaming that the boy was imbibing a taste for adventure, and developing a desire to go and see foreign climes. Long before Farmer Graysfield or his wife knew aught of the mischief growing in their son's head, Jack had made up his mind on two points. He would go to sea, and he would marry Katie Leng. Now, if anything could have been more opposed to his parents' wishes than going to sea, it was that he should marry Katie. True, she might be the prettiest girl in the county, but that was not to the point. The Graysfields had always married cousins, and there was a cousin growing up for Jack now. And with this cousin there was land adjoining Matching, and money enough to set them up at once if they pleased. No sooner, then, did all this burst upon Mrs. Graysfield, than, as she said, she saw through the whole thing. That wicked old man and his artful girl had laid a cunning trap for her unsuspecting boy. But she would beat them, if anybody could. The first effort at opposition had failed, it is true; for, notwithstanding the sermon, Jack was not to be turned from his purpose; but they would not forget to revenge themselves on the Lengs. During the next six months, accordingly, poor Katie had had to put up with many a bitter slight and petty jealousy. The whole society of Bulhatch-Tye were either aunts, or sisters, or cousins to the Graysfields, in degree near or farther removed, and were up in arms against these leaders of children from the path of filial duty.

As nothing could be said against a girl whose sole care seemed to be to make her old father happy, these annoyances had to be confined to excluding her from summer parties, and taking little notice of her at such gatherings as the rector's harvest feast.

"Never mind, my girl," the old man would say when Katie had been wounded by some spiteful dart; "somebody will come home from sea who'll put it all straight."

"Oh, I don't know, father. Sometimes I think, now everybody's turned so against me, whether Jack will be the same."

"Jack change!" exclaimed her father; "not he. What does the words of his favourite song say?" And at this point the voice, which now began to quaver a little, would give out—

"Change as ye list, ye winds, my heart shall be The faithful compass that still points to thee."

Take ye no notice, and it'll all blow over, Katie. It's only women's ways, my dear; they don't mean nothing."

V.

Perhaps it would have all blown over, had not a circumstance just then occurred which seemed far enough from being likely to affect the Lengs in any way. This was, the return of Mrs. Knighton and her son to Friarswell Park. Mrs. Knighton was the grand lady of the place, and her son (who was just about to come of age) was the owner of Friarswell. Mrs. Knighton had been left a widow when Reginald was about three years old. Stricken with grief at the loss of her husband, she withdrew from all society, and shut herself up at Friarswell, announcing her intention to devote herself entirely to her son. She would hardly let the boy out of her sight; she would not send him to school; by all kinds of indulgence she fostered his shyness, until, at eighteen, the poor lad was as timid and sensitive as a girl, and wholly unfitted to fill the position to which he was born.

Mrs. Knighton had suddenly opened her eyes to this fact, and, hoping to overcome in one year the work of the eighteen preceding ones, she had taken Reginald abroad, in company with an invalid bachelor friend and an elderly maiden sister, and was much surprised as well as annoyed to find that he returned to Friarswell very much the same as he left it.

Very soon, however, a change became noticeable in him. After going three Sundays to church, both morning and afternoon, he conceived a violent fancy for rambling about the place alone, particularly in the fields behind Friar's Lane. Mrs. Knighton, I believe, might have speculated on the cause of this new whim for a whole year without coming near the truth. Poor Reginald had fallen desperately in love with that "dreadfully artful Katie Leng."

Of course, he had no difficulty in seeing her. He had been accustomed to talk to old Ned all his life; and as for Katie, she was quite innocent of any suspicion that she was the attraction which drew the young master so frequently to the cottage, and made him stay so long. She certainly wished that he would not join her when she chanced to meet him in the village, for he had nothing to say except how glad he was to get home again, and that he should be of age next month, and then could do whatever he pleased.

But though Katie was blind, her neighbours were not. The mail that carried to Jack one of her loving letters, with three tiny kisses dropped in wax outside, also bore two or three family epistles, full of varied details as to the sad way in which Katie Leng was going on. They'd always thought her flighty, but had held their tongues. But now she'd forced people to speak by her boldness in walking every evening with the young squire, who was never out of the cottage.

Jack looked rather glum as he read that part of his mother's note where she hoped he would "never take any more notice of such a wicked, pert girl, or think of her." He tore up the other virtuously indignant epistles, and then re-read his love-letter, afterwards kissing it a dozen times, and wishing he was only home to show them that all the squires in the world couldn't shake his faith in Katie.

VI.

Now, all this could not go on very long without some echo of it reaching Mrs. Knighton's ears. When she heard that her Reginald was always walking about with old Leng's daughter, she could not believe it. She scorned the very idea; her Reginald, her "sensitive, proud boy," make a companion of an old sailor and his uneducated daughter! Impossible. But when, day after day, with strained eyes she watched him go away in the one direction, and when her heart ached to see him return one evening in such hopeless dejection that she could not get a word from him, she could bear it no longer. So when he came to say "Good night," she told him all she had heard, and asked him what he had to say. He stood for a moment irresolute, and then blurted out:

"I love her with all my heart, and if she won't marry me, I shall die, mother!"

Was she in her senses? A Knighton ~~marry~~ a vulgar village girl!

"Reginald," she exclaimed, "do you dare insult me, by saying that a son of mine would ever ask a low-born woman to be his wife, and take my place as mistress of Friarswell?"

"Katie Leng is no low-born woman," he answered defiantly, "and I have asked her to be my wife; and she,—she says she will not have me; but I will marry her yet."

Before his mother could find words to speak her wrath, he had left her alone to pace the room, in bitter self-reproach that she had not listened to those who had begged her to let her boy be brought up as others were, so that he might be fitted for the position he was to fill.

Wearily passed the night; and early the next day Mrs. Knighton knocked at the door of the cottage in Friar's Lane. She found Katie alone, and at once began in a hard, cold voice, to tell her tale of the village gossip—how she had not believed anything against a girl whom she always thought well of; "but," she added, "I can shut my ears no longer, and before I speak again to my son, I wish to know if you can defend your reputation in any way."

Before that word was spoken, Katie had been thinking how she could best screen the young squire's foolishness; but now, Mrs. Knighton herself could not have walked more proudly than did Katie Leng to her little old-fashioned work-box. Taking from it two letters, she put them before the lady without saying a word. One (which had been received that morning) was a passionate appeal from Reginald, begging her to reconsider what she had said, and promising to marry her the very day after he came of age, adding that he would declare it at once, or keep it secret, as she pleased, since he cared for nothing in the world but her love. The other (which was all ready to send off) was Katie's answer—a letter any girl might have been proud of, though poor Katie blushed scarlet as Mrs. Knighton, with a face blanched by the pain caused by reading her son's letter, opened it. Neither she nor Katie noticed the anxious face of old Ned, who, after wonderingly watching them from behind the elder bush outside the window, moved into the porch, and softly lifted the latch, to listen to the interview.

As Mrs. Knighton read Katie's letter, she was visibly affected. The delicate way in which the girl tried to spare the young man all pain; the manner in which she drew his attention to the difference in their positions, and the duty he owed to his station in life; her reference to the grief it would cause his mother, who loved him so dearly; and, finally, her frank confession of the impossibility of her thinking of him, as she loved some one else, who alone should ever call her wife—struck Mrs. Knighton with astonished admiration. She folded up the letter, and stepping over to where Katie sat, put her hands on the girl's shoulders, as she said:

"Katie Leng, forgive me!"

"Oh, madam! please don't speak like that."

"I repeat it, that I can never expect you to know what I feel towards you; but if I live for forty years, every day I will ask a blessing on the girl who has spared my son to me."

Poor Katie completely broke down, and so overcame old Ned's caution that he straightway opened the door wide, saying:

"Katie, my dear! you mustn't cry like that. Why, what's it all for?"

"For this," said Mrs. Knighton, "because the squire's mother has come to thank your daughter for refusing to become her son's wife."

"My Katie the squire's wife!" echoed old Ned. "The Lord forgive you, ma'am!"

"It's true, notwithstanding, Leng. Katie has refused to be mistress of Friarswell Park."

"Hurrah!" cried the old man, slapping Katie on the back. "Why, there's a feather in Jack's cap!"

"Jack!" repeated Mrs. Knighton, surprised. "Who is Jack?"

"Oh, father!" urged Katie, as fresh colour mounted into her cheeks; "you mustn't!"

Old Ned looked rather foolish at this, and, in apology, muttered something about "letting the cat out of the bag."

"Come, Katie," said Mrs. Knighton, "let me share your secret; for, believe me, from this day until my life ends, you will never have a truer friend than me. Is Jack the husband you have chosen, my dear?"

"Oh, ma'am! I don't know about husband," stammered out the girl; "but we've promised to be true to each other, and Jack told his mother so, though he didn't ask Mr. Graysfield because we are so young."

"They must be very proud of their son's choice," said Mrs. Knighton.

"Indeed, they are not," replied Katie, "for ever since Jack has been gone, neither Mr. nor Mrs. Graysfield, nor any of their relations, have looked my way. They say father was the cause of his going against them all, and taking to the sea."

"Was that true, Leng?" asked Mrs. Knighton, turning round and smiling.

"Well, ma'am," replied old Ned, "I never said a word to their boy I wouldn't have said to a boy of my own; although it did seem a thousand pities for a fine young fellow like Jack to lose the chance of ever getting a pop at the Frenchmen. He's in a merchant vessel now, but Katie won't rest, and I shan't die happy, till he wears the king's button."

Mrs. Knighton turned to Katie again and said—

"Katie, would it be a pleasure—could I serve you in any way, if I interested myself for Jack Graysfield? Many of my family have interest in the navy, and I might be able to do something. It shall not be for want of trying, if it would render any service to you."

"Oh, you're too kind! indeed, indeed I have done nothing that should make you trouble yourself like that."

"Say no more," answered Mrs. Knighton; "only remember every time you ask anything of me you confer a favour. Now good-bye, Katie. Do not judge my conduct harshly; remember Reginald is all the hope I have in this world; he is my only son, and I am a widow."

VII.

During the next twelve months there were wonders worked in Bulhatch-Tye. To begin:

the young squire went abroad again, but this time with his cousin Colonel Lumsden. Mrs. Knighton remained at Friarswell, calling upon all her neighbours, and renewing her old intimacies, so that her house might be the resort of cheerful society by the time her son returned. Then Katie Leng became Mrs. Knighton's prime favourite, so that nobody who looked down upon her could expect to be shown any favour by the lady of the manor. Again, Jack Graysfield was now a "master's assistant," a real officer in His Majesty's navy, and was coming home next year with a cocked hat and real sword by his side to marry Katie Leng; and last and best of all, at Friarswell new year's treat, when the gentry and all the parish were present, Mrs. Knighton had desired old Leng to propose the health of Jack Graysfield, after her health and her son's had been given. This toast was drunk with much applause, and Farmer Graysfield, in returning thanks for his son, took the opportunity of publicly expressing his gratitude to Mrs. Knighton for using her interest in his behalf, and so turning what his parents had looked upon as a disgrace, into an honour and a pride. At this point Mrs. Knighton stood up, and said before everybody, that although the respect she bore to Mr. and Mrs. Graysfield would have led her to serve their son with pleasure, yet that it was not to her they were indebted so much as to another person present. "This is the one you must thank," she added, turning and taking the bewildered Katie by the hand. "Katie Leng, by her true and honourable conduct, laid me under a life-long obligation, and the only way she let me show my gratitude was by promoting the interest of the man who is happy enough to have chosen her to be his wife. Take your daughter to your heart, Mrs. Graysfield; and when my son brings one home to me, may I have as much reason to be proud of her as you have!"

Mrs. Graysfield didn't wait for more invitation. She had a good motherly heart, and, until this animosity had arisen, had always liked Katie. So Katie sat between the farmer and his wife for the rest of the evening; and because she would have her own dear old father near her, Ned sat next to Mrs. Graysfield, chuckling, "Won't this be a feather in Jack's cap!" Then Mr. Littleton came over, and shook hands with them all, saying—

"Now, about that sermon which has always rather weighed on my mind: I rather think, Mrs. Graysfield, when Jack returns, I must make it up by preaching another in his favour."

"Hooraar!" cried old Ned, excitedly. "Why that'll be another feather in Jack's cap!"

And the Rev. Felix Littleton was as good as his word; for on the first Sunday after Jack's return, the congregation turned their eyes even more curiously than they had done on a former occasion, first on the Graysfields' pew, and then on Ned Leng's, when the text was read out:—"A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men."

LENNIE ORME.

"NOTRE JEAN."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HESTER KIRTON."

"HOLD thy tongue, Jean! wilt thou never be quiet?"

The words were not very hard, but they were so harshly spoken.

I was coming from my room along the open gallery that ran round the courtyard of the Hôtel de Lyons, and I looked down over the old wooden balustrade to see the speaker.

She was tall and thin—would have been called handsome, I suppose—she had one of those flat, well-coloured, bright-eyed, expressionless faces which may serve to hide various feelings, but which certainly only betray one—that of placid self-satisfaction.

Just now this face was in a frowning phase: it was evident the speaker was not satisfied with her little son.

I had only reached the quaint old Norman town of St. Roque on the previous evening, but something in the tone of voice made me recognise Madame Clopin, my landlady at the Hôtel de Lyons.

I suppose it is an unpardonable weakness; but I do not like to hear a woman tell boys to be quiet when they are in the open air, and then I knew Jean's crime was not a serious one. I had heard a clear little treble pipe a few minutes sooner sounding out—

"La Boulangère a des écus
Qui ne lui coûtent guère,
N'en doutez pas je les ai vus
J'ai vu la Boulangère—j'ai vu," &c."

And then in the midst of the rapid refrain had come this extinguisher—"Hold thy tongue, Jean! wilt thou never be quiet?"

I scarcely knew why, but I felt that a sudden and unaccountable fit of indignation against Madame Clopin had taken hold of me, and as indignation must be fed by pity, I felt an equal amount of sympathy for the little pale Jean.

He was not a pretty child when you saw him nearer, he was so very pale, and he had such dark circles under his eyes; then he had a wide quivering kind of mouth, and straight, soft-looking hair—no, certainly, Jean Clopin was not a pretty child. I dare say it was contradiction—I am very contradictory—it is one of the privileges of single women. You see our married sisters have always their husbands to contradict and snub in private, and this gives them a large power of public gentleness and sweetness; but whatever the cause may have been, I felt my heart go out to poor little large-eyed Jean as I had never felt it stirred for any pretty little boy. I stood looking at him over the balustrade. His mother sailed on into her den in the entrance way opposite the salle, but Jean seated himself on the edge of a long stone trough just below the great pump.

The action reminded me of Cinderella. There was a desolate, longing look on the little pale face. I don't think Jean felt inclined to sing the "Boulangère" after his mother left him.

Everything was still and quiet in the old grey court. There was a range of sheds at the end facing the broad covered entrance, and under these stood the outlandish, heavy-hooded carriages of the Norman gentry, putting up at the Hôtel de Lyons a day or so, on their way to St. Luc and Trouville. Under the farthest shed was a goodly array of vegetables—orange-coloured carrots, with lovely feathery tops, equalling a fern in grace and colour; snowy turnips, with emerald crowns; and strings of rosy onions, while in wirework baskets, suspended from the beams overhead, were the blanched scarole leaves draining, as the ceaseless drip, drip on the round stones below testified, in readiness for the table-d'hôte salad.

I wanted to make acquaintance with the little pale child. With boys it seems best to let one's overtures take a propitiatory shape, and I went back into my room, which opened on to the gallery by a glass door. Just before I left Southampton, Aunt Lotty had crammed a box of acidulated drops into my hand.

"The very best possible preventive against sea-sickness, my dear," the gentle old lady said. "I have been told if you put one in your mouth when you get on board, and replace it with another as soon as it has dissolved, and repeat this, dear Jemima, until the box is empty, you won't even feel squeamish."

I kissed Aunt Lotty, and thanked her with the sort of affectionate hypocrisy one is sometimes compelled to use; and now for the first time I unsealed its paper wrappings and opened the box.

I went back to the gallery.

My Cinderella was looking more cheerful. He had quitted the trough, and stood watching the chef de cuisine as he pumped into a great brass pan which now stood just where Jean had been sitting.

The chef's face grew redder and redder as he pumped, and made a yet more vivid contrast against his fresh white costume.

"Well, Jean," he said, "what art thou doing here? Why art thou not out hunting butterflies?"

The depressed look came back to Jean's face. "I have got no net, La Barbe."

"Ah, what a pity! Hast thou lost that net which Louison gave thee at the last Saint Jean?"

"No, I have not lost it."

I was not near enough to be certain; but it seemed to me the poor little boy sighed.

"Thou hast not lost it, notre Jean? Where is it then, my boy?"

"Mamma has taken it, until I am more wise, La Barbe, and until I shall not cry out so—so loud for joy when I see three, four, five beautiful butterflies settled on the clover-blossoms. Oh, it is beautiful—it is beautiful!" he shouted, almost as loud as he had shouted "La Boulangère."

"Chut," the chef raised his hand warningly, and gave a glance over his shoulder towards the entrance-way. "Out of the road, my lad;" and he raised the brass pan, like a great jewel now, as the water sparkled to the sunshine above, while the bright metal glowed up from beneath. He smiled and nodded affectionately to the boy, spite of his admonition; and I felt somehow justified in the fancy I had taken to poor little Jean Clopin.

I don't know that I needed justification: troublesome, uncomprehended children seem to have a special claim on one's sympathy. Like the houseless, starving dogs, they can't tell their needs. Poor little souls, they don't know what it is they want; they don't know what it is that makes them abrupt, and obtrusive, and troublesome—the very opposite of "pretty behaved." They only know that sometimes, when their little hearts are most full of overflowing love and life, they get a harsh repulse, which plunges them into a slough of doubt and distrust ; and they scramble out at last aimless, only conscious that they don't know how to do better. But if they could tell us what they wanted, they would, after all, be precocious little horrors. The best of them is, that the fount of love in their hearts is usually inexhaustible. Choke it, draw it off, seal it down—it still rises and finds its way to the light.

But while I went on meditating in this sentimental fashion (you see, I am, as I said before, a single woman, an "independent lady of a certain age," with nothing to do but to study my own sentiments—I gave up the idea of getting married long ago, for I fancy I should find the restraint of being tied down to a home and a husband simply intolerable)—well, while I had gone on wandering in this way, Jean had spied me out, and he stood now in the midst of the courtyard, his eyes fixed on me.

"Catch," I said in English ; then, feeling very much ashamed of my mistake, I called out the word in French. But Jean had comprehended, and had caught his bonbons, and he stood smiling and pulling off his little cap ; but he did not begin to eat the sweetmeats.

I thought he was modest, and I went back to my room. After a few minutes, I came again to look for Jean. He was still where I had left him, and I beckoned him to come to me. He ran up-stairs, came and sat down by me on the sofa, and looked at me with his bright, earnest eyes.

How the child stared at me ! I wore long curls then ; and at last, looking specially at them, he said, "Madame is English, is she not ?"

"Yes," I said, and smiled, for almost as he spoke the poor little fellow reddened ; and I remembered a French caricature I had seen, and which he, doubtless, had also seen, of these same long English curls.

Somehow, this broke the ice, and he was soon chattering away, looking as blithe as a butterfly.

He had a papa,—oh, yes ; but he was away ; he had gone to see grandmamma, who lived in Paris and was so—so ill. And he had sisters ; but yes, he had four of them—Idalie, and Marie, and Françoise, and Gabrielle ; and a little brother. Ah, but was it possible that madame had not seen his little brother ? He was of such beauty and gentleness that everybody must love him ! And already he could laugh,—oh, yes, he could laugh ; and he was Jules. There was a great man, also, who had been named Jules, and his surname was César. Which did madame think sounded best, Jules Clopin, or Jules César ?

Here he stopped, and looked up in my face, as if the answer were of importance.

I laughed.

"Well, I think I prefer the last," I said ; and then, as he looked downcast, I tried to make the best of it :—"You see, Jules César is historical ; and I like history."

His little face lit up in a moment.

"And I too, madame—I love history ; of all my lessons, I like it best. But Idalie and Marie do not love history—they care only for the history of the saints !" Here came a very unmistakable sigh.

"And you like butterflies too, Jean, I think ?"

"Oh, yes, madame."

"But it is cruel to kill them," I said, for I don't like to see insects tortured ; and it is my belief that boys' hearts get hardened prematurely if they are allowed to take the life even of a butterfly in cold blood.

"Madame"—Jean looked very grave at me, and he put his little hand on his heart as if to assure me I might believe him—"I do not kill the butterflies. When I see them, as they come flying all around me, scarlet, and blue, and white, and orange, and my gold and black machaons above all—ah, madame, then I am glad. It seems to me that paradise must be just like those butterflies. I catch them only to see them, that I may enjoy their beautiful wings, and then I let them fly ; and my net does not hurt them. And I would fly with them if I could ; they are so beautiful and happy, the butterflies."

His eyes had grown large and bright ; he had risen to his feet as he spoke, trembling all over with his excitement.

I did not understand him, but I felt the presence of a gift in the child. Who knows, thought I, but here is the germ of a great painter or a famous poet ? Will it ever develop, or will it be ground down into common humanity by want of sympathy ?

I could not understand him, as I said before, but I drew little Jean to me and kissed him almost reverently.

He put both arms round my neck and whispered, very softly, "I love you."

II.

I went down to the salle à manger next morning to breakfast. I wanted to renew my acquaintance with Jean. I thought that perhaps he would like to go with me to the Museum to see the pictures.

The staircase ended on the opposite side of the entrance way, and just as I was crossing this to go into the salle, I saw a stout, good-tempered looking nursemaid in the courtyard.

"Louison!" sounded from the kitchen, and she turned back again.

"It was Louison who gave him the net," I thought. "I shall wait here, and then I shall listen to Louison's report of my little favourite."

I went on to the entrance and looked out into the street. A tall, long-moustached gendarme was in the very act of bowing profoundly to the chef. There they were, their noses nearly touching, the cocked silver-laced hat and the paper cap both in the air. I could not help laughing, and not to seem ill-bred, I went back into the courtyard.

Louison was coming towards me again. "Good day," I said; "where is little Jean?"

"Ah, mademoiselle, do you know our Jean?" Louison had detected my single estate at once, and was far too polite to address me as madame. "It is for him that I go to speak to the mistress. Ah, the poor child, it is every day the same, from morning till evening it is nothing but scolding."

"But how is it that he is so naughty a child?"

"Naughty, mademoiselle! if we were all as good as our Jean, there would not be room for so many in paradise." Here Louison stopped and wiped her eyes with her blue apron, and then settled her cap-strings with a look at me as if I had ruffled them. She had a hard, brown, Picarde face, with such a row of white teeth as let you see at once that she had not been born in a cyder country like Normandy. "Ma foi!"—she shrugged her shoulders and went on talking as fast as she could—"it is past belief, that a little girl who is not bad for others, who is even devout for her age, should bring home tales of her own brother till she takes the joy from his life."

"But who does this?" and I felt that I looked indignant by the sympathy of Louison's bright black eyes.

Louison looked over her shoulder and tossed back her great solid-looking head with its cockscorn of lace. Seemingly she had adopted the cap of the country in which she now lived.

"I will speak," she said; "let those have the shame who cause the blame. It is Idalie, mademoiselle; madame cannot see a fault in her, and she is sent out to take walks with our Jean and with the others, and to watch over them. For you know, mademoiselle, the ways of a boy are not the ways of a girl. Jean sees something which pleases him, he laughs, he dances, he sings, he is so excitable a child when anything gives him pleasure. But, mademoiselle, Idalie is different: she is quiet, discreet, if you will, but she is dull; she cannot understand the pleasure of our Jean, and she thinks it is wrong to do anything but to walk along quietly as in a procession. It is hard, but it is perhaps just, that madame will not suffer that the child should sing or cry out here in the court; but in the open air what can be the fault? I ask myself, is he always to be kept in such subjection, he who is so bright and so gay when he is beloved? How can he live with such treatment? They do not know what they are doing to him."

I felt puzzled.

"But has this always been so?" I said.

Louison shook her head. "No, mademoiselle, monsieur and madame have only been here two years. Before then we had a farm in the country, and our Jean was always out-of-doors. He was not ill then, and when he came into the house he was quiet. Now he is never well or strong. It is not so bad when his sisters are at school; but with every holiday it gets worse, and I can do so little for him."

"It is very sad," I said. "Where is he now?"

Louison shook her head angrily. "The poor child is in the loft. He sang before he said his prayers, and Idalie has said to madame that he will grow indeavour if he is not punished."

"Good day," I said. Now that I had heard all I wanted, it seemed to me that I had no right to have questioned Louison—that I had been meddling in other people's business; and yet she spoke of the boy almost as if he were her own. I learned afterwards that he was her foster-child.

I had so counted on our Jean as a companion, that I felt lonely by myself. I went and visited the cathedral—a magnificent semi-Norman pile, with a broad ribbon of golden sunlight striking across it from the clerestory to the pavement. Looking at that golden ribbon—so broad and solid that it seemed too real and hard to be a mere effect of light, I almost felt the old childish belief that if I could only clasp it firmly enough, it would take me straight up to heaven.

"I wonder if Jean thinks so. I must ask him."

Here I found myself blushing. I read in a book once that women do not blush after five-and-thirty. I am past that age now, and yet I blush still when I feel ashamed of myself; and now I was ashamed to find that, instead of examining the antiquarian treasures of St. Etienne, I had been thinking of climbing sunbeams just as Jack climbed his beanstalk. Well, I confess it, I am steady enough in respectable England, but once I get to the other side of the water, I find gaiety catching, and become as childish as if I had shaken off twenty years.

I turned to leave the church after a bit, and met a girl coming in. She was ragged and dirty, and I recognised her as one of a band of women I had seen employed to sweep the streets the evening before. I had fancied them the very refuse of the population.

I thought she was coming to me for a sou, but she took no notice of me; she went straight to the little altar of the Blessed Virgin, crossed herself, and then knelt down and prayed quietly for about five minutes. Then she got up, crossed herself with bent head as she passed the holy water scallop, and left the church.

I felt a strange inclination to follow the woman and learn her history; but just then my heart was so full of Jean and his troubles, that I lost the opportunity. If I go back next year to St. Roque, I must try to find out my poor ragged devotee.

When I reached my inn, Madame Clopin and Jean were both at the foot of the staircase. I was so rejoiced to see my little friend that I went forward and kissed him before I spoke to his mother. Of course, this was a most undignified proceeding, and I saw, by madame's set eyes and mouth, that she thought so.

"You have a charming family, madame," I said, "but as yet I have only made acquaintance with my little friend," and I patted Jean's soft, straight, brown hair.

"You are very good, mademoiselle, and I hope Jean shows by his conduct that he is grateful for your kindness."

I could have put madame under the pump; only, you see, she is a head taller than I am. The word "could" must be understood as referring to the capacity of feeling.

"He is a dear little fellow," I said with energy; "I want him to go with me to the Museum."

You should have seen Jean's eyes,—they sparkled just as they had done about the butterflies, and he began to jump and snap his fingers.

The corners of madame's eyes and mouth went down as if some one had pulled a string attached to them.

"As if there was ever so ill-bred a child. Jean, stand quiet at once, bow to madame, and thank her for her goodness." Then she went on in quite another voice to me—a sort of voice that sounded as if it had been rolled, there was such a want of inflection in it.

"You are very good, madame, but I fear to trouble you with Jean. He has not yet learned to be discreet, and he might cause you embarrassment. When he goes out it is always with his sister Idalie, and sometimes with Idalie and Marie—alone it could not be."

It is impossible to describe the sudden change in my little man's face. Poor little Jean! All the joy that had shone out through his clear grey eyes was shadowed under this sudden cloud; they now looked light and colourless.

I felt unable to conquer Madame Clopin, but I would at least be even with her, and have my way, even although I had to take hers along with it; so I announced that I would be charmed to conduct the three children to the Museum.

Jean ran away to fetch his sisters in great excitement, and then Madame Clopin went on.

"Ah, mademoiselle, if I am unhappy in Jean, I have at least one treasure—my Idalie is an angel—she is so good, so exact, so scrupulous, so pious, so watchful over the conduct of her brother, and so anxious to amend him, that she is more than I can speak of."

Here, to my surprise—for I was terribly prejudiced against Madame Clopin—a genuine tear sprang into each of the hard brown eyes, and rolled over the wooden cheeks.

I longed just then for the wonderful knack some people have of saying a word in season; but though I felt that Madame Clopin was wrong in setting one child against another, I felt still more strongly that I had better mind my own business, and keep my opinion till it was asked for. You will know by this that I do not like to be interfered with myself, and that my reticence has the attribute of that peculiarly selfish maxim, "Do as you would be done by," just as if one could always judge other people's feelings by one's own!

Well, we went to the Museum.

"Come and walk with me, Jean," said Idalie, "and Marie can go with mademoiselle."

But I told Idalie I wanted her to walk with me, and I sent the two little ones on together. Idalie was, as her people say, "ni bien ni mal"—neither good nor bad—a dull, discreet sort of child. I mentally saw the woman she would grow into—we have plenty of them in England, and I shivered—women that are always right, and therefore, as they can find nothing to amend in themselves, are for ever tinkering their neighbours.

At the Museum Jean came and nestled close up to me. I found him wonderfully intelligent about the pictures; he pointed out beauties to me which I should never have discovered for myself; and I felt more than ever the presence of a gift in the little pale, large-eyed child.

"I wonder if his mind is too active for his body," I thought to myself. "Those dark circles don't look healthy." But after we got home I saw him romping and playing with a still younger sister at one of the windows overlooking the gallery, and I dismissed the thought.

I had settled to meet some friends at Lemans, on their way to Paris; and then we were to spend a few weeks on the banks of the Loire. After that I had to visit my cousins in Brittany, so I could only stay a week longer at the Hôtel de Lyons. But I promised poor little sobbing Jean, when I said good-bye, that I would not go back to England without revisiting St. Roque. He had been with me nearly all day lately, and I had grown warmly attached to the loving, intelligent child.

Madame was not in when I started for the station, but Louison came to my room to fetch me when the carriage arrived. Jean flung himself on my sofa, hiding his face in the cushions, and the old woman signed to me to slip away quietly.

"Good-bye, Louison," I nodded as soon as I was seated in the cab at the inn door. "I will come back again to our little Jean——"

"You will have to come soon then, mademoiselle," she said, and her face grew so sad that I was alarmed; "the doctor told me yesterday, when he came to see the waiting-maid, that our Jean cannot live long; there is mischief here," she said, and she put her hand on her heart. "Ah, they will all be sorry when it is too late."

I felt stunned by this sudden news; it seemed as if I must go and take another look at our Jean. But my coachman was impatient. If I missed this train my friends would grow uneasy, so I drove off heavy-hearted.

III.

I was longer away than I had expected to be. My friends were a pair of enthusiasts, a husband and wife, artists in different ways; and they would not leave unvisited one of the many places of interest which gem the silver Loire, so that it was the end of September before I got to Dinant, late in October before I once more set forth on my way to England. I was resolved not to try the long passage to Southampton again. I would go back by way of Paris; so, of course, St. Roque was out of my road, but I had promised little Jean, and I could not break my word.

The constant change of scene, the charming conversation of my artist friends, and, after that, the delight I had experienced in my intercourse with the Breton peasantry, that strange mixture of the grotesque and the picturesque, had quieted my fears about the little uncomprehended child. But now, as I found myself driving through the quaint streets of St. Roque, with their gabled houses, and sculptured dormers and grey old archways, through which, if you took the pains to look, were to be seen every here and there lovely tree-shaded gardens, still gay with fuchsias and China roses, and stately with oleanders and stiff courtly hollyhocks—now and then with a tiny fountain in the midst, that seemed as if it laid a trap for sunbeams, and revelled in having caught them—as I drove through all these well-remembered beauties, Louison's parting words came back, and I felt a sudden keen anxiety.

Louison herself was in the courtyard when I arrived, and my first glance at her told me that no one would ever more be anxious for little Jean. She was dressed in black, and I knew how rare a custom this was in women of her class.

"Ah, mademoiselle," she said, "you are welcome, but if you could only have come a week ago."

Then she bustled on before me to my room, the same that I had had on my former visit.

"Come in," I said; but I might have spared my words, Louison followed me in, closed the door, and then she set her back against it and burst out crying.

I cried too, and for a little while we could not speak to each other.

"Mademoiselle," said Louison, "I could not help it, he loved you and you loved him, and it is all said."

"But when was it?" I asked.

"Ah, then, you did not know it, and I thought it was for that you came; only yesterday we laid him in the cemetery. Mademoiselle, did I not tell you they would be sorry? The patron, ah, poor man! he was yet in Paris, for his mother, the old madame, is of so undetermined disposition that she will neither die nor let it alone; but when our Jean was taken so—so ill, madame sent for monsieur, and he came at once. Ma foi, I should like you to have seen the face of notre Jean when his father came to him. He was on the sofa here, mademoiselle—he loved to be in this room when he could—and his eyes shone with joy. 'Do not cry, papa,' he said, for monsieur took his boy quite up into his arms, and I saw the tears coming—'I shall be quite well now thou art come. I have wanted thee, my dear papa. When I see thee I don't feel so naughty. Am I very naughty, my good papa?'

"Mademoiselle, you should have seen our Jean's eyes that moment—like a pair of stars looking straight into his father's heart.

"Monsieur did not answer. I do not think he could. Madame had come in and she stood listening, but notre Jean did not see her.

"'Papa,' the little voice said—and oh, mademoiselle, I saw the mouth twitch, and I could hardly hear him say—'Stay with me always, and then I shall be good; there has been an English lady here, and she too made me feel good. Why is it, papa, that I am so naughty to mamma and to Idalie?'

"Madame knelt down and kissed the little hand of our Jean.

"'Thou art not naughty, my love. Mamma will not think thee naughty any more.'

"Ah, mademoiselle, I think the look in our Jean's eyes just then must have been very hard to bear; for I would not have known madame. She threw her arms round him, she laid her cheek against his, and she sobbed till monsieur spoke out quite sternly:

“Margotin, agitation is bad for him—how can you be so selfish? Help me to put him to bed.”

“Then madame got up quite humbly, and went on before monsieur to her own room, and we laid our little Jean there, mademoiselle, but not for long. Sometimes he suffered, and then we heard him praying for patience and constancy; but he did not suffer long, mademoiselle. Two days ago he said to me, ‘Adieu, Louison, I am sorry to go from thee, but I am going to a better place, where I shall not make a noise or be naughty any more. I am going to le bon Dieu, Louison. Good-bye.’”

Louison buried her face in her apron, but her last words had stopped my tears. Why should we weep and lament for our little Jean? As well might the caterpillar grieve to see its fellow turn chrysalis. The bright little spirit was at rest—for ever free in the presence of that Perfectness of Beauty it had loved so ardently yet so gropingly here.

KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

A GLANCE AT ENGLISH HYMNS SINCE THE REFORMATION.

A Lecture given at the Working Men's College, Great Ormond Street.

HYMNS, although they form but a small portion in the great field of poetry, are yet a portion of it which comes home to most of us in a living way; we all, I suppose, either care for them more or less ourselves, or know those who do. I hope, therefore, that a very short sketch of the changes through which English hymns have passed since that epoch when the Reformation and the modern form of our language began together may not be without value.

We may divide the whole subject into three periods. I. That of the early Reformation, before the distinct formation of non-conforming Protestant congregations. II. That of the eighteenth century, from Addison and Watts to Cowper, which, as an intelligible name, I may call the Evangelical period. III. The hymns of the last sixty years, during which hymn writing, as a distinct form of poetry, has been cultivated with considerable success by writers representing the many religious schools which have flourished, or, at least, have come into being during our own age.

I.

All poetry, it has been often remarked, reflects faithfully the feelings, especially the highest and deepest feelings, of the time which produces it. It is obvious that this law will be especially true of religious poetry. Men may feign, for the sake of fashion or of fancy, in their other styles of verse; nor, of course, has such feigning (which we should then call by the darker name of hypocrisy) been at any time absent from their religious profession. But it is certain that hymns not written in a genuine frame of mind will have little chance of succeeding. There is, indeed, in this form of poetry one great source of “conventional” treatment, which may occur to some of your minds, and which undoubtedly renders hymns, in one way, less accurate representatives of the age when they have been written than some other forms of poetry—the drama, for example. This conventional element comes in thus. The long series of words and of thoughts which have become symbols of the Christian faith to most men, naturally form a part—too large a part, I would venture to say—of the language of hymns. They are hence apt to be cold, or, as I said just now, conventional. But beneath this formal similarity in style lie hid, as we also know, all those singular fluctuations in the mode of regarding religion which have marked every century of Christianity, and are not more clearly and decisively traceable in the nineteenth than in the thirteenth. So impossible is it to have life without change! So ineradicable the human passion for freedom and variety of thought! So idle, again, is the boast of those who maintain that their faith (whatever form it may assume) is infallible! So essentially childish the regret of those who sigh for a hopeless and never-realised unity! Yet the practical necessity under which the hymn lies of conforming always to the general code of Christian expression, and, further, of restraining itself within the obvious limits of a vocal act of prayer or praise, or, at most, of a brief series of reflections and descriptions, has undoubtedly been a serious impediment to success in hymn writing, and one which it has required real poetical genius, or the strongest religious impulse, to conquer. Upon the portion which poetry as an art should hold in the hymn, I shall say a few words further on. Meanwhile, the first period is naturally coloured at the outset with the gravity of an age when men, to whichever communion they might belong, had not only to live for their faith, but to die for it. The hymns written during the reigns of Edward VI. and Mary are marked by a solemn tone—by a prevalence of stern, didactic feeling; they are the work of men to whom life was an earnest, a painful thing; they want the happier flow of less troubled ages—the golden cadences which occur spontaneously to “hearts at leisure.” I take one specimen from the “Paradise of Dainty Devices,” a collection which, though published in 1576, represents the earlier period of which I have been speaking.

HYMN FOR WHITSUNDAY.

Come, Holy Ghost, eternal God, and ease the woful grief,
That, through the heaps of heavy sin, can nowhere find relief.
Do Thou, O God, redress,
The great distress
Of sinful heaviness.

Come, comfort the afflicted thoughts of my consumed heart:
O rid the piercing pricking pains of my tormenting smart.

O Holy Ghost, grant me
That I by Thee
From sin may purged be.

Thou art my God: to Thee alone
I will commend my cause:
Not glittering gold, nor precious stone,
Shall make me leave thy laws.
O teach me then the way
Whereby I may
Make Thee my only stay.

My lips, my tongue, my heart and all,
Shall spread Thy mighty name:
My voice shall never cease to sound
The praises of the same.
Yea, every living thing
Shall sweetly sing
To Thee, O heavenly King.

The next specimen is ascribed to Sir Walter Raleigh.

Rise, O my soul, with thy desires to heaven,
And with divinest contemplation use
Thy time, where time's eternity is given,
And let vain thoughts no more thy thoughts abuse;
But down in darkness let them lie;
So live thy better, let thy worst thoughts die!

And thou, my soul, inspired with holy flame,
View and review, with most regardful eye,
That holy cross, whence thy salvation came,
On which thy Saviour, and thy sin, did die!
For in that sacred object is much pleasure,
And in that Saviour is my life, my treasure.

To Thee, O Jesu! I direct my eyes;
To Thee my hands, to Thee my humble knees;
To Thee my heart shall offer sacrifice;
To Thee my thoughts, who my thoughts only sees:
To Thee myself,—myself and all I give;
To Thee I die; to Thee I only live!

This grave but manly character continued to mark our hymns during Elizabeth's reign; at least, there are very few that take the lighter tone which, during the latter half of it, began to show itself in other forms of poetry. There is a sense in which one might call this severity of tone Puritan; but only in so far as Puritanism is to be used to signify, not a distinct sectarian spirit, but the spirit of what was best in the religious feeling of the time. The tone of the hymns is, in fact, a reproduction of the tone of the theology: nor, had the writers been disposed to adopt the more cheerful and animated style of their secular contemporaries, would the politics, whether of Church or of State, under the first Stuarts have encouraged them. Hence, as we advance to the seventeenth century, the hymns of Donne, Herbert, Vaughan, and others of that age, including some by Habington the Roman Catholic, are deeply meditative; they are weighty with thought and feeling; there is little in our poetry which bears reading more, or better repays the reader. On the other hand, these later hymns have the faults of the time in their style; they are often over-subtle in thought or in language; they run into obscurity and fantasticality; there is a certain pleasure in quaintness, and the writings of that age give it,—but it is one of the lower forms of pleasure: they tend to forget what I may call the congregational character proper to the hymn, and fall rather into the class of the religious meditation. My first examples are from the justly-famous George Herbert.

Teach me, my God and King,
In all things Thee to see;
And what I do in anything,
To do it as for Thee.

Not rudely, as a beast,
To run into an action;
But still to make Thee preposset,
And give it his perfection.

A man that looks on glass,
On it may stay his eye;
Or if he pleaseth, through it pass,
And then the heav'n espy.

All may of Thee partake:
Nothing can be so mean,
Which with this tincture (for Thy sake)
Will not grow bright and clean.

A servant, with this clause,
Makes drudgery divine;
Who sweeps a room, as for Thy laws,
Makes that and th' action fine.

This is the famous stone
That turneth all to gold;
For that which God doth touch and own
Cannot for less be told.

Observe the curious touch of scientific observation about the properties of glass in the third stanza. Herbert was one of Bacon's main friends and counsellors in his philosophic labours.

Oh what a thing is man! how far from power,
From settled peace and rest!
He is some twenty sev'ral men at least
Each sev'ral hour.

One while he counts of heaven, as of his treasure :
But then a thought creeps in,
And calls him coward, who for fear of sin
Will lose a pleasure.

Now he will fight it out, and to the wars ;
Now eat his bread in peace,
And snudge in quiet : now he scorns increase ;
Now all day spares.

He builds an house, which quickly down must go,
As if a whirlwind blew
And crused the building : and it's partly true,
His mind is so.

O what a sight were man, if his attires
Did alter with his mind ;
And, like a dolphin's skin, his clothes combined
With his desires !

Surely if each one saw another's heart,
There would be no commerce,
No sale or bargain pass ; all would disperse,
And live apart.

Lord, mend, or rather make us ; one creation
Will suffice our turn :
Except Thou make us daily, we shall spurn
Our own salvation.

There is a strange meditative power about this poem ; something almost dramatic in its analytic insight into human nature. My next example is an elegy on the loss of dear friends, from Henry Vaughan, a poet far less known than he deserves ; a follower of Herbert's, who, if he has not all the strange, passionate intensity of his master, shows a greater fluency and sweetness. I wish I had space to quote from the charming preface (1654) to Vaughan's book, the "Silex Scintillans," in which he sets forth a little of his own life and of his ideas of hymn writing ; but it has been beautifully reprinted (Pickering, 1847), and is within reach of any who care for a little volume which they are not likely soon to weary of.

They are all gone into the world of light !
And I alone sit lingering here !
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.

It glows and glitters in my cloudy breast
Like stars upon some gloomy grove,
Or those faint beams in which this bill is drest
After the sun's remove.

I see them walking in an air of glory,
Whose light doth trample on my days ;
My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,
Mere glimmering and decays.

O holy hope ! and high humility !
High as the heavens above !
These are your walks, and you have show'd them me,
To kindle my cold love.

Dear, beauteous death, the jewel of the just !
Shining nowhere but in the dark ;
What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust,
Could man outlook that mark !

He that hath found some fledg'd bird's nest may know
At first sight if the bird be flown ;
But what fair dell or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown.

And yet, as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul when man doth sleep,
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes,
And into glory peep.

I end the first division of my subject with Charles I., rather because the race of hymn-writers seems after that time to grow scanty for awhile, than because there is much difference between their style and that of the few hymns which I know dated during the last fifty years of the seventeenth century. Some specimens by Jeremy Taylor, Baxter, Mason, and others will be found in Sir Roundell Palmer's rich collection. I must pass on to the second period.

II.

To this, which I termed the "Evangelical," belong probably the majority of the hymns sung, or sung till lately, in our churches and chapels. Most of these were either written by, or in spirit connect themselves with, the great ministers of God who, in the eighteenth century, carried on the torch of English religion, sometimes, perhaps, with too irregular and ecstatic a hand ; kindling it sometimes, perhaps (if I may pursue the metaphor), into too lurid and earthly a flame ; yet, on the whole, running their race with no small portion of the "divine breath and inspiration." To this remarkable development, however, so far as it is simply theological, I can do no more than allude ; and it must be enough to define it by enumerating the names of Doddridge, Watts, Whitefield, the two Wesleys, Scott, Toplady, and Cowper. Indeed, the first very distinguished hymn-writer we meet—Bishop Ken—is not connected with this particular religious movement. His famous hymns may perhaps be regarded as points of transition to the newer manner ; they are the earliest which really live in our churches. Addison, again, belongs to no marked theological school. Yet there are few hymns more tender and holy in their sentiment, as there are few indeed more finished in their style, than those which we owe to that all-accomplished genius. The only one I can quote commemorates Addison's thankfulness for his safety during what were, a hundred and fifty years ago, the dangers of a journey to Italy.

How are Thy servants blest, O Lord !
How sure is their defence !
Eternal wisdom is their guide,
Their help omnipotence.

In foreign realms, and lands remote,
Supported by Thy care,
Through burning climes I pass'd unhurt,
And breathed in tainted air.

Thy mercy sweeten'd every soil,
Made every region please ;
The hoary Alpine hills it warm'd,
And smooth'd the Tyrrhene seas.

Think, O my soul, devoutly think,
How, with affrighted eyes,
Thou saw'st the wide-extended deep
In all its horrors rise :

Confusion dwelt in every face,
And fear in every heart ;
When waves on waves, and gulphs on gulphs,
O'ercame the pilot's art.

Yet then from all my griefs, O Lord,
Thy mercy set me free;
Whilst, in the confidence of prayer,
My soul took hold on Thee.

For though in dreadful whirls we hung
High on the broken wave,
I knew thou wert not slow to hear,
Nor impotent to save.

The storm was laid, the winds retired,
Obedient to Thy will;
The sea that roar'd at Thy command,
At Thy command was still.

In midst of dangers, fears, and death,
Thy goodness I'll adore;
And praise Thee for Thy mercies past,
And humbly hope for more.

My life, if Thou preserv'st my life,
Thy sacrifice shall be;
And death, if death must be my doom,
Shall join my soul to Thee.

Isaac Watts is so well known a name that I am sure it would surprise some of my hearers to find, if they turned to his own book, in place of the partial selections from it, of how many remarkable pieces they were ignorant. Let me here give one which seems to me amongst the most characteristic of Watts's, whether in its dramatic directness of expression, its straightforward introduction of dogmatic opinions in which we, perhaps, shall not share, or its admirable delicacy and elevation of sentiment. It is a mere baby's hymn, indeed; yet one hardly envies the power of writing such a hymn more than the modesty with which the author speaks of it:—"Some copies of the following hymn having got abroad already into several hands, the Author has been persuaded to permit it to appear in public."

CRADLE HYMN.

Hush! my dear, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed!
Heavenly blessings without number
Gently falling on thy head.

Sleep, my babe; thy food and raiment,
House and home, thy friends provide;
All without thy care or payment,
All thy wants are well supplied.

How much better thou'rt attended
Than the Son of God could be,
When from heaven He descended,
And became a child like thee!

Soft and easy is thy cradle;
Coarse and hard thy Saviour lay:
When His birth-place was a stable,
And His softest bed was hay.

Blessed babe! what glorious features,
Spotless fair, divinely bright!
Must He dwell with brutal creatures!
How could angels bear the sight?

Was there nothing but a manger
Cursed sinners could afford,
To receive the heavenly stranger?
Did they thus affront their Lord?

Soft, my child; I did not chide thee,
Though my song might sound too hard;
'Tis thy mother sits beside thee,
And her arms shall be thy guard.

Yet to read the shameful story,
How the Jews abused their King,
How they served the Lord of Glory,
Makes me angry while I sing.

See the kinder shepherds round him,
Telling wonders from the sky!
Where they sought Him, there they found Him,
With his Virgin Mother by.

See the lovely babe a-dressing;
Lovely infant, how He smiled!
When he wept, the mother's blessing
Sooth'd and hush'd the holy child.

Lo, He slumbers in His manger,
Where the horned oxen fed;
Peace, my darling, here's no danger,
Here's no ox a-near thy bed.

'Twas to save thee, child, from dying,
Save my dear from burning flame,
Bitter groans and endless crying,
That thy blest Redeemer came.

Mayst thou live to know and fear Him,
Trust and love Him all thy days;
Then go dwell for ever near Him,
See His face, and sing His praise!

I could give thee thousand kisses,
Hoping what I most desire;
Not a mother's fondest wishes
Can to greater joys aspire.

Humble as this hymn is in its aim, I hardly know anything like it in its union of simple words and sublime ideas; nor does Reynolds himself paint childhood with a more overpowering tenderness.

You will observe how different are these hymns from those of the earlier period. They contain less expressed thought, less direct argument, but they are animated by a brighter spirit; they are not so weighty in diction, but they are more truly songs of the pious heart; they lean rather towards rendering a reverential faith than a penitential fear. Sometimes, indeed, the fervour of the age passes into an ecstasy hardly suited for public use or public recital. Such we find amongst the many admirable hymns which we owe to the Wesleys, and such also is that hymn which, in accordance with the opinion of good judges, I should be disposed to put highest within its class—Toptady's magnificent "Rock of Ages." One specimen in a less elevated key is all I can introduce, and I content myself thus the less reluctantly, because I am here in the region most familiar to our memories. It is by Charles Wesley.

The harvest of my joys is past,
The summer of my comforts fled,
Yet am I unrepentant at last,
And sink unsaved among the dead.
Nearer the margin of the grave,
Thou canst not in a moment save.

Destroy me not by Thy delay;
Delay is endless death to me:
But the last moment of my day
Is as a thousand years to Thee:
Come, Jesus, while my head I bow,
And show me Thy salvation now!

I might add Doddridge, Haweis, and Beddome, writers in a more meditative style; Logan, under whose name we have a few finished stanzas; the two great series of foreign hymns which we owe to the somewhat mystic piety of the Moravians in Germany and Madame Guion in France; and a vast variety of humble souls, whose names we perhaps read in village churchyards, and do not know that though dead, they speak to us in some of the most valued and most often-repeated of our Christian songs. But I must hasten over these and many more to the one whom I would select as the last, and, in some ways, the highest, of the Evangelical school, William Cowper. The pathetic story of his life is known, or should be known, to every one; no more strangely romantic career, no more tragic scene in the "battle between hell and heaven," can be found than that which transacted itself in Cowper's soul within the quiet village of Bedfordshire, with its level fields and calm waters, immortalised in our hearts and memories by the genius of this great sufferer. With that story the production and the character of Cowper's hymns are closely connected; the jarring tones of despair which sometimes break from them, in contrast with the exquisite air of peace and holiness by which they are also pervaded, are but a reflection of the agitated heart of a man too finely made and too sensitive for his own health or happiness. It must be also added that the type of religion accepted by Cowper is of a somewhat rigid and melancholy character, and that, writing as he did rather to relieve his own heart than under the responsibilities of poetry, he has very often lapsed into commonplace and conventional language. Yet throughout all Cowper's hymns we are sensible that they are the work of a real poet; there is a simplicity about them, an ethereality of touch, which other writers, who felt their subject not less strongly than Cowper, are unable to reach; like Herbert's, like Addison's, like even those which we owe in a later age to Byron, they vindicate the secret supremacy of the poet's art, even in that form of it where art is bound most sedulously to conceal itself. I commend this point to your attention, because it is one which has been little noticed; nay, the judgment just expressed may perhaps be in opposition to that often entertained in respect of hymns. Here, as elsewhere in every form of art, the highest excellence is reserved—not for the most religious man, not for the man most solely and singly penetrated with the Christian idea, but for him who has combined the required devotional spirit with the greatest mastery over poetry as an art. Short single effusions of first-rate merit we owe indeed to those who could not, strictly or professionally, be described as poets. But whenever there are a number accepted by the world at large as good, we find they are due to those who have practised poetry as an art: to Addison or Cowper, to Herbert or Keble. Purity of mind, simplicity, devotion, love of God and one's neighbour, openness of heart, courage of confession—all these are essential elements for those who would succeed in hymns; but, after all, and above all, we shall find that the poet has the best of it; that art is justified in her children.

Sometimes a light surprises
The Christian while he sings;
It is the Lord, who rises
With healing in His wings:
When comforts are declining,
He grants the soul again
A season of clear shining
To cheer it after rain.

In holy contemplation
We sweetly then pursue
The theme of God's salvation,
And find it ever new:
Set free from present sorrow,
We cheerfully can say,
E'en let the unknown to-morrow
Bring with it what it may.

It can bring with it nothing
But He will bear us through;
Who gives the lilies clothing
Will clothe His people too;
Beneath the spreading heavens
No creature but is fed;
And He, who feeds the ravens,
Will give His children bread.

Though vine nor fig-tree neither
Their wanted fruit shall bear;
Though all the fields should wither
Nor flocks nor herds be there;
Yet, God the same abiding,
His praise shall tune my voice;
For, while in Him confiding,
I cannot but rejoice.

Cowper's closing lines (as here) are often conventional in their expression.

Hark, my soul! it is the Lord,
'Tis thy Saviour, hear His word:
Jesus speaks, and speaks to thee;
"Say, poor sinner, lov'st thou me?"

"I deliver'd thee when bound,
And, when bleeding, heal'd thy wound;
Sought thee wandering, set thee right,
Turn'd thy darkness into light.

"Can a woman's tender care
Cease towards the child she bare?
Yes, she may forgetful be;
Yet will I remember thee!

"Mine is an unchanging love,
Higher than the heights above,
Deeper than the depths beneath,
Free and faithful, strong as death.

"Thou shalt see my glory soon,
When the work of grace is done;
Partner of my throne shalt be;
Say, poor sinner, lov'st thou me?"

Lord! it is my chief complaint,
That my love is weak and faint;
Yet I love Thee and adore!
Oh! for grace to love Thee more!

Far from the world, O Lord, I flee,
From strife and tumult far;
From scenes where Satan wages still
His most successful war.

The calm retreat, the silent shade,
With prayer and praise agree,
And seem by Thy sweet bounty made
For those who follow Thee.

There, if Thy Spirit touch the soul,
And peace her mean abode,
Oh with what grace, and joy, and love
She communes with her God!

There, like the nightingale, she pours
Her solitary lays,
Nor asks a witness of her song,
Nor thirsts for human praise.

Author and Guardian of my life;
Sweet source of light Divine;
And, all harmonious names in one,
My Saviour! Thou art mine!

What thanks I owe Thee, and what love,
A boundless, endless store,
Shall echo through the realms above
When time shall be no more!

III.

After Cowper we may conveniently date the beginning of the hymns of our own age. I do not mean that many of those written since his time are not very similar in sentiment and in style to those of the eighteenth century; yet even in these one may gradually and, as it were, silently trace the operation of those general changes in our ways of thinking and speaking from which no one can escape; whilst these general changes have also brought about the more important effect that hymns have ceased to be the work of one large school of religious thought, and represent now those many movements amongst which our parents and we ourselves have lived, and which it is neither necessary nor desirable that I should here attempt to criticise. Looking, however, at the new or revived modes of theological impulse as they have influenced hymns, I think it will be allowed that a great and a very useful range of sentiment and of style has been hence added to this portion of our literature. I do not call upon any one for approval of the opinions which he may not share, or may even regard with alarm and hostility. Yet, on the whole, I venture to claim that we shall find the best side, that which is most true or most tender, in each religious phase, reflected in its hymns. Partly from the very idea of the hymn as an act of praise or prayer, partly from the large and generous spirit of poetry herself, those tones which jar upon us when they are heard in other spheres of literature are, more or less, sweetened and harmonized in song. The sects clasp hands here; hymns High and Low, Evangelical and Ritualistic, the words of the Established Church and of the Chapel, those even of the early and mediæval periods of Christianity, meet together in our hymn-books, and are heard from the same lips; they express that deep underlying unity of conviction in which we all share far more than we are ourselves conscious of. I shall, therefore, simply select a few which appear to me typical specimens of the best hymns of this century; premising that I will choose original hymns only; the vast majority of those which have been recently translated—especially those from ancient sources—appearing to me heavy and awkward as poetry, often trivial in thought, and rarely in true or natural unison with modern faith or feeling. The body of hymns translated from German sources, and those from the much overrated hymns of the Latin Church (including such as Mr. Neale's popular "Jerusalem," which, however, I venture to pronounce both clumsy in diction and essentially materialistic in its ideas), are those here specially referred to. Of such performances as the hymns in celebration of individual saints, which occur in some recent collections—uncouth Latin versified in more uncouth English—however earnest and well-intentioned from the translator's point of view, it is not necessary to speak.

Bishop Heber, during the first quarter of the century, left us a set of hymns, written in a finished style of much elegance, and valuable from the manly and intelligible character, which is not a universal attribute of the modern hymn. They are also remarkable for the skill with which the natural landscape is introduced, a feature to which they probably owe part of their popularity. The Missionary Hymn is a well-known example. I select one which is not so familiar:—

I praised the earth, in beauty seen
With garlands gay of various green,
I praised the sea, whose ample field
Shone glorious as a silver shield;
And earth and ocean seem'd to say,
"Our beauties are but for a day."

I praised the sun, whose chariot roll'd
On wheels of amber and of gold;
I praised the moon, whose softer eye
Gleam'd sweetly through the summer sky;
And moon and sun in answer said,
"Our days of light are numbered."

O God! O Good beyond compare!
If thus Thy meaner works are fair,
If thus Thy bounties gild the span
Of ruin'd earth and sinful man,
How glorious must the mansion be,
Where Thy redeem'd shall dwell with Thee!

With Heber's manner, too often slightly artificial, and not free from the jingling cadences and tinsel commonplace which are the weak side of the school of Byron, compare some stanzas of charming artlessness by the great imaginative painter, William Blake:—

Can I see another's woe,
And not be in sorrow too?
Can I see another's grief,
And not seek for kind relief?

Can I see a falling tear,
And not feel my sorrow's share?
Can a father see his child
Weep, nor be with sorrow fill'd?

Can a mother sit and hear,
An infant groan, an infant fear?
No, no! never can it be!
Never, never can it be!

And can He who smiles on all
Hear the wren with sorrows small,
Hear the small bird's grief and care,
Hear the woes that infants bear,

And not sit beside the nest,
Pouring pity in their breast?
And not sit the cradle near,
Weeping tear on infant's tear?

And not sit both night and day,
Wiping all our tears away?
Oh, no! never can it be!
Never, never can it be!

He doth give His joy to all:
He becomes an infant small,
He becomes a man of woe,
He doth feel the sorrow too.

Think not thou canst sigh a sigh,
And thy Maker is not by:
Think not thou canst weep a tear,
And thy Maker is not near.

Oh! He gives to us His joy,
That our griefs He may destroy;
Till our grief is fled and gone
He doth sit by us and moan.

Milman, Grant, Montgomery, Kelly, may be named amongst those who have done themselves honour during the first half of this century. The character of the hymns of that period is refinement and moderation; they avoid the overwrought expressions and decided dogmatism which repel or attract us in the Olney and the Wesleyan collections; they are free from the over-subtle thought and fantasticality of the later Elizabethan writers. On the other hand, these hymns, generally speaking, strike one as wanting in spontaneity and fervour; they have too little of the character of the song; they are literary and meditative. These aims are carried to their highest development in Mr. Keble's "Christian Year," probably the most successful collection of English hymns by any single writer, Watts only excepted. This famous series is, however, too reflective in character, and often too obscure or too subtle in sentiment, to fulfil the common vocation of the hymn. Like the fervent and singularly varied collection which we owe, in late years, to Dr. Bonar, the "Christian Year" is more for the reader than the church.

As the influence of Byron and of Scott are perceptible in the hymns of Bishop Heber, so Keble has some of Wordsworth's felicity in phrase, much of his delicacy, much of his meditative tendency; but in force and in simplicity he must be ranked, on the whole, far beneath his great master. It is very high distinction for a writer to be fairly nameable with Wordsworth,—of all our modern poets the one whose individuality (when fully manifested) is the most individual. Bearing this in view, it would be no disrespect to Mr. Keble if we named him a Wordsworth in twilight. This definition is borne out, not only by the general tone of sentiment and of reasoning, but by the details of the "Christian Year,"—the graceful landscape sketches, the selection and structure of the verse, the cadences of the rhythm. It is difficult to choose one hymn suitable throughout for recitation, and, at the same time, capable of doing justice to the writer's peculiar excellences. Perhaps a few stanzas from the well-known "Evening Hymn" may best show how high a point of success Keble could reach when he employed the simple style which a hymn demands:—

Sun of my soul! Thou Saviour dear,
It is not night if Thou be near:
O may no earth-born cloud arise
To hide Thee from Thy servant's eyes.

When round Thy wondrous works below
My searching rapturous glance I throw,
Tracing out wisdom, power, and love,
In earth or sky, in stream or grove:

Or by the light Thy words disclose
Watch Time's full river as it flows,
Scanning Thy gracious Providence,
Where not too deep for mortal sense:

When with dear friends sweet talk I hold,
And all the flowers of life unfold;
Let not my heart within me burn,
Except in all I Thee discern.

When the soft dew of kindly sleep
My wearied eyelids gently steep,
Be my last thought, how sweet to rest
For ever on my Saviour's breast.

Abide with me from morn till eve,
For without Thee I cannot live;
Abide with me when night is nigh,
For without Thee I dare not die.

There is a peculiar subdued fervour, a repressed passion about the "Christian Year" which leads the way to the more emphatic expression which marks the hymns of our own immediate time. This quality has been occasionally carried into want of taste and moderation; yet, on the whole, we must recognise in the collections of the day a more genuine perception of the real purpose and character of the hymn. It would be easy to find examples of extravagance in manner from recent hymnals; but my object is to set before you the best things of every age; those in which the style is seen at the most advantage. The three following specimens appear to fulfil this purpose, although every one will perhaps be able to name others with a similar claim for selection. The first, by Mr. Keble's friend, Dr. J. H. Newman, is one of the most beautiful poems of the kind in the language, and like most of the writer's, is equally marked by severe purity of taste and pathetic simplicity:—

Lead, kindly Light, amid th' encircling gloom,
Lead Thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead Thou me on;
Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

I was not ever thus, nor pray'd, that Thou Shouldst lead me on;
I loved to choose and see my path; but now
Lead Thou me on!
I loved the garish day, and, spite of fears,
Pride ruled my will: Remember not past years!
So long Thy power has blest me, sure it still Will lead me on
O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone,
And with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

By a writer unknown to me is the following, remarkable also for its simplicity and pathos; qualities which I should place among the very highest of those demanded in this province of poetry:—

Christ will gather in His own
To the place where He is gone,
Where their heart and treasure lie,
Where our life is hid on high.
Day by day the Voice saith, "Come,
Enter thine eternal home;"
Asking not if we can spare
This dear soul its summons there.
Had He ask'd us, well we know
We should cry, "O spare this blow!"
Yes, with streaming tears should pray,
"Lord, we love him, let him stay."
But the Lord doth naught amiss,
And, since He hath order'd this,
We have naught to do but still Rest in silence on His will.

Many a heart no longer here,
Ah! was all too truly dear:
Yet, O Love, 'tis Thou dost call,
Thou wilt be our all in all.

Mr. Lyte's singularly elevated and truly-felt stanzas—lately spoken of to me as "almost perfect" by the greatest poet and judge of poetry of our own time—may properly close this long, but I hope not uninteresting series:—

Abide with me; fast falls the eventide;
The darkness deepens: Lord, with me abide;
When other helpers fail, and comforts flee,
Help of the helpless, O abide with me.

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day;
Earth's joys grow dim, its glories pass away;
Change and decay in all around I see;
O Thou who changest not, abide with me.

I need Thy presence every passing hour;
What but Thy grace can foil the tempter's power?
Who like Thyself my guide and stay can be?
Through cloud and sunshine, Lord, abide with me.

I fear no foe with Thee at hand to bless;
Ills have no weight, and tears no bitterness;
Where is death's sting, where, grave, thy victory?
I triumph still, if Thou abide with me.

Hold Thou Thy Cross before my closing eyes;
Shine through the gloom, and point me to the skies:
Heaven's morning breaks, and earth's vain shadows flee;
In life, in death, O Lord, abide with me.

F. T. PALGRAVE.

THE AUTHOR OF "THERE'S NAE LUCK ABOUT THE HOUSE."*

1710—1765.

MORE than a century and a half ago, long before James Watt was born to give new life to the district, Greenock consisted of two little seaports, a quarter of a mile asunder, with a wide bay between. The inhabitants in the one were mariners and mechanics, and in the other mariners and foreign traders; and the combined population did not number a thousand.

Both seaports had fair harbours for the period, and both enjoyed the privilege of holding yearly markets. These were frequented by the Highlanders, who, descending in companies from the neighbouring mountains—with peaceful intentions for once—disposed of their native stock, and laid in stores of what were by comparison foreign commodities. But in each of the towns the great centres of activity were the quays, where the gabberts and the fishing-boats, with now and then a large vessel, lay-to. The best houses were built round the quay-heads, in the old fashion which enabled men and women to look down upon the stir produced by their trades, and to combine the indulgence (in a way no longer possible) with air and light, and even

* And are ye sure the news is true?
And are ye sure he's weel?
Is this a time to think o' wark?
Ye jauds, fling by your wheel.
Is this a time to think o' wark,
When Colin's at the door?
Rax me my cloak, I'll to the quay
And see him come ashore.
For there's nae luck about the house,
There's nae luck at a';
There's little pleasure in the house
When our gudeman's awa'.

And gie to me my bigonet,
My bishop's satin gown;
For I maun tell the baillie's wife
That Colin's come to town.
My turkey slippers maun gae on,
My hose o' pearl blue;

It's a' to please my ain gudeman,
For he's baith leal and true.
Rise up and mak a clean fireside,
Put on the muckle pot;
Gie little Kate her Sunday gown
And Jock his button coat;
And mak their shoon as black as slaes,
Their hose as white as snaw;
It's a' to please my ain gudeman,
For he's been lang awa'.
There's twa fat hens upo' the bauk,
They've fed this month and mair;
Mak haste and thrav their necks aboot,
That Colin weel may fare;
And spread the table neat and clean,
Gar ilka thing look braw;
For wha can tell how Colin fared
When he was far awa'?

Sae true his heart, sae true his grace,
His breath like caller air;
His very foot has music in't
As he comes up the stair.
And will I see his face again?
And will I hear him speak?
Tired-out and dizzy w' the thrail,
In troth I'm like to gae!

Since Colin's weel, I'm weel content,
I hae nae mair to crave;
Could I but live to mak him braw,
I'm blest alang the aye.
And will I see his face again?
And will I hear him speak?
I'm dounright dizzy w' the thrail,
In troth I'm like to gae.
For there's nae luck, &c.

with the view of blossoming gardens, waving woods, and green fields; for Greenock and Crawford's-dyke alike commanded the grand silver sweep of the Frith of Clyde and its lochs, thrown up against the dark mountain land of Cowal, which included Finnart More and Argyle's Bowling-green.

In the house of one of the shipmasters of Crawford'sdyke, Jean Adam was born about the year 1710. The education she received in the parish and sewing schools must have been good; and it was very soon put to use. In consequence, probably, of her father's dying when she was young, Jean entered, while yet a girl, the service of a clergyman in the neighbourhood—Mr. Turner of Greenock, it has been suggested. Here she united in her own person the offices of a modern bonne, a nursery governess, and a sewing maid. A minister's income could not furnish great remuneration for such assistance. Even highly trained sempstresses at that time were in the habit of giving their skill and industry, together with the use of their fashionable patterns, for "sixpence a day and their meat." But if young Jean Adam got small payment in crown pieces, and fared on pease brose, nettle kail, and barley meal scones, she was made so far one of the minister's family, and was allowed some small share of the priceless treasure of leisure to cultivate her faculties. Not only had she free access to the stray folio of romances and rhymes which is said to have stirred her up to the exercise of her gift, but also to Milton's poems, and the stately, artificial English versions of the classics on the bookshelves in the minister's study. A taste for reading in such circumstances must have been comparatively rare, and there is evidence that Jean was encouraged and applauded in its gratification.

Thus in the west country manse young Jean Adam found a home. And it was whilst busy knitting the minister's stockings, helping to make the clothes of his wife and children—boys and girls alike—taking her turn at one of the many spinning wheels, which in their combined droning were fit to drive the worthy minister distraught over his sermons, nursing the little ones, and attending on the sick, that she drew near and curtsied to the muse. For other experiences of life and livelier diversion than what was afforded by the minister's dusty, heavy volumes, she would doubtless have the news of the parish and port. She would tell what lad and lass were forgathered and on the eve of being "cried in the kirk" (Anglice, having the banns published), what boat was amissing, and what bare-footed and shock-headed caterans had crossed at the Clock ferry for no good. She must also have attended many entertainments both mirthful and solemn—penny weddings and dirgies, rockings and tent preachings.

Doubtless, too, on occasion she would go to the fair of Inchcolm—the great highland fair at Largs—where, besides getting a glimpse of the "horrid heights" of Goatfell and the rocky wildness of Ailsa Craig, screaming with its wild fowl, she would see more stirks and wethers, and hear more Gaelic, than in any other assembly on this side the Clyde. And if she got a cast in a wherry as far as Glasgow, she would land at the little rustic quay of the Broomielaw; not so big or so busy then as either of those at Crawford'sdyke or Greenock. Next, she would cross the old bridge, below the arches of which the Highland boats, with their familiar red sails, and their patriarchal freight of cattle, sheep, butter, cheese, eggs, and bright-dyed yarn, passed up the river as far as Rutherglen. Besides the Cross, the College, the High Kirk, the Laigh Kirk, and the new Ramshorn Steeple, she would be certain to visit the imposing metal statue of King William, presented to the city a short while before by Governor Macrae, of Madras, whose brother was the Ayrshire fiddler in utmost request at kirns. She would get a glimpse of the grand town houses, with their rows of trees and gardens, and of the high walls and palisades of Blythswood and Shawfield, shut off from the streets like the old family hotels of Paris; she would stare awestruck at the Virginian merchants themselves (the noblest, most magnificent men she could ever have beheld), cadets of the county gentry—the Walkinshaws, Porterfields, Glassfields, and Buchanans. These merchants wore velvet breeches, scarlet cloaks, braided with gold or silver, and cocked hats above their wigs. They promenaded, as if with the kind intention of making a public show, before the Exchange and on that side of the Trongate which at certain hours of the day was respectfully set apart for their private use. And if Jean had any hankering after the full stream of ruder life, she had liberty to make her way through the narrow lanes and the hurrying throngs of the Saltmarket, the Gallowgate, and the Candleriggs.

No portrait of Jean as she was at this or at a later time is preserved; nor has any tradition handed down her bodily likeness. Her friends of other generations have to fall back on their fancies, and from analogy puzzle out her physical traits. Was she not a raw-boned, irregular-featured, ruddy lass, somewhat uncouth in air and gait, and at once half bashful and half bouncing in manner? Was not her bearing full of simplicity and straightforwardness, while the fire of enthusiasm and earnestness dwelt in the large grey eyes under the bushy brows, and a world of warm womanly sympathy and lovingkindness spoke in the full soft mouth? Then as to dress: for a gala trip to Glasgow, and a night or two under the hospitable roof of her own or the Turners' kindred, she was pretty certain to wear a well preserved Indian cotton gown, and a bon grace straw hat. But when down at the manse of Crawfurdsdyke, she would boast nothing better than a woollen petticoat and a short gown of striped linen within the house; and for a tramp across the moor, a blackberry-gathering with the bairns, or a turn on the quay, she had only to throw over her head the tartan screen of plaid, which kept its hold in this district long after it was given up in others. Such was the becoming attire of the Lanarkshire and Ayrshire women.

The great glory of Jean's life, attained whilst she was yet a young woman, was the publication by subscription of her volume of poems. The first piece she is said to have written was nothing more formidable than "An Address to Grief," which, however, was much admired by her friends. She continued to write, her poems getting scattered about. They were collected by a Mr. Drummond, of Dymnack, and printed in a little volume by James Duncan, in the Saltmarket, Glasgow, in 1734. The curious Address to the Reader, which opens the volume, was not written by Jean, but by one of the Crawfurds, her patrons. It gives a short account of the author, and expressly refers to the literary advantages she had enjoyed during her service in the manse.

Whether the book was published before or after she had quitted this household, which in course of time had no farther need of her, is uncertain. But be this as it may, the list of subscribers shows no lack of friends in her native place. The names of Crawfurds are there by scores, from Dame Margaret of Castlemilk, to the relict of Mr. Thomas Crawford, advocate. There are baronets and lairds of that ilk, and their ladies; noble Temples and Montgomerys; ministers of the gospel and students of divinity in abundance; masters of grammar schools, condescending generously to encourage a sister rival; and merchants and tradesmen down to hammermen and portioners.

If Jean's literary venture was not a great success in a mercantile light, it was at all events well received by her contemporaries. And one advantage, quite distinct from its pecuniary success, it certainly won her, and that was the honour, by no means slight in those primitive days, of being in most circles welcomed as a poetess. And this was an honour not often vouchsafed by the traders of the west. Within the next fifty years the appointment of master to the grammar school of Greenock was hampered by the stipulation that the master should thenceforth abandon the profane and unprofitable art of poem-making.

On leaving the manse Jean set up a day-school for teaching girls of her own degree reading, writing, and needlework. According to tradition it was situated among the notabilities of the quay-head. She had for a number of years now presided over her samplers, quilting frames, spelling-books and primers, before the great journey of her life was undertaken. She must have been hard upon middle-age when she closed her school for six weeks, and travelled to London and back, in order to obtain an interview with Richardson, the creator of her idol, Clarissa. It has been questioned whether it was within her walking capability to accomplish the long journey at the rate of twenty miles a day, as Helen Walker, the original of Jeanie Deans, did, impelled by a much more powerful motive. But, with an occasional "lift" from a coach or a chance traveller, it is quite possible that Jean Adam may have accomplished her cherished purpose. She was very much the hare-brained, hardy woman who, for such a cause would have encountered the fatigue and danger which a long journey then involved. The matter, however, is one of hypothesis; nobody can actually tell, at this date, whether Jean performed her exploit or not. Her scholars believed she did. And if so, it may well be asked where—among all the extremes of society which met in the London of Lord Chesterfield and George Whitefield, of Lady Mary Wortley Montague and Lady Huntingdon, of Vauxhall and Moorfields—could there be found a stranger figure than that of the travel-soiled, mazed Scotch schoolmistress? Of all the decorous, sentimental ladies who fluttered round this genius of a dapper little printer, and petted him—what worshipper so unsophisticated, so arch, and so likely to fill him with wondering trepidation as this wild, pure-minded, high-hearted Scotchwoman?

Jean had a little circle at home, by which she was known, loved, and well remembered. This was the kindred spirits among her scholars. One day she introduced into their studies the startling novelty of reading aloud to them from Shakespeare. The play was Othello; and she read it with so much effect, and was herself so much moved by her own reading, and by Shakespeare's writing, that at last she "swerfed" (swooned) away in the tumult of her thoughts and feelings. These were the days of fine lady swooning. And Jean, with her ambition and her imperfect education, was not so circumstanced, in spite of her natural sincerity, as to be above affectation. She had a craving for refinement, and refinement was then believed to culminate in the languishingly vague impersonation, "a delicate female." But she was rather out of order in appreciating Shakespeare so heartily; for hers was not the age of hearty enthusiasm for the dramatist, whom it mincingly termed "the Swan of Avon."

Jean indulged her scholars in other intellectual treats. She sang her own songs (would we had more of them to sing!) in her school-room "many a time." And we may be sure that she did not "swerf" away after one of them; on the contrary, one may picture her nodding her head, stamping her foot, and cracking her fingers, in the most benign satisfaction.

But the grim realities of life were fast coming on Jean. It so happens that the loveliest lyric on wedded love is generally believed to have been written by an unwedded woman, the song of wifely pride and tenderness, which comes nearest to Burns' "John Anderson," to have been the utterance of the subtle sympathy and latent affection of a woman who never owned a husband. Of all Jean's acquaintances, gentle and simple—merchants, masters of grammar-schools, and ship captains—not one sought, or at all events was successful in the search for her hand. Yet, in her large-heartedness and quick impulsiveness—towers of strength, if but well restrained—Jean Adam was as little capable of standing alone in the world as the silliest and weakest of her sex. Among her many talents, practical wisdom did not hold a place. That London journey, and the closing of her door for weeks beyond the brief space allotted for holidays, was a dubious step as regards the prosperity of the school. Scarcely less doubtful was the reading of Shakespeare's play to the children of sternly matter-of-fact and rigidly-righteous folk—descendants of the play-banning Covenanters in their chief seat, the West. Doubtless a new and more accommodating schoolmistress would be readily found, whose fruit and satin pieces, in the easily dazzled eyes of the young daughters of the sea captains, would put out fine linen quilting, and whose strength of mind would not be such as to lead her to fly in the face of their fathers' and mothers' principles with regard to the vanity of Othello.

What told sorest on Jean was an exceedingly rash speculation into which she entered. The single edition of her poems did not all get into the home market. Think of this lone woman—her hair growing grizzled under her bon grace—occasionally having herself rowed up, wind and tide in her favour, on a Wednesday half-holiday or a Saturday afternoon, to make searching inquiries of Mr. James Duncan in the Saltmarket as to the sale of her book, her anxiety for his answers balancing any over-weening vanity of which she might ever have been guilty. Time has robbed these incidents of their prosaicness, but left them their poor human interest. Jean was sanguine still, however, and shipped the surplus copies of her poems to Boston in America, from which she never got any return of sale. In addition to the mortification and disappointment this caused her, it swallowed up what little savings she had gathered; and thus she was left destitute when well advanced in years.

In her extremity she had no resource but to seek help from the old friends whom she had seemed to have more or less offended and alienated by her waywardness and eccentricity. She had now no home or resting-place among her lass-bairns at the quay-head of Crawfurdsdyke. Calm and storm might succeed each other on the watery highway; the golden sun might set, and the silver moon rise behind the mountains of Cowal; Dutch and French skippers might take the place of the Highlandmen and chatter their gibberish in room of the sputtered Gaelic; more and bigger ships in full sail, and with flags and garlands flying at the masts, might ride in on the rising tide; and happy family groups might sally forth to welcome the returning sailors; but Jean Adam would not be there to see. She had ere this "taken her foot in her hand," according to the old half piteous, half scornful proverb, and gone trudging in sun and wind, in rain and snow, from clachan to village, from farm-town to laird's place, wherever she could hope to "fend" through such work as she could still do.

A townsman and gallant biographer of Jean Adam has tried to free her memory from the degradation of having become a beggar at last. Nor is it at all likely that Jean was ever a beggar outright. But it is certain that she was a wandering hawker of whatever ability still remained to her to shape and sew, to bake and brew, to nurse the very young, and wait on the very old. The scant recollections which are handed down, though sorrowful ones in their way, bear out this softened version of Jean's reduced condition. Mrs. Fullarton, an old scholar, told her daughter of Jean's coming to her house in this character. Mrs. Fullarton said that she had offered her old clothes, which she at first proudly declined, until pressed by necessity or rebuked by her sensitive conscience for haughtiness of spirit unbecoming her situation, she at length came back and took away. This was natural behaviour on the part of a poor, half-dependent woman, but it was not the behaviour of a beggar.

Jean eventually returned to the state of service of her youth. Nor was she too old a woman to be capable of it, although the best of her days were past. Her fingers were waxing stiff and her eyes dim. What had been but play to the light heart of youth, with all the world before it, was a dreary darg to the heavy heart of advanced life, that had known better things, and was now without any refuge under the sun save the grave. Probably it was because she was proud in her downfall—the hardness of her fate having soured the natural sweetness of her temper—that no friend interposed to prevent the end.

On the 2nd of April, 1765—in the spring, which is so softly balmy and tearfully bright in that Scotland of the west, Jean stood once more within the shadow of King William's statue and of the grand mansions of the Virginian merchants. Stumbling into the presence of the merchants themselves, she went on in her faded tartan screen and dragged gown till she skirted the Trongate, and vanished in the crowd of the Gallowgate. She was more footsore than if she had made another journey to London, more faint-hearted than when she "swerfed" away after the reading of Othello. Her high spirit and tender heart were fairly broken. But a new dawn was breaking for her, and a Friend was waiting for her in a land that was very far away, yet very near. Jean Adam was admitted into the Poorhouse of Glasgow, by an order from two of the baillies of Greenock, as "a poor woman in distress, a stranger who had been wandering about." She died there the next day, and was buried by the parish.

Jean's champion attempts to establish the fact, that the Poorhouse of Glasgow was then more of a hospital than a poorhouse, and that various persons, quite different from modern paupers, found refuge under its roof, and died there. Very possibly he is right. The years since the '45 were not so many but that men and women more highly born and delicately nurtured than Jean had been, might, at the very date of her death, have been thankful to live and die within those despised walls. Nevertheless, even a hospital bed was a woeful last home and death-bed for Jean Adam; and "a stranger who had been wandering about" was a woeful title for the author of "There's nae luck about the house."

Jean's poems in their subjects as well as their style bear internal evidence of the source from which their inspiration was drawn. We have such titles as, "On Creation," "On Redemption," "On the Method of Grace," "On Abel," "On Joseph," "On Astrea," "On Lucretia," "On Cleopatra," and so forth. These poems are what might be expected—the unconscious reflection and echo of Jean's studies. They made no pretension to originality, and the claim which was set up for them—that of correctness of phrase and propriety of figure—would not get them a moment's hearing in the present day. Like most echoes, they are monotonous, formal, and inflated; frequently they are childish; occasionally they are quaint. The most quaint in plan are, "A Dialogue between the Soul and Curiosity," and "Curiosity and the Soul about the keeping of the Ten Commandments."

But it is not easy to judge Jean Adam by these poems. The English language was, in truth, a foreign tongue to her. She was not playfully coquetting with it, but struggling laboriously and painfully to master it in such earnest, indeed, that she changed her very name to meet its supposed requirements—writing Christian and surname on her title-page, "Mistress Jane Adams." She might have succeeded in reading it with relish, but she could never write it without cramping impediment. But set her to her native dialect, and she could, and did write very differently.

It is not necessary here to go into the dispute regarding the authorship of "There's nae luck about the house." It has been settled by competent authorities, and common consent now awards the song to the simple woman, Jean Adam, instead of to the scholar, William Julius Mickle.

Tradition has something to say as to the originals of the song. They were popularly held to be a couple named Colin and Jean Campbell, who lived at Crawfurdsdyke. "Jean made a great work about her man," and no necromancy was needed on the part of her neighbour and namesake to interpret and utter Jean Campbell's feelings, on the return of her husband from one of his longer voyages.

The local scenery throws light on some details of the song; whilst other details, as graphic and still more minute, illustrate the prosperous middle-class condition of the heroine and the hero.

"And are ye sure the news is true?
And are ye sure he's weel?"

the song begins in a fond realisation of bliss, so great that, for a moment, it cannot be credited.

"Is this a time to think o' wark?"

follows, in the full extravagance of joy.

"Ye jauds, fling by your wheel;"

and then the triumphant, loyal lilt of the chorus, glad in proportion to the former rueful, lonely independence, sounds out clearly:—

Page 53.

"For there's nae luck about the house,
There's nae luck at a';
There's little pleasure in the house
When our gudeman's awa'.
Is this a time to think o' wark
When Colin's at the door?
Rax me my cloak—"

She has servants to do her bidding; she has already issued her orders to her lasses:—

"I'll to the quay
And see him come ashore."

The "bigonet," or high-cauled, starched matron's cap, above the comely face, now flushed with honest delight; the "bishop's satin gown," the "turkey shoon," and "hose o' pearl blue," were more or less costly articles of dress, proving the rank and wealth of the woman who could afford to wear them. So, too, a hundred and thirty years ago were little Kate's "Sunday gown," and Jock's "button coat." The motive for putting them on in each case is the artless art of a heart which both loves and honours its master:—

"'Tis a' to please my ain gudeman,
For he's been lang awa'."

The two fat hens reposing, unconscious of their doom, on "the bauk," are a picture in one line of homely "couthiness," and the record that the hens have been fed

"this month and mair," pleasantly suggests how Colin has been watched and waited for.

"Mak haste and thrav their necks about" sings like a cruel summary sentence of death; but the wholesale destruction was in the best of causes,—

"That Colin weel may fare;
And spread the table neat and clean,
Gar ilka thing look braw."

And here how much of the mistress survives in the wife! The duty was discharged ungrudgingly; and most graceful was the compliment paid to the enviable Colin. He must have been a good fellow to have been so doted on after many years had tried his worth. But it is also on the cards that he may have been a gruff and surly bear, or a dry and stiff dog of a man. Still the wistful question is sweet:—

"For wha can tell how Colin fared
When he was far awa' ?
Sae true his heart, sae smooth his speech,
His breath like caller air—" and the joyful woman runs on:—

"His very foot has music in't
As he comes up the stair."

This innocently insane delusion of the wife's, chiming in as it does with a host of similar precious hallucinations, has made so deep an impression, that Jean's townsman thinks it right to append an explanation making known its peculiar significance. Those big, braw houses on the quay-head, with their foreground of land-locked water—ship and boat and mountain, seen doubled by their shadows, and their background of flowery gardens (full of Ayrshire roses as well as cockle-shells) and wooded heights, had also wide outside stairs, with steps of sounding Norway deal, on which women sat and worked, and children played, and which Colin coming back to his jewel of a wife might climb two at a time.

The last verse is the climax of the whole—the natural ineffable melting of the tremulous laughter into a sudden shower of tears, all glistening as they temper the broad sunshine of the heart:—

"And will I see his face again?
And will I hear him speak?
I'm downricht dizzy wi' the thocht;
In troth I'm like to greet," followed up quickly by the recovered bell-like ring:—

"For there's nae luck about the house,
There's nae luck at a';
There's little pleasure in the house
When our gudeman's awa'."

SARAH TYTLER.

CARTES DE VISITE.

Now that every bookseller's window is converted into a portrait gallery, and the public demands some knowledge of the personnel, as well as of the deeds and speeches of men of eminence and notoriety, the carte de visite has become such a great institution that it is worthy of some special notice. These handy little records of old familiar faces stand in the same relation to the grand portraits that grace the National Gallery and the drawing-room that small change does to gold or paper money. They are the democracy of portraiture. As the sun shines alike upon peer and peasant, so when he wields the brush he is equally impartial, and you may now purchase in Seven Dials as good a picture as regards mere likeness as can be procured in the more aristocratic quarters of the town. When we reflect upon the horrible effigies the last generation of the middle and the upper portion of the working classes were satisfied with—upon the miserable silhouettes snipped in black paper on board the penny steamers—upon the "likenesses in this style four shillings," the value of the photographic portrait comes forcibly before us. But the very fidelity with which this new art copies what is set before it, renders it all the more necessary that the operation should be both skilful and artistic. It does not always follow that persons in the highest station command the best portraits. It is notoriously otherwise, in fact, with regard to the highest lady in the land. There has scarcely been a good portrait recently taken of her Majesty. This seems perfectly unaccountable; but we understand that the same etiquette which would not allow the chafing-dish to be removed which burned the Spanish king except by the proper official, will not permit of the artist posing his august sitter. The best attitude, the most agreeable light, the most pleasing expression which he may select, or call forth from the ordinary sitter, is denied to him by the court rules of the lady whose carte de visite is the most universally in demand. When Prince Albert was alive all etiquette was banished; he himself with his artistic instincts posed his Royal Consort, and the photographer found the most delicate part of his work done for him. At present the Queen merely takes her seat, and intimates through her secretary that she wishes to be taken in a certain attitude, and the artist has nothing to do but to comply with the order. It must be evident that photographs taken under such circumstances cannot be very satisfactory. Even such as may turn out well never reach the public, inasmuch as her Majesty purchases for her own use all the best negatives, prints from them being taken by her own photographer. There is one photograph of the Queen, crowned and with the royal robes, the history of which seemed a mystery, but the explanation of it is this: a well-known photographer took a likeness of the Queen of Spain similarly attired, which she forwarded to her Majesty, desiring a similar return carte. This is the only regal instance, we believe, of an exchange which has become so common in society.

The public does not appreciate the fact that very careful dressing is required to obtain a satisfactory audience of the sun. Sol is even more inexorable than any court flunkey in such matters. The public seems to think that the sun takes cognizance of any colour that may be presented to him, and finds out its mistake when too late. Yellow or orange may suit the brunette, and mauve, or the lighter shades of blue and grey, may harmonize with the blonde; but in the camera it is far otherwise. The yellow ray of the spectrum does not affect the silver plate, whilst mauves, purples, and blues do most actively; thus when the printing process reverses the shades on the photographic plate, the yellow becomes black, and the delicate light colours above mentioned print nearly pure white. Thus sitters sometimes become so altered in their photographic portrait that they scarcely recognise themselves. Gloriana with golden hair comes forth with raven tresses, and the yellow rose in Rebecca's coiffure is as black as the locks they adorn. A certain class of people, again, like the sun to register their finery. Ladies who but seldom go to court, wish to make the most of the occasion, quite regardless of the fact that stiff brocades, especially during the crinoline fashion, give anything but an elegant contour to the figure. There has been of late, however, a very great improvement in this respect, and all the better class photographers have learned to impress upon their sitters the value of simplicity, both as regards pose and dress.

In certain quarters of the town, however, the rage for pretence is as great as ever, both on the part of the sitter and the photographer. It will be observed that the lower the neighbourhood the more varied the amount of properties or scenic decorations to be found in the studio. Possibly the carpenter would prefer being taken working at his bench, but the photographer, who artfully prefers pleasing Jones's wife, places him upon a terrace with a far-stretching landscape as a background. Servant maids, again, are seated in splendid boudoirs, and respectable tradesmen are placed in extensive libraries, whereas the only books they feel at home with are their day-books and ledgers. All this is the mere snobbery of the art, which we rarely see practised in better-class studios. A flat grey background, which throws up the figure without cutting up its lines, is now almost universally employed. Nevertheless the ignorance that is occasionally displayed by people of the better class with respect to the manner of taking the photograph would scarcely be believed. On one occasion two ladies entered the sitting-room of a studio, and placing themselves before a mirror, after some time wished to know if the portraits were not finished, evidently thinking the looking-glass was the operating agent. In another case we heard that a young lady intimated her desire that her hair should be made a little longer; and it has been desired that even jewellery should be omitted in a portrait, the sitter making no attempt to remove it herself. One old gentleman in the country even sent up the colour of his hair to the colouring artist of the Stereoscopic Company, and called four days afterwards to inquire if the portrait was done! Young lady sitters during the present fashion of dressing the hair are not photographed to advantage, the chignon affording a very unsubstantial foundation for the head-rest.

The rage for the carte de visite, which has lasted so long, seems at the present moment to be on the decline, or rather we should say other sizes are now becoming saleable, which formerly was not the case. The reason of the popularity of the carte de visite is obvious. The small size of the picture employs only the centre of the lens—its truest part—hence the clearness and the sharp definition it gives to the features; but what is gained in these particulars is lost in modelling and half-tones, which give all the delicacy of expression to the face which we see in cabinet photography and the vignette heads. These latter are generally cut out of large existing photographs, and are not taken for the occasion. The beauty of some of them, especially of the leading actresses, is pretty sure, we think, to bring the new size into fashion.

The sale of cartes de visite is scarcely a fourth of what it was when they first came into vogue. All our photographic albums are filled; the whole of our friends are represented; and the celebrities of the day and children now mainly keep the photographers in employment. But the sale of noted individuals and of the Royal Family is still immense. Some of the wholesale houses do an enormous business in this article.

The Messrs. Marion, in Soho Square, alone possess the cartes of many hundred thousand persons. This house does not photograph, but merely purchases of those who do. The possession of negatives of famous persons is a fortune to a man. Mr. Mayall, of Regent Street, who has photographed nearly all the Royal Family, has been paid by the house of Marion alone, upwards of £35,000 for cartes de visite of its various members. The Stereoscopic Company, which photographs, as well as purchases negatives of any celebrity that may be inquired after, possesses a portrait gallery which includes every known person of any distinction. It is scarcely necessary to say that any matter which brings an individual into public notice at once raises the value of his carte de visite. Tom Sayers's battle with Heenan sold fifty thousand of his cartes de visite. The gallant bearing of the Queen of Naples placed her photograph in every album in the kingdom. Many a man, through some accidental circumstance, wakes up and finds himself famous, and in two or three days his carte de visite is staring at him from every window in town. If any illustrious person is reported ill, there is an immediate inquiry after negatives, and as the pigeon-holes of Printing House Square are always kept well supplied with biographical sketches of statesmen about to depart this life, so the photographic printer anticipates their death by keeping a large supply of cartes de visite in hand. We scarcely know whether a statesman would be pleased or shocked at such an anticipation of his decease. It may not be pleasant for any man to know that others are eagerly making a market out of such an event; but then, on the other hand, it must be highly flattering to know that when he has gone hence and taken with him the original, he has left so many copies behind. Whether it was that Lord Palmerston had, during his lifetime, discounted his popularity, or because of any reaction which has occurred with respect to his memory, we know not; but it certainly is an undoubted fact that his carte de visite is no longer called for, whilst those of many of his cotemporaries, now deceased, are still in very fair demand. Thus, Cobden is still largely sold in the market, possibly because he represented a principle which is dear to the hearts of his countrymen. Next after royalty, the photographs of statesmen, we are told, sell the best; but even the most eminent of these are local in their sale. The politics of our leading men may be even guessed by the district in which their cartes de visite sell. Thus, Bright sells largely throughout the north, whilst in the west he is never inquired after. Next to statesmen, the largest demand is for actresses, especially operatic singers. When Jenny Lind was on the boards her carte de visite sold very largely, but nothing like that of Adelina Patti, which has quite astonished the photographers themselves. The Messrs. Marion alone have sold, within these last three years, fifty thousand copies of the portrait of this popular singer. In France also, there is a very large demand for actresses and singers, but for no other persons of eminence. Our neighbours seem to care nothing for their statesmen, great men of letters, artists, or great religious teachers. Their homage, as indicated in this particular instance, is often of a sensual nature, and many of the photographic pictures which disgrace the windows of the sellers of photographs are published either in Paris or in Brussels. The sale of clergymen of the Church of England is also very large, especially of those whose names have been brought prominently before the public, such as Keble, Pusey, Neale, Mackonochie, and of course the leading bishops. We have spoken of a photograph of Dr. Pusey, but this is not strictly accurate: he never would have his carte de visite taken, although pressed to do so, and on one occasion was offered a bribe of a hundred pounds for a charity with which he was connected. The carte we see of him in the windows is from a sketch taken surreptitiously while preaching. There is a carte de visite of the Bishop of Oxford holding up his fingers after the ancient method of giving the blessing, which caused some scandal at the time, and which is now withdrawn from sale; but a colonial bishop, Dunedin, now boldly stands forth in the same attitude. His see being so far distant, little notice has been taken of this portrait. As a rule, portraits of dissenting clergymen are not at all in demand. Of course, we except Mr. Spurgeon from the rule. It is difficult to account for this fact, unless we are to suppose that the dissenting element in the population, as a class, care less for art than church people and those who move in society. It cannot be that they are less attached to their pastors, or that they prize them less highly than church people in a spiritual sense.

What has become of what were once termed pistolgram portraits? An instantaneous method of securing a likeness is no doubt a great desideratum, but we question whether, with our present means of posing the sitter, anything like a natural expression would be thereby secured. The act of posing a sitter is by no means calculated to secure a natural expression. Indeed, most people enter a photographer's studio with the same flutter they do the operating-room of the dentist, certainly with scarcely less nervous trepidation. In both cases the "patient"—we use the word advisedly—has to screw his courage up to the sticking point. The sight of the tooth-drawing instrument may give a slight shock to the nerves, but we question if the effect is as visible on the countenance as that produced by the photographic manipulator gently pushing back the head until it is brought up by the head-rest—that terrible instrument, which sets all the lines of the face into spasmodic contractions, effaces, like the touch of death, all expression, and reduces the flexible human countenance to the condition of a mask. If the sitter recovers this touch of cold iron, the photographer's warning voice to "remain quite still" while he removes the cap of the lens and exposes you to the searching eye of the camera, generally settles the business, and renders the first negative a failure. With such instruments of torture, used as they are generally without discretion, the pistolgram would only have the effect of giving the expression at the very worst, just as the first shock has paralysed or contorted the expression. Photography, where living muscle is concerned, cannot be performed successfully at express speed. The best and most artistic operators are well aware of this; they allow the sitter to become accustomed to the sight of the instrument, just as a good groom in breaking in a horse makes him look quietly at every object likely to make him "shy." Again, all good photographers are aware that what is termed a good taking day, such as is favourable for printing from the negative, is by no means favourable for producing the highest specimens of his art. The full blaze of the sun, however shaded from the camera room, never yields those tender half-tones which give all the charm to a really fine likeness. Although the sitter may be in a room whose northerly aspect may wholly exclude the direct rays of the sun, yet his penetrating influence affects the whole firmament, and the effect is that the silver of the plate is affected so quickly in the higher lights that no time is permitted for the drawing of the delicate half-tone, without which a photographic portrait is worthless. Hence a slightly cloudy day yields by far the best picture. Of course we do not mean a foggy day, especially a yellow foggy atmosphere, such as we get in November; on such occasions the photographer cannot work, the whole face of nature being reduced to the tone of the room where he manipulates his negatives, in which yellow fog is simulated by yellow blinds. In the majority of cases the very clear definition of the picture gives a hardness which is not agreeable, and which the human eye never shows us. The iris is continually in motion, becoming larger or smaller to accommodate itself to the amount of light or to the distance at which objects are viewed. A certain softness is the result, which ordinary photographs do not give. We may illustrate what we say with reference to the hard outlines of some photographs by the effect they have when viewed in the stereoscope compared with the natural objects they represent. Stereoscopic pictures always look like hard clay models, they lack all the softening effects of the atmosphere. Stereoscopic views are particularly unpleasant, to our mind, for this very reason—atmospheric perspective is wanting in them; and although the different objects seem to be round, yet those parts situated on different planes seem as though they were but flat surfaces placed one before the other, just as the fly side-scenes at a theatre seem distinct from the back scene. The late Mr. Claudet, who was really a scientific manipulator, perceived this error in ordinary photography, and patented a method of giving softness to his portraits which rendered them like fine mezzotints. This he did by means of a movable lens in his camera. A very slight movement broke up the almost metallic sharpness of this outline (which, we repeat, we never see in nature), and gave most agreeable portraits. The colour, again, of the photograph has a great deal to do with its pleasant appearance. A cold, grey portrait, which some photographers seem to admire, is not nearly so agreeable as those of deep chocolate colour, so full of warmth in their shadows. Mr. Ernest Edwards, who has given us such a fine portrait gallery of our medical men, has appreciated this fact; so did Silvi, who a few years ago most certainly stood at the head of all our photographic artists as a taker of cartes de visite, but has now retired from the profession.

Whilst we are referring to the question of colour, let us enter our protest against the barbarous practice of painting photographic portraits with oil colour. The absurdity of this practice is evident enough to the artists, who are only the servants of the public in this respect. When water colour is used, the photograph is printed specially light; the transparency of the colour, however, allows all the incomparable drawing to show through, and the result is the most charming. Possibly the miniatures of Messrs. Locke and Whitfield are unmatched by the finest miniature painters of the metropolis in many particulars; but how different the result when the heavy oil colour obliterates with its material daubs all the phantom-like grace of the sun's pencil! It is urged as an excuse by artists who thus misuse their powers that the photograph is apt to fade in tropical countries very speedily, and even in temperate climates after a time—the effect being to remove as it were all the drawing upon which the colourist has based his picture. It is possible that the silver process is liable to this objection where a tropical sun has to be withstood, but the discovery of the process of printing portraits in carbon altogether removes this objection. The carbon photograph is absolutely indestructible, and there can be no longer any excuse for the use of any other material than water colour in the tinting of sun pictures.

It is a very common thing to hear a person say, "They never succeed with my photograph." We admit that the portraits of our friends are capital, but our own are "not a bit like." And there is something more than mere egotism in this remark. How few are the positions of one's face with which one is familiar! We never see our side faces; it is very difficult to catch a glimpse in the mirror even of a three-quarter pose of the countenance; hence many photographic portraits of ourselves are wholly unknown to us. Although the mere raw outline of a face may be given as well by an indifferent lens as by one of the best, yet a likeness, in the highest sense of the word, can only be obtained by the most artistic photographers with the best appliances. These advantages can only be commanded by the photographic firms that are largely employed by the public, and have been trained by large practice. It is vain to look for anything like an artistic performance from men who have left some trade or handicraft for the more profitable camera. It is by such hands that the many hideous likenesses to be found in most carte-de-visite albums are produced.

In France they have a keen appreciation of the difference between a good and a bad photograph. They produce some of the very best and some of the worst. At the last Fête of St. Cloud, near Paris, there was a photographic van placed in a conspicuous position to make a trade of taking cartes de visite during the progress of the festival. On the outside of the van was a printed bill containing the following announcement:—

PHOTOGRAPHIC AMBULANTE.

FÊTE DE ST. CLOUD.

CARTES DE VISITE.

La douz. 3 francs.	Air de Famille 5 francs.	Ressemblance garantie. 8 francs.
-----------------------	-----------------------------	-------------------------------------

Thus the skill of the operator was nicely adjusted to the wants of the sitter. When mere quantity was required, three francs a dozen only was demanded, but a family likeness must be paid for liberally; and for a guaranteed resemblance the highest charge of all was demanded.

Three or four years ago, among the novelties photographers are ever seeking after, what was called the diamond cameo photograph was brought out. The plan consisted in taking four different views of the face of the sitter on one carte. The photographer employed a small camera and small lens. A simple arrangement within the camera enabled him to expose a section only of the plate at once, which, having received its impression from one portion of the sitter's head, was shifted so as to receive another, and so on until the four were taken. Before being exposed in the printing frame, the negative was covered with a mask of perfectly opaque paper with oval openings, to show neatly and clearly the four pictures to be represented. The object of masking the negative was to protect the intervening space on the slip of the sensitised paper from the action of the light, so that it might appear perfectly white, while the sharp ovals representing the heads were more or less dark, making a striking contrast. The plan did not, however, succeed, for the reason that the sitter did not recognise his own face in some of the positions in which he could not see it in the glass; hence the fashion speedily died away.

But to return to the carte-de-visite mania. In these days of advertising, when so many people are clever at keeping their names well before the public, it is not to be supposed that the photograph is overlooked. When we scrutinise the scores of faces that gaze upon us from the booksellers' windows we cannot help remarking that some heads are repeated with a pertinacity that is by no means commensurate with their real character. Upon inquiry, such individuals will be found to make capital out of this forced notoriety. Actresses, in particular, imagine their fame depends upon the profusion with which their cartes de visite appear in public. In cases where the sitter is very celebrated, and is sure to sell well, it is becoming the custom to demand a royalty for the use of the negative. We believe Tom Sayers was the first to set this fashion, just after his famous fight with Heenan. Not only did this worthy sell his "mug," as he termed it, to one of the sporting publishers, but he engaged to give them the exclusive copyright in it, to the exclusion of all others. But actresses and pugilists are not alone in this desire to be constantly before the public. The pedestrian may recognise the face of more than one clergyman who takes this means of keeping alive his popularity, and we more than suspect some physicians of taking the same course of increasing their practice. It is a refined method of advertising, which cannot well be brought home to the individual; moreover it has this advantage over the newspaper puff, that its cost is defrayed directly at the public expense.

For the direct and avowed purposes of trade the carte de visite has not been so extensively used as may have been expected. Large numbers are printed for the purpose of showing delicate designs in glass and in gold and silversmiths' work by the Stereoscopic Company—a most legitimate exercise of its use; and it would be well if, as far as advertising purposes were concerned, these useful sun pictures stopped here, but we were lately favoured with an ingenious application of its powers as a begging medium. A card with the portraits of six children reached our hands, with a printed flyleaf to the interesting family picture to the following effect:—

"CHILDREN TO SAVE.

"Advertisement sent to a few taken from the 'London Court Directory.'

"The father of these British-born Protestant children is an elderly gentleman, ruined by competition in business, and past beginning life again; and the mother is in a very precarious state of health. To seek for adopters is against parental instinct; and besides it may ultimately come to that, as by the time their schooling is over, in ten or fifteen years, they would most likely be orphans, and their willing adopters would be welcome to it [sic]. At present, the father, in his alarm for the fate of these creatures, seeks for some that would pay, not to the father, but to good boarding-schools, for their clothing, keeping, and tuition; and after school time, see that they should not want. Willing benefactors are therefore requested to state what they would feel inclined to do for each child they may point out by one of the numbers given at the foot, to Alphabet, till called for, at the Post Office, No. 1, Liverpool Street, Moorfields, E.C., enclosing card or addressed envelope, to insure correct address, if a reply should be wished for."

The children are all duly numbered at the foot of the carte de visite, and the whole affair affords a most ingenious application of the art to the purposes of this new sort of pattern post, setting forth specimens of juvenile raw material. Whether this audacious male cuckoo succeeded in dropping his six little responsibilities into any domestic or scholastic nest, we do not know, but the attempt shows that the begging fraternity know the value of photography.

The whole tribe of rogues who feed upon the credulity of mankind have also found out its powers of filling their pockets. The following advertisement touches a very tender chord, and we have no doubt is greatly successful:—

"Your future husband or wife's true carte de visite.—Mr. H—, the celebrated astrologer, will send the true carte de visite of your intended, with name, age, and date of marriage, for sixteen stamps. Three questions answered for two and sixpence. State age and sex. Send stamped directed envelope. Address, Mr. H—, — Villa, — Road, Notting Hill, London. Answer in two days."

This advertisement has appeared in many of the penny papers, and no doubt has eased a considerable number of servant maids and clerks of their stamps. It must certainly create a sensation in any man's or woman's mind to break the seal of the astrologer's letter, and draw forth the picture of the mate that is to be. It is, in fact, the magic mirror brought home to every door at the smallest possible cost. We must confess, however, that the specimens of promised wives and husbands we have seen have not been such as to tempt others to know their matrimonial fate by return of post.

But photography lends its aid as easily to the rogue-taker as to the rogue. The public may not be aware that there is a photographic album at Scotland Yard, in which may be seen the carte of every ticket-of-leave man in the country. The charitable regulation which allows a convict his liberty before his sentence has expired, is burdened with the condition that he must report himself personally once a month to the police authorities wherever he may happen to reside. Before leaving the prison, his photograph is taken by the prison authorities, for the purposes of identification. It is, of course, for him to resist; if he does, he is not allowed his liberty. One carte de visite is kept in the police album at Scotland Yard, another at the station-house of the division of the metropolis in which he may select to reside, and a third is forwarded to any country district he may wish to remove to. When the carte de visite and the prisoner arrive at Scotland Yard, a sergeant of each division of the force is called in to inspect both portrait and sitter, in order the better to identify him by the aide of the little carte, in case he should fail to put in an appearance. It is scarcely possible to conceive a carte taken under less agreeable circumstances. The ticket-of-leave man's album is, indeed, a strange psychological study. The individual who opens it is prepared to find a villainous portrait gallery of low foreheads; but his anticipations are by no means verified. Very many heads are those of the ordinary population, no better and no worse. Now and then the odd-shaped head, the curious formation of the eye, the full animal jaw, prove that we are gazing upon men predestined by nature to commit acts of criminal violence, or to perpetrate petty thefts. Sometimes a strikingly handsome countenance appears full of intelligence—be sure that man is a forger, or a delinquent in some of the higher branches of fraud. We asked the superintendent who kindly showed us the book, if any of the police would be justified in taking any man into custody on the strength of the carte de visite alone. The reply was guarded—"not on the carte alone, but certainly after previous identification of the individual." Appended to each carte de visite, there is a most graphically written description of each prisoner, especially of any particular marks he may happen to have about his person. These are powerful aids in identifying any runaway, for there is scarcely a living person that does not possess some mark about the body, not easily obliterated, that would lead to his identification. This is especially the case with the criminal population, and with the class from which convicts generally come. With a strange perversity they are in the habit of pricking in with gunpowder all sorts of marks—suns, stars, anchors, &c.—on the fleshy parts, brands, in fact, which can never afterwards be removed. In this respect they seem altogether to lack the cunning of the lower animals, many of which, as the sportsman well knows, have the tact to hide in "cover" so assimilated to that of their own body that they are overlooked. The scars, again, which men living by violence are sure to carry about them, in many cases make the police officer as certain of his man as the grazier is of sheep.

There are cases, however, in which identification of an absconding rogue by such marks, or even a comparison of his face with a photograph portrait, is out of the question. For instance, when Redpath some years since absconded, there were no means at hand by which the detectives could identify him. It was supposed that his negative would be found in some of the photographic houses, and upon inquiry Mr. Mayall had one. A large number of photographs were printed and distributed among the police force, and before long he was detected just as he was about to sail from some port in the north of Europe. In this case he was, we are informed, much disguised.

Only a short time since, Mr. Pollaky, the private detective, made a bold stroke by the aid of a carte de visite. He was in search of a fraudulent debtor, a Mr. Gray, and one evening, whilst in the Stadt Theatre, in Vienna, he recognised a gentleman elegantly dressed who most completely answered the appearance of a photographic portrait in his possession. Without loss of time he arrested him; he turned out to be the veritable man he was in search of, and he afterwards ascertained that he had taken his passage and was about to leave Vienna by the night mail for his port of departure.

A far more interesting group of carte-de-visite portraits are those left by friends at the police-office of persons that are missing. Young ladies' portraits in such quarters especially look out of place; but there are many such. One cannot contemplate them without a feeling of pity or commiseration. Some of them have placed shame between themselves and home; some the dark water. We fancy the carte de visite is of little avail in such cases.

Viewed commercially, no art matter of modern introduction has made such extraordinary progress as photography; and this may be especially said of that branch of it which relates to carte-de-visite portraits. At the present time the sale of these amounts to between sixteen and eighteen millions a-year. As we have said before, the demand at present is nothing like what it was. In the years 1860—62 no less than between three and four million cartes were sold of her Majesty. Sometimes the cartes of illustrious persons, owing to peculiar circumstances, sell at greatly enhanced prices.

Thus when the Prince Consort died, his carte was in great demand at ten shillings each. The execution of the Emperor Maximilian and the assassination of President Lincoln produced a sudden demand for their portraits, with which the supply could scarcely keep pace. But independently of the trade in cartes de visite, a score of other tradesmen have been either greatly stimulated or brought into life by the new art. The demand upon the precious metals, gold and silver, has been very great; enormous quantities of glass are required for the negatives; the same may be said of cards; the making of albums employs thousands of persons. Cabinet-makers have additional employment in making the carved "properties," chairs and tables, garden balustrades, cabinets, that are so plentifully used. The chemists are required to furnish large supplies; the lens makers have been rendered equally busy; and we may add employment has been afforded to a large amount of labour, very much of which we are glad to see has fallen to young ladies. In short, the introduction of photography generally has marked a new era in the arts, and the higher branches of manufacture, and as far as we can see is destined to a further development year by year.

Amateurs are not as a rule successful in portrait-taking, but we must make an exception in favour of a lady, Mrs. Cameron, whose life-size portraits may be seen in a shop in Bond Street. These are taken with the large lens, and, without the appearance of art, are yet most artistic portraits. The head of Alfred Tennyson, with its flowing locks, and calm, grand expression, shows us the power of photography in large—if we may so speak. Mrs. Cameron has a fine sense of light and shade, and the heads she has taken remind us of the noble pencilling of Corregio, so grandly are the masses of light and shade disposed.

It is not uncommon, we hear, for some of our best portrait painters to aid their pencil with photographic life-size sketches of their sitters, and they need not feel shame at allowing Phœbus to be a guide to their brush in the matter of likeness, and in the arrangement of broad effects of light and shade. It has been objected that these life-size portraits are always disagreeable, in consequence of the roughness they give to the skin. This is quite true of photographs taken with a small lens, and afterwards magnified to the life-size; but this difficulty is entirely got over by the use of a large lens, which has scarcely any magnifying power. Mrs. Cameron's portraits are perfectly free from any roughness by reason of her adopting this process; and more life-like heads than those shown in the windows as specimens of her art we have never witnessed. These large-sized heads, when artistically coloured, are so life-like that the spectator can scarcely help thinking a living individual is looking at him.

ANDREW WYNTER.

A SUPPER IN A CARAVAN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PEGGY'S HAVEN."

BEHIND the Mitre stables, at Monkworth-cum-Barns—low, grey flint stables that were once the ruined Abbey's granaries—and the back gardens of a row of sleepy old houses, still called the Precincts, there is a patch of waste land, given up to dust-heaps, battered saucepans, smashed pottery, crownless hats, mildewed odd shoes, and a rank growth of docks and stinging nettles. Per se, it is not an attractive prospect, or rather retrospect; but in the days of my youth it was flooded, for a week or two before Easter, with mystically golden light. The wilderness blossomed like a Lent lily; for it was here that the proprietor of the Blue Waggon went into spring-quarters in readiness for the coming fair.

His booth and properties were packed beneath a tarpaulin on the roof of his caravan, his two horses were put up in the Mitre stables, and for a fortnight he lived in mysterious retreat, with his great dog, his family, and his company. It was to prevent these last from becoming cheap through exposure to unpaid-for glances that he had selected this retirement behind the stables. The legend ran that he took them out for airings in the small hours, muffled up like Eastern women. At any rate, muffled or unmuffled, they were never-seen abroad by day. The Blue Waggon, therefore, was as good as a haunted house. A brooding atmosphere of secrecy in-ised its indigo sides, its red wheels daintily picked out with black, its green-shuttered, white-blinded windows, and its green-panelled, brass-knocked front-door. "Peter Pogson, Stage Waggon," seemed a very prosaic inscription for such a poetical vehicle to bear. We boys of the Precincts, seated on the back-garden walls, used to watch its advent with awe-hushed joy, as it came lumbering through the back gateway of the Mitre yard—its two-windowed house-front, staring full at us whilst it slowly moved along sideways, suggesting thoughts of a crab from Giant Land. There was a giant inside, and, perhaps, he had something to do with this confused association of ideas.

It is needless to say that we often dropped from the garden-walls during Mr. Pogson's absence, and endeavoured to get a glimpse of the interior of his residence; but these enterprising efforts were rendered fruitless by the vigilance of a brindled bull-mastiff, almost as big and as fierce as a puma, tethered by a very long chain to the near forewheel. His name, at full length, was Grimaldi; but he answered to the very appropriate soubriquet of Grim. For the most part, therefore, we had to content ourselves with the nodding acquaintance which we bragged of possessing with Mr. Pogson and Mrs. and Miss P. when they took in turns their walks abroad. We were all good customers at fair time, and, in a condescending kind of way, they were very affable to us. Under these circumstances, I was a proud and happy man when I was invited to take a pipe and potluck ad libitum in the Blue Waggon. The fact that my manhood was taken for granted in the proffer of the pipe, of course, had much to do with my delight, but the mysterious exclusiveness of the mansion to which I had at last obtained the entrée, had far more. Outside the circle of his co-professionals, no one, as far as I was aware, had ever received such an invitation from the proprietor of the Blue Waggon before. The circumstance that he never found it convenient to repay the small loan which had secured me this striking proof of his favour was a mere dust-pinch in the other scale. In those salad days I would gladly have lost ten times as much, if I had had it to lose, to get on terms of intimacy with "professionals." Such familiarity seemed a far manlier phase of "fastness" than furtive smoking of penny pickwicks.

In the bygone time, when Mr. Pogson figured as a clown, he had been known amongst printers of playbills and the general public as Pablo Fernandez; but on his retirement from dramatically-performing public life—in consequence of a broken thigh, so badly set, that, in his own professionally facetious phrase (in allusion to his waddling gait), he was “goosed” for life—a compromise was made between his private and public names, and he was thenceforth known, both in “the profession” and amongst the profanum vulgus, as “Pab Pog.” Almost the only trace of his old calling which he retained was a tendency to turn in his toes and puff out his pockets. He never stooped to anything so trivial as “Here we are agin,” or, “Fine day to-morrer. How was yer?” Such rare facetiæ as he now indulged in were almost wholly confined to private life. When he thumped the drum, and blew down into the Pan’s pipes, in front of his own entertainment, he would, however, sometimes condescend to vary his monotonous music, and “walk up, walk up,” with confidential assurances to the young women in the al fresco crowd, that “their young men was hall hinside, and ‘ud cut their throats if their gals didn’t cut in harter ‘em;” or by informing some aged Benedict that “he’d jist seen ‘is hold ooman a-kissin’ of a smart young hoffer.” Managerial responsibilities had not sharpened Pab Pog’s wit. “Respectability” was the rôle which he affected now. He “dressed the part” in a drab hat with a mourning band, and broad, up-turned, green-lined brims; sandy whiskers, clubbed in a blunt V, on his once closely-shaven cheeks and chin; a jet-brooched, crumpled white neckcloth, black coat and waistcoat, baggy cord breeches, with a bunch of greasy keys and seals dangling at the end of a broad strip of watered black silk ribbon, and a pair of big boots, very deep as to the tanned tops, very long as to the striped flaps, very crinkly as to the legs, and very broad as to the toes. The general effect of his get-up was a medley of the Ethiopian serenader, the undertaker’s man, and the horse-dealer; but Pab was of opinion that his responsible appearance was far more efficacious in drawing houses than even the coloured cartoon hoisted at fair-time above his caravan—an illustrated canvas sheet about the size of a brig’s mainsail. When, however, he had been thumping, piping, joking, pulling out his watch, and rattling his money, fruitlessly, for ten minutes at a stretch, if his daughter made her appearance on the little platform, in her abbreviated muslins and wreath of red-calico roses, to give one clink of her castanets, one spin of her tambourine, one swirl round on her red-rosetted toe, and then to bound in again as if she had invisible wings, or her white shoes were soled with india-rubber, the enamoured youth of Monkworth-cum-Barns would clatter up the show steps like a storming party.

In spite of our little town’s monastic name, our hearts were inflammable by beauty. I must confess that it was pretty Polly Pogson—such was her name in the boots and stockings of domestic life, although in her fleshings she was known as “Mademoiselle Zephyrine, Beneficent Queen of the Fairies,”—it was Polly, I say, that constituted in my eyes the crown of my bliss in getting admitted to the Blue Waggon on the easy footing of a family friend. Mrs. Pogson—a fat, slovenly, good-natured woman, with a double-chin, and always one, sometimes both, stockings down at heel, who took the coppers, and had an inimitable knack of frying sausages and making welsh-rabbit, but who, when I knew her, was not otherwise remarkable—had been a columbine in her youth, and proudly fostered the hope that the Zephyrine, ere long, would almost equal her mother’s performances in “legitimate business” in that line—performances which Mrs. P. believed to rank amongst the most fondly cherished traditions of the stage.

But at the time of which I write, Mademoiselle Zephyrine was the only female member of her father’s company. It had two male members: one, “The Original Giant Bluebeard Blunderbore;” and the other, “The World-Famous Gentlemanly Dwarf, Signor Jacopo, who was cradled in a Silver-Gilt Pint Pot, and now appearing in his celebrated tragic-comic part of Jack the Giant Killer, as performed before all the Crowned Heads of Europe, the President of America, the Great Mogul, and the Sultan of Timbuctoo.” The Giant, the Dwarf, and the Fairy Queen were depicted on the mainsail, in one of the most impressive tableaux of the piece in which they performed—the Giant a good deal larger than life, the Dwarf a good deal smaller than life, but the Fairy Queen, as all her admirers declared, with unanimous indignation, not half so beautiful as life. Long before the days of the burlesque-writers, playwrights took liberties with mythology. Didn’t the Attic tragedians do so? At any rate Pab Pog’s poet had done so in the one act (and one scene) drama, which, it was almost otiose for the manager to intimate, had been “hesspressly written for his hew-neck gal-láxy of hunrivilled talent.”

“The Giant, the Dwarf, and the Genius:

Bluebeard Blunderbore, Brave Jack the Gentleman, and the Beautiful and Beneficent Queen of the Fairies," was the long title of the brief tragi-comedy. A flat rock in the middle of the stage, and a flatter wood at the back, constituted the scenery. Grunts like the gasps of an asthmatic elephant, and steps like the thuds of a pile-driver, are heard behind the wood. Bluebeard Blunderbore enters, and leans upon his club. A beard of blue tow reaches to his waist in front, blue locks hang down to his waist behind, blue moustaches curl like buffalo-horns beneath his drooping nose. His gabardine is sulphur-hued, and girt with a broad blue belt that holds a gore-stained scimitar. His turban is crimson, and studded with a crescent of glittering Bristol stones. His slippers are crimson likewise, turned up at the toes like skates, and wooden-soled like clogs. "I have lost my voice," he pipes (a fact ingeniously worked in by the poet). "For ten long days and nights I have not tasted human blood. I am a-weary. Let me repose." He lies down in front of the rock, licks his blood-streaked weapon with the frantic tongue of famine, and then falls sound asleep. Jack the Giant-killer rises from behind the rock, in a flaxen wig, a court-suit of black-cotton velvet, dress sword, silk stockings, buckled shoes, a cocked hat under his arm, and green glasses on his cocked-nose. "Mine eyes are dim," he murmurs, mournfully. "Alas, my vision is impaired" (another fact ingeniously worked in by the poet). "Tears for the sufferings of my race have done the deed. 'Tis well. I see not now how grievously they suffer. Yea, heaven is ke-yind, when most it doth seem harsh. The monster haunts this spot. Could I but find him!" He draws his rapier, and prods vigorously at vacancy. At last he stumbles over the giant's feet, and shouts exultingly, "Ha! have I found him? Have at thee, fiend!" The giant rises drowsily, muttering, "I smell the blood of an Englishman." When fully awake, he swings his club with one hand, and mows away with the scimitar in the other; always carefully avoiding Jack, who keeps on pricking away at the giant's legs in the most valorous style. But presently Jack lowers his point, and sighs sadly, "Once more the dimness! The hour hath not yet struck. But boast not, Blunderbore—the clock is warning now. Au revoir—brute!" Jack runs round and round the rock, with the giant after him. Jack's foot trips and the club is just descending on his head, when the wood suddenly opens, and the Queen of the Fairies, in white and blue, rose-red and flesh-pink, bounds upon the stage, waves her flower-wreathed, streamered wand, spins round upon her right toe, curtsies her acknowledgments of the applause which greets her pirouette, and then inquires, in a tone of arch solemnity, "Bluebeard, where is thy—WIFE?" The giant is conscience-stricken, he lets fall his weapon, and Jack, briskly getting up, slays him with the utmost facility. Jack and the Fairy Queen then dance round the prostrate corpse together, plucking its beard as they go by. The Fairy Queen executes a protracted pas seul, and when she has complied with the usual encore—waited for, if it does not come at once—the curtain falls upon her Elfin Majesty standing upon one leg on Bluebeard Blunderbore's shoulder, whilst Jack strikes an attitude at his feet, ejaculating, as he takes off his green spectacles, "Their occupation's gone. I thank thee, heaven!"

Such is my cold middle-aged remembrance of the thrilling drama at which, calida juventute, I used to assist as long as my coppers lasted. At the close of each performance, Pab Pog looked in to announce, "Now, ladies and gen'lmen, and nobility o' the vicinity, them as stays pays agin. We takes yer money. and you takes yer choice." My choice was always to stay whilst my money held out—not nearly so much on account of Blunderbore and the Giant-killer, as to feast my eyes upon the bounding Zephyrine, and applaud her to the echo. The piece seemed very flat until the flat wood split in two—an effect in which there was occasionally a hitch: since the Fairy Queen had to be her own scene-shifter, and in spite, or rather because of, her magic wand, sometimes made a mull of the business.

Such being my loyalty to the Pogson family, I thought myself cruelly ill-used when I first presented myself at the door of the Blue Waggon. I had spruced myself up for the momentous occasion, carefully brushed off the dust which I had contracted in scrambling over the garden wall, and marched boldly up the doorsteps. Grim, impressed by my unwonted confidence, had contented himself with a series of still-suspicious growls. Everything as yet had gone well. Mrs. Pogson put her papered head out, when I knocked. "Well, sir, the master ain't at home," was her reply, when I had explained my business; and then, holding the door barely a-jar, she engaged in a very rare conference with her daughter. "He says your father have a-ast him, Poll," I heard her whisper. "Drat the boy! He can't come in now—we're all in a mess, and Bluebeard is a-shavin'."

"Oh, is it on'y one o' them boys?" was Zephyrine's indifferent response, and then she made some further satirical remark, as I could judge from the giggle in which mother and daughter joined.

Before she had composed her countenance, Mrs. Pogson again put out her head. "P'raps you'd better call when Mr. P.'s in, young gentleman," she said. (Zephyrine's satire had indisposed her to honour me again with a grown-up "sir.") "He've jest gone up the Mitre yard. If you want him, you're pretty sure to find him in the tap."

But I was in too Naaman-like a mood to go in search of the showman; I turned and went away in a rage, almost tumbling off the steep little ladder; and, as soon as I reached the ground, Grimaldi made a rush at me, as having been detected in the imposture which he had all along suspected.

The next time I saw Pab Pog, I informed him somewhat sulkily of my fruitless visit to his residence. He had plainly forgotten all about his invitation, and did not seem very eager to renew it. His little account with me being still unsettled, however, he compromised matters by remarking, "Well, you see, sir, it would be hill-convenient to us purfeshnuls if strangers was to come droppin' in permiskus like. But if you'll take a snack with us to-morrow night, at nine sharp, we shall be proud o' the hhonour o' yer company. You'd better wait till you see me a-comin' back wi' the supper-beer, for the dawg's safe to bite at night. I can't make out 'ow 'twas he come to let yer go by as you did. But you're sure your mar won't objec', sir? I'm a respectable man, and don't want to make no words in the vicinity."

It was galling that the man who had so recently invited me to take a pipe and pot-luck, should talk as if he thought me under absolute petticoat government. But there is a bitter to every sweet; and it was very sweet to think that I might sit by Zephyrine's side at supper, and actually see that ethereal creature eat and drink. What did she feed on? Honey-dew? The giant and the dwarf, too,—what were their unearthly viands?

Next evening, the instant Pab Pog issued from the Mitre yard, I was at his side. He carried a foaming pot of porter in each hand, and a can of the same beverage slung upon his arm like a lady's reticule. To my offer to ease him of a portion of his load, he replied, in a tone of lofty offence, "Sir, I may 'ave my hessentristsies, but I knows purlite-ness. Hif I've a mind to fetch my own beer, what's that to you or hanybody helse? In our spear o' life, we don't ax a cove to come and see us to make a pots on 'im. I thought a young gen'leman ood a larnt more manners." When we reached the waggon, Grimaldi could not help giving one short growl, which plainly said, "Well, I hope, it is all right now, but I can't be sure;" and then the door opened, and I entered my Cave of Mystery and Bower of Bliss, dimly illuminated by the fire-light and one tallow candle in a candlestick that looked, from its size, as if it must belong to Signor Jacopo, although there were no signs of "silver-gilt" splendour in its unburnished brass. The celestial Zephyrine, attired in a high-necked brown merino frock, was laying black-handled knives and forks on a table-cloth curiously mottled with grease and egg and coffee-stains, and stamped with stale arcs and circles that told of overflowing pots of beer. This was somewhat disappointing, but the reception she granted me was worse. She gave me a bland, motherly smile, and bade me find a seat, just as if I had been a bashful little boy, instead of a young gentleman bent on seeing life, and invited to blow a cloud with her professional papa. Mrs. Pogson—her face still unwashed, but her hair for once out of paper, and arranged in ringlets that looked like wheelks just twisted from the shell—was busy at the stove, and nodded her welcome over her fat shoulder. A little frying-pan full of frizzling sausages stood upon the stove, almost pushing off a black saucepan and a pile of willow-pattern plates that were warming there. In front hung a Dutch oven, whence issued a savoury scent of toasting cheese.

Whilst the final preparations for supper were being made, Pab Pog, that he might be wanting in no duty of politeness, explained to me his domesticities. "That's where me and the missis sleeps," he said, pointing to a box-bed at one end of the waggon; "and that's Poll's crib," pointing to an alcove at the other, curtained with pink glazed calico; "an' that's where we keeps our stars," jerking his thumb towards a green-baize curtain which hung along one side, and which kept on bulging out and then suddenly collapsing in a very perplexing fashion.

"The gentlemen is dressing, and will eftsoons appear," Zephyrine majestically interpreted.

A corner of the curtain was lifted up, and Signor Jacopo made his appearance. The little man rubbed his big hands and bowed politely to the ladies, nodded familiarly to his manager, and overwhelmed me with the condescension of his greeting, "You do me pwoud, sah. I have obsairved with gweat satisfaction you-ah youthful pwedilixion faw the dwayma." The Signor evidently prided himself on his swellich lisp and manners, and was regarded by all his caravan-mates as an infallible authority on all points of etiquette. He was a very stylish little gentleman. He had brushed his black locks up into a cock's-comb curl on the top of his big head. He wore a silk-faced pilot-jacket, a double-breasted white waistcoat, a frill to his shirt, and a gilt chain crossed upon it. He sported a massive gold signet-ring also. His green spectacles were discarded, but he was for ever raising and dropping a gilt eye-glass in the most lackadaisical fashion, perking his head on one side at the same time like a bird's.

The giant's entrance did not create a tithe of the sensation which the dwarf's had caused. In a brown coat and waistcoat, corduroy breeches, and grey stockings, all too small for him, he looked far more like an overgrown Smike than a ferocious Blunderbore. His long nose drooped and his shaky knees stood out like a cab-horse's on the stand. His narrow shoulders stooped. Jack the Giant-killer had a bushy pair of whiskers, but Bluebeard had shaved himself as clean as a scraped pig. The dwarf had a bass voice, but the giant piped in the weakest treble. His little head, without the wig, did not look much bigger or hairier than a Dutch cheese. He had a weak mouth, and mild eyes that pleaded for pity and protection in a put-upon, childish way that seemed absurdly droll in such a mountain of a man. I soon found that the giant was the smallest personage in the establishment. "Why, Long Sam, what a time you've been!" said Pab Pog. "Keep in' the comp'ny waitin'. That ain't hettikit, is it, Seenu?"

I could scarcely credit my ears. "Long Sam" the name of the dread Blunderbore in private life!

"Please, I was a-washin' my hands," answered the giant, submissively, and slowly subsided into his seat, as if he was letting himself down through a hole in the floor, but really folding up his long legs like a foot-rule.

"Don't scold him, Pog," said the dwarf, compassionately. "The ladies and you-ah young fwiend must weceive my apologies. Mr. Sam ke-yindly blacked my boots faw me. He is a good fellah."

The giant looked up gratefully, and the dwarf nodded back as who should say, "Conduct yourself as you have hitherto done, and you may rely upon my continued protection."

I should have liked the Signor, had it not been for two things—the obtrusively paternal manner in which, as he imagined, he adapted himself to my capacity by turning the conversation, apropos of nothing, on lollipops and marbles; and the marked attentions which, in a Grand Sultan kind of way, he paid to Zephyrine. It was pleasant to see that she was amused by these attentions, but then it was not so pleasant to see that she was also proud of them. She sat next the Signor; and when I saw her give him a playful tap when he had insisted on helping her to mustard (it circulated in a burly little Dutch burgomaster, with a brown clay body and a pewter hat), I half repented that I had spent such fruitless pains on my "Ode to Zephyrina's Hand"—my rhymes for which had run out when I had got no farther than—

"Tinkling on the tambourine,
Taper-fingered Zephyrine,
By enamoured eyes is seen.

"White as milk in any dairy,
Mightier far than bear-paw hairy,
Though as small as hand of fairy."

The Signor was the recognised wit as well as arbiter elegantiarum of the company. If he asked for salt, Zephyrine giggled, and Mrs. Pogson called out, "Oh, you droll crittur," with tears in her eyes. Pab Pog, who had once been a wit himself—and had got his living by it, too—could not always see the point of Signor Jacopo's jests, but he was as much impressed as his wife and daughter by Signor Jacopo's gentility. The little man, shovelling mashed potatoes into his mouth with his knife, as if he was loading a cart, enlivened our symposium with a record of his romantic adventures in foreign courts. He had dined with empresses, danced with queens, duchesses had fallen desperately in love with him. It was queer at first to note the implicit faith which his comrades put in these wild legends, and queerer still to see how completely, through dint of frequent repetition, the Signor had convinced himself of the historical nature of his mythology. But the atmosphere of credulity soon told upon me. I felt proud of getting into such distinguished company. Professional people had, no doubt, a remarkable gift of adapting themselves to circumstances. They were true gentlemen, who didn't give themselves stuck-up airs, and sneer at sausage because they once feasted to satiety on venison. Who was I, to doubt that the Signor had eaten off gold plate and quaffed Tokay, because he and even the adorable Zephyrine put their knives in their mouths? Pab Pog half swallowed his as if, in spite of his respectability, he was practising a conjurer's trick; the giant hungrily picked his teeth with his fork, and Mrs. Pogson harpooned sausages out of the frying-pan with hers, and held them up at its point to public outcry, with the playful advice, "Now, don't all shout at once, and don't say no if you'd rayther not?"

"A remarkable little man, ain't he?" said Pab Pog, in a confidential aside, confidentially adding, "I hassure you there ain't many—to say nuffink of a young gen'leman o' your age—as I'd grant the privilege to meet him in the spear o' private life. You mustn't mind his chaffin' yer a bit. You see he thinks it was a bit o' liberty o' my part to ax yer to meet him. Chaff! Law bless yer, there's lots as 'ud think it a hhonour far above their desarts to get a word—let alone a joke—from Seenur Jacopo in a convivial sarkle like there 'ere. He's known far and wide in the purfeshn as Gen'leman Jack. They do say he might set in the House o' Lords if he chose to claim his rights. But he's hessenric, he's hessenric, is the Seenur. Anyhow, it won't do for me to rub 'im the wrong way—for he draws uncommon, and he could make 'is hown terms helsewheres. There's lots 'ud be glad to snap 'im hup if hi was fool enough to let 'im slip through my fingers. You see, he's so hairistocratic. When he takes a swig out o' the pewter, he vipes his mouth on the table-cloth afore he drinks, an' then agin afore he sarkilates the fluid."

I was not disposed to dispute the Signor's aristocratic claim, but my loyalty to Zephyrine compelled me to question his exclusive attractiveness. I ventured to suggest that Mr. Pogson's lovely daughter had more to do with the popularity of his entertainment than even his gentlemanly dwarf. "Oh, yes," was the sire's cold acknowledgment of my compliment; "Poll's well enough for a gal, but gals is cheap."

This was unendurable, and so, to aggravate him in return, I, as an experienced member of the play-going public, assured Mr. Pogson that in popular estimation the giant was a far more impressive character than the dwarf.

"Giants," he snorted contemptuously. "Well, if you could get a giant as was a giant, warranted sound in wind and limb, an' with some sort o' 'eadpiece on 'is ugly shoulders, he might be a bit of a ketch. But mostly they runs to legs, and precious bad legs, too. They hain't a mite o' study in 'em. It ain't much Long Sam's got to say, but it took him a heverlastin' long while to learn. They've no inventive genius nayther. Now the Seenur there can gag away as if he'd been in my line. Besides, you see, you can make up a giant if yer ain't got one, but yer can't cut down a dwarf. Kids is no go. They're sharp enough for most dodges, but, you see, yer can't give 'em the hold look about the heyes."

Pab Pog, having thus spoken, suddenly remembered, I suppose, that he was not conversing with a co-professional, and abruptly edged away his chair to join in a discussion, in which the Signor and Mrs. and Miss P. were engaged, as to the date of the Pig-faced Lady's first appearance.

"Excuse me, my deah Ma'm'selle," remarked the gallant dwarf to Zephyrine. "You ah fah too young an' chawmin' to know anything about the mattah. Faw my own paht," he went on, "it is a mystewy to me how such monstwosities can consent to exhibit themselves. It shows sad depwavity of taste, both on theyah paht and that of the Bwedish public."

I was left to amuse myself with Long Sam, who was busy over a plateful of Welsh-rabbit, which Mrs. Pogson had found time to push him in an interval between cooking and conversation. The giant was silently enjoying it. "You see, I know the quanticums," our plump hostess was fond of vaunting when complimented on her culinary skill.

"A pleasant evening, sir," I diffidently observed to my big neighbour.

"Please, I'm a-eatin'," he softly answered, with a sidelong glance of mild reproach. Of course, after that I could only hold my tongue. But presently the giant, who had been for some time chiselling his plate with his knife-point, looked up. "I've a-done now—what is it?"

The abrupt inquiry was mildly put, but still it was startling. I could only repeat, still more diffidently, my previous brilliant observation.

"A pleasant evening?" whispered the giant after me. "I'm sure I'm glad you likes it. But you're young. Not but what the cheese was good; and the sassengers. Taties, p'r'aps, was so-so—they'd got burnt in the bilin'. Mrs. P.'s a good cook, but the stove ain't eal to her abilities. They might ha' skinked my beer, but I'm used to that. I likes my beer, though, with a 'ead on it. Young gen'lman, don't you never git spooney on a gal. I was thought a deal more on till I got sweet on Polly. Folks 'as their feelins, though they is seven foot four. You looks as if you'd run up. Don't you never run to my size, and don't you go for to be sich a hass as to git spooney on a gal. I never said nuffink, but she see it, and Mrs. P. see it, and Pab Pog see it, and the Sig-nore see it, and so they chaffed me. The Sig-nore's sweet on Poll himself—not as he's got a bit better chance—but he's different. He's a-dined w' hempresses—leastways, so he says. He ain't a bad chap, though, if he wasn't allus a-braggin' so about 'is great folk; but then, you see, he's naterally of a swell sort. Anyhow, he allus takes my part. Not as I've much to complain on in the way o' grub an' that. Pog don't grudge a cove 'is keep, and Poll and Mrs. P. was werry kind when I was laid up w' the rheumatiz, and thought I should ha' 'ad to go into the workus. I couldn't hact no more nor Pog could jump through a flap w' his game leg. But then, you see, they don't regard one's feelins. Now that the Sig-nore allus do. Sez he to me one day, 'Sam,' sez he, in his perlite way, 'don't lets 'ave no words. You're spooney on Miss P. Don't you go on a-bein' spooney. She's the hempress o' my 'cart—me that 'as kissed live hempresses—but not w' my consent shall she part old friends. You an' I, Sam,' sez he, 'as got on like a 'ouse afire, an' it shan't be my fault if our friendship's squenched. You've got no fault, Sam'—so he was pleased to say—'cept that you're too good-natured, an' snore a bit too loud till I wakes yer hup w' the walkin'-stick.' (My bunk's a-top o' his, you see, an' he takes the stick to bed w' him, an' stirs me hup through the battens, when I begins to beller.) 'So, lookee here, Sam. I don't want to hurt yer in mind, body, nor hestate. But I might be forced to, if you was to think hany more about my Polly.' She ain't 'is Polly, and never will be nayther; but we've got on werry smooth since that. Still it ain't pleasant to be hordered about by the Sig-nore, though he do respec' one's feelins—'cept when him and the gal is a-pinchin' an' a-pokin' of me in the show. Don't you never run to my size."

I had then another rival; but he, like myself, was slighted, and so my heart softened towards him. I felt very slighted just at that moment. The Signor was smoking a cigar, Pab Pog was puffing away at a highly respectable churchwarden clay; but, though I had been expressly invited to take a pipe, no pipe had been offered me. "Don't you smoke, Mr. — Mr. — Blunderbore?" I sympathetically inquired.

"Oh, I shall 'ave my rig'lation pipe bimeby—p'raps two, as it's a noliday. It's on'y fine gen'lomen as 'asn't hovergrewed theirselves as is privileged to smoke Hawannahs. An' my name ain't Blunderbore, nor more nor he's a Sig-nore."

The giant thought that he had made a joke, and, as I saw that I was expected to laugh, I laughed accordingly.

Long Sam went on in temporarily raised spirits:—"Ikey Jacob's 'is right name, an' Sam'l Cole is mine. P'raps my folks was as good as 'is, though I'm not for hever-lastin' blowin' about 'em. I wouldn't a-said a word agin my hold dad, if 'e'd on'y a-wrung my neck as soon as I was born. I used to like it at fust, bein' a-showed about, but I'm sick an' tired on it now. You see, I've no wariety. I'm a-made little on in the show, an' I'm a-made little on in 'ere. Afore I come to Pog, I'd a cage to myself like the wild beastes. But now the Sig-nore's hevery-body. If it wasn't for the gal, I'd cut. Don't you never git sweet upon a gal, an' don't you run to my size. It'll cost such a sight for your cawfin if ye're a swell, an' if ye've got to arn yer livin', yer can on'y do it in this 'ere heathenish sort o' way. If I was to try to do a hhonest stroke o' work, I should 'ave all the boys a-mobbin of me; an' I hain't been hinside a church, not since I was so 'igh. I wish I was dead, I do. Eatin' an' drinkin' 's my on'y comfort. I likes a pipe, too, but Pog 'lowances me, 'cos he says smokin' ain't good for my constitooshun."

Just then, however, Pog pushed the tobacco-jar over to his retainer, and invited him to charge. Long Sam clutched it like a child pouncing on a sugarstick, and drawing an old meerschaum out of his breast-pocket, rammed and crammed it with shag to the utmost limit of its capacity. When he had lighted the black wig that curled high above the turban of his mahogany-checked Turk's head, and Zephyrine, moreover, had handed him a tumblerful of rum-and-water, the giant forgave the hard fate that had made him seven foot four, and puffed and sipped in silent complacency. By way of jest compliment, I was then at last invited to take a pipe, but cruel Zephyrine indignantly negatived the proposal, with uncomplimentary maternal anxiety for my welfare.

"For shame, par," she exclaimed. "What would his mar say? You wouldn't like to make the boy sick!"

There was some almost equally unpleasant controversy, too, as to whether I was to be allowed to touch the spirits and water. The Signor suggested that Mrs. Pogson might possibly have some "waspbewy vinegah aw ginjah wine." He had not an intimate acquaintance with the "highly respectable middle classes," but those, he believed, were the "festive bevewages of the childwen of the uppah sarcles."

Pab Pog, however, cut this controversy short by shouting, "Hang it all, I 'on't have a friend stinted at my table. A thimbleful o' grog can't hurt nobody."

"That it don't," chimed in Mrs. P., availing herself of the opportunity to tilt the bottle once more into her own tumbler.

"Hettikit be blowed," went on Pab Pog. "Ain't we a-jollifyin'? Dror hup, gen'lmen hall, an' let's be convivial. Seenur, you propose a sentiment, an' then Long Sam 'll sing us a song. He hain't sich a bad woice, hif e'd hon'y got a bit more on it."

The Signor mounted on his chair. He smirked and hemmed, and ran his fingers through his Brutus curl. Then he pulled down his wristbands, and leaning on the table with the bridges he had made of the thumb and forefinger of each hand, he once more cleared his voice, and thus delivered himself, "Ladies and gentlemen—my esteemed Mrs. Pogson, lovely Miss Pogson, my young fwiend, if he will pahmit me so to call him, whose name at pwesent I do not pweecesely wecollect, fwiend Pog, whom I have known for many wolling yeahs, and you, my honest Sam, who shaah my pwofessional labaws and my pwivate bedwoom—it is needless, I am shaw, faw me to say how pwoud I am to be made the spokesman of this united company. I may have moved in fah diffent scenes, but I have a haht that thwobs at the sight of lovely woman, innocent youth, and manly couwage, wherevah I may meet them. Nachaw may have given me pahsonal advantages which she has cwuelly denied to some. Fawtune may have bestowed on me social advantages which othahs have not been pwivileged to enjy, but my haht is in its wight place, and I hahtily thank you, my fwiends, faw all you-ah past ke-yindness and you-ah pwesent ke-yind weception. I call upon you now to chawge you-ah glasses—at pwesent we have no wine, but wum will do as well—and dwink with me this sentiment, 'May the pwesent be the most misewable moment of our lives!'"

"Didn't I tell yer the Seenur 'ad the gift o' the gab uncommon?" whispered Pab Pog, as he made the glasses dance on the thumped table. "Hain't he a style, too? There ain't many o' them Parliament chaps could 'old a candle to 'im, I reckon."

When Long Sam had sung his song like a mammoth piping bullfinch, and Zephyrine had danced the sailors' hornpipe, as well as the brown merino and cramped space would permit, Mr. Pogson, who was growing sentimental, exclaimed, "Now this is what I call a hintellecschal way o' spendin' a hevenin'. I'm a respectable man, an' likes to enjy myself in a respectable manner. I've took a fancy to this 'ere wicinity. 'Cept at fair times, it's so precious sleepy. The hold churches and things is soothin' to a man as knocks about the world as I does. I likes to lay up 'ere afore Heaster. When I takes my walks abroad I sees the flowers hall a-blowin', hall a-growin', in the gardings, an' I 'ears the birds a-singin', an' I thinks o' when I vos a by. My mother, poor old gal, used to like to 'ear the birds a-singin'. Her an' me used to tramp out to Hilford of a Sunday a-purpose. It's nice, too, not to 'ave to do nuffink, jist as hif yer was a se-vell, when yer thinks on it at bed-time. An' yet I can't 'elp lookin' for'ard to the fair. 'Ereabouts the beaks an' parsons is reas'nable gen'lemen, an' doesn't 'ound a hhonest man about as hif 'e was a wagabone. They does in some places. It's fair flyin' in the face o' Providence, sez I. What was janiuses like the Seenur made for if they wasn't to be showed? But come, young gen'leman, it's time you was a-bed. Say good-night to the comp'ny, an' I'll see yer past the dawg."

Whilst I was lingering at the door, shaking hands with the lovely Zephyrine, and thanking her for about the twentieth time for the delightful evening I had spent in the Blue Waggon, Long Sam stooped over me like a giraffe, to whisper in my ear once more, "You're young. Don't you never run to my size, and don't you go for to be sich a hass as to get spooney on a gal."
